Since the reform is an economy measure, there is little doubt of overall public support. But the Lindsay administration also wishes to be defined as sympathetic to the poor, not as drawing the purse strings more tightly about their necks. And so the new economy has been couched in a series of pieties to the effect that an automatic disbursement plan rather than discretionary grants will reduce paperwork, freeing welfare workers to counsel and guide recipients along the path to "rehabilitation." This definition will also be received favorably by the public. Americans are always prepared to believe that poverty results from individual defects, not social and economic injustices, and the Lindsay administration seems prepared to pander to that belief if it will keep the fiscal lid on welfare. But recipients who have now learned to organize and fight the welfare system may not submit any longer to the preachments of case workers. Indeed, the movement may soon demand that welfare workers stay out of the ghettos and barrios, thus putting a halt to routine invasions of recipients' homes which take place under the guise of establishing rapport and conducting rehabilitation (in probable violation of the Fourth Amendment).

Far more important than immediate economies in the planning of the city is its hope that by this "reform" it can dissipate the welfare organizing movement and avert the trouble the movement has already created for New York officialdom. Recurrent demonstrations at local welfare centers have generated one incident after another with welfare workers and police, each episode being a threat to the tranquillity of the ghettos. Welfare officials have complained in the press that the movement virtually controls some of the local centers, and there is much truth in the charge. In recent actions, they have driven case workers out of the centers, taking over desks and files, and spent the day reading the department's dossiers on them and other recipients. Once the financial benefits which mobilized large numbers of people are eliminated, officials hope that the movement will wither away. Hugh H. Jones, chairman of the State Board of Social Welfare, announced recently that the flat-grant program would both "stabilize outgoing expenditures" and "very seriously handicap" the welfare recipients' movement. With the movement weakened, the welfare system can presumably regularize the operation of its local centers, and re-establish effective control over the clients who depend on it. In the long run, too, welfare economies depend on such control.

Recipient leaders also understand that the flat-grant reform could cripple their movement. They know that it is their success in producing money that has built and emboldened their constituencies, and so a search is under way to find new means for prying loose substantial sums for substantial numbers of the welfare poor.

A tentative decision has been reached. In early fall, the movement plans to mount a "spend the rent" campaign. By using their rent money for other purposes, welfare clients can circumvent the flat grant. What the city saves by restricting grants for clothing and furniture, the clients can make up from the rent money which is included in their regular welfare checks. In any case, the condition of slum housing is cause enough for a rent strike, and the movement is likely to find many in the ghetto who will join in this new strategy.

Rent strikes have been tried before in New York, but have usually bogged down in cumbersome legalistic procedures. In the 1963-64 rent strike, for example, organizers tried to follow the complex statutes governing rent withholding. The law prescribed an elaborate bureaucratic course, and the courts interpreted the law rigidly. Judges admitted only the inspection records of the Department of Buildings as evidence of hazardous violations. To obtain those records, organizers had first to fill out forms, then arrange and follow up appointments for inspections, then check housing agency files to make sure that hazardous violations had in fact been posted. Meanwhile the organizers also had to make sure that rents withheld by tenants from the landlord were being collected and deposited in private escrow accounts. Finally, organizers had to shepherd tenants through the courts. And when they got there, it often turned out that violations were mysteriously missing from the official records. When the tenants lost in court, as they usually did, their escrow funds were turned over to the landlord; if by some chance they won, the money was turned over to the clerk of the court, to be given to the landlord after repairs were made. In no case did the tenants keep the money.

The bureaucratic rites by which housing repairs were to be exacted exhausted organizers and bewildered tenants. To make agency procedures work on your behalf you need money, expertise and political influence—resources which landlords possess and tenants do not. Thus landlords exploited the intricacies of bureaucratic procedure and the corruptibility of bureaucratic officials to evade or overcome the challenge from tenants. Even rare victories in the courts yielded tenants only minor—and short-lived—improvements. Since it could not produce repairs quickly or multiply them widely, the strike attracted few tenants and developed little political force.

Welfare leaders know by now not to repeat these mistakes. First, they will tell people to keep the rent money and to spend it for clothing and household furnishings. There will be no escrow accounts. Then it will prepare tenants to meet retaliation on the stoop, not in the courtroom where they would lose. People will be trained in tactics to resist evictions, such as sitting on the furniture, crowding hallways so the furniture cannot be removed, and putting it back if it is removed. That the welfare clients' movement in New York is now strong enough, and bold enough, for such tactics should be evident from the recent flat-grant protests at City Hall, where mothers with children in their arms rushed police barricades and screamed angrily at policemen charging on horses.

The city hopes to stop the recurrent disorders in welfare centers by its flat-grant reform. But evictions will provoke street confrontations with the police and marshals, and may constitute an even greater threat to placidity in the ghettos. Ironically, if the welfare movement succeeds in mounting a widespread and prolonged rent strike, some of the credit will have to go to the "reform" which forced the movement to intensify its tactics, and angered the poor enough so that they were ready to take up the challenge.

HARRY GOLDEN

Jewish apathy is a frustrating, ever-present factor which clouds the future of Jewish-Negro relationships as the Negro fights for his place in the American society. That is the conclusion of a rabbinical student, Laurence Lauer, based on a ten-week study of the poor in Milwaukee's inner city. His report appeared in a story in the National Jewish Post (September 13).

Lauer served as an "intern" with a summer-liaison project, part of a program inaugurated by the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion; four cities, Milwaukee among them, accepted the students for the work. Lauer and his bride spent their honeymoon living in the Milwaukee central city, surrounded by heavily Negro population. He attended meetings of Negro organizations wherever he would be admitted, listened to the leaders airing their problems to the "establishment" or carrying the results of such conferences back to their people.

He thus reinforced his previous idea that so-called Negro anti-Semitism is basically only an anti-white attitude rather than something directed specifically against the Jew. On the other hand, the traditional role of Jewish civil rights organizations in bringing help to the Negro has made little or no impression on either the Negro or Jew, Lauer said. And he could find no ordinary Jewish citizens who seemed to care whether the Negro made progress or not. The Jewish community remains uncommitted, apart, unknowing and uninvolved.

This fact alone, he warned, will help to increase the gap between the Jewish community and Jewish youth, because today's educated young Jews are increasingly nonreligious and committed to aid the poor and the black.

In only a few instances did Lauer have occasion to approach Jewish merchants or citizens directly in the inner city, seeking help for the Negro. In one attempt he tried to get some merchants to invest idle funds in a Negro credit union formed to aid the poor. The merchants would not deposit funds because for the time being little or no interest was promised on savings, and he could convince no one that the effort would be good for the community. One merchant bragged of his relationships with Negroes, but Lauer noticed that he had surrounded his store entrances with the latest protection devices. Lauer felt that mistrust of the residents was being excessively advertised.

In 1955 I urged the B'nai B'rith to organize help for the Negro. I said that for the first time in 1,500 years we had an opportunity to fight for democracy in a situation where we are not the target of oppression, and that when you fight for others you build a wall of security around yourself. I urged them to put an ad in all the big papers of America saying that we Jews, as a community, would use our funds and our energies, and our social-action know-how in the fight for the Negro, because the Negro has indeed given the Jews a free ride, the biggest free ride in history. They have gone into the courts of America and proved that the Constitution means what it says. And in this respect they have served the Jews as well as all other Americans. This free ride hasn't cost the Jews anything.

At a lecture in Grossinger's a lady said to me, "Mr. Golden, why do you always talk about civil rights? What have the Negroes ever done for us? Anyway they are all anti-Semites."

I said, "Lady, as soon as the Negroes have a Grossinger's I'll stop talking about civil rights. And anyway a Negro anti-Semite is about as convincing as a Jewish white supremacist."

Lauer's complaint that the Jews are not interested in the Negro bespeaks the secularization of their religion. The rabbi has lost his classical function as a teacher, the laity has taken over. It was the same with the Protestant sects in the South when their churches backed away from the moral issue in 1954 and the ministers were told to "stick to religion, leave politics and controversial issues alone." How many Protestant clergymen lost their jobs because they said a word about the battle between 1955 and 1960 will never be known. I know of at least twenty who were fired.

If Lauer succeeds in awakening the Jewish community on behalf of the Negro he will have served the Negroes and America, but mostly he will have served the Jews.

TALKS WITH THE VIETNAMESE

MARILYN B. YOUNG

Mrs. Young is research associate at the Center for Chinese Studies, University of Michigan.

Some time in early June, Dave Dellinger and Robert Greenblatt had discussed the possibility of holding a large peace conference of intellectuals in Paris. By late August the proposal was more modest: five American academics would, at their own expense, go to Paris and, meeting with the North Vietnamese delegation, discuss such matters as seemed fruitful to bring up. We were an oddly homogeneous group despite differences in age, temperament, specific political approach and experience: Jonathan Mirsky, professor of Chinese at Dartmouth and head of its East Asia Center; George Kahin, head of Cornell University's Southeast Asia program; Douglas Dowd, professor of economics at Cornell; Howard Zinn, professor of political science at Boston University, and myself. What bound us together was a desire to make the trip serve the cause of peace in Vietnam. We were not likely to succeed where so many had failed, but the idea of merely exchanging pleasantries with the North Vietnamese appealed to none of us. We could not quite get rid of a deep hope that our trip would somehow make a difference. We wanted to get from the North Vietnamese a clear statement of their position, a confirmation of what many observers saw as de-escalation on their part, an understanding of why the peace talks were so hopelessly stalled and what might be done to propel them. We got all of these things. That it will make any difference remains to be seen.

The North Vietnamese live and work in a large compound which was once a school named after Maurice Thorez. It is in the suburb of Choisy-le-Roi, whose elegant mayoral residence is occupied by a Communist. Every afternoon at five o'clock the French car-pool drivers and the Vietnamese staff members play a vigorous game of volley ball. Throughout the day one hears the soft thud of bocce balls. The compound is a complete world: not a bit of Vietnam transferred to Paris (in our meeting room there were only a few Vietnamese objects, and they seemed to have been tacked upon the wall in much the way a lonely person tacks up pictures of his family), but an anonymous place which would retain no memories of the Vietnamese once they were gone. We asked Mr. Oanh, head of the North Vietnamese Peace Committee, if he had had much opportunity to enjoy Paris. His answer was brief: "No, I have too much work. Besides, what is there to see? Paris is a city like any other." Since we were, all of us, overwhelmed by the beauty of the city in this soft, late summer, the reply sounded almost like a rebuke. Being in Paris was no pleasure for Mr. Oanh, or for anyone else in that compound. It was an irrelevance; they wanted to go home.

Our first meeting took place on the afternoon of the day we arrived, September 5. It was a long, hard session of questions. The Vietnamese wished to know what was the meaning of Chicago; was there an alliance between McCarthy, McGovern and Kennedy, and would it continue even after Chicago; did the American public understand what was happening in Paris, and so on. We answered as best we could, describing Chicago and its possible consequences; the powerfully negative effect of the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia; the widespread confusion about the significance of the Paris talks; our speculation on Johnson's alternatives and likely choices. The Vietnamese listened politely, took notes, asked more specific questions, and then invited questions from us. These were carefully written down, assurances were given that there would be time to answer them in full, and we filed into an adjoining room for dinner.

The room was strictly functional and, except for an attractive photograph of Ho Chi Minh at his most patriarchal, without decoration. I sat next to a Southerner, Tran Cong Tuong, head of the Association of Vietnamese Lawyers, a plump and genial man whose very amiability misled me. He looked like the still affluent Shanghai exiles one meets in Hong Kong and Taipei, men whose ability to operate allows them to thrive against all adversity, men who delight, for reasons hard to fathom, in entertaining whatever Westerner they come across, however unimportant he may be. But when Mr. Tuong had finished heaping my plate with food, he began to talk about other conferences—at which he had been a delegate—Geneva in 1954 and again in 1962 over Laos. He spoke with wry bitterness of the closing session of the 1954 conference, when the head of each delegation rose to give his government's position. "Oh yes," Mr. Tuong said, "I will always remember Bedell Smith. . . . We knew then the difficulties ahead of us." I told Mr. Tuong that no more than a handful of Americans had then had any notion of the possible meaning of Bedell Smith's speech. He nodded silently. There was a pause during which he again overburdened my dinner plate. Then, rather suddenly, he told me that his wife had been killed by the French, that his second wife lived and worked in the jungle so as to avoid American bombs, that the history of his country had been one of war and death for so long. He left abruptly after dinner and I had no chance to tell him—what?—how sorry I was, how helpless?

After dinner Minister Xuan Thuy joined us briefly. Since the Vietnamese delegation worked closely as a committee he would leave the task of answering our questions to two members whom we had already met—Nguyen Thanh Le, principal spokesman for the delegation in Paris, and Nguyen Minh Vy, a deputy of the National Assembly. He wanted only to tell us, as friends, a few things. Thuy is a well-dressed, confident and compactly built man. His speech, even in translation, is succinct and forceful. He was eager to disabuse us of any notion that the Vietnamese were delaying the talks in the hope of getting a better deal from a new administration. The Viet-name. Thuy explained, "have never accepted peace as a law of nature." They were ready to fight for as long as necessary. The issue, in Paris, was simple: the United States must unconditionally end all bombing and other acts of war against the North. As soon as that occurred, negotiations on substantive matters would begin. It made no sense to speak of the Vietnamese as deliberately delaying the talks. They awaited an American decision. Indeed, as far as Thuy could see, the platforms of the Republican and Democratic Parties on Vietnam were substantially the same; both reaffirming current Administration policy.

The basic themes we were to hear again and again from Vy and Le were laid out by Thuy that night. The North Vietnamese did not seek peace on any terms. A peace which looked to permanent partition or the continuation of a "new colonialism" through a puppet government in Saigon was no peace at all. Peace must be based on genuine independence and a respect for Vietnam's territorial integrity. Thuy, and the other members of his delegation, stressed that it was in such a peace as they sought that American honor lay. It was evident that, listening to the repeated demands by Johnson and others for an "honorable peace," the North Vietnamese had come to believe that the notion of national honor has great significance for the American people. It is a concept they well appreciate and they attempted to allay the American public's presumed concern.

Thuy insisted that his country respected America's honor and its people's long tradition of freedom. Vietnam had no desire to humiliate the United States. Indeed, how could a country as small as his humiliate a "great power"? No, Thuy reflected, only by making peace could American honor be served, only then could America escape the "onus of being a bully. . . . Johnson's notion of honor is not to withdraw but to stay in Vietnam. We cannot accept that. Johnson himself has lost America's honor." Vietnam, Thuy assured us, is a country which knows how to "behave correctly with those who are correct with us." The French had been fought and beaten, against all odds. Now relations between the two countries were good. It could be the same with America.

Thuy had brought an atmosphere of formality to the meeting which disappeared when he left. Our exhaustion was obvious and the Vietnamese agreed to meet with us again the next day, rather than attempt any further discussion that night. The second session lasted more than five hours, during which time Mr. Vy and Mr. Le answered our questions, interrupting each other in their desire to make their case plain, but turning aside our often clumsy efforts to get them to say more than they wished. Le is a thin, fragile, scholarly-looking man. He smiles easily and broadly but his speech is always calm, almost passive. Vy, a Southerner and descendant of princes, is quick and passionate. He speaks with large and insistent gestures. When he learned that George Kahin had been in South Vietnam recently, he began at once to ask questions—how did this look, or that? Then he sighed hugely. Vietnam, he explained, was one, yet he missed the South. Hue was "the most beautiful place I have ever seen. I don't know if it is as it was before. I don't see how it could resist the bombing." That was why, he continued, "this problem concerns us in our very hearts. And that is why it is absurd to demand conditions from us." Mr. Vy said he had heard that the people of the United States "cherished" the city of Boston. Yet Hue had been destroyed. How could Harriman continue to demand reciprocity? "We haven't touched even a needle or a thread of the United States."

Both Vy and Le discussed the issue of reciprocity at length. It is an important one for Americans to understand. The Vietnamese feel that they cannot grant reciprocity in return for a total bombing halt in the North. They maintain that they are the victims of a foreign intrusion and must, perforce, defend themselves wherever necessary. To trade off action in the South for a halt of bombing in the North would, step by step, grant the United States everything—without even negotiating. For we could, bit by bit, exchange de-escalation in the North for their reciprocal action in the South, without at all reducing our own military activities in that area. In the end, the United States would be, as it apparently wishes to be, in total control of the South. A truly reciprocal response to an end of bombing in North Vietnam would be an end to bombing in North America.

Only one other point was made with equal insistence: the Vietnamese had come to Paris for one purpose alone, to determine the time and manner of an unconditional halt to the bombing and other acts of war against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam. The United States had given the Vietnamese no reason to think that this was not clearly understood. Thus our agreement to go to Paris was taken as an implicit acceptance of the notion that the bombing would end. Instead, four months and twenty sessions later, there had been no progress whatsoever.

And during that period, the North Vietnamese had watched with growing distress the deliberate effort of the American delegation to "sow confusion" everywhere. For example, Vy complained, instead of concentrating on the single issue of bombing, Harriman had raised an aimless series of topics—restoration of the DMZ, a reduction of troop infiltration, respect for the neutrality of Laos and Cambodia, etc. Mr. Vy did not object, in principle, to discussing any of these. All were legitimate subjects for consideration—once the bombing had been halted. Mr. Le broke in to describe the intense efforts of the American delegation to get the Vietnamese to swallow reciprocity in one form or another. "It is like a man who can't eat cheese, and is offered Camembert when he has just refused Chèvres. Cheese is cheese."

What of de-escalation? Mr. Harriman frequently told them of President Johnson's major de-escalatory move on March 31. In fact, Mr. Vy explained, Johnson had simply realized that bombing all of North Vietnam had not proved effective. His calculation, ingenious if brutal, was to concentrate and intensify the bombing on a smaller area. Nor was the restricted area an unpopulated wasteland, as the American people had apparently been led to believe. More than 4 million people lived between the 17th and 20th Parallels, 25 per cent of the total population. Later, Mr. Le gave us statistics on the bombing "frenzy" currently under way. Before March 31, the average monthly bombing raids on all of North Vietnam were 2,500. By May, raids between the 17th and 20th Parallels alone numbered 4,700 and by August, 6,500. The tonnage of explosive bombs dropped monthly showed a similar increase, from 21,000 in May to 73,000 by the end of July. In August, 211 out of 426 villages in Nghe An were bombed, in Ha Tinh, 217 out of 250 villages were hit, in Quang Binh, 124 out of 131, and all twenty-three villages of the small province of Vinh Linh near the DMZ were bombed. Coinciding with the harvest season, anti-personnel fragmentation bombs increased from 250,000 in May to 1,350,000 in August. Doing a quick calculation, Professor Dowd remarked to me that over the four-month period (May to August) one fragmentation bomb had been dropped for every man, woman and child living between those Parallels.*

H. Zander, Toronto Star

Mr. Vy noted that instead of allowing the "majority of Vietnamese to sleep tranquilly," as he had assured the American people he would, Mr. Johnson had escalated the war not only in the North but in the South. There had been an increase in B-52 attacks, 40,000 additional American troops had arrived, the Thai contingent was reinforced, and the South Vietnamese army had similarly been increased. To claim, as Johnson did, that these moves had been planned before May and therefore could not be taken as escalation, was absurd. Plans can always be canceled.

Looking angry and puzzled, Mr. Vy said he was "uneasy" about President Johnson. Why did he distort everything so completely? Why was a guerrilla who threw a grenade called a terrorist, "while B-52s are carpetbombing in the North and the South and no one calls the man who sent them a terrorist? If we Vietnamese call this bombing a barbarous act, we are accused of misusing the language."

The proper use of language is important to the Vietnamese. Having, as forcefully as possible, established the right of all Vietnamese to defend themselves anywhere in their country, having dismissed as utterly unacceptable any possibility of reciprocity, they were ready to point to recent actions in South Vietnam as evidence of their "good will." Only in this context did they discuss, and stress, events in the South. Early in June, Mr. Le told us, Harriman had made ambiguous reference to the possibility that a halt in the rocketing of Saigon might lead to the cessation of American bombing. For sixty-six days, beginning on June 21, those rocket attacks did cease; but the only American response was an intensification of the air war, North and South.

Le's plain statement that the rocketing of Saigon had been halted as an "act of good will" is of major importance. Moreover, the Vietnamese asked us to consider the meaning of American casualty statistics. In early May they had averaged between 400 and 500 per week. During June, July and August, the figure dropped to about 100, despite an increase in American sweeps in the Mekong Delta and elsewhere. "Tell the people the truth as it is," Vy insisted. Only "obstinacy" prevents Johnson from seeing the "objective reality of the situation in the South."

In response to our questions, Mr. Le discussed Edward Kennedy's speech of August 21 (we met before Arthur Goldberg's statement, which would have served a similar purpose). Both Le and Vy expressed approval of Kennedy's approach to the problem. He had understood, and they cited his words, that the United States must "make an end to this war, not five or ten years from now; not after the expenditure of another $100 billion and the lives of another 25,000 of our finest sons; but as quickly as it is physically possible to reach the essential agreements. . . . Specifically, our government should undertake as soon as possible: first, to end unconditionally all bombing of North Vietnam." As for Kennedy's other points, the Vietnamese were more than ready to discuss them, and any other questions, when the bombing and other acts of war (naval bombardment, etc.) ended.

"The United States," Le said quietly, "cannot subdue us. We have lived under the French and the Japanese and know the fate of those who lose their independence. We have gone through days when we lived as cattle, without permitting ourselves to stand up straight in front of our oppressors. But since 1945 we have stood up and 'under our feet is the soil and above us the heavens.'" Vietnam was one country. The retention of a puppet government in the South would not be tolerated. (How, Vy wished to know, did Johnson square his sense of honor with his support of—and words failed him for a moment—hoologans and scoundrels like Thieu and Ky?) Self-determination could not occur under the guns of foreign troops. As the NLF had repeatedly stressed, questions concerning South Vietnam alone would be dealt with by the South Vietnamese. The issue of reunification, a different order of problem, would be discussed by both North and South.

*The figures given are from North Vietnamese sources, but we were reminded by Mr. Le that Secretary of Defense Clifford had, before a Congressional committee, confirmed that the number of sorties flown over the North had doubled to a figure of 10,000 since the President's announcement.

It was almost eight o'clock in the evening and none of us had eaten. The session was clearly drawing to a close. For the first time I was reminded that the North Vietnamese were Communists as well as nationalists. Full of good feeling for us, they tried to reassure us. As intellectuals we had had the "righteousness and straightforwardness" to oppose the war. In some circumstances "intellectuals play an important and glorious role." We were not, in short, to feel badly about our class background.

"The struggle for the truth," a Vietnamese proverb runs, "is itself the truth." A comforting thought, if human lives did not hang on it. We drove through the quiet streets of Choisy-le-Roi to the light and movement of Paris. The North Vietnamese had stated their case with precision, with a minimum of rhetoric, with understanding for the peculiarities of the American situation. For hours we worked on a statement which, as simply as possible, set forth their position to the American public. Confident that, after all, we were bringing back something which would justify the trip, we held a press conference in New York. We made three points:

(1) The North Vietnamese had come to Paris with the clear understanding that the first step would be to determine quickly the date upon which all United States bombing and other acts of war against the North would stop, and that only then would substantive talks take place. The American decision to come to Paris signified for the North Vietnamese a readiness on the part of the United States to stop the bombing. Instead there had been a steady escalation of the war since May.

(2) While rejecting reciprocity, the North Vietnamese have recently taken significant steps to show their desire to move forward to substantive negotiations. As evidence of this, their delegation pointed to the sixty-six-day halt in the rocketing of Saigon and the dramatic decrease in American casualties between May and September.

(3) Like Senator Kennedy, they stressed that the cessation of the bombing, since it would lead directly to substantive negotiations on peace, would save American lives, not risk them.

Four reporters listened to us. Two took notes, plainly skeptical that what we said had any news value; a third was so unaware of the issues that he couldn't seem to take notes at all, and the fourth began to debate with us the legitimacy of the war. Afterward, there was a brief but successful C.B.S.-TV interview. Our statement has received only scant newspaper coverage. Our TV interview was never put on the air. A major part of the American people continues to believe that Vietnamese obstinacy alone holds up the talks, that on March 31, Johnson substantially reduced the bombing, that the Vietnamese, foolishly, postpone progress in vain hope of a change on the American political scene.

The Vietnamese, who are fond of proverbs, offered us one as we left: Lies first ruin their author. That may be, but while the lies go on, Vietnam is being destroyed—and so, perhaps, is the United States.

SOCIALIST CONFERENCE

SEARCH FOR RELEVANCE

MARVIN E. GETTLEMAN

Mr. Gettleman teaches history at the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. He is the editor of an anthology, Vietnam (Fawcett) and more recently, with David Mermelstein, The Great Society Reader: The Failure of American Liberalism (Random House).

The Socialist Scholars Conference, founded in 1964 by a group of Rutgers historians, held its fourth annual meeting at the university's New Brunswick campus from September 7 to 9. The original call had been for a conference of "scholars who share a Socialist perspective." No rigid definition of membership was established. "We do not propose to examine closely anyone's credentials. Whoever thinks he might be at home or interested will be welcome." Many hundreds of interested persons did gather in early September, 1965, at Columbia University to participate in the first Socialist Scholars Conference. In 1966 and 1967, meetings were again held, and increased attendance attested to the revived interest in socialism. (See "What Is a Socialist?" by James O'Connor, The Nation, October 4, 1965, and "Marx and Shame: Socialism Today" by Harvey Swados, The Nation, October 10, 1966.)

The meetings followed the format of such other scholarly bodies as the American Historical Association and the Modern Language Association, where formal papers and commentators make up the panels. Over the years, conference papers and discussions have covered a wide variety of subjects: working-class life and poverty, American conservatism, literary realism, the media, the welfare state, origins of the cold war, blacks in the United States, the Marxist-Catholic dialogue, Marxian theory, radicals and hippies. Many of these have subsequently appeared in such journals as Monthly Review, Science and Society, Partisan Review, the now defunct Studies on the Left and in a number of anthologies.

Despite the importance and excellence of much of this scholarship, dissatisfaction with the conference has begun to develop. A number of groups on the left have complained that their particular "tendency" was inadequately represented; they were not mollified on being informed that the conference's policy is to invite participants not on the basis of factional representation but rather on that of demonstrated scholarly talent. Scores of people criticized the decision to hold the 1966 and 1967 conferences in hotels. As hippie activist Abby Hoffman put it during the third conference at the New York Hilton: "You can't tell the Socialists from the capitalists." However, this choice was forced upon the organizers by the refusal of many universities in the New York area to provide facilities.

The steering committee wisely returned the conference to an academic setting in 1968, although it meant moving out of New York City. Also, this year, an ambitious attempt was made to organize the conference around a unifying theme—"The Socialist Perspective in the Advanced Countries." The program included panel discussion on five topics: the role of intellectuals in social change, the history of the American working class, Black Power and socialism, the contemporary working class and neo-capitalism, and a final provocative session devoted to exploring the preconditions for a mass Socialist party in the United States. The smaller attendance at the Rutgers meeting (about 550 compared with more than 2,000 in 1966) made possible lengthy discussions of the issues raised, with extensive audience participation. Debate was vigorous, if not always on a high scholarly plane.

One subject that generated particular interest this year was the role of the contemporary working class in the advanced countries. Ernest Mandel, a Belgian Marxist scholar and journalist, predicted that this class, eclipsed for the past two decades, would soon reassume the revolutionary role assigned to it by Marx. Most of Mandel's empirical evidence came from the events in France during last May and June, in which he himself was so active as to be expelled from the country. Mandel's theoretical assumptions derived from the Marxian concept of alienation—the situation of the worker who is forced to sell his labor as a commodity. None of the changes in the conditions of work since Marx's time (the shift to white collar, the service jobs, the increased wages) has fundamentally altered man's relation to the productive process. In Mandel's view, the basic work situation in advanced capitalist countries still results in a dissatisfaction that under certain circumstances may become revolutionary discontent.

Mandel's interpretation, based partly upon "faith" and "confidence" in the ultimate revolutionary destiny of the working class, did not go unchallenged. It was argued that automation has rendered this class obsolescent. Another critic doubted that advanced capitalism would fall into the serious troubles that Mandel's predictions assumed. Mandel responded with data and conclusions drawn from his experience and close examination of the French uprisings. Strikers there not only occupied factories but raised demands for worker control of the productive process. Such demands were inherently revolutionary. Of course, the French "revolution" of May-June was contained by the adroit maneuvers of the de Gaulle regime, aided by the conservatism of established trade union leadership and the Communist party. Nevertheless, Mandel saw these events as proof that the industrial working class could still exert revolutionary influence. His analysis was rich with historical allusions and subtle political insights. He did not apply Marxian concepts mechanically but in a stirring and creative manner which pointed clearly to the political work that Socialists need to do in the decades ahead. His presentation was the high point of the Rutgers conference.

Mandel's participation in this year's conference continued a policy of inviting distinguished European Socialists to the meetings. In 1967, two Soviet scholars, Yuri Zemoshkin and Timur Timofeev of the Institute of the World Labor Movement in Moscow, delivered papers. That year also, Owen Lattimore, now at the University of Leeds, spoke elegantly on contemporary Asia at the dinner meeting. In 1966, the late Isaac Deutscher, biographer of Trotsky and Stalin and the author of many books on Soviet affairs, gave a memorable talk "On Socialist Man." Thus, one of the major functions of the conference has been to reaffirm Socialist internationalism by bringing the European and American movements closer together.

Mandel this year and Isaac Deutscher in 1966 both called for intensive effort to win the working class to socialism, but in the United States many Socialists have written off the workers as hopelessly wedded to the capitalist status quo. Special characteristics of American workers which engender this pessimism about their revolutionary role were discussed in a conference session on "New Thoughts on the Historiography of the American Working Class." Prof. Herbert Gutman of the University of Rochester offered a provocative analysis of the enduring pattern of conflict and violence within American labor history. He suggested that in most industrializing countries, as for example England, "the painful transition from a preindustrial to an industrial society occurred once, dominated the ethos of an entire era, and then faded in relative importance. But the United States has continually absorbed and sought to transform preindustrial peoples at each stage of its development." The protracted process of incorporating ever new ethnic strata into the work force has produced cultural tensions often resulting in strife.

Gutman saw the widespread violence that has been endemic in American labor history as flowing largely from conflict between workers nurtured in a nonindustrial discipline and the rational regimen of the modern factory. From this perspective, intraclass conflict, as well as struggle between worker and boss, are placed in the wider context of the evolution of American society. Lack of class-conscious militancy is the natural result of a repeatedly re-enforced heterogeneity of the working class. Gutman developed his thesis with a wealth of empirical data, reading excerpts from letters, writings and official reports, ranging over whole epochs in American history—and losing some of his audience in the web of his subtle argument.

Gutman's commentators questioned his emphasis on the protracted ethnic adjustment that accompanied industrialization here. Melvin Dubofsky of the University of Massachusetts doubted that such a sharp distinction could be made between the multiple process of acculturation of the working class in the United States and the allegedly one-shot process in a country like England. Another critic, Philip Foner of Lincoln University, protested Gutman's strictures on labor historians, whom he had charged with too exclusive focus on the trade union movement, and consequent neglect of cultural and ethnic factors. Foner suggested that the accusation could be better laid against labor leaders, particularly Samuel Gompers of the AFL, who systematically neglected foreign elements in the working class, not to speak of American Negroes.

Vigorous discussion of Gutman's paper followed at luncheon on Saturday among Foner, Dubofsky and the author himself. They made no attempt to involve the audience in this private debate. Nor did they make evident the relevance of Gutman's interpretation to the contemporary scene. None of the issues raised by Ernest Mandel about the revolutionary role of workers was discussed, although an abstract of Mandel's paper was available before the conference. Nor did anyone mention a paper delivered to the first Socialist Scholars Conference in 1965 by Princeton sociologist Richard Hamilton on rural and preindustrial survivals in contemporary working classes. Hamilton's work anticipated many of the conclusions that were implicit in Gutman's paper but never made really explicit. This failure to build on earlier Socialist scholarship testifies to the isolation in which American Socialists still operate, and which the conference was intended to dispel.

And isolation in another context was the source for much of the criticism directed at this year's conference. Although its original task of creating a body of radical theory and analysis for the contemporary situation has barely begun, the Socialist Scholars Conference this year was called upon by many of the young political activists present to undertake yet additional responsibility. They demanded that the conference become more "relevant." The word "relevance" came up continually and was used to define what some thought was missing in this year's display of Socialist scholarship.

The panel on "The Role of the Intellectuals in Social Change" precipitated much of the activist criticism. Papers by Christopher Lasch of Northwestern University and Warren Susman of Rutgers both presented the case for intellectual autonomy and a scholarly role of relative detachment. Their papers stressed the cultural aspects of the struggle to transform America, and they set the tone for much of the conference. If any overall perspective on socialism in the advanced countries emerged, it was the priority of the "cultural front." The session on the working class, as said above, explored the clash of cultures. Even the panel on Black Power and socialism had an essentially cultural focus. Harold Cruse's new book, The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual, which deals largely with the need to build an authentic black culture, was discussed. (Cruse was attacked for adopting a simple model of ethnic group conflict to explain American society, and insisting that Socialist ideas should be "excluded from the new black consciousness.") Even Ernest Mandel referred to the need for intellectual struggle to combat the "mystifying" cultural apparatus of capitalism. But Lasch and Susman made most explicit the notion of the priority of cultural effort for radical intellectuals, and it was their formulation that came in for most vehement abuse. Some even maintained that portly, witty, scholarly Prof. Warren Susman was "the enemy."

It was evident that dissatisfaction with the content of the Socialist Scholars Conference was only part of what was troubling the younger activists. Many of them, fresh

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

from the battles at Columbia University or in Mayor Daley's Chicago, found Socialist scholarship too remote from their day-to-day concerns in the movements. (By way of startling contrast, right-wing journalist, Alice Widener, writing in Barron's business and financial weekly, discovered that the conference was the seat of America's "revolutionary Marxist brain trust," actively plotting imminent insurrection.)

At its worst, the activist criticism amounted to a crude attack on the life styles of academic radicals, and brought to the surface deeply anti-intellectual tendencies in the New Left. But it also demonstrated that over the past four years the Socialist Scholars Conference has created a constituency of nonacademic activists, younger teachers and graduate students. At the business meeting this year, a large contingent of these people, including some of the most vehement critics of the conference, was enrolled in the steering committee. Future annual meetings promise to have a more activist cast.

The polarization between academic intellectuals and movement activists dampened the reception of a call for a new mass Socialist party in the United States. James Weinstein, former editor of Studies on the Left, made this proposal at the final conference session on Sunday morning. The past failure of socialism in America, he observed, was not simply a failure to seize power (there had never been a moment when that was dimly possible), but the inability to sustain in popular consciousness the image of a socialism that was appropriate to an advanced industrial society. In his important recent book, The Decline of Socialism in America, Weinstein has analyzed that failure. A new party organization, free of entanglement with any of the now existing Socialist sects, could best reverse the trend and make socialism a vital force in the United States.

Underlying Weinstein's appeal—and indeed underlying this whole conference on "The Socialist Perspective in the Advanced Countries"—is the poignant fact that socialism has come to power so far only in underdeveloped countries, most notably China and Czarist Russia. In these places, the building of a humane socialism has been distorted by the need to complete the economic tasks of the preceding (capitalist) epoch. The goal now is to fulfill the original Marxian vision of a mature socialism emerging in an advanced industrial society, where the process of capital accumulation is complete and where democratic traditions still have validity. There will be no need then for political and economic authoritarianism. If the Socialist Scholars Conference can begin to awaken such a vision, and specify the conditions for its fulfillment, it will have made a contribution not only to understanding the world but also to transforming it.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Solzhenitsyn: Ring of Truth

THE FIRST CIRCLE. By Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn. Translated from the Russian by Thomas P. Whitney. Harper & Row. $80 pp. $10.

DONALD FANGER

The author of Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism (Harvard University Press), Mr. Fanger is professor of Slavic and comparative literature at Stanford University.

Ortega once wrote that a work of art yields not to frontal attack, but to him who sets out to take it like Jericho. He was speaking of Don Quixote and, as it turned out, his circlings led him through questions concerning nothing less than the nature of literature and the very fate of Spain.

Solzhenitsyn's new novel (begun in 1955, completed in 1964) invites a like approach, though for very different reasons. Socially and humanly complex, it is not artistically complex—not "modern"—so the challenge it poses is not to say what it is or how it works, but rather to see it adequately and truly, to find a proper perspective. Here the difficulties cluster: history and politics have mined the circumference of Jericho.

The difficulties are partly literary but mainly extra-literary. They begin with the fact that The First Circle—whether or not the rumors are true that the KGB sent the manuscript abroad as a provocation—has been published in the West, but not in Russia. This immediately makes it a political event in a special sense, hurting the author at home, where his protests against foreign publication go unreported*; inevitably complicating our own responses, and involving us willy-nilly in the campaign against him, because our public reactions will be used to justify keeping the book from its first and true audience.

In its fate, then, as in its high seriousness, The First Circle resembles Doctor Zhivago. Both works are pitched precisely to the experience and awareness of the Soviet citizen, in an attempt to clear the air by truth-telling. An author need not be "right" to do this; disputes about the validity of Pasternak's view of history cannot touch the basic artistic validity of his novel. His book, like Solzhenitsyn's, seems to be aiming at a kind of radical moral therapy, by treating national traumas in terms that cut through all the usual abstractions, sophistries and silences in order to reassert the primacy of intimate, individual human experience, of those basic things which alone can command unqualified credence and assent. But there the likeness ends. Pasternak's novel was artistically eccentric and sophisticated, its ultimate themes death and immortality. Solzhenitsyn's novel is squarely in the tradition of Tolstoy, accessible without difficulty to the common reader (that, presumably, is why Surkov, who led the attack on Doctor Zhivago ten years ago, calls Solzhenitsyn's works in general "more dangerous")—and its subject is the ugliest, postwar stage of Stalinism.

The title is from Dante's Inferno, the first circle being that privileged section of hell reserved for wise men whose only offense was to have been born in pre-Christian times. Solzhenitsyn's narrative centers on the inmates of an institution representing the first circle within the Stalinist prison system—a sharashka or scientific research institute, staffed with specialists drawn from the more brutal labor camps. Here the prisoners are granted certain amenities (sheets, cigarettes, meat at dinner) and immunities (no beatings, no hard physical labor), the better to exploit their talents. The sharashka in question, on the outskirts of Moscow, is engaged at the end of 1949 in two of Stalin's pet projects—an automatic telephone encoder, and a device for identifying the voices in recorded telephone conversations.

Success at such work may mean early release; but promises are unreliable, and in any case success is all but precluded by unrealistic deadlines, absurd regulations and the impossibility anywhere along the line of speaking the simple truth. This is perhaps the main continuum in the book: the absolutely hopeless, vicious circle of absurdity. One prisoner, an engineer who had refused to work with the Germans, received a ten-year sentence on his return to Russia; another engineer who did work for the Germans also got ten years. "That was Stalin's signature—that magnificent equating of friends and enemies which made him unique in all human history." When the aging, paranoid dictator is himself introduced, in a section that is at once more savage and more humane than any of Tolstoy's depictions of despots, the reader is told: "His first thought always was: how far can this person be trusted? And his second: has not the moment come for this person to be liquidated?" Small wonder that the prisoners of his system can argue, heatedly and earnestly, about the point in a man's life when it is best to be imprisoned. There is no escape.

Solzhenitsyn's novel is—like the novels of Tolstoy—lateral and cumulative in its effect, formed from a series of interlocking portraits, of separate arrested fates. These may be ultimately exemplary, but none of the characters exists simply to show or prove something. The emphasis throughout is on what the author calls at one point "the whole astounding world of an individual human being." Even Stalin, whose megalomania requires that entirely successful performance be ascribable to him alone, thus insuring muddle and mediocrity everywhere down the line, is pictured in a final vignette as a terrified, empty old man: "Growing old like a dog. An old age without friends. An old age without love. An old age without desire."

And even Stalin is presented as not merely an actor in the present time of the novel, but in terms of his own past and evolution. Each of the several dozen characters is individuated biographically as well as temperamentally, his past invoked to give perspective and resonance to his present situation; each is the center of another, possible novel. The lines of implication run from Stalin and his security minister, Abakumov, through the bosses of the sharashka—Yakovlev, struggling to hide his own former imprisonment; Roitman, about to fall victim to the new campaign of anti-Semitism; Myshkin and Shikin, careerists jealous of each other—to the prisoners themselves.

And from the prisoners—the humane philologist Rubin, unable to reconcile his experience with the party loyalty to which he clings; Kondrashev, the prison artist pursuing a dream of perfection; Doronin, the happy-go-lucky drifter who signs up as an informer to expose the other informers; Spiridon, the janitor, who comes to incarnate the stubborn virtues of the peasantry; Sologdin, the brilliant engineer, anticipating release but capable, for the sake of integrity, of renouncing it—from these and others the ties of relationship lead to portraits of people on the outside.

*He has also expressed concern over hasty and inept translations. This one can at best be called uneven. Dialogue is frequently wooden, and the narration is apt to lack nuance, grace and sometimes clarity.

There are wives and families, in Moscow, in the villages, existing tenuously as persecution intensifies and the lines of hope go slack. The reader moves through the dormitories of the University, and learns of such necessities as the expunging of the names of foreigners from dissertations. He is given fascinating glimpses into the psychology and way of life of the rich and privileged postwar elite—a subject, to my knowledge, seldom treated in Soviet literature and never before with such fullness. Solzhenitsyn introduces a famous novelist and a rising young critic (who “did not so much write himself as reject other writers”); indeed, in a chapter written with appalling high spirits he presents a Mrs. R. (Roosevelt?), for whose visit a “model” prison cell is temporarily constructed, complete with tablecloth, cigarettes, icon, priest in residence, specially washed and absolutely astonished inmates.

It will be clear from this incomplete catalogue that the book is really more an anatomy than a story. Solzhenitsyn deliberately refuses to impose a preconceived shape or order on his material, beyond limiting it to four days in December of 1949. So he makes no attempt to point up the horror of this life; quite the contrary, even horror is resolved into its simplest, mundane constituents. (The horror, one character ruminates, “lies in the gray methodology of years. . . . Your thoughts occupied with how you can grab the heel of the loaf rather than the middle from the prison tray; how you can get untorn underwear that will not be too small at the next bath.”) So also the novel contains few events, properly speaking.

The semblance of a plot attaches to Innokenty Volodin, a diplomat; the book opens with his telephoning an eminent doctor to warn him against a frameup. It is the first hesitant ethical act of Volodin's hedonistic young life. The call is intercepted, Volodin's voice recorded and sent to the sharashka for identification. The doctor, needless to say, is arrested; so too—three days and 500 pages later—is Volodin, with a feeling of relief: Now there is “nothing more to fear, nothing more to fight against, no more need to pretend.”

He has fallen, paradoxically, into the only kind of freedom possible in this world. It has nothing to do with action; it is an existential freedom, the conscious repossession of one's integrity, and it is the fundamental good in Solzhenitsyn's world. The engineer Bobynin found it in prison, and so can taunt Minister Abakumov: “what else is there you can threaten me with? What can you deprive me of?” Incidental characters like Captain Schagov found it in the war: “In roadside ditches, in washed-out trenches, among the ruins of burned houses he learned the value of a can of soup, an hour of quiet, the meaning of true friendship, of life itself.”

And the more fortunate of the book's main characters undergo this quintessentially Tolstoyan experience. Volodin, who up to the eve of his arrest has been conscious only of the truth that you have but one life, comes to sense “a new law, in himself and in the world; you also have only one conscience.” Even Roitman, a major in the MGB, is brought to ask: “Where should one begin to set the world aright? With others? Or with oneself?”

The chief spokesman for the author, standing to Solzhenitsyn as Levin does to Tolstoy in Anna Karenina, is Gleb Nerzhin, a brilliant 31-year-old mathematician. It is he who indicates the moral axiom behind all these portraits in reflecting on “the Tolstoyan teaching that no one in the world is just and no one guilty.” It is he who seeks “to resolve in prison everything he had not been able to decide about in freedom,” who is driven from his own field into that of history in an attempt to account for Stalin and Stalinism.

Nerzhin's fate is sealed early in the book, when he refuses to cooperate on a cryptography project, and renounces indignantly the prospect of the pardon which cooperation might buy. He will settle for nothing less than truth and justice—and so at the end he is transported back to the camps, having destroyed the clandestine manuscript which he has been living for years to complete.

This refusal to deny the core of one's authenticity is echoed by a few others in the book. Trapped in an absurd game

(and Solzhenitsyn, like Tolstoy, delights in underlining absurdities), they refuse finally to play. They are the “saints,” whose quixotic stubbornness offers the only ground for faith in the possibility of a juster future.

In sureness of touch, brilliance of observation, depth of moral concern and breadth of sympathy—in the ring of truth he achieves—Solzhenitsyn does, as I have tried to make clear, bear comparison with Tolstoy. The likeness might, in fact, serve as the basis for an extended essay. In the present context, however, it suggests one uneasy question about the ability of realism, a hundred years after Tolstoy, to deal with such subject matter. It is not simply that Tolstoy's characters are free to work out their destinies, whereas for Solzhenitsyn's all the conclusions are foregone; the sense of no exit and the immobility of hell that dominate The First Circle are as appropriate as they are powerful, given the author's initial strategy.

The question is how well that strategy can serve even a major writer, after all that the literature of the past fifty years has accustomed us to. One may be troubled by a suspicion that the themes treated here by now require not so much to be realistically dramatized as somehow encompassed and mastered—and that the language of everyday life may no longer suffice for the purpose. At this point in history, it may be that some metalanguage is needed to deal freshly with such numbing enormities.

And here one feels the false position again. To pursue these questions at such a moment seems as plainly impossible as not to raise them at all. The First Circle is a very great achievement—for us to value, but not to fault. It is for us—but not in the first place.

The Poor Specialists

CULTURE AND POVERTY: Critique and Counter Proposals. By Charles A. Valentine. The University of Chicago Press. 216 pp. $5.95.

NAN PENDRELL

Mrs. Pendrell is associate professor of anthropology at Chatham College, Pittsburgh.

Mr. Valentine describes his essay as “ambitious” and I am glad to say that he is quite right. It is also provocative and should raise hackles in the right places, among social scientists and anti-poverty programmers. Especially provocative is Valentine's handling of Oscar

Lewis' concept, “the culture of poverty” and to his working-over of Daniel P. Moynihan. Valentine's thesis is that many (if not all) social science interpretations of poverty have had a “pernicious net effect” on social policy. Hence they must be countered by alternative interpretations, free of class bias and of the pervasive confusion of class and color categories.

The book begins with a rather conventional explication of “culture” as a system of symbols—internalized rules of the game—that ought to be conceptualized as distinct from “society,” which is a structure of institutional arrangements. The concepts of a "self-perpetuating lower class" and an "international culture of poverty" then come under attack, and are followed by an overview of "accepted notions of the poor," and an outline for "new understandings." The concluding section of the central essay presents "alternative views of poverty and the poor, present and future." Anti-poverty policy proposals are made in a postscript that precedes an appendix which is surely the first comprehensive—probably too comprehensive—urban "ethnographic research design" to appear in print.

Valentine's criticisms of the Moynihan thesis are equaled in incisiveness only by the authors of Black Rage, in which Doctors Grier and Cobbs establish the vacuity of myths about the so-called "weak Negro family." In 5 pages Valentine develops a masterly analysis of the essentially retrograde nature of Moynihan's proposals for a federal program of family or children's allowances. A main thrust of Valentine's policy proposals is that the central connotation of poverty in the United States is inequality, since poverty contradicts the crux of American ideology, which is said to be equality. This may have An American Dilemma as its referent; Myrdal too appears to regard equality as the significant variable in the national ideology; hence the dilemma, the gap between ideal and real behavior. The premise may not be valid, but who would argue with a definition of poverty as inequality?

Nor can there be substantive objections to Valentine's "anti-inequality" specifics: massive restructuring of federal, state and local policy to incorporate "positive discrimination" in favor of the poor; predominant local power and genuinely effective participation of the poor in decision making; genuinely effective measures to compel compliance. These proposals are far superior to others within the genre of last-ditch writing; but already they may have passed into the realm of the penultimate. Valentine is aware of this. He wonders whether there is "any hope for the black masses other than a vision of Black Power somehow to be forged from their collective internal strength," whether after all, "class warfare and revolution may be the only solution for the poor."

Valentine cannot be criticized if his policy proposals should prove to be too late but, unfortunately, he can be, on other grounds. For example, despite his high regard for the work of Oscar Lewis, he somehow conveys the impression that Lewis is the source of errors perpetrated by those at whom Valentine directs his sharpest, and often very acute criticisms: Nathan Glazer, Moynihan,

Walter Miller, David Matza, Charles Keil, Thomas Gladwin. This may be because Valentine appears to credit Lewis with original sin: the invention of the phrase "the culture of poverty." Much of Valentine's dissatisfaction with Lewis' term stems from his belief that what Lewis calls the "culture of poverty" is actually a "subculture." But Lewis does not claim more for the concept:

In my writings it is the label for a specific conceptual model that describes in positive terms a subculture, a way of life handed on from generation to generation along family lines. (My emphasis.)

Lewis repeats this in the introduction to La Vida where he refers to the "subculture of poverty," and in a footnote, he states: "While the term subculture of poverty is technically more correct, I have used 'culture of poverty' as a shorter form." Much of Black Rage supports Lewis' contention that the subculture of poverty is maintained across the generations, not merely by exploitation and discrimination but also by enculturation and socialization. However, Grier and Cobbs go far beyond Lewis by relating their case histories concretely to historical and contemporary racism and exploitation of the black masses.

Valentine's quotations from Lewis' works are sometimes oddly truncated. I shall give but one of several instances of the resulting distortion. Following his discussion of Lewis' description of the "culture of poverty" as lacking integration "in the major institutions of the larger society," Valentine cites Lewis as follows: "This is a complex matter and results from a variety of factors which may include . . . fear, suspicion, or apathy. . . ." Contrast this with the full statement: "This is a complex matter and results from a variety of factors which may include lack of economic resources, segregation and discrimination, fear, suspicion, or apathy. . . ." (My emphasis.)

Such excision reflects a strain to depict Lewis as mistaking a variable (the subculture) for the total system. But the evidence is rather that Lewis does relate the subculture to the environing milieu. For example, he emphasizes that "chronic unemployment and under-employment" are factors that lead to the "reduced possibility of effective participation in the larger system" (La Vida). More seriously, Valentine rejects Lewis' contention that it is easier to eliminate poverty than to eliminate the "culture of poverty." But surely Lewis is only restating the Marxist principle of superstructural lag: Relations of production may be changed more definitively than ideological and value systems. He also objects strongly to Lewis' focus on the family as the study unit. One wonders whether he would be content with the family as the unit, if Lewis had linked his families more concretely to the larger system? Probably not, since he opts for "community" study, although as he knows there are enormous difficulties with this concept too; perhaps that is why Lewis has chosen to focus on the family.

The question is not Lewis' choice of unit, but whether more significant generalizations can be drawn from family studies. Lewis has been criticized elsewhere (Current Anthropology) for his failure to interpret the autobiographical materials adequately, but Valentine suggests additionally that Lewis exhibits undue confidence in current social service solutions.

I cannot conclude without pointing to another instance of the misinterpretation of original texts. In refuting Lewis' characterization of the "culture of poverty" as lacking organization, Valentine points to William Mangin who is said to have found that "squatter settlements around Latin American cities manifest a high degree of community organization." He regards this as evidence for "well-defined community structures among the urban poor." Here is Mangin's statement from Latin American Research Review:

Thousands of priests and nuns have left the Church over this agonizing, soul-searching question:

should clerics be allowed to marry - and to continue their work if they do?

Here is a serious outspoken report in which ex-priests, former nuns, theologians and historians discuss the major problem facing the Roman Catholic Church today!

MARRIED PRIESTS & MARRIED NUNS

Edited with an introduction by James F. Colaianni, Director of the National Liturgical Conference.

$6.95
a Ramparts book
McGraw-Hill

I believe existing evidence indicates that inhabitants of squatter settlements are less alienated from the national state, and more involved with each other than are residents of city slums. . . . One of the reasons for this difference is that squatters can constantly see around them a major accomplishment of their own, i.e., the seizure of land and the creation of a community. (My emphasis.)

Mangin emphatically specifies that he wishes to lay to rest the widely held identification of Latin American urban squatters with slum dwellers and Valentine's point here must go the way of this myth. Far too little is known about relationships between Latin American urban squatters and slum dwellers.

Squatters frequently successfully defend their interests as putative home owners despite sporadic attempts to dislodge them. Slum dwellers are of course rent payers. This distinction may have considerable political and socio-economic significance. What Mangin implies is that slum dwellers may indeed exhibit at least some of the characteristics that Lewis regards as diagnostic of the "culture of poverty."

Such lapses from precision are a pity, for Valentine has a great many sharp things to say; he says them without regard for falling chips, and he breaks new ground for urban anthropologists. Surely, predictable subsequent editions of his bristling essay will give him the opportunity for revision and expansion.

Most of the imagery in The Dark Birds is on a level with that of "Pigeons," which is what makes this so exemplary a book. Some of the other poems, though, do not aim so high; sometimes the aim is high but the target isn't hit dead center. Only to be expected. What is true of the poems as a whole is that there is no statement in them apart from the context of the imagery; the best ones are singularly unified, achieved, such as these lines from Stars "Climb Girders of Light":

*Man brief as the storm, more than five feet of lightning, twisted and beautiful.
Man made like his roads,
with somewhere to go.*

"Man"—such a big, abstract word. But in this poem, potentially, the guy next door.

I admire Stock's effort in Covenants to use the language as if it were a dazzling aquarium, a full spectrum of colors in graceful motion. There is room in poetry for elegance, courtliness, no matter how far our time has traveled from the Field of the Cloth of Gold. Richness abounds in nature, in the spirit of man, and in the American language. But Stock's work strikes me as carefully constructed jungle growth; I would like to take a machete to some poems:

*Autumn's ultimate will regina in ice and testament seen in any leaf besieged and riddled to shambles in the skirling sphynx,
or, haloing a hill, in sumach crownfire—these disappear as you draw nearer the glass.
Behold your power over the reproach as details of décor, oil astern, stream off
the swollen cenotaph, leaving you:
power lover to lover falls relinquished, inviolable images by inviolate tokens conduct you to where the mimic's captives, reachless, in the cycle unhouseled, still abide epiphany through warrant you have loved.*

from "Epithalamium, I"

There are humor and virtuosity in Stock's poems, particularly in "The Synapse" and "Portrait of Gertrude Stein," though the latter does carry on too long. The best poems in Covenants seem to me those written "after Carlos Drummond de Andrade," whom Stock regards as the greatest of living poets. Whether he is or not is beside the point; what is important is that under the force of his direction Stock shows he can write crisply, cleanly, movingly, as in "Confession":

*I have not loved my counterpart enough,
have neither hunted his lice nor nursed*

Private & Public Hurt

THE DARK BIRDS. By Bert Meyers. Doubleday & Co. 68 pp. $3.95.

COVENANTS. By Robert Stock. Trident Press. 81 pp. $3.95.

GENE FRUMKIN

Mr. Frumkin is a poet who teaches at the University of New Mexico.

Bert Meyers, in his second book of poems, The Dark Birds, continues and refines his use of clean, hard imagery which was the touchstone of his first book, Early Rain. In this respect he is the antithesis of Robert Stock in his first volume, Covenants.

If The Dark Birds is less adventure—some than Early Rain, the deficit is made up by greater control. Thematically, Meyers' work retains its sense of private and public hurt: the poems are songlike, and this is the secret of their success in dealing with the large concerns as well as the smaller ones. We haven't often experienced social criticism sung in autotelic poetry (as distinct from poetry written in conjunction with music, by Bob Dylan, for example). The slenderness of the song, the tenderness, in fact, of the device, plays off against the toughness of what is being said.

There is no separation in this book between the pain felt in one's self and the pain felt for the entire human condition. The poem "Pigeons" rings terrible and true:

*Wherever I go to find peace or an island
under palms in the afternoon at midnight to pity my neighborhood at dawn in the shrubs to look for a child*

*I hear them they fly by applauding themselves
I see them
they pray as they walk their eyes are halos around a pit
they look amazed*

Who are these that come as a cloud to our windows who rush up like smoke before the town burns

*You will find one on a mountain in a carpenter's shop at home on the lawn of an old estate
at the library
in the forehead of paradise*

*Whoever is mad can accuse them
thousands were killed in a day*

*What happens to them happens to me when I can't sleep
they moan and I'm there and it's still like that*

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Norris Milgram Dept. MD
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

his itch.

I have proffered only some few words, melodious, late, upon returning from the feast.

Without giving I gave and without kissing kissed.

He who hides his eyes beneath the cot perhaps is blind. And in the halflight treasures, even the most peerless, tarnish.

How, from what is left, compose a man and all that he implies of suavity,

vegetable harmony, murmured laughter, love, surrender, and mercy?

I have not even loved myself enough, close as I am. No one have I loved except that bird—crazed and blue it came—that ended smash against the airplane's wing.

Maybe, as they say. Stock hasn't found his voice yet. Maybe, when he does, it will more resemble the one he uses in "Confession."

Letter from a Former Optimist

EVE MERRIAM

*Miss Merriam is the author of After Nora Slammed the Door (World) and Figleaf:
The Business of Being in Fashion (Lippincott), among other books.*

In Brecht's play In the Jungle of Cities, a character keeps crossing himself and muttering gently, "Things are getting worse, things are getting worse." I second the notion.

The young radicals are planning more confrontations: a "celebration march" to commemorate one month After Daley.
What they do not realize is that they may be in a revolutionary condition, but the state is not. We have skipped over the coming revolution and gone direct to counterrevolution. The dedicated young are refusing to die in Vietnam but they are going to get clobbered on the local battlegrounds.

Gloomy Sunday these days leads to doomsday Monday. Talking to a real estate agent in upstate New York over the weekend: "Never mind how inflated prices are now," he says, "if you think they're sky-high, wait until after the election in November. Everybody will want to flee the cities. There won't be any country places to buy at any price.
Better get a hideaway now." His sales talk seems only slightly exaggerated.

Passing the gates of Columbia University and the posters announcing stepped-up meetings of SDS scheduled for the coming week. Is it possible that violence on the campus can be avoided this fall? My Pollyanna heart insists that bloody April will not be re-enacted. But as Chicago was a self-fulfilling prophecy, so the stage is now set at Columbia for the many pseudo acts that will manage to lead to the real thing. There have been innumerable warm-up interviews with administration spokesmen, faculty, radical leaders, concerned parents, worried alumni. "Do you expect there will be violence?" the microphone thrusts to any passer-by. "Well, there may be, but we won't be the ones to start it."

righteously reply all segments. But the initial shove will come from somewhere, you can bet your subscription to Life, with its handsome full-color, black-blue-and-blood spread laid out in advance.

Every day more teachers' strikes are reported across the country; Shanker's union is only the biggest and most headlined. It still seems astonishing that such groups should become militant, yet their walkouts are now almost as frequent as were the sit-ins a few years ago in the ancient history of the civil rights movement. (Remember Greensboro, N.C., in 1960? Look it up in some reminisced almanac.) Teachers strike; so do subway workers, garbage men, hospital workers; police and firemen threaten. What ever happened to our old concern about the Condon-Wadlin Act? Welfare workers picket on one side of the street; welfare clients on the other. Alternate parking for placards from the Peace and Freedom Party and the Freedom and Peace Party. What group does not speak out, make demands, these days? Only the entrenched machine politicians of the two morgue conventions.

In light of the increasing formidability of George Wallace and the Agnewizations of law 'n order, will I later regret not supporting Lyndon's little shortbread?
For a while I was tempted by the lesser-evil theory, but Hubert himself keeps escalating blunders, and every time I'm ready to hand him my vote he snatches it away by another colossal crudity. He is either a bigger fool than anyone imagined or he is even more snobbish than William Buckley. His preposterous claim that he could have just as well supported the minority-party plank on Vietnam if that had been adopted. What of the provision in the plank for an unconditional bombing halt? Oh, dimples
Hubie, I didn't read it all that carefully;
I didn't know that fine print was in it.
Does he really take us for a bunch of Frederick Law Olmsted, Sr.

FOUNDER OF LANDSCAPE ARCHITECTURE
IN AMERICA

By Julius Gy. Fabos, Gordon T. Milde, and V. Michael Weinmayr

This handsome book is the first pictorial study of Olmsted's major work in urban, state, and national park design; community and regional planning; and campus and estate design.
Among the original drawings and photographs included are his plan of Riverside, Illinois, his site plan for the Columbian Exposition, and two large scale fold-outs of Central Park and Stanford University.

128 pages, 74 illustrations, 10 x 10, $12.00

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS PRESS
Amherst, Massachusetts 01002

illiterates? Or does he think we know but don't care?

Fastidious about the niceties of language, I have demurred radical slogans of the "Fascist pigs" variety. Here in Morningside Heights where I live, I have been asked to sign a petition protesting "Columbia University's rape of the community." Just a few weeks ago a young girl was raped in Riverside Park; I suggest to the youthful petitioners that they tone down their metaphors. But their hyperboles no longer seem so strident to me. With the unchoice of the coming elections, with the war continuing, with white racism rampant, and with the lawless conduct of police officers, in uniform and out, I become what I would once have considered paranoid. I am suspicious of every burly guy I see wearing a bulging jacket; I flinch for the youngsters dressed in jeans and sandals. I want them to cut their hair: not for conformity's sake but for their own safety. I lived through the McCarthy witch hunts of the fifties, and now I sense those days will seem tame compared to future repression. Even here I cannot break out of my middle-class mildness. "Repression" is a pale euphemism. Police state, fascism, are what I mean. I had better get used to the sound of it.

I fear I will.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

BOUND FOR GLORY. By Woody Guthrie. Foreword by Pete Seeger. E. P. Dutton & Co, 430 pp. $6.95.

One reviewer called Woody Guthrie's 1943 autobiography "far more stirring... than The Grapes of Wrath." This reissue of the book (it covers 1912-42, before he became really famous) might have been more appropriate before the commercial Guthrie boom that followed his death last year, when he had already become a cherished hero for so many kids today, but we should be grateful to have it now. Even readers who never heard him or his songs will understand the current esteem in which he's held after reading only a few pages. It has taken Woody's sensibilities twenty-five years to come into style: he didn't want to be tied down. The book describes growing up in Oklahoma and West Texas oil-boom towns—with Woody wondering why the poor people did the work and stayed poor while the rich man got the profits. It tells of his family, and life with migrant workers, but it is mostly about the long years of riding the rails and the conversations he had with boomers and other boxcar types (he, with his guitar, was always one of them) who made that almost vanished culture so memorable. Some of it is a little corny and sentimental, but it is always shockingly immediate and real, written as if Woody were telling it out loud. It's not often in literature that we get a work by someone who loves and is one of the people; this is a book to make novelists and sociologists jealous.

THE PARADOX PLAYERS. By Maureen Duffy. Simon & Schuster. 222 pp. $4.95.

A young writer who has left his wife and child and pretty well given up on the possibilities of living in the square world buys a small boat and sets up house in it through a winter on the Thames. Although the writer and the oddball members of the small river community who become his friends are fairly dull folk (all are running away from the usual something, but it's not very interesting and they talk about it too much), Miss Duffy's novel is very much worth reading because of how well she conveys the snug world of river life.

A FAN'S NOTES. By Frederick Exley. Harper & Row. 385 pp. $6.95.

The author bills this touching and depressing autobiography of sorts as "a fictional memoir," and asks to be judged as "a writer of fantasy." It is the story of Mr. Exley, the son of a hero-worshiped high school athlete from upstate New York, doomed by the accepted insanities of America to live out his life as a fan, not just of the New York Giants, toward whom most of his real passion and affection get channeled but of the process of daily survival, a game he can't/won't play and must be content to admire, observe, damn, and be periodically driven mad by. Mr. Exley is a very good writer, and although his descriptions of his family life, his forays into love, business, marriage, alcoholism, teaching and mental hospitals are all remarkably good-humored, they add up to an American nightmare. The hero's inability to alter his sanity makes him crack under the weight of it. There's a lot of wit and bravado in this book, but it's more painful than funny.

ALL THE LITTLE ANIMALS. By Walker Hamilton. Simon & Schuster. 125 pp. $3.95.

In which Bobby Platt, a retarded and badly brutalized 31-year-old boy, runs away from his hideously evil stepfather and teams up with Mr. Summers, a lovely little old man who, having himself been brutalized, has dedicated himself to burying small dead animals. They decide together to kill the stepfather. Mr. Summers gets beaten to death in the process, and Bobby has to kill his Dickensian stepfather himself: good and gentleness have triumphed over brutality and evil, and Bobby carries on the animal burying, filled with grief for his dead friend, but somehow cleansed by the act of removing the man who had been responsible for so much of his own sorrow. This is the kind of novel that is often hailed as a beautiful and sensitive little classic; if you care for the genre (I do not), you'll find it exquisitely written.

THE BLACKING FACTORY AND PENNSYLVANIA GOTHIC. By Wilfrid Sheed. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 246 pp. $5.50.

"A short novel and a long story," both of these eerie works catch the feelings of profound childhood isolation with the accuracy and impact of a black-and-white photograph. In Pennsylvania Gothic a young boy finds himself driven, by almost the same inescapable circumstances, into the same hopeless syndrome that caused his father's suicide. In The Blacking Factory, the waxen personality of a right-wing radio commentator is traced back to the polite but deadly brutalities of a British public school which he attended during a crucial time in his adolescence (again, a distant, puzzled father bumbles things). In different ways, both pieces are about the impossibility of parent-child contact, and the real desperation of children who never get beyond it; it's the intensity of this desperation which makes Wilfrid Sheed's book so chilling.

FILMS

HAROLD CLURMAN

There is often something attractive about even a (moderately) bad film. Its background, for instance, may be nicely photographed. Several of the films I saw during the first week of the sixth New York Film Festival are very pretty. Most of them are regarded as superior. But I soon came to realize that what I enjoyed most was their "landscapes."

They are highly sophisticated films: their boldness about sex and their nudes are immediately striking. (A motion picture nowadays without one or more views of a naked woman is simply not with it.) The films were also very psycho-

Publishers' prices shown for each book

39840. COMPLETE INTRODUCTORY LECTURES ON PSYCHOANALYSIS. Sigmund Freud. For the first time in a single volume, both The Introductory Lectures and The New Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis. Belongs in every library. $12.50

84320. TIKOPIA RITUAL AND BELIEF. Raymond Firth. Absorbing study of rites and doctrines outside the main religious system of the Tikopians—a secluded Polynesian people virtually untouched by Western civilization until World War II. $12.50

42100. DEVELOPMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY OF JEAN PIAGET. John Flavell. Detailed, comprehensive and penetrating analysis of the trail-blazing theories of the most influential figure in child development studies today. $8.75

44680. THE EMPTY FORTRESS. Bruno Bettelheim. The best-selling breakthrough in the study of childhood autism. Discusses birth of the psychological self, mysterious beginnings of the mind, roots of pathology and therapeutic suggestions for treatment. $9.95

55020. IMPROVED NEWS. Tamotsu Shibutani. Offers evidence, extensive and varied, which casts doubt on the commonly accepted Allport and Postman thesis that "tumor is a distortion of 'fact' occurring in serial transmission." $6.50

68120. THE PERSON IN PSYCHOLOGY. Gordon Allport. The great psychologist's final testament. His concern with the deeper meanings of individuality is demonstrated in application to new problems. $9.95

53180. HISTORY OF PSYCHIATRY. Franz Alexander and Sheldon T. Selenitsky. Sheds startling new light on ancient beginnings of psychiatry. Its development, and growth. $11.95

41810. FAMILIES OF THE SLUMS. Minuchin, Monfiro, Guernsey, Rosman and Schamer. Presents an original theory of the special dynamics of the slum family—and offers a new approach to therapeutic strategy. $10.00

54960. IDENTITY: Youth and Crisis. Erik H. Erikson. Magnificent new book summarizes author's major work of last two decades. Revolves about his concepts of identity formation and identity crisis. $6.95

55920. INTENSIVE FAMILY THERAPY. Bossonmeyer and Framo. Editors. Fifteen distinguished specialists provide a stimulating, provocative overview of treatment of family members in the family setting, pointing the way to remarkable therapeutic results. $12.50

64040. NEURAL BASIS OF BEHAVIOR. Lloyd M. Woodburne. Well-integrated and comprehensive review of neuroanatomy and neurophysiology. Emphasizes throughout the behavioral implications of neural mechanisms. $11.00

alcoholism homosexuality hypnosis deviant behavior

How to keep pace childhood autism retardation group treatment

With the enormous advances and breakthroughs in the behavioral sciences, how does one keep current? By letting the Behavioral Science Book Service search through hundreds of manuscripts—then submit to you only the books of highest interest, greatest significance.

Each month, you are offered the latest, most authoritative works in the behavioral sciences: psychiatry, psychology, sociology, anthropology, child development, social welfare, marital problems, family relationships, sexual behavior. They're available to you at savings of up to 40% off publishers' prices. Sometimes more. And every fourth book you buy earns you a free bonus book. If you are seriously concerned with keeping up, can you afford not to act now?

Choose any 3
books—worth up to $37.50—for only $4.95

with a short experimental membership in The

Behavioral Science Book Service

84270. APPROACHES TO CROSS-CULTURAL PSYCHIATRY. Edited by J. M. Murphy and A. H. Leighton. Specialists in psychiatry, general medicine, anthropology, sociology, and social work report on the search for ways of identifying mentally ill in other cultures. $9.75

70050. PRINCIPLES OF GROUP TREATMENT. Eric Berne. Formulates a coherent theory for the conduct of group treatment—the first systematic exposition of the use of transactional analysis in groups. $9.75

70100. PROBLEMS OF PSYCHOTHERAPY. Albert Zucker. Throws much-needed new light on such classic problems entering the life of another person, establishing his reality, and reducing artificiality in therapy. $5.95

71180. PSYCHIATRY AND THE DILEMMAS OF CRIME. Seymour L. Hallick. Broad integration of different psychiatric approaches to the criminal, both in terms of understanding and aiding him, with revolutionary social implications. $10.95

78200. SEXUAL INVERSION. Judd Marmor, Editor. Sixteen important contributions to the growing concept that homosexuality is social in origin and therefore can be eliminated, once the patient understands the outside forces at work on him. $8.50

32540. ALCOHOLISM: Modern Psychological Approaches to Treatment. Eva Maria Blum and Richard H. Blum. "A volume that anyone with a serious interest in the problem of alcoholism will turn to again and again." — Robert J. Lange, M.D. $10.00

79130. SOCIOLOGICAL TRADITION. Robert A. Nisbet. Traces the development of sociological ideas seen as responses to the great events and processes of history, by such pioneers as Weber, Marx, de Tocqueville, Stenmel, Durkheim, and Cooley as well as others. $7.95

79210. THE SOCIOLOGY OF MAX WEBER. Julian Freund. Sweeping, stimulating introduction to Max Weber's sociology that covers the whole range of Weber's interests, placing them in the context of his philosophical and methodological views. $6.95

81900. THEORIES IN CONTEMPORARY PSYCHOLOGY. Melvin H. Marx, Editor. The single most comprehensive overview of psychology to be published in a decade—a rich assortment of relevant material on psychological theory. $9.95

TRIAL MEMBERSHIP APPLICATION

Behavioral Science Book Service
Front and Brown Streets, Riverside, N. J. 08075

Please enroll me as a Trial Member, and send the three books whose numbers I've filled in below. Bill me only $4.95, plus shipping. If I'm not delighted, I will return them within 10 days, and my membership will be cancelled. As a Trial Member, I need accept no fee as long as I make Selections during the next 12 months, always at reduced Member's Prices, plus shipping. I understand that savings range up to 40%, and occasionally more. Each month I will receive advance notice describing forthcoming Selections, along with convenient form for requesting Alternate Selections or books at $4.95. For every 4 Selections purchased, I may choose a free Bonus Book. (This introductory offer counts as the first Selection).

Three books for only $4.95
(write in numbers):

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY.....STATE.....ZIP CODE.....

Please be sure to include zip code. $-709 logical. But I find that I prefer their pornography to their psychology.

I relished the Italian lakes, walks, hotels, casinos of Twenty-Four Hours in the Life of a Woman, the St. Tropez of Les Biches. Even the pigmented Two or Three Things I Know About Her, which dwells on the disagreeably altered face of Paris, is somehow made to look delicious. Whatever their subject or message it was the chromatic candy of their images and a sense of luxury in their sites which compensated for my indifference to their content.

Max Ophul's 1955 film Lola Montes is visually exquisite. The director's cultivated eye is everywhere apparent: the composition of a concert in Copenhagen's Tivoli Gardens is a perfect Manet. Anton Walbrook plays the King of Bavaria, Lola's most notable lover; in the very tilt of his top hat one recognizes the director's dash. Yet for all its nostalgic evocation of the early 19th century in Europe—something I especially appreciate—the film is pap.

Orson Welles's sixty-three-minute The Immortal Story which takes place in Macao is also a handsome sight. In it Jeanne Moreau, recumbent to receive a passing bedmate supposedly 17—although he looks 35—is rendered more sensuously appealing than ever. The picture is based on one of Isak Dinesen's Gothic tales. It indicates once more Welles's penchant for the mysterious macabre. A program note declares that it is about "the artist playing God" and "that life imitates art with ironic consequences." But the total effect is inconsequential, despite its suggestion of even more portentous meanings.

Les Biches (The Does) is a complicated story of inverted and involuted sex. Two Lesbians have an affair. Then in turn they go to bed with one man. Finally the girl who has been left out insists on living with the "normal" couple who have settled down together, so that she may enjoy both her former lovers vicariously. When she is refused this privilege the lone girl goes mad and kills her erstwhile "mistress." "There is something unhealthy here," says the man who slept with each of the women on two successive nights.

All this may be fascinating to many, but I found myself altogether unconcerned. Sex is an endlessly absorbing preoccupation and activity but the use made of it in many films today is as humanly relevant as True Story fiction or the mannequins in display windows.

I shall return to Godard's Two or Three Things I Know About Her when I have seen two other of his films which the festival announces. Godard is a deservedly controversial figure because hardly any of his films is entirely without merit. Being extremely prolific, he improvises or "guesses" as often as he creates. His ambiguity is frequently accidental and sometimes fraudulent. He is at his worst when he philosophizes: his own comment in Two or Three Things, spoken in a hush, is adolescent woolgathering with absurd pretensions to existentialist paradox.

La Religieuse (The Nun), based on an anti-clerical novella by Diderot, has been banned in France. It relates to the mores of the 18th century; it depicts a young lady unable to survive in a society in which the aristocracy, the middle class, the peasantry and the government are vilely corrupt. I reserve further comment on this film till a later date.

There were also such items as the Report on the Party and the Guests as well as Capricious Summer, which did not inspire any particular pleasure in me but still contained something more substantial than spurious erotica. The first of these two Czech films is a somewhat Kafkaesque parable with political implications. One cannot blame the Czechs for being opaque and devious in their symbolism; that has for some time been their manner and more recently their necessity. Capricious Summer directed (and among others acted) by Jiri Menzel of Closely Watched Trains seemed to bore its first-night audience—its pace was too leisurely—but I found an odd charm both in its lyric color and in its comic-pathetic overtones. A third Czech film is scheduled and I shall discuss the general characteristics of Czech film making next week.

Though most of these films afford agreeable pastime at least, I had begun to despair of the festival as a source of any great personal satisfaction when I came upon Robert Bresson's Mouchette. Bresson's art is a relief from factitiousness. Every shot of his picture is a simple and telling declarative sentence. He doesn't hurry; he looks and sees. He eschews tricks and that "art of the cinema" which so preoccupies the cognoscenti. His is an ascetic art, laconic and penetrating. It is deeply human without bathos.

Mouchette is a girl of perhaps 14 who lives in one of those very small French villages in which the inhabitants seem to hide behind closed shutters as if they were keeping watch over corpses. Her father is a hard and soundless peasant worker, her mother deathly ill and her infant brother squalls through hunger and neglect. The family is wretchedly poor. Tenderly she ministers to her mother and fondles and feeds the child maternally. Her schoolmates mock her shabby clothes, her dank complexion. The boys call her "rat face." She revenge herself by throwing mud at them. The town's women are dry; the men, incapable of easy communication, spend their moments of rest in bitter silence at the café terrasses after consuming several draughts of harsh liquor. Only when Mouchette's mother dies is kindness shown her by the gift of a free tumbler of coffee and an extra croissant which she disdainfully throws away.

There is a gratified smile on her face when a boy in a miniature auto deliberately and continuously bumps into hers at the fun-fair "race course." Attracted by the boy she follows him, but only to be spurned. And finally when she experiences an intimate contact, the impulse of desire toward her, it is through rape by a drunkard, the town's epileptic poacher whom she later speaks of as her "lover." When her father tells her that her mother was a "brave woman" she responds with "Merde." When an old woman, enamored of mortality, offers her material to serve as a shroud in which to bury her mother, Mouchette curses the "old witch" and drowns herself, wrapped in a dress from the bounty. It is a terrible story but it sinks into the consciousness as something more than a brutal tale of rural darkness and suffering. It conveys the unnoticed, the unsensational agony, the secret and insidious pain of all human isolation.

It may be concluded from the above that in preferring the black and white Mouchette to most of the lush melodramas whose gorgeous males and females suffer the torments of our time—one asks oneself why Bonnie and Clyde didn't go into the movies—that my predilection is for unvarnished realism as contrasted to refined art or camera manipulation. It would be much more exact to say that I am definitely averse to the gay but morally sleazy drapery so frequently used to conceal the diseases it pretends to disclose.

TV: Daley's Hour

CHARLES HORMAN

Mr. Horman is a free-lance writer and film maker.

Mayor Richard Daley's hour-documentary defending the tactics of his Chicago Police Department was broadcast on Sunday, September 15, on prime-time television in 142 cities. The people of Chicago—Democrats and Republicans, Left and Right, blacks, Poles and Chinese—can rest assured that their $50,000 or so of tax money has produced a highly persuasive film—certainly far better than the grade-B thrillers HUAC cranked out to smear demonstrators on the West Coast.

Directed by Henry Ushijima, the film—called What Trees Do They Plant?—tactfully mixed chosen quotations from police and professors with hand-held coverage of the major street confrontations on the Wednesday Hubert Humphrey was nominated. Rennie Davis and Dave Dellinger of the National Mobilization had a chance to explain in some detail their distress about being denied a marching permit. As a matter of fact, I tuned in just after the opening credits, and thought for a moment it was not the Daley film after all, so scrupulous was it in presenting Mobilization's viewpoint.

After the discussion of the permit, however, What Trees Do They Plant held few surprises. The film—and Mayor Daley's—basic point was that the scenario for the battle of Chicago had been written months before by full-time agitators, several of whom had visited Cuba and Hanoi. These “hard-boiled revolutionaries” expected three things—to disrupt the convention, to paralyze the city, and to discredit the government by confrontations with the police.

The shock troops, said the film, were a particularly disreputable group called Yippies who set the tone of the demonstrations and were far from nonviolent. A deputy superintendent of the Los Angeles police, who had come up to watch his Midwestern cousins handle crowds, assured us that although there might have been a few right-wing excesses, the police handled themselves with remarkable restraint.

Police Commander James J. Riordan showed us “weapons” which the police had gathered in the wake of the Yippies. These included a baseball bat, broken glass, a broken bottle, and a pickax handle which, he said, “showed obvious intention of malice—no doubt what the intention of this was.”

This documentary is aimed not at the ultra Right who are already persuaded of what is necessary to restore law and order but at the good Democrats, liberal and moderate, who are wondering if they'd rather stay home this time around than get out and vote the Humphrey slate. “The purpose of this program,” said Homewood of the Chicago Sun-Times, “is to explore that middle ground of cause and effects.”

During the melee in Chicago, as police charged demonstrators, radical interpretations of America became suddenly persuasive to many Americans who thought themselves moderates. However, if either leftist or rightist analyses are correct—if, say, America is either a police state or on the edge of Red anarchy—then it is oddly irrelevant to vote Democratic in the fall. And thus, What Trees Do They Plant tries to restore a middle ground for Democratic candidates to occupy in November.

Homewood introduced Prof. Richard Wade of the University of Chicago as a man concerned with the problems of the cities. Professor Wade pointed out that both the chanting of obscenities and throwing of missiles and the “clubbing of citizens without regard to innocence or guilt” had occurred. “Unless we see the two sides, we won't get anywhere in analyzing the event or in solving these problems for next time.”

“The gainer,” Wade feared, “will be the forces of George Wallace. The loser is the decent center of American politics.” Even Daley, who can be an immoderate man, assured Walter Cronkite that he would not have taken such drastic precautions had he not been informed by his security forces that there were several assassination plots afoot.

Because it is skillfully written and assembled, the film will certainly convince many who are disturbed, but not dissenting, Democrats. People who were there during the key moments shown in the documentary will realize that the narration evades or, more simply, lies about crucial facts. But the film has not chosen as its audience the people who were there.

The narration is evasive, for example, during the excellent footage of police charging the authorized rally in Grant Park on Wednesday afternoon. The sound track rambles rather irrelevantly about thousands who gathered to hear the speakers and “demonstrators dressed like Castro” as the picture shows tear-gas grenades going off and police busting heads. The narration does not explain why the police attacked the meeting, which had been given a permit. Because I was there, I know the attack was unprovoked.

The film's next shot shows a line of demonstrators with joined hands. Behind them mills a disorderly crowd. The narration says: “The long line of march is formed up by those who want to disrupt the convention.” The narration thus implies that time has passed, the rally is over, and the demonstrators are now preparing an illegal disruption.

In fact, the shot was taken at the same time as the preceding ones, but from the viewpoint of the police lines. When the police charged, Rennie Davis, Vernon Grizzard and others from the National Mobilization lined up the marshals between the police and the crowd, which had been listening to the speeches. They tried to quiet things down and back the crowd away from the police—but the police charged faster than the marshals could move the crowd. Davis was then clubbed.

The sequence filmed outside the Hilton that same day is quicker and more deceptive. “All the agitation, all the planning, all of the pressure leads to this,” intones the narrator. “The moment of confrontation. It cannot be avoided.”

Then there is a nice action sequence of the police scrambling through the crowd, packing kids into paddy wagons. Not too much of the beating. “The crowd surges forward,” says the narrator, “and police clear the streets.”

That Wednesday night I was in the front line of that odd mix of demonstrators, oglers, poor people's caravan and newsmen who faced the police at the corner of Michigan and Balbo. More than 25 feet of clear space separated the crowd from the cops. No one on our side did any surging, and everyone who watched television that night, looked down from the windows of the Hilton, or was in the crowd knows it. The police assault was completely unprovoked by the demonstrators, who were chanting slogans but doing nothing else.

I had rushed to the side behind the

How You Can Show the Classics of WORLD CINEMA
In Your Home, Club and School!

SHOW THE GREAT FILMS of ALL THE NATIONS!
LA STRADA - BICYCLE THIEF
3 PENNY OPERA - RED BALLOON
ALEXANDER NIKOLAI - NINI
CARNIVAL IN FLANDERS
Write for FREE catalog of 16mm films "WORLD CINEMA"
BRANDON FILMS, 221 W. 57 St.
New York 10019, Dept. N

Why Do You Read So Slowly?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, many people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-510, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

police barricade where the crowd was jammed so tight it was impossible to move anything but my head. Two women, who had just come out of the hotel, were clinging to each other and wailing. A third was trying to climb up their backs to the sheer walls of the Hilton.

The police wheeled 90 degrees and charged. They began clubbing the people in the first row behind the barricade. I was in the second. A woman shrieked, "Don't hit me! Don't hit me!" But they did.

Nearby to the left, a group of long-haired students were chanting, "The whole world is watching, the whole world is watching." Above them, on a platform, the television cameras—their red lights on—were tilted almost straight down at the crowd and the police.

I heard the plate-glass windows in the Hilton begin to crack. Then they shattered, and someone cried out in pain. People near the windows began pushing forward to get away from the broken glass, forcing those of us in front back into the night sticks. A girl in front of me was clubbed. Blood sprayed over her blond hair and green V-neck sweater. She fell down, and I couldn't see her any more.

The police moved back a few feet and took out their cans of MACE. In hunched, gun-slinger stances, they moved up and down the barricade, squirting steady streams at us.

The MACE hit me on the neck, chin and forehead. It splashed off my glasses, clouding them, but didn't get in my eyes. It stung on my face. I ducked down; and, as I did, I heard the screams of those directly behind me who up to then I'd shielded.

What an extraordinary spectacle so many people saw in their living rooms that evening during the time slot usually reserved for The Virginians. For many, the shock by-passed politics; surely this was not the way to handle things.

Reporters, who had been a special target of police attack, reacted sharply. Jack Mabley, whose columns in the Chicago American had shown strong support for the police and distaste for the demonstrators, changed his mind for that Thursday's edition of the paper. "Scores of people under the Palmer House canopy watched in horror," he wrote, "as a policeman went animal when a crippled man couldn't get away fast enough. The man hopped with his stick as fast as he could, but the policeman shoved him in the back, then hit him with the night stick, hit him again and finally crashed him into a lamppost."

Mabley went on to describe Jerry Rubin's arrest by four policemen who had followed him in an unmarked car: "I have heard Rubin speak, and he was obscene and revolting. In America a man may be arrested for obscenity or revolution. But Rubin was grabbed off the street and rushed to jail because of what he thinks."

"This is the way it's done in Prague. This is what happens to candidates who finish second in Vietnam. This is not the beginning of a police state, it is the police state."

That reality in the streets—transmitted electronically to the living room—seemed to require that people make one of those simple choices which are the most difficult. It lined up the police against citizens assembled to petition for redress of grievances; and the violence in the streets underlined the quieter violence being done to democratic process inside the amphitheatre.

Mayor Daley's film is only the last step in a moderating process of revision which began that Thursday when Che Huntley, chatting with his reporters pointed out that there was a whole of a difference between the responsible demonstrators and the hard core of ruffian agitators who wanted trouble. Soor after the convention folded, commentators began giving some of the demonstrators those multi-syllabic nicknames—like "hard-boiled revolutionaries" and "professional agitators"—which meant that these were the real bad apples, so it was O.K. to beat them up or put them in jail. The rest were responsible, which meant they would probably stop soon.

What Trees Do They Plant, in effect welcomes those who are ready to step back into the party. We've had some misunderstandings, dissent has been registered; but now there's work to be done. The lesser of two evils is waiting to be elected again. But even the balanced statement of the urbanologist and the slick narration cannot bind together the wound which was opened in Chicago.

The final scene in the documentary is a shot of the crowd outside the Hilton. During the speeches on Thursday afternoon, a voice from a megaphone is saying, "We're going back to create 2-3, 200-300 Chicagos in our local communities." The voice is repeated and the words are superimposed on the milling demonstrators. What trees do they plant indeed! Rooted in sedition, these demonstrations will bear bitter fruit. Two hundred to 300 Chicagos? How immoderate! How irresponsible! Wallace will gain, Nixon will be elected!

The film will persuade people; but I doubt that it can dispel that enervation which grips the liberal center of the Democratic Party, because in one sense, the film is right. The demonstrators—all of them—came to Chicago, as the film points out, to disrupt the convention, paralyze the city, and discredit the government by confrontations with the police. And they succeeded. Perhaps not many had the resolution to desire what happened; but all who came, knowing what the convention must be like, anticipated somewhere in their minds that terrifying, conclusive eighteen minutes outside the Hilton Hotel. After it, not all of Daley's film makers can put Humphrey Dumphy together again.

WORKER WANTED

RADICAL AD-MAN WANTED to handle all facets display advertising, including solicitation, for weekly Guardian, N.Y.C. Low pay. Benefits. Contact Ray Reece Jr., 197 E. 4th St., N.Y.C. 10009 (212) OR 3-3800

PERSONALS

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team!" For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10017.

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

107-68

222 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $14

☐ Two Years, $24

☐ 6 Months, $8

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $4 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1266

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

For one in the legal battle, it seems to be just an ordinary set-to. (9)
A sign of advance in a little matter might mark the highly opinionated. (5)
No offensive implications in such as a Venus? (7)
Snake-eyes? Two degrees to one! (7)
See 12 across.
11 and 13 You might find several stripes on one with such as Chiroptera and Formicidae, but they shouldn't hurt you. (13)
Walked vainly, when supported? (8)
Somewhat like a pot of gold, as the French say, in all frankness? (6)
You might have a potential need around four for a salad, perhaps. (6)
Wearied about the disturbed condition? Tense that is imparted by sound? (4)
Held by a sailor or a farmer? (6)
See 19 down.
Is the fricassee of veal in one not expected to work? (2, 5)
Game hunters might look for this. (7)
Elbow. (5)
Acted like Bonnie Prince Charlie when young? (9)

DOWN:

and 6 down Get to the bottom of Roberts, perhaps, if you want leads on the line. (5,4)
One who might prepare for the movies makes the publicity a little more fitting.

3 and 27 down Not a matter of name-calling, though the subject might come up in it. (10,4)
4 Brought in like some servants used to be? (8)
5 A staff might have at least one bottle.
6 See 1 down.
7 Reading letters with the appearance of wood or stone? (7)
8 Certain in step, and held in esteem. (9)
14 They picture him going out each year like a rude hermit surrounded by destiny. (6,4)
15 Never a grain of bitterness here! (5,4)
17 Game allowed in the street? (8)
19 and 25 across Hurried and dined, as some couples do. (6,4)
21 Street litter? It's basic to our ways! (7)
22 Queue taken in hand by the umpire? (4,2)
26 Correct, whether or not 25 follows. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1265

ACROSS: 1 Reverend; 10 and 5 Grave digger; 11 Marijuana; 12 Elision; 13 Parades; 14 and 21 Single-minded; 15 Sistine; 18 Stylist; 24 Riposte; 26 Replete; 27 Blind spot; 28 Inapt; 29 Splash; 30 Slightly. DOWN: 1 Rugged; 2 Viability; 3 Reeling; 4 Nominee; 6 Injuries; 7 Grand; 8 Roadster; 9 Tropes; 16 Inelegant; 17 Ascribes; 19 Insides; 20 Steppe; 21 Marital; 22 Napping; 23 Sentry; 25 Phial.

PUBLICATIONS

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MIDTOWN, Box 934-N, Maywood, N.J. 07067.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Marco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOUNDS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Book, 4B West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 262 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on President Johnson to immortalize and transfigure his Administration by calling together a permanent WORLD CONGRESS, of the elected heads of all nations (for one purpose only), to seek to arbitrate or prevent all present and future wars. Readers contact President Johnson.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EXPORT AIR CARGO

Complete services available: documentation, banking, etc. PLUS greatly reduced air freight rates. Contact:

Berklay Air Services
P.O.B. 163, JFK Int'l Airport
Jamaica, N.Y. 11430

WINTER RENTAL

FURNISHED, Sherman, Conn. country house, fireplace, ideal for writer. Woods, lake, quiet. $125. Box #618, c/o The Nation.

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelig (Viking, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $2.99
- ☐ THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER by Ronald Sampson (Pantheon, $4.95) $2.99

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

10-7-68

Do we need your subscription?

Frankly—yes. Without loyal support, we couldn't continue. And it's always a struggle.

But we're not just asking; we're giving. We offer our subscribers information, stimulation, a forum for unpopular opinion.

Join the voices in the wilderness. Subscribe now. Someday "we" may outnumber "them."

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not join now?

BONUS OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you will add four bonus issues to my subscription.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name
Street
City State Zip
N10-7

THE NATION

OCTOBER 14, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
OCT 15 1968
LIBRARY

Rebellion in the Shops
WHY THEY LIKE WALLACE

B. J. WIDICK

A Watcher in Prague

JIRI MUCHA

DETROIT: City Without News

JEROME AUMENTE

Frankfurt Fair ANDRE SCHIFFRIN

3-698 PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 947

LETTERS

cool pill

Johnston, Vt.

DEAR SIR: In your editorial about the new censorship of schoolbooks in California ["Clean Minds," Sept. 30] you speak in passing of the "much more open, realistic and healthy attitudes toward sex" among young people in America today. Certainly their attitudes are more open, and possibly more realistic, but are they healthy? Those in a position to know say that interest in sex among students has declined steadily and radically in the past two or three years. The attitude seems to be that sex has no more meaning than other bodily functions, ingesting, defecating, etc. Is this healthy? Is it what we want?

We used to think the pill, considered sexually rather than procreatively, would help to liberate and heat up people who were formerly repressed or inhibited, but maybe all it is doing is to add sterility, in the broadest sense, to frigidity: another case of technology destroying cultural values.

Hayden Carruth

Alaska write-in Lyndonville, Vt.

DEAR SIR: In 1964, Senator Gruening of Alaska voted against the Tonkin Resolution—as so many others have come to wish they had. Later, he tried valiantly to tell us the truth about Vietnam, and events have shown how right he was. Having lost a close race for renomination, he has just announced plans for a write-in campaign.

The Peace Movement now has muscle: money and manpower. No one deserves our full support more than Ernest Gruening. Let's do everything humanly possible to encourage the Senator. With his opposition split two ways, an all-out write-in effort would have an excellent chance.

Senator Gruening has brought to Washington a rare combination of sophistication, character and brilliance. The United States can ill afford to lose the services of this great man.

William A. Pierce, M.D.

knife in Hubert

Lake Orion, Mich.

DEAR SIR: In "The Bitter Legacy of LBJ" [by Carey McWilliams, The Nation, Sept. 9] you suggest that "if they [the Democrats] did not elect Richard Nixon . . . it was through no fault of Lyndon Johnson, Mayor Daley, or the happy nominee."

I wonder if it was more deliberate than that. If it's true that the industrial-military complex runs the country, perhaps it is also true that they like Nixon and have suggested as much to their boy. It is the only supposition that makes sense of the following:

(1) Beating up the press. Unprecedented! Especially for politicians at election time.

(2) Polarizing the young. Certainly Nixon is at least as warlike as LBJ and Humphrey, but Hubert gets the bitterest anti-war demonstrations.

(3) The chrome-plated, neon-lighted steam roller, which nobody needed, and which no experienced politician uses publicly unless in a desperate situation—which nobody was in at Chicago. (And on coast-to-coast television!)

(4) The public repudiation by LBJ of every attempt by Hubert to gather back the moderates and liberals. Surely even amateur politicians know better than this; and whatever else Johnson is, he's no amateur.

Perhaps at lower levels, the Democrats are unaware of being scuttled; but by now, even Ebullient Hubert must suspect that that uncomfortable feeling between his shoulders is a Texas bowie knife.

Barbara W. Benetti

EDITORIALS

The Scandals of '68

The World Series is traditionally the halfway mark between the conventions and the election and, having reached that point, we may assess the scandals of the campaign with some confidence.

(1) Vietnam. Down to the conventions it promised to dominate the campaign, and indeed it is still much on the voters' minds. But it is not really being discussed.

During the week of September 30, Humphrey belatedly broke the ice, but the water was so shallow that he did not get his ankles wet. What he said was touted by his public relations staff as a major announcement, but it was obviously a concoction made up under pressure to "do something" about a lagging campaign and to project an image of Humphrey thinking for himself.

Poor as Humphrey's performance was, it shines by comparison with Nixon's on the same topic. Nixon has refused to discuss Vietnam at all, on the ground that he does not wish to interfere with the negotiations going on—or rather standing still—in Paris. It is not Nixon's sense of responsibility that accounts for this reticence but his hope that the voters have forgotten (or never heard of) his warmongering in 1954, when he backed Admiral Radford and other early hawks in the scheme to relieve the French garrison at Dienbienphu, with nuclear bombs if necessary. A major scandal of the campaign is that Humphrey so far has let him get away with it. But then, Humphrey has so much hawk in his own past that his caution is understandable.

Wallace's position on Vietnam hardly warrants serious discussion. His support comes from a section of the electorate that equates any kind of negotiation and compromise with "appeasement," yet he must reach out for votes among that greater mass which wants to see an end of the war, win, lose or draw. So he touches on it only briefly while bellowing for "law 'n order," segregation without racism, and castrating the Supreme Court. If peace cannot be had at the conference table, Wallace would inquire of the Joint Chiefs of Staff whether the war can be won militarily (as if they knew!) and if they said yes he would leave the rest to them.

(2) Atmosphere. One of the scandals of '68 is the tone of the campaign. Why is it, really, that there is so much unfocused anger and resentment for a man like Wallace to exploit? Isn't it precisely because that anger and resentment have not been focused against legitimate targets, as they would have been in meaningful politics?

Who, for instance, is explaining inflation in terms that make sense? Who says out loud that the finagling with the costs of the Vietnamese War has had much to do with what is happening in the cities, with the stalemate in civil rights, with discord on the nation's campuses?

Or take law and order, which appeals most strongly to a large and fearful portion of the electorate. Neither Nixon nor Humphrey has attacked Mayor Daley, neither has denounced the lawlessness in the South on the issue of desegregation. Because both have preferred to evade the real causes and effects in this area, they have let Wallace stand forth as the protagonist of orderly government and the strong man who will make the streets safe.

(3) The Collapse of the Future. All three candidates belong to the past—different pasts but all jogging along abandoned roads. Not one of the candidates holds out any realistic hope for the future; when they refer to it at all, it is high-flown rhetoric. That is why there are no slogans in this campaign. Since the turn of the century, from the Square Deal of Theodore Roosevelt to the Great Society of Lyndon B. Johnson, slogans have played a symbolic role in the bidding for votes. Slogans can be deceiving in whole or in part, but they do indicate a determination to advance. This time there is no such determination, only a desire for office. Nixon's talk of the "Forgotten American" is not a slogan, only a meretricious appeal to a largely fictitious sense of injury. All three Presidential contenders are mired in the past; in consequence all three fail, as Muskie implied, to inspire confidence.

What the campaign looks like, then, at this point, is that one would rather see Edmund Muskie succeed to the Presidency than Spiro Agnew.

The Pentagon Speaks

Stories by John Lannan in the Washington Star and Victor Cohn in The Washington Post (September 20) disclose an incipient conflict between administrative scientists connected with the Pentagon and scientists who receive Pentagon grants but insist on voicing their opposition to the Vietnamese War and urging others to do likewise. In one of the publications of the American Mathematical Society, a number of mathematicians inserted paid advertisements urging colleagues to be "responsible for the uses to which your talents are put. . . . We believe this responsibility forbids putting mathematics in the service of this cruel war." Among the signers were Drs. Jervey Neyman, Lucien LeCam and Peter Bickel of the University of California, all working under grants from the Department of the Army. In due course they received sharply admonitory letters from Dr. John W. Dawson, chief scientist of the Army Research Office at Duke University. Dr. Dawson wrote that "a mutually acceptable decision to terminate our present association when your present support expires appears to be consistent with both our positions."

The Navy was less peremptory. Dr. Peter King, chief scientist of the Office of Naval Research, revealed that letters had been sent to five people involved in four Navy contracts. He refused to identify the recipients but paraphrased the contents of the letters: "It has come to our attention that [the signers of the advertisements] may have strong personal feelings about Department of Defense support. In the light of that, do you want to continue to work for us? Our concern is in what that announcement really means." Dr. K. C. Emerson, deputy for research in the Army's Office of Research and Development, took much the same view as Dr. King (thus a view different from Dr. Dawson's). Still more divergent, Dr. William J. Price, chief scientist in the Office of Aerospace Research, said that although his office had on its payroll persons who had signed

IN THIS ISSUE

October 14, 1968

EDITORIALS

354

ARTICLES

- 358 Rebellion in the Shops:
Why They Like Wallace B. J. Widick
- 360 "Truth Was Not Silenced":
A Watcher in Prague Jiri Mucha
- 363 City of Rumors:
Detroit's Year Without News Jerome Aumante
- 366 Color Blind from Birth Eleanor Heckert
- 368 California Breakthrough:
Social Reform Through Law Ed Cray

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 373 Heil Ho! The Frankfurt
Fair André Schiffrin
- 374 Five Poems:
Autumn Kitchen Carol Bergé
Departures and Distances Linda Pastan
Late Autumn Leaves Robert Peterson
A Wry Music Rosellen Brown
- 376 The Huxleys: Brave Voyagers Calvin Bedient
- 378 Art Lawrence Alloway
- 379 Films Harold Clurman
- 382 Theatre Julius Novick
- 383 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher	Associate Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.	GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor	Associate Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS	PHIL LEVY
Executive Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT HATCH	HELEN VIGORELLA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHEK; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 12

the ads, there was no intention to send out such letters.

Faced with these conflicting positions, Dr. John S. Foster, Jr., Department of Defense director of research and engineering, issued a formal statement of policy. "Some members of the research and development community," he wrote, "have disagreed with government decisions while they contributed significantly to the country." Such being the case, he urged that the military "take all necessary actions to preserve our mutually beneficial relationships with the academic research community during this period when there are potentially divisive pressures."

Scientists are far more important to the Pentagon (and to science-based corporations) than the Pentagon is to them. Thus scientists who insist on speaking their minds are not only protecting scientists in general against censorship (both those who agree with them and those who do not), but are helping measurably to preserve freedom of speech for all citizens, at least so long as the divisions within the country remain within present levels of acrimony.

Labor Pains

Whether he knows it or not, George Meany is about to get the same kind of cruel comeuppance that led to the departure of Dr. Grayson Kirk from Columbia University: the serfs are demanding a bigger piece of the action and the "establishment" is not responding. First of all, Mr. Meany is confronted with the "protest movement" of Walter Reuther who, with the aid of the Teamsters, has set up the Alliance for Labor as a means of restoring to the labor movement some of the social idealism it seemed to radiate in the 1930s. Like some other labor leaders, Mr. Reuther is miffed that Meany did not bother until September to secure AFL-CIO ratification for his unqualified endorsement of Humphrey last April. Meany, of course, has clamped down hard. Some of the unions—International Chemical Workers and United Rubber Workers, among others—that had at first been inclined to join the rebellion are now holding back. For the moment the rivals are observing a false truce (they have both endorsed Humphrey) but there will be interesting post-election developments.

The Reuther schism is, however, merely one phase of the "protest movement" that Meany faces. In California, many unions are in revolt against the arbitrary handling of political endorsements. The Los Angeles County Federation endorsed Jesse Unruh for re-election to the Assembly in which he serves as Speaker; the State Federation rejected the endorsement. In disgust, Unruh has said of the State Federation—which purports to represent 1.5 million organized workers but really represents itself—that it "hasn't enough political muscle in the state legislature to get a Mother's Day resolution passed."

Joseph Kraft reports from Flint, Mich., that many union members resent the action of the leadership, not on any one issue but again because of the handling of political endorsements. Much of the sentiment for Wallace reflects this resentment.

Yet despite mounting evidence of disaffection, Meany keeps redoubling his efforts for Humphrey, minimizing support for "dovish" Democratic Senators who have excellent labor records and cracking down on all who refuse to knuckle under to his dictation. By his stubborn adherence to the old coalition politics he is assuring further dissension in the union movement after November 5 and placing labor in a perilously exposed position when the new Congress convenes. Infatuated with "law and order," he seems to have forgotten the Memorial Day Massacre in Chicago, when the wrath of the police was directed not at students and hippies but at men who were trying to form trade unions. Unfortunately it will be organized labor, not George Meany, that will pay the price for this lapse of memory.

Identity Crisis

The rebellion against Meany is an aspect of the general crisis that confronts organized labor in all the industrially developed countries. During past times of economic deprivation, labor leaders in these countries have been able, often for fairly long periods, to induce the rank and file to follow political leadership of which it did not fully approve and support programs some of which it detested—all as the price to be paid for more jobs and better wages.

In today's affluent societies, however, a section of the rank and file feels itself in a position to reassess some of its ancient prejudices. The leaders of British labor were shocked recently to discover that a large section of the membership enthusiastically endorsed the racism of Enoch Powell. If they had hung out more in the workers' pubs, they would not have been so taken by surprise.

Nor is there any reason for surprise that a significant section of American labor supports the racist views of George Wallace. For seventy years, organized labor in California constituted the spearhead of the anti-Oriental movement. Much the same feeling has long characterized organized labor's attitude toward Mexicans (in the Southwest), toward Negroes and, at an earlier period, toward European immigrants.

Periods of prosperity bring out the always latent chauvinism in the labor movement, which derives from job competition in economies of scarcity. In today's affluent societies, labor faces an "identity crisis." It can no longer indulge in its ancient fantasies without placing the gains it has won in jeopardy. It must decide, therefore, just what is the true function of a trade union in the post-industrial societies. The crisis has become acute because the leadership has too long neglected the task, as Reuther puts it, of unionizing the organized, that is, of aligning the membership against the traditional trade union scourges—war, racism, and "law and order" (police-state style).

Reducing the Profile

Either the State Department and the Pentagon have begun to listen to The Nation (which we would like to believe) or they have on their own begun to take a tougher line against diplomatic-military blackmail. At any rate, the government of Francisco Franco is not finding our negotiators such easy marks as in the past.

In 1953, the United States and Spain entered into a twenty-year defense pact calling for the establishment of multi-billion-dollar American bases in Spain. An initial ten-year period was to be followed by two five-year extensions, unless either country desired to withdraw from the agreement. This provided a source of income and opportunity for extortion which Franco's Fascist regime was not likely to overlook. Without the pact, the position of Franco's government might have been untenable; Uncle Sam's complaisance kept internal crises within bounds. The pact was extended in 1963 for five years, with a "sweetener" of $100 million from the U.S. treasury.

Franco had no intention of settling for any such bagatelle this time around. Flanked by military advisers, his foreign minister, Fernando Maria Castiella, sat down with Secretary Rusk, likewise supported, and with traditional Spanish punctilio requested a $1.2 billion raise, to be spread over the last five years of the lease. Making good use of his superlative imperturbability, Rusk came back with an offer of $100 million. The Spaniards were gradually worn down to $700 million, but that, they averred, was their rock-bottom price, and on September 26 they broke off negotiations.

According to a handout from the Spanish Embassy, "Everything points to a renewal." This press release attempts to "sell" the American public. Besides expatiating on the boon the bases represent, it alludes to the injuries the Spanish have suffered from our presence: "The third of the bases, Moron, near Seville, is the take-off point for the large tankers which refuel in flight the USAF aircraft operating in the Mediterranean. It was a tanker based at Moron that collided with a bomber over Palomares on the southeast coast of Spain and almost caused a disaster of incalculable proportions when four hydrogen bombs were scattered in the region." However, for $700 million, possibly less, Franco will risk such disaster for another five years.

The Spaniards are probably right: one way or another, the pact is more likely than not to be renewed. However, some uncertainty is suggested by Mr. Rusk's flinty counter-offer. For one thing, the general value of overseas bases is under discussion in Washington; for another, Uncle Sam is not the Croesus he used to be—or, as Mr. Rusk puts it, the time has come for the United States to "reduce its profile" overseas. There is no better place than Spain to make a start.

One War

"You have a home in the Army," the slogan that was echoed with resigned bitterness by black GIs as they reenlisted in the years after World War II, no longer seems to lure the Negro soldier. According to Robert Terrell, writing in the New York Post, rates for Negro re-enlistment are down in the last year from 66.5 per cent to 31.7 per cent. Terrell talked to a number of black GIs whose terms were coming to an end and heard two main reasons for the reluctance to stay in the service. The first, according to his respondents, is that Negroes are dying in disproportionate numbers in Vietnam. No statistics were offered, but the blacks look around them and see that the company typewriters and supply rooms are manned by white boys. The Negroes feel themselves field hands once more—in fields of blood.

The other reason given is that the DMZ and the Mekong Delta are poor places to go hunting for freedom when the soul brothers are stalking it in the streets of urban America. Incredibly, and ironically beyond comment, the black troops in the rice paddies yearn to be where the action is.

Corroborating this picture of Negro disillusion with the Army game in Vietnam, Lee Lescage tells in The Washington Post of a recent riot of military prisoners at Long Binh Jail (known with sweet brevity as LBJ). Sixty-three men, including five guards, were injured; one white prisoner was killed. When the uproar had burned itself out—and most of the stockade's buildings with it—all the white prisoners and 100 of the Negroes cooperated in restoring order. But 220 others, all Negro except for three Puerto Ricans, refused and were placed in a special compound, where they improvised African-style garments and beat on metal drums. They were fed a diet of C-rations until, one by one, they agreed to form up for roll call and otherwise obey confinement routine.

Army spokesmen dismiss this demonstration as atypical: everyone in the jail was already out of step with the Army. But Army spokesmen make a practice of dismissing whatever seems to contradict their image of a holy war fought by golden youths. The fact is that the riot in the LBJ was not directed against the authorities; it was fought by prisoners against prisoners, blacks against whites, with Negroes apparently on the offensive.

Another thing that Army spokesmen would certainly deny (if they could be made even to understand the question) is that Vietnam and the ghetto, Saigon and Harlem, are two fronts of one war. But the blacks don't deny it, and neither will history.

Military 'Social Welfare'

At a time when the Johnson-Humphrey Administration and the Congress are putting the ax to the roots of most social welfare programs, Defense Secretary Clark M. Clifford announces that he is mobilizing the Pentagon for an attack on the social ills of the nation. Any such proposal has an odd sound in a country where the role of the armed services has traditionally been limited to defense against foreign enemies—or at any rate to fighting, whether for defense or for other ends.

But that is what Clifford said: "The Department of Defense, a department which consumes 9 per cent of the gross national product of our nation, a department which employs 4.5 million Americans, has a deep obligation to contribute more than it has ever contributed before to the social needs of the nation."

This would take the form of low-cost military housing, a "new generation" of military hospitals, schools and education for undereducated young men who would emerge better fitted for employment. Another innovation would be for the Department of Defense to urge industry to build new plants and to subcontract as much defense work as possible in surplus labor areas.

This speech was delivered before the National Security Industrial Association, which represents some of the largest defense contractors. It is fair to assume that it reflects some uneasiness, on the part of the Department and its beneficiaries, about the continuing high level of military spending—and a feeling that some taxpayers might be finding the defense budget just a bit heavy. So Mr. Clifford, who has had long experience in making the unpalatable tasty, is offering goodies from an unexpected source.

REBELLION IN THE SHOPS

WHY THEY LIKE WALLACE

I. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick is the author of Labor Today: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States (Houghton Mifflin). He teaches at Columbia and Wayne State Universities.

Detroit

Unless an unlikely political miracle occurs between now and November, most active unionists on every leadership level face the probability that organized labor will suffer a disaster in the national election. What the polls and the press surveys have portrayed, that George Wallace is making deep inroads into the so-called labor vote, is confirmed in a range of interviews in the Midwest. No one can argue that defections from the Democratic ticket in the industrial states are not hurting Hubert Humphrey, the choice of the trade union hierarchy.

Ideologically, politically and organizationally, the present status of the trade union movement offers little hope that the labor leaders can save the day for their man Hubert. At a time when Humphrey seeks to soften his views, the hard-line outlook of George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, stands firmly with President Johnson—the man who left labor speechless when he abdicated the Presidency. Ordinarily, close to 70 per cent of union members vote Democratic, though among skilled workers the Republican vote is usually higher than 30 per cent. What is new is the large proportion of Democratic labor voters who have swung to George Wallace, finding in him a candidate who articulates their various discontents.

In the South, the most conservative estimate we obtained from talks in labor circles bore out the recent Gallup poll estimate that about 50 per cent of union members were supporting the former Governor of Alabama. A more likely percentage was 75, according to a union official close to the situation. The group not attracted to Wallace is, of course, the Negro membership.

The polls which indicate that about 20 per cent of American voters are now for Wallace are misleading in the same way that the 4 per cent national unemployment figure fails to reveal the depths of that problem. The concentration of this vote, as with unemployment, is more meaningful, and it must be said that the intensity and the size of the Wallace support in plants and shops is very disturbing.

The offer, however, is vaguely sinister. It is a late offspring of the marriage between big defense and big industry, and one may have misgivings. There are much cheaper and more efficient ways to inaugurate a civilian public-works program than by putting the Army to work on a part-time basis. Or can it be that Mr. Clifford surmises that the armed services can no longer discharge their historic purpose, simply because it is no longer to be achieved by military means? That being so, and Othello's occupation being on the way out, is he to be kept in uniform by providing him with a social mission?

After the United Auto Workers held a series of regional conferences attended by the delegates to the spring national convention, and other active leaders, Walter Reuther engaged the American Arbitration Association to conduct a secret ballot of Presidential preference. The results showed that 10.2 per cent or 271 of these activists were for Wallace; about 87.8 per cent or 2,319 were for

Ivey

Humphrey, and Nixon received twenty-seven votes, or 1 per cent. A UAW press release then exulted: "The overwhelming vote in favor of Hubert Humphrey and Edmund Muskie by the democratically elected delegates to these conferences, representing 1.6 million UAW members, shows that the vast majority of working men and women have not forgotten who their friends are." What is most astonishing about this optimistic interpretation is that not a single individual in the UAW whom I talked to in any part of the country believes it. In fact, everyone asserted that this vote did not reflect the sentiment in the shops. Shop stewards, plant officials, international representatives, staff people—all were unanimous in saying that the Wallace sentiment is bigger than anyone admits.

This is not a UAW phenomenon: A secret poll of Teamsters in St. Louis came up with Nixon 956, Wallace 860, Humphrey 744 and McCarthy 449. Steelworkers in the Detroit area appear to share the sentiment of the Pennsylvania mill towns as reported in The New York Times—the guys in the shops "go for Wallace." Inquiries among the Akron Rubber Workers produce the same response.

What about white-collar unionists? A local union president states that Wallace sentiment is as strong there as in the shops. The AFL-CIO announces that it has registered more than 1.6 million voters and that sounds good until you check with people who worked in the communities during these drives. They report big Wallace strength. In the suburbs of Akron, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit, etc., where anti-Negro sentiment is so strong, will higher labor registration help labor's official candidate? In Dearborn, Mich., home of the Ford Motor Company and the UAW's biggest local, the only Negro family living among the 115,000 residents has just left in despair. As for the flood of anti-Wallace literature coming from union headquarters, old hands in COPE and PAC, the political arms of labor, know that this is the least effective way to influence opinion.

Can labor rally young voters in the nation to the Humphrey banner? Certainly not with its hard line on war, its antagonism toward any element in the Democratic Party that doesn't go along with Johnson 100 per cent. It is difficult to see how the labor leadership can combat Wallace in the shops when its hostility toward the youth movement seems to echo Wallace completely. Meany referred to the Chicago demonstrators in this fashion: "I know what you would do with this dirty-necked and dirty-mouthed group of kooks. To be frank, you might overreact." Some 2,000 Machinists union delegates cheered.

Meany is not alone in his views; indeed, he expresses the views of most people I've talked to in the union movement in recent weeks. When P. I. Siemiller, president of the Machinists union, declared, "union members are pretty sick of rioters, looters, peaceniks, beatniks and all the rest of the nuts who are trying to destroy the country," he confirms the prejudices in the shops, and no one will win over the Wallace people with that line.

One must go back a long way to recall a time when hostility was so bitter toward not just the young college radicals but youth in general. "They got it made and are goofing it up," is what the assembly-line worker tells us. There is a class hatred and an even stronger manifestation of anti-intellectualism in such sentiments. Does it suggest Germany in 1932? Nor is there much tolerance of "McCarthyites," who are not being so much convinced as pressured. Said one top McCarthy supporter in Michigan, who may vote for Humphrey, "Sometimes I think I'm in Prague." The only segment of the population in the Midwest centers that appears solidly Democratic is, again, the Negro voters, and this is due as much to fear of Nixon-Agnew and Wallace as to any alliance of labor with the Negro community.

How explain the Wallace phenomenon among the working people? Walter Reuther used to argue in the AFL-CIO that labor must "unionize the organized," and the record speaks for itself. August Scholle, president of the Michigan AFL-CIO, lists, besides a diminishing political activity in unions, these factors as contributing to the swing toward Wallace: (a) A rapid influx of young people into the union movement, replacing more militant veterans who have retired or died—these people "take all their benefits for granted"; (b) a deterioration of moral standards—not the kind Wallace talks about but a lack of loyalty and respect for those who fought for labor's goals, like Humphrey for two decades; (c) a general unrest and rebellion brought on by the Vietnamese War, ever-increasing taxation on those least able to pay, and other factors.

Other analysts argue that it is racism, pure and simple. A minority of unionists see the Wallace phenomenon as the unrest of the little man, who feels lost and alienated, who doesn't identify with the vast union structure and the top leaders. This view calls into question the validity of the programs and leadership of George Meany in the AFL-CIO, and Reuther's comparative silence down the years. But no one likes to discuss the issue in those terms.

This is not the first time that labor has faced a major challenge from the far Right. Rev. Charles Coughlin, the silver-tongued priest from Royal Oak, Mich., once had a radio audience in the millions. He defended the acts and policies of Hitler and was seen as the forerunner of American fascism. He had good support in the industrial plants. But the skill of Franklin D. Roosevelt, combined with the dynamic appeal of the CIO union movement, cut the labor base from under Coughlin. What is disturbing today is that equivalent political factors are missing. The contrast between Roosevelt and John L. Lewis, leading the forces of social progress in the 1930s, and the Humphrey-Meany team of today is painful. Even if a miracle should occur, Wallace would remain strong as a national spokesman for a dangerous Right, rooted in a sector of the population that is finding its own political muscle, away from the traditional patterns of American politics.

The students on the campus may talk about "making a revolution," but they ignore the real movement in America—a swing to the right so marked that both Nixon and Humphrey are competing for the right-of-Center votes: that is how they read the political climate in this nation. Jokingly, I tell my labor friends, "Don't worry about the election. You'll win a big victory. You'll claim you kept Wallace from the Presidency." The smiles get thinner as time goes by. Lesser-evil rationalizations have their limitations.

A WATCHER IN PRAGUE

JIRI MUCHA

Mr. Mucha, one of Czechoslovakia's most distinguished writers, is the author most recently of Living and Partly Living (to be published by McGraw-Hill this month), an account of his stay in a Czech prison during the Stalin era. He was sentenced to six years, spent some time in solitary confinement, and later worked in a coal mine. He was in Prague during the occupation and left shortly thereafter for London. This article was translated by Ewald Osers.

London

I still can't understand how it happened. And why it happened. Or maybe I can just understand why—but not how. I am still walking about like a man who has seen a ghost in bright daylight—something hideous and unreal, compounded of shadows and smoke. Or of shadows and poisoned gas. Because this ghost can kill.

When did it all start? In May, 1968? In January, 1968? Or in December, when the power which had been concentrated in Novotny's hands was snatched from him? That moment is about as difficult to pinpoint as the exact source of a river (a few interlaced springs on a vast mountain meadow). It really began two or three years ago when the shell enclosing the living body of the nation was irresistibly getting thinner, rather like an eggshell getting brittle just before the hatching of a chick. There still was the will of dictatorship, but fewer and fewer people were prepared to carry out senseless orders. There was the machinery of suppression, but fewer and fewer people dared to use it. And a year ago, when at the Writers' Congress things were openly said which everyone had long known and said in private, it took the government of the day several months to decide to punish the insubordinate intellectuals. Within a much shorter time it was compelled to revoke its sanctions, and in a still shorter time the government, until then all-powerful and infallible, had fallen.

Maybe some tank units in some Byelorussian or Ukrainian garrison received even then their first stand-by orders. The tragedy began to take its inexorable course: freedom was affecting the nervous system of a deformed communism like curare.

In Poland they were still able to neutralize the spontaneous movement of the young toward freedom by inciting the workers and by the well tried formula of anti-Semitism, but in Czechoslovakia it did not work. The workers, when urged to resent the intelligentsia, knew perfectly well that the students were their own children, remembered that they had often tightened their own belts to send them to college, and decided that it was in fact the low intelligence of the leaders that had brought the country to the verge of bankruptcy. Attempts to fan anti-Semitism failed even more quickly in a small country which had just been watching and admiring Israel's courage. Thus when the Novotny wing tried to retrieve the situation, it misread the temper of the people and lost the gamble.

I believe that the crisis in the Communist world, which culminated in the occupation of Czechoslovakia on August 21, was inescapable. The old guard in the central committees of all the Communist countries still employed a way of thinking and working which might have been appropriate to an uneducated, poverty-stricken proletariat. That dissatisfied and poorly educated mass—and at one time that was a correct description—provided nothing but strength. Intelligence had to come from elsewhere, and with it an iron discipline. A totally different situation exists today when a worker has a far better education and a higher living standard than did a schoolmaster or official fifty years ago. The authorities are no longer dealing with an easily manipulated mass but with a large number of independently thinking individuals. And the moment man starts thinking, his first indispensable need is freedom.

Tragedy thus became inevitable: those in power, who should have kept their fingers on the pulse of the people, lost their touch; they failed to see the essential transformation of the working class and drove it into battle against itself, against a spontaneous need for freedom which they saw as counterrevolution.

In Czechoslovakia, a traditionally industrial country with an excellent educational system, the average worker even before World War II was on the level of an intellectual in many an agricultural country today. In Czechoslovakia it was far easier for—as the slogan goes—all power to pass into the hands of the workers, because any intelligent worker could, without particular difficulty, take on the job of a factory manager or a minister. Needless to say, this had disastrous results. But on the other hand, the Czechoslovak working class was the quicker to realize where the mistake lay.

Ever since January, when the Novotny wing was eliminated, we have known that we were playing with fire. Not that we thought our policy was wrong but we remembered only too well the reaction of our own neo-Stalinists or old-type Communists, or whatever one wants to call them, to similar manifestations elsewhere. We were just hoping that our neighbors' fears and antagonisms would be controlled by reason, and that, once we had proved to them that our road was right, they would be able without any further fear to adopt whichever features of our experiment they chose. We knew that the people in those countries were on our side. It was quite possible that their own situation

Coming Soon

PAUL O'DWYER by Pete Hamill
RAFFERTY vs. CRANSTON by Phil Kerby
THE NEGRO AND THE CANDIDATES (Three Views)

was even more tense and intolerable. That, of course, made the danger even greater, but Dubcek believed in the force of human reason. He believed that it could conquer even the fear of losing power. It did not.

In the middle of a joyfully peaceful summer, just as we thought the main danger was over and that we would now get a chance to prove we were right—in that terrible, evil, incredible night of August 20-21, the darkness suddenly and strangely came to life. I had just got back to my home on Hradcany Square, directly opposite the castle and the President's residence, when the noise of a fast-moving car, disturbing the nocturnal quiet, seemed to repeat itself with a strange regularity. It was not alarming, just irritating. The government and the President often gave receptions in the evening, so there was nothing particularly striking about it.

Then came the aircraft. The deep engine drone of low-flying machines. One, two, three, ten, twenty. Some night exercise, I thought. I dialed the call service. I wanted to be awakened at eight. "Sure. Eight o'clock," the girl repeated. "You know that the Russians are occupying the country? It's just been announced on the radio."

It was fantastic. Occupying? Why, what, whom? For a while one's mental images tried to fall into some logical pattern. The drone of the aircraft grew louder, the cars were arriving faster. Suddenly these unconnected items connected into a plot. It was not yet real; just a plot in one's mind, triggered by the sounds. Some troops moving along some roads to some other city. Not to Prague; that was impossible. To some other city.

Then a frightful, frightening memory blended in. March 15. Hitler's occupation. Concentration camps. Executions. It was impossible. And outside the dawn was breaking, the square outside the castle was empty—in two or three hours it would be full of cars, tourists, children, lovers—and only up in the sky hung the drone of invisible aircraft.

I turned on the radio. A voice which before long would be engraved on all hearts spoke of Warsaw Pact troops. Of how they were occupying Czechoslovakia and how it was too late for any resistance. And then came the words we had heard so many times: Keep calm. Keep calm.

There was a fierce roar and clanking. I turned to the window. An enormous tank was entering the square at a furious speed, followed by another, and a third, and a fourth, and like antediluvian monsters the whole column raced round the square, and around again, and behind them came tracked vehicles full of soldiers. Most of the tanks had their hatches open and the crews were looking out at the buildings. The square was dead. The tanks took up position in front of the castle, traversed their guns to point at the seat of the government. A tank blocked one entrance into the square; a tracked infantry carrier blocked the other.

The nightmare had taken on substance. It was not any more real or any more comprehensible, but it had materialized and you could now touch it.

Under my window a cordon of soldiers formed up, with red paratroop berets and submachine guns slung over their shoulders. Well-turned-out, well-dressed soldiers. They were waiting for something to happen. Nothing happened. We were an occupied country.

From a page of drawings by the Czechoslovak cartoonist, Ivan Steiger, published in The Christian Science Monitor

Prague woke up to a bad dream. Nobody understood—and when they had understood they understood even less. A city that was free yesterday was to become unfree at the touch of a button. The truth proclaimed, pursued and defended only yesterday was to be abolished. A group of quislings were to come marching out of the castle gates to welcome the invaders with the traditional bread and salt.

But truth was not silenced and no one came marching out of that gate. The city filled with young people, from 14 to 22 or 25, and there began one of the strangest occupations in history. Everyone knew at once that the nerve center of the country was the radio. One crowd therefore spontaneously made for the Radio Center and, without weapons, placed itself in the path of the advancing tanks.

"Keep calm. Let your weapon be passive resistance. Don't be provoked into bloodshed. That's what they are waiting for. Don't be provoked!" The words rang out from all the loud-speakers in the streets, and from all transistors. The tanks stopped, alarmed. The human bodies would not let them pass. Obstacles appeared—an overturned bus, some automobiles. Immediately above their heads a reporter was giving the world a running commentary of the battle for the Radio Center. It was an absurd performance—part Havel, part Gogol. A squad of Russian soldiers entered the building, ripped two telephones from their sockets at the reception desk, camped down in the foyer and lit cigarettes. Their officer set out on a tour, and on two floors he locked the office doors. One did not have a key, which put him out a little, but at least he had tried. Then he reported back to his commanding officer with the pride of a mission successfully accomplished. Except that he had omitted to lock up the teleprinter room and the principal operational offices. And so, while he was taking a rest, an account of his exploit was already being broadcast to the world and the radio continued to function.

Out in the street a type of defense was taking shape that was to develop into an art in the next few days. Coordinated by the radio, the young people conducted not so much a passive as a nonviolent resistance, a technique they had perfected in their dealings with a progressively less tough police of their own.

Above all, they were treating the occupiers with ironical contempt. "What are you doing here?" they would say to them, jovially slapping them on the back. "Is that a way to go visiting?"

The education of the Stalin era boomeranged in an unexpected way. The young people, into whom Russian had been drilled in grade after grade, were able to communicate with the unhappy invaders. In Russian script they wrote on the pavements, on trees, and even on the tanks themselves. Go home. What do you want here? Dubecek. Svoboda. But also Munich 1938; Prague 1968. This is not Vietnam. Home, dogs.

But in front of the Radio Center the situation was more tense. The tank crews, faced with the crowd, panicked.

They opened fire. First over their heads; then at the people and into windows. Flames leapt up. One tank was on fire. Then another. And the café across the road. And another building. Some dead were lying on the pavement. And wounded. When an ambulance came to pick them up the tanks maneuvered so as to bar its way.

The sound of firing also came from Wenceslas Square. One burst hit the young people on the museum ramp. And still the radio went on reporting each incident, its reporters driving through the city with their tape recorders, the cameramen shooting dramatic sequences—under machine-gun fire if spotted—and a few streets farther down other crowds of young people were pushing round tanks and infantry carriers, arguing with their crews. "Explain their mistake to them," the radio was urging. "Convince them." And from windows and doors and loud-speakers voices were calling out to the invaders in their own language.

"Halt!" a soldier shouted at a young girl in the square outside the castle. She was on the way to buy her groceries round the corner. She handed him her shopping bag and money. "All right, stupid—you go and do my shopping for me!" He dropped his eyes and turned round.

A short distance away a group of young people stood around the tank which was blocking the way into the square. One of the soldiers helplessly shrugged his shoulders and wept. A little later a girl of about 17, in a mini-skirt and with long hair, placed herself in front of the tank and read out, in Russian, an appeal to the occupying forces.

Vltava radio, the station operated by the Russians in the hope of winning over the public, broadcast an interview with the mother of a Russian soldier; she was proud that her son had hastened to the aid of Prague, the city during whose liberation his father had been killed. Prague radio replied: That mother would do better to dry the tears of the mothers of the young people whom her son perhaps had shot dead without any reason.

Abruptly, like an icy wind sweeping over the surface of a lake, the square was transformed into a battlefield. The lazily strolling soldiers scuttled to the trees, dropped down on their knees, machine guns started barking, and an anti-tank gun jerkily maneuvered on a piece of lawn where only yesterday children had been playing. Then came the crack of tanks firing, then more machine guns, then again the sharp crack of cannon fire, and finally the "Urra" of a charge.

What were they capturing? I don't know. I could not see any farther because of the trees, and I could not move any closer. And a little later, only a short distance away, mini-skirted girls, contemptuously indifferent, were telling the troops to go home, sticking up posters, and chalking swastikas on their tanks.

Then a bunch of boys and girls arrived—excited, angry. Their leader, bearded and long-haired, was carrying a Czechoslovak flag spattered with blood. "You're killing children," they were shouting in Russian. "Here's the blood of one of our friends."

The sun was shining, the girls had put on their prettiest dresses, over the city reverberated the peal of church bells and the wail of sirens in protest against the occupation, and the soldiers, uncomprehending in their steel boxes, were hungry and thirsty. "Not a crust of bread, not a drop of water for the invaders," the slogan swept the country. Stupid brutal force had lost the day. Facilities which had once served totalitarianism—the apparatus of the Communist party, the network of municipal radio transmitters—everything now turned against the invaders and forged the whole nation into a perfectly functioning army of unarmed resisters.

It was pure Kafka-like, the whole of Prague with its narrow streets, its gargoyles and its churches. It was incomprehensible, terrifying and ridiculous. On one side frightened soldiers firing at children, and on the other a tank crew in tears. On one of the bridges a friend of mine was stopped by a soldier who released the safety catch of his submachine gun and ordered him to go back. When he tried another bridge he was again stopped, but this soldier was merely scrounging cigarettes.

"Aren't you ashamed?" an old woman asked a head sticking out from a mountain of steel. The head stared at her open-mouthed.

"Pardon me," I said. "Would you move your tank a little so I can drive out?" The tracks clanked obligingly. He let me through and then backed his tank again to its original position.

CITY OF RUMORS

DETROIT'S YEAR WITHOUT NEWS

JEROME AUMENTE

Mr. Aumente is an urban affairs writer for The Detroit News.

Detroit

Detroit is slowly groping back to normal after enduring the nation's longest strike of major newspapers on record, but the fifth largest city in the United States somewhat resembles an amnesia victim whose serious information gaps will never be bridged. The prolonged shutdown of The Detroit News and The Detroit Free Press, which sell 1.3 million papers daily, hit the population in a debilitating way. As information dried up, the ability to make decisions, to bring about political and social change, or simply to achieve peace of mind, went with it.

The strike of 267 days began in November, 1967, only months after the most destructive riot in the nation's memory. The dialogue of recovery was muted at its most crucial point, and that was a real tragedy. For Detroit was a city turning inward, with many of its citizens living in dread of the racial situation. The reminder was in the faint outline of former glass store fronts in the slums, now bricked, cemented or sealed with cinder block. A fortress mentality prevailed, and behind the embrasure-like openings, the wrought iron grills and metal bars, there was an uneasy waiting for the next siege.

Rumors swirled like leaves in the fall of 1967 after the summer riot. Left unchallenged through the winter of the strike and into last spring, their virulence grew. Guns were stockpiled by both blacks and whites, and in the suburbs neighborly patterns of protective cross fire were arranged. Some disheartened Detroiters hung signs in their windows: "This House Is Not Armed." Effigies of civil rights and black leaders were hung from lampposts in a downtown plaza.

Through all this, private polls taken by the city showed that in both black and white areas, the fear of street crime was all-consuming. A mimeographed broadside, "Alarm," was distributed by an extreme right-wing group with a Dearborn address and calling itself the "Patriotic Party." It asked: "Can you survive the next riot? Next time they will destroy all the utilities, gas, water, lights, phones, and plan to murder all policemen and their families." The party urged as a number-one priority: "Have a gun and plenty of ammunition. Nothing wrong with a bow and arrow." These pamphlets found their way into the ghettos, and black militants reacted with a demand for counter arming.

After months of such volatile nonsense, Mayor Jerome P. Cavanagh warned in a special television address last March: "Fear is fueled by rumors, and rumors have been rampant from Grand Boulevard to the Grosse Pointes . . . Without newspapers in this city, these rumors have spread by word of mouth until they have taken on the aspect of truth and a basis for action.

"Victimized by rumors, the citizens of Detroit—both Negro and white—are arming themselves in unprecedented numbers. And in the suburbs surrounding Detroit gun sales have soared."

Mayor Cavanagh announced the formation of a "Rumor Control Center" at the city's Commission on Community Relations (CCR) and shortly after the broadcast the lines were swamped with 500 calls. The pace continued at 300 a day for a week. When Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., was killed, the daily volume jumped to 1,500, while Detroit underwent a tight curfew. The sight of National Guard on the streets reawakened painful memories of the previous summer.

The bulk of the calls came from whites, and the most prevalent fear was a murderous black invasion of the suburbs. The carved Tiki gods and Afro dress worn by some black nationalists fanned the imagination of fearful whites. They accepted the rumors that the blacks carried bullets around their necks with the names of police and their children scratched into the casing.

Following Dr. King's death, two policemen were wounded in a machine-gunning, and a wave of more minor incidents was reported. But Detroit escaped the violence of the rest of the country, and people were curiously reassured by the realization that another big riot was not inevitable. The phone calls dropped to about thirty a day. But the positive effect of this relaxation of tension was not felt by a metropolitan population deprived of its newspapers.

Richard Marks, director of the CCR, believes that the steady flow of rumors reflected an inability of television to fill the information gap. People were getting the headlines, but these cryptic mountain peaks of news lacked "the details that so often form the binder of communications."

Without exception, persons interviewed in public and private life felt that, while television and radio helped, they did not satisfactorily replace the information supplied by the normal print media. Some stations extended their news shows, but the result was to add water to an already thin soup. Coverage was "longer but not wider," one viewer complained. Another said: "There is no sensitive exploration of the issues, or any depth. You get a solid blast, but no thought."

However, the local affiliate of the N.E.T. network, WTVS, had an unusual opportunity to experiment with the televising of news when the Ford Foundation, at the urging of Fred W. Friendly, made the station an emergency grant of $42,000. With this money, the station produced a one-hour "Television City Room," Monday through Friday, from November, 1967, to March, 1968. The format, conceived and executed by unemployed newsmen from the Free Press, consisted of a round-robin discussion of national and world news, twenty-minute segments of important local stories read by the newsmen who covered them, special reports, interviews and a reading of the comics.

WTVS has a potential saturation of 68 per cent of the 800,000 homes, but Louis Slyker, station manager and program director, estimated that the audience never exceeded 50,000 homes. This was still impressive, and so were several thousand calls and letters. San Francisco's educational TV station, KOED, got Ford backing for a similar project when a strike closed that city's papers a few weeks later. [See "TV's First Real Paper" by Michael Harris, The Nation, March 18.]

The Ford Foundation was embarked on a multimillion-dollar educational television support program, and the Detroit project was a "hangnail grant" that was not extended beyond March. WTVS then sought local support, but found potential contributors under pressure not to give. Slyker said "the party line was that we were prolonging the strike by our presence." He declined to say where the alleged pressure came from, only that it was not labor.

The show offered an alternative to the hit-and-run approach of most broadcast news, but Slyker had to admit: "We don't think TV and radio can fill the gap of newspapers, much as we tried to do so." It was impossible to duplicate the breadth of content or the ability to read a paper at leisure, not on schedule.

Thus many important developments that will affect the Detroit area for years went almost unnoticed. The New Detroit Committee, a coalition of community leaders working with moderate and militant blacks, undertook a major program for the hard-core unemployed, won state open housing laws, and initiated a wide variety of social and physical programs. While hampered by a break with the militants, it did achieve some dialogue. The committee won wide national publicity, but at home its effects were muffled. In April, it had to issue its first major progress report, setting goals for years to come, without the dailies to report, support or evaluate its work.

Detroit's Model Cities project encompasses a 9-square-mile area of 125,000 population. The crucial election for its citizens' governing board went relatively unnoticed in May. Leaders say they were unable to get adequate coverage on television. Only a court action that related to the election date thrust the event into prime news time. Whites in the proposed development area remained lethargic until an article in The Wall Street Journal, indicating that there was the likelihood of a black take-over, brought them into action.

Many of the findings of the President's National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders, even its reason for being, centered on Detroit. But when its report appeared, there were no responsible papers to give daily interpretation. The political flip-flops of Gov. George Romney, the decision of President Johnson not to run, the murders of Dr. King and Robert Kennedy, the opening of the Paris peace talks, the crisis of the French students' strike, passed in the silence of the strike.

Legislators in Lansing, the state capital, took the newspaper blackout as a time to slip through pet legislation; at the same time, the fight for meaningful open housing legislation was hampered by the absence of strong editorial support. A suburban weekly editor said, in fact, that the whole flow of political stories from the state capital dried up without the prodding influence of the two metropolitan dailies.

Within the city, the council race split along racial lines and there was little understanding of the candidates' positions, or even a clear idea of how many were running. The council voted a controversial stop-and-frisk ordinance, and rejected a local gun-control law. A special high school study commission found the Detroit system "appallingly inadequate and a disgrace to the community"; coverage and explanation of these important events were missing. Perhaps the only time Mayor Cavanagh did not regret the absence of the papers was during his divorce proceedings and the custody fight for his children.

John Hersey's Algiers Motel Incident was published during the summer, and the judge immediately ordered a six-month delay in the trial of a Detroit policeman implicated in the killing of three young blacks at the motel during the 1967 riot. Without the newspapers, the legal maneuvers leading up to the trial and the delay were not adequately reported, and the feeling of the black community that nothing was being done was the greater without a day-by-day chronology of the case.

Pressure for the return of the newspapers mounted. Romney said he would even ask President Johnson for help (but didn't). The strike became a center of state senate hearings, federal court action, and comment in Congress. Citizens petitioned for an end to the strike and threatened a subscription freeze. Rival newsmen from the two papers prepared a joint statement calling for a settlement and warned: "These are most critical times for this city. . . . Detroit is gripped by fear and misguided by rumor and misinformation."

Meanwhile, the convention time drew near, and Michigan is an important state politically, both for its reservoir of labor support in unions like the UAW and for the national focus of George Romney. Nelson Rockefeller knew this and scheduled a massive advertising campaign for the metropolitan area. He canceled it when the strike dragged on beyond the Miami convention.

Pre-election polls that The Detroit News would have conducted would have indicated the popular support for Rockefeller and Eugene McCarthy in out-state communities. McCarthy was able to attract a crowd of 15,000 at Tiger Stadium despite a drenching downpour. Rev. Albert Cleage, Jr., a Detroit minister and nationally known black militant leader, chose the rally as the occasion to endorse the Senator, but the effect was lost.

Labor came out early, and solidly, for Humphrey in Michigan, and labor newspapers cranked out pre-convention support. The UAW split over an endorsement before the convention. Walter Reuther is a close friend of the Vice President, but he is also a dove on the war. Some others on the union's executive board had supported Robert Kennedy. Eventually, the UAW would fall in line behind whoever was the Democratic candidate, but meanwhile it waited. The Democratic delegation to Chicago had no reason to shift its allegiance from Humphrey.

And Romney might have been prodded into a more vigorous support of Rockefeller. True, the Michigan Governor was still smarting from the backhanded support the New York Governor had given his candidacy, but the Michigan delegation was strongly supporting Rockefeller. Romney remained uncommitted before going to Miami. There were no papers to prod him.

Shortly after the shutdown in November, three interim strike papers, dubbed the "vulture press," were on the streets with a total estimated circulation of 375,000. Their quality was mediocre and they had disappeared by January in union contract labor disputes.

The Michigan Chronicle, a responsible Negro weekly, enjoyed robust growth. A moderate biweekly Negro paper, Detroit Tribune, was born. Militant black weeklies appeared; one of them, The Inner City Voice, carried such headlines as "Racist Cop Beats Black Mother." A new daily, The Black and White Reporter, promised a biracial approach to the news.

Other new publications came and went, the most vivid splash of yellow journalism being The Detroit American. It pandered crime news and sensational headlines, with veiled racial references to Negro crimes. Its somewhat archaic tone is illustrated by an excerpt from a daily feature, "Police Blotter": "A new atrocity, the beating and shooting of a 27-year-old Detroit as he lay helpless on the sidewalk by a merciless street cur because he had no money to surrender has been recorded by police. . . . Another shooting of a helpless lone man by a four-man jackal pack [was reported] and the valiant counter-attack by a citizen with a pocket knife who drove off four punks, two of them armed, despite the fact that the whelps fired six shots at him. . . ."

Merchants turned out their own handbills, and postmen worked overtime to handle the flood of emergency mailings. "Since the strike we've been engulfed by garbage," a housewife said. "Shoppers, folders. . . a whole trash barrel full. They stuff up the mailbox." Business showed a decline among the smaller merchants who depend on advertising; the larger stores with established clientele were less affected. The 1967 Christmas sales figure was up 6 percent from the previous year, though still below expectations. A woman sensed a new phenomenon: "I notice more people sharing information. Did you know that? Did you hear that?—calling each other."

The strike had been agonizingly extended by a "blueprint for bedlam" in which twenty-three separate contracts had to be negotiated with fourteen separate unions at each newspaper. Any one union could walk out, bringing a general strike, as happened when the Teamsters struck during negotiations last November. There is a growing sentiment from both publishing and union sources for some reform that would make it impossible for a single union thus to trigger a general strike against the will of the majority of the unions.

RENFRO

Both The Free Press and The Detroit News say that they will never be silenced again, but have not said how they can be so sure. However, the News undertook a voluntary training program of nonstriking employees and thus achieved the capacity to produce a newspaper of limited size, if needed. The Free Press is reported able to do the same by marshaling resources from other newspapers in the Knight chain. Although neither management resorted to the extreme of publishing its own paper, the ability to do so adds credibility to their vow not to tolerate another extended shutdown.

Meanwhile, the metropolitan area seeks to recover from the experience. One cannot avoid the feeling that its growth was stunted by lack of information. The interim diet was a thin substitute, in some cases a harmful one. The permanent effects of the malnutrition will not be measured for some time.

COLOR BLIND FROM BIRTH

ELEANOR HECKERT

Mrs. Heckert, a resident of the Virgin Islands, is the author of a novel, Mucovado, which is about to appear in paper reprint. She is now completing a second novel under contract with Doubleday.

St. Thomas, V.I.

If you had an accident in the Virgin Islands, and were rushed to the hospital for emergency surgery, the chances are four to one that your surgeon would be black, and only one of your three nurses would be white. Should you wish later to pursue the legal niceties of the accident, you would know that of the 200 policemen who might investigate the case, 196 are black, and that the chances were even that a black judge would hear your case in municipal court. Eighty per cent of newspaper coverage of your adventure would be controlled by blacks.

And if you had arrived recently from the States, where "burn, baby, burn" vies with "law and order" and Huey Newton confronts George Wallace across an impasse of hate, you might be afraid. But you would not need to be. In these island outposts of the United States, your white skin would not be held against you. Neither, however, would it gain you an advantage. And of course you would be outnumbered five to one.

Integration is an almost ancient fact in these islands, a strange sort of integration wherein the white man has come to seek acceptance from the black. A few more statistics and then a little history: Of the estimated 54,000 residents of the Virgin Islands, 17 per cent are white. In the public schools about 70 per cent of students and 75 per cent of teachers are black. Three out of five principals are white. About 90 per cent of the students at the new College of the Virgin Islands are black, but the faculty is about half white.

Of the fifteen Senators in the Virgin Islands legislature, twelve are black. On the other hand, of the sixteen American Governors appointed (by the U.S. President) since the United States bought the islands from Denmark in 1917, only three have been black, and those in fairly recent years. The smart money here says that the first elected governor will be a white man, but not because he is white. He is native.

The intended implication is that the largest part of such discrimination as does exist here is of an older sort, not drawn on lines of color but according to whether one was born here or came from somewhere else. And it happens that, while a good many natives are white (mostly of French, Dutch and Danish origin), a large part of the immigrant population (from neighboring British and French islands, where work is scarce and wages are incredibly low) is black.

Integration came to these islands (the U.S. Virgins, comprising St. Thomas, St. John and St. Croix) before the Americans took possession fifty-one years ago. In 1835, Peter von Scholten, the Danish Governor-General, invited intelligent and well-tutored slaves to his formal dinner parties. Foreseeing the certainty of emancipation, von Scholten was eager to establish social possibilities between responsible Negroes and the whites they would have to deal with, once free. His first attempt failed; the white guests, having heard of his plan, did not show up. But the Danish colonists were essentially a liberal lot, and from the time of the second attempt at an integrated dinner party until the present, Government House has been the scene of mixed gatherings. Von Scholten's mistress, a free colored woman, was his hostess at both political and social functions.

Von Scholten is given much of the credit for obtaining King Christian's signature on a bill (in July, 1847) proclaiming all children henceforth born of slaves to be free. The bill stated further, however, that the slaves themselves were to remain in bondage for twelve more years, so that they could be educated for their freedom. The promise of freedom was not enough for the slaves and they threatened to revolt unless they had freedom now. They got it within the year, and from 1848 the blacks of these three islands have been not only free but possessed of goods and a very real power to control their own destiny.

Like the Governor-General, other influential Danes had openly loved, and often married, their Negro women. As a result, the larger part of the islands' real estate was owned by citizens of mixed blood when the Stars and Stripes were hoisted over Fort Christian.

For a good many years integration—complete integration as far as one can tell—was quietly and innocently practiced as daily routine. Marriage and social congress between the races were not considered unusual. There were occasional complaints of discrimination when the white U.S. military personnel (for Washington recognized the islands' strategic advantages) were generous with their seed but unwilling to assume the responsibilities of an integrated family life. But for the most part, black and brown and white moved about without giving much thought to color.

The integration that was a natural state in this primitive community turned into an economic necessity about twenty years ago with the considerable ingress of white entrepreneurs from the United States and Europe. These businessmen saw a potential that had escaped the imagination of all but a very few natives: tourism. The newcomers were possessed of capital, business ideas, energy and faith in the growth of the islands. As they began to prosper, so did the large majority of heretofore desperately poor natives; the per capita income for the Virgin Islands became (and remains) the highest in the entire Caribbean area. Thus the now powerful black middle class was born.

And with the incredibly rapid growth of tourism came an unspoken knowledge that complete racial concord, or at least the appearance of it, was essential to the islands' economic foundation. When there is racial disturbance, the visitor almost never gets a whiff of it. In fact, the proofs of working integration are so dazzling and refreshing to the newcomer that he is easily led to imagine a perfection that does not exist.

In the last year there have been several minor racial conflicts and the murder of two whites by blacks. (Most local opinion would say, perhaps defensively, that these were the direct results of agitation from stateside black militants.) The first murder took place immediately following the news that Martin Luther King had been killed. It was very simple: a black man walked into a restaurant in St. Croix and killed (by his own admission) the first white man he saw. The second was the killing of the publisher of a local liberal and controversial magazine by a Negro who had displayed "kill whites" signs on his taxi several months earlier, and who had for that reason been removed from the streets by black policemen. It is generally thought that the man is insane. Everyone concerned about the island's future thinks of these incidents as horrible exceptions to an otherwise nearly satisfactory situation.

Rumors have been circulating, some of which seem reliable, that certain Black Power groups will be the first to bring the notion of real racism to the islands—that in fact the basic strategy for infiltration has already been laid. I discount any strong possibility of success for such movements. I am not, of course, speaking of those groups whose aim in the States is to forward the cause of integration; here they would find the situation far too advanced to be worth their efforts. But anyone or any group devoted to violence as a means of achieving black separation would lack the slogans that would mean anything to anyone. It is a simple fact that equality of opportunity is a way of life here—in education, in housing, in jobs, in social situations. The kind of discrimination that is in fact a problem (i.e., that displayed by "natives" toward "off-islanders," black or white) would only, I think, work against any attempt by outside militant groups to change the present situation.

But this in turn suggests one group that might be susceptible to the arguments of militants from the States: the off-island blacks, who have indeed been faced with living conditions comparable (in some ways) to the ghettos in America. About 12,000 bonded aliens work in the U.S. Virgin Islands. Black and white islanders employ aliens almost exclusively as domestics, and aliens swell the rank of businesses that are in need of menial or hard labor. Natives tend to eschew such work, preferring such jobs as driving their own taxis or office work. Here the alien is at a disadvantage and is made to feel it—in the already overcrowded housing and hospital facilities and in the schools.

There is a great deal of social interaction between blacks and whites in the upper economic strata. The educated, affluent Negro appears to accept his white counterpart without challenge. If he has hidden misgivings, they most probably stem from a fear of losing his island culture and heritage. Blacks of this class have been forced to develop a razor-sharp sense of tolerance, for they have in most cases been exposed to long periods of white arrogance during stateside education, military service or business dealings.

No statistics, alas, are available concerning interracial sexual drives in the islands; and since the subject is bound to lurk in the back of most readers' minds, I offer a personal sampling of opinion. One black woman friend voiced a feeling I have heard expressed commonly: "I could be attracted to white guys here, but I simply won't let myself. I have the distinct impression that a white man wouldn't value me or take me seriously. He doesn't in the States, why should he here?" A white woman's response to the question of her inclination toward black men: "I've been involved that way, but never again. The attraction on their part is spurious. I doubt that a Negro would ever trust my motives, even though I know he has good reason to." And from a black man: "I've reached the point where I don't want to go out with white women any more. In the beginning I suppose my desire for them was mostly curiosity. But a lot of these tourist chicks come running down here on a fling and they think a black man's here for them to use. There's a sign on them that says 'look at me, I'm liberal' but when it's all over they shake hands and are a businesslike as a Cuban prostitute. No thanks, not for me." And from a white man: "White women ought to take a lesson from the colored girls I know. White women tend to let you take something for a price—oh, not a monetary price but a psychological one. Colored women have more giving nature."

Today, less than half the real estate (and only small portion of the real value) of the islands is owned by blacks. Along the main streets it is easy to see that the white man definitely controls retail business. Of white owners, mainlanders rather than natives are in the majority, but several vast business empires are owned or controlled by white natives. It is said that all but a few Virgin Islanders have been too close to the woods to see the big bills growing on the trees. It is also said that they feel a deep resentment of the whites to whom they have sold the vineyard.

And what about the wealthy stateside black businessmen? If our spring is so sweet and pure, why have so few of them come to taste the water? Here I must rely on the voice of one Negro from the States who had been very successful in business on St. Thomas, but eventually sold his interests and returned home. He said he had left the islands so that his children could have the benefits of a more cultural atmosphere. When I asked him if the discrimination he would face back home was worth the exchange, he smiled and asked, "What discrimination? It's 'in' to be black today."

Many of the bright younger black natives are leaving the islands for a wider variety of job opportunities and very few mainland blacks are coming to take their places. Some blacks from the States say the local natives resent them (which is true) and make it difficult for them to live and work here. Some say the cost of living is disproportionate to the low salaries, and still other say the islands have nothing to offer the black man except a good climate and a very groovy spot for retirement.

White tourists (and why almost all the tourists here are white is a matter that has puzzled me for years) often forget to leave their racial hang-ups at home, and this sometimes presents problems for all of us who live here. A black doctor friend tells me of a white woman who was brought to the hospital after an automobile accident. Only emergency surgery could save her life. As she was being wheeled along the corridor she became conscious and cursed my friend and the nurses, telling them all to keep their black hands off her. I asked the doctor if he had not been tempted to do just that, and let her bleed to death. "We have to be tolerant of people like that," he said softly. "Before she left the hospital she even liked us."

More recently, after another automobile accident, a teen-age son of white islanders found himself in the emergency room, where the black nurses and doctor treating him began to talk about race relations in the States. As the doctor took a stitch in the patient's eyebrow, he hesitated. Looking into the boy's eyes he grinned broadly and said: "You better believe black is beautiful."

CALIFORNIA BREAKTHROUGH

SOCIAL REFORM THROUGH LAW

ED CRAY

Mr. Cray is director of publications for the ACLU of Southern California. He has written on California politics for a number of national publications, and is at present completing a book on health care in the United States.

Los Angeles

The credentials of James Lorenz, 30, are impressive: Phillips Academy (high honors), Harvard '60 (magna cum laude and Phi Beta Kappa), Harvard Law (another cum laude) and one of Spring Street's most influential law firms. Just four years out of school, he now heads a law office with a staff of 105 and a budget this year of $1.4 million. Yet for all these honors, it is unlikely that the former cross-country runner will ever be named Junior Chamber of Commerce man of the year. The waves he makes are much too big.

Lorenz is the director of California Rural Legal Assistance (CRLA), the two-year-old agency which has tripped up Governor Reagan, frustrated the U.S. Department of Labor, wrestled the state bar to a draw, infuriated the California Council of Growers, provoked the collection agencies' protective association, and alienated a parcel of politicians. At the same time, he and the staff members of CRLA have earned the wary trust of California's 600,000 rural poor.

When you are poor, it is hard to believe those who say they want to help you, harder still to hope that they can do so. The police, the law, the government belong to the growers, the banks, the collection agencies—to anybody but the poor. If you have little English, it is even more difficult to have trust.

You know your wages may be garnished if you can't make payments on the ten-year-old automobile. You know you may be denied welfare when the "Little Winter" comes to the Imperial Valley and you can't find work. You know there is no unemployment insurance for farm workers, though you work only six months a year to earn $1,378 for a family of five. You know the farmer is legally obliged to provide decent living quarters, and you know that no one seems to enforce the law when you are sleeping five in a room. You pay your taxes, but soon learn that the city will not give you water or sewers, or pave the hard-earth streets of Niggettown. You are poor, and it is very difficult to have hope; but the CRLA did stop the braceros.

It was a make-or-break case. "If we had backed down, we would never have had credibility with our clients," Lorenz explains. And it was a calculated risk: the implacable hostility of growers and their powerful lobby in exchange for the timorous support of the rural poor CRLA hopes to aid.

During the summer of 1967, CRLA had tried with no luck to negotiate the rehiring of two groups of farm workers in Salinas and Modesto. One group had been fired because the members were believed to be in a farm workers' union, the other because they were to be replaced by braceros, Mexican nationals imported to work the fields at lower wages.

Where growers once brought braceros in freely, and such layoffs were common, Mexican nationals can now be used legally only if there is a labor shortage, if efforts have been made to recruit domestic workers at the $1.60 minimum wage, and if farmers have met various health and safety standards in the fields. In any event, braceros cannot be used on farms where a labor dispute exists, or if their coming would be to the disadvantage of domestic laborers.

The Bureau of Employment Security (BES) of the U.S. Department of Labor is charged with seeing that the federal regulations are met. In theory, it reviews evidence gathered by its own men and by the Farm Labor Bureau of the California Department of Employment. The evidence of compliance in hand, BES certifies to Immigration that all is well. Immigration brings across the braceros.

Five growers' associations asserted in 1967 that there was a shortage of domestic workers and that they were seeking help from the state's Farm Labor Bureau to find scarce harvesters. One of the five represented the farmer who had discharged CRLA's nine clients for union membership, yet now was claiming a labor shortage.

In theory, the state Farm Labor Bureau was checking on compliance with the law. CRLA attorneys were dubious and had amassed considerable documentary evidence to support their skepticism. The head of the bureau is William H. Tolbert, an appointee of Governor Reagan and a former employee of the California Citrus Growers Association, Southern Section. His appointment has been compared by one CRLA attorney to "making Dillinger chief of police."

Though he had been holding worker applications from growers' associations for some weeks, Tolbert delayed forwarding them to the federal Bureau of Employment Security until just before the tomato crop ripened. The delay put BES regional administrator, Glenn E. Brockway, in a bind. A close review of the applications would delay the use of braceros; meanwhile the 210,000-acre crop would rot on the vines.

Still seeking to regain the jobs of its unemployed clients, CRLA thought it had a bargaining wedge. Sheldon Greene, at 33 the oldest of CRLA's attorneys and head of its Modesto office, had gained the Department of Labor's assurance that prior to certification, he would be given an opportunity to present his clients' case. The use of braceros was much rumored when CRLA began making daily calls to BES. On September 6, Brockway rejected a California Department of Employment telegram requesting braceros. The telegram was "totally inadequate, as no supporting evidence was included," Labor officials explained.

Shortly after a phone call on the 7th, the first request for 800 braceros was received in BES's San Francisco office. At 4 P.M. the next day, without seeing the documentation demanded two days before, without checking on growers' compliance with the laws, and just five hours after reassuring CRLA that no requests for braceros had been acceptable, Brockway announced certification of the need for 8,100 braceros. Four of the growers' associations, asking for a total of 7,300 braceros, had yet to submit their requests. Not a single supporting document required by the regulations was in when Brockway made his announcement.

CRLA felt it had been double-crossed. Assured that it would take as long as three weeks to check upon compliance, Greene and Robert Gnaizda of the Salinas office had felt they would have ample opportunity to show Brockway that the associations and individual growers were anything but in compliance with the law. Brockway shoulders full responsibility for the certification: "I made this judgment on my own, and without pressure from anyone. The action was precipitous, I must admit."

CRLA moved just as fast. The day after certification, Greene and Gnaizda were in court on behalf of their jobless clients, seeking an order to bar the braceros. A temporary restraining order was issued that day, and a full-scale hearing ordered for the 12th.

With the federal court order looming, BES agreed to the talks previously promised. Forty-eight consecutive hours of negotiation produced a settlement between Labor and CRLA. The 8,100 requested braceros were to be admitted (6,125 actually came in), and the suit which would have delayed them indefinitely was dismissed.

Twelve major concessions were made by the Department of Labor, the most important of which was the agreement to set up a seven-member panel to refashion the certification procedures. Three of the members were to be nominated by CRLA, three were to represent growers or their associations. CRLA's nominees would give farm workers for the first time a voice in determining the policy of the bracero program. How effective the panel will be remains to be seen. Brockway was forced to call more than 200 growers before he could find three who were willing to represent the farmers' interests, and brave the associations' ire.

The bracero case, Lorenz explains, "was really the test case to see if government will operate lawfully. Our clients are concerned about unequal justice, about morality, and if they have to obey the law, they want everyone else to do the same." Those who would be moral cannot often expect to be popular too. Lorenz and his thirty-three attorneys manning the ten state-wide offices of CRLA are resigned to being disliked.

The hostility would have taken its toll of the CRLA staff before now, were it not for the evangelical dedication Lorenz has fostered in his amalgam of Ivy Leaguers and idealists, chosen as much for their "Peace Corps" fervor as for their professional skills.

Fervor and skill are both needed, Gnaizda says, for CRLA's program "takes chances." Lorenz shrugs off the implication of legal derring-do, explaining that Gnaizda has a conservative outlook. But despite his air of equanimity, Lorenz is walking a tightrope. His program must be active enough to maintain the community support it has enlisted, yet cannot alienate too many people in high places. Paradoxically, and proportionately, the more effective CRLA is in defense of the rural poor, the more precarious its balance becomes.

CRLA has considerable opposition already. It had been in business little more than a year when Rep. Robert Mathias (R., Kern County) asked for a probe of its link to Cesar Chavez's United Farm Workers Organizing Committee. The tie was obvious to the Congressman: Chavez is one of thirty-three CRLA board members. Mathias did not know that Chavez has yet to attend a meeting. His endorsement, not his intramural vote, is important to CRLA. An eight-month investigation by the government's General Accounting Office gave CRLA a clean bill of health.

After the bracero settlement, Rep. Burt Talcott (R., Monterey) warned the home folks in a press release from Washington that CRLA's "principal purpose in our area appears to be political, more than legal. Purporting to help the poor is simply a tactic to divert attention from their real motives."

Smarting from the bracero setback, the California Farmer editorialized: "It's painfully evident that the farmer is the enemy and that harassment is the order of the day." But California's farmers, who will gross $4 billion in 1968, could take heart. "We have Congressmen B. F. Sisk and Charley Gubser fighting for us at the Washington level," the magazine reassured its readership.

Congressmen Sisk and Gubser were not alone. In the Upper House, Sen. George Murphy called for the dismissal of Lorenz and CRLA's then associate director, Gary Bellow. Murphy went further, introducing an amendment to the Office of Economic Opportunity funding bill which would have barred the 250 neighborhood legal service programs from bringing suit against government agencies. Murphy complained that attorneys "have been to challenge our laws all too often." He could not but himself to believe "that affording legal advice, counsel representation to persons unable to afford it in order to promote justice should include the right to bring against a federal, state or local agency supported by taxpayers' money when the party is represented by another agency or program which is financed by the same funds."

Senator Murphy singled out two suits for special attention: the bracero case; and what he termed an "all-out assault" on the Sutter County welfare department.

Sutter County's Board of Supervisors is not most liberal in the state. The board has refused to prove poverty programs on the self-satisfied justification that there is no poverty in Sutter's Eden. CRLA stuck in its legal oar when a get-tough welfare director refused to accept or process applications for aid to dependent children. Some would-be applicants were offered one-shot food orders; other were flatly turned away.

The Marysville office of CRLA filed thirty appeals with state Department of Social Welfare hearing officers, launched a parallel lawsuit to bar future denials. Governor Reagan termed it "harassment of a county welfare director," ignoring, as did Senator Murphy, the fact that of the thirteen cases reviewed by the state, the applicant had won twelve. (The count now stands at eighteen, nineteen, and the one loss has been appealed.) The Senator also failed to mention that the state welfare director John Montgomery, himself a Reagan appointee, formerly criticized the Sutter County practice as not "in accordance with the law."

Despite Murphy's speech, the Senate on October 10 voted 52 to 36 against what American Bar Association president, Earl F. Morris, termed the "ill-conceived amendment."

Two weeks later, the Board of Governors of the state bar association, naming no names, expressed "grave concern that certain of the proposed legislative changes relating to the subject legal service programs may seriously impair the independence and obligation of a lawyer to his client."

It was a tardy gesture, but gratefully accepted. CRLA, the more so since the state bar had unexpectedly opposed Lorenz's first funding request in 1966. The OEO legal services program from which the funding was to come, had been created to work in cooperation with organized bar. It was one thing when rural legislators responding to pressure from growers, claimed that CRLA was the legal arm of Cesar Chavez. It was quite another when the state bar, fearing the inroads of group legal practice, said the same thing. Lorenz flew off to Washington, and OEO sent him up to Capitol Hill. He survived Congressional grilling by stipulating that CRLA was not a union business, but did reserve the right to represent union members.

Meanwhile, Clinton Bamberger, then director of Legal Services for OEO, told Sargent Shriver that, bar or no bar, if CRLA were not funded, Shriver could look for a new director. Shriver waited a week, then in what Lorenz

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

scribes as a "what-the-hell mood," agreed to the $1.2 million request.

It took more than a year of negotiations for CRLA to get the bar to make peace. The bar's opposition dissolved with the signing of an agreement with CRLA in June, 1967. Most of CRLA's opponents still had no more than a glimmer of the impact the organization might make. Lorenz, however, had given them fair warning. He wrote in the first proposal: "So far as the rural poor are concerned, the familiar saying that we are a society of laws, not of men, is, at best a half truth. Laws are passed, interpreted and enforced by men; legal rights depend upon political, economic and legal representation. Yet this is what the rural poor, particularly the farm workers, have consistently lacked." In short, CRLA was ambitiously bent on upsetting the power structure in rural California.

Two years spent at O'Melveny and Myers, a doyen among Spring Street's prestigious law firms, had taught Lorenz some hard lessons. There is a close relationship between law and socio-economic power, a pairing unthought in law school, and little discussed by most attorneys. Furthermore, influential law firms with extensive community ties exert an automatic deterrent effect; their mere appearance in a case helps avert legal entanglements. Lorenz hoped to bring to California's 600,000 rural poor similar authority. He was, in effect, asking OEO to create in one stroke a major law firm which could compete with the old established offices. "CRLA needed that size and prestige," Lorenz explains. "Quality goes where complicated problems go, to the large firms"—one reason why offices such as O'Melveny and Myers can skim the cream of the law schools.

CRLA would not, certainly at the start, have that sort of prestige, and it could not offer job security to the bright young men Lorenz wanted on his staff. Instead, he had to hold out a challenge, the promise of social problems to solve by use of "test cases"—deliberately fashioned legal actions aimed at rectifying inequities in law which relate to the poor to legal poverty. For law school graduates, for experienced attorneys, the prospect of making new law is tantalizing. Every attorney dreams, however idly, of arguing a case before the U.S. Supreme Court. Few do; CRLA was offering that opportunity.

Lorenz's idea of social reform through the law is not unique in the OEO legal services program. Legal representation of the poor can take either of two forms: filing court actions to attack root problems, or coping with the immediate, day-to-day crises of people with too little money. Most of the country's OEO-funded programs take the latter course. They may envy CRLA's reputation and program, but the 250 OEO-funded legal offices have not often emulated them. Their offices become divorce- or traffic-court mills, their attorneys master hands at negotiating landlord-tenant disputes or filing bankruptcy petitions. Overwhelmed by people needing help, the time spent on an individual client declines.

The quality of the legal representation also falls off. Over half of the legal services in the United States don't provide even adequate legal representation for clients," says Lorenz, not a man to pull his punches. "About 75 per cent of California's 50 legal aid or OEO-supported law firms are mediocre or bad. They are consensus oriented, afraid to alienate pressure groups. Most must please the local bar association and the Community Chest agency which funds them, and keep the right wing placated."

Despite the controversy inherent in CRLA's notion of law reform, it has won converts. The most important is Earl Johnson, Jr., director of OEO's Legal Services Program. Quoted in Barron's magazine, Johnson said: "The primary goal of the War on Poverty's Legal Service Program should be law reform achieved by significant test cases that can revise the structure of the world in which the poor live."

Restructuring the world of the poor is easily misunderstood, or plainly disliked by those whose prerogatives are infringed. Their disaffection is troublesome, but need not be fatal, as long as the legal service program can rely upon community support. CRLA gains its support from groups not often described as "the Establishment." When organizing his board of directors, Lorenz went first to the farm workers themselves, then to liberal Jewish groups, the labor movement, and the Mexican-American community. From these disparate elements, he fashioned a board committed to his idea of social reforms through the law.

These are the groups to which CRLA must constantly prove itself, and it takes work. In its first two years, the firm has handled 11,000 cases for some 15,000 clients. Legal advice and negotiation between contentious parties dispose of the great majority of cases: fewer than 25 per cent end up in court.

Of the cases which do go to court, about one-third involve consumer or employment questions. Another third are domestic relations and housing matters. The remainder involve governmental agencies' interpretation of the law or regulations which discriminate against the poor.

Seventy-five per cent, Lorenz estimates, of the court actions are "service" cases—divorces, traffic fines, default judgments, wage garnishments. They have no impact on the law, and raise no particular community controversy. "Failure to take these service cases would give 'the other side' a handle to attack us," Lorenz says. "These routine cases in any event are good for training attorneys in the special problems of the poor." Sometimes, too, a routine service case can grow into something bigger, as did the bracero case. CRLA dutifully handles the service cases, but its attorneys are frankly more interested in law reform, what Lorenz describes as "the big work, the exciting work."

"The other side" looms large in the conversation of Lorenz and his associates. The threat posed is real, the pressure constant, and the defense against repeated attacks time-consuming. Gnaizda, CRLA's resident conservative, says Lorenz and former associate director Gary Bellow have a "special feeling" for their jobs. "A courage," he adds. Courage it just may be. CRLA will take on the biggest opponents. Like the Governor of California.

Gov. Ronald Reagan was upset with the Medi-Cal program, fashioned by the state legislature in 1965. A patchwork of new and existing programs, Medi-Cal paid the costs of hospital and nursing home care, laboratory services, drugs and physicians' services for medical indigents.

Seemingly the program began to run into financial difficulty when Governor Reagan took office. By November, 1966, the Governor's office was estimating costs for the coming year at $584 million. Then a revised estimate put the burden at $666 million, leaving the program in the red by $20-odd million. State Health and Welfare director Spencer Williams announced that Medi-Cal costs would be reduced by cutting services. Some 160,000 beneficiaries would be immediately lopped from the rolls and an estimated 1.5 million Californians could expect some reduction in tax-paid medical care. The program was to be restricted to the treatment of acute conditions and emergencies.

Twelve days after the announcement, Sheldon Greene, with the bracero victory under his belt, secured a court order prohibiting Governor Reagan from putting the retrenchment into effect. The order was based on the fact that contrary to the state law setting up the Medi-Cal program, the proposed reduction in services would place the program below the level of aid that had prevailed before Medi-Cal. In addition, three other requirements of state law were ignored in what CRLA called the "Dragonian" slashes.

Governor Reagan had been caught with his staff work undone. The alarming deficit figures were suspect. (Six months later, it appears that Medi-Cal actually has a surplus that may run as high as $62.1 million.) The Governor's office had not read the Medi-Cal law closely; Williams' order had been issued without checking with the attorney general. The lower court order was made permanent, then ratified when the state supreme court upheld the injunction. With the bracero settlement already rankling, CRLA had delivered its second rebuke to the Governor.

It couldn't have come at a more unpropitious moment. While Greene jockeyed his clients' case through the courts, Lorenz was shaping CRLA's refunding proposal for 1968. Under the law setting up OEO and its legal services program, the state governors have a partial veto power. Their disapproval of a grant or a program can be overridden only by OEO's director. Such actions—in the face of political repercussions—are not frequent.

CRLA thus found itself at the untender mercies of the Governor's office. For a full month, four members of the Governor's staff worked through CRLA files looking for evidence of evil-doing. No one, including the Governor's men, knew what to look for. By the time they left, rumors of a veto were in the offing.

Lorenz spent a week in Washington lobbying for his program in the event the Governor vetoed or demanded major limitations in the CRLA program. Meanwhile CRLA's board members were lining up their constituency: senior citizens, social workers, law school deans, churches, labor unions, well-placed attorneys, and people who knew whom to call to get to people in high places.

Paul G. Zimmer, deputy director of the state OEO office, discounts CRLA's legal victories over the Reagan administration as lying behind the veto threat. Instead, he argues that the entire philosophy of the Governor's office is to involve more deeply the private sector in the poverty program. The bar associations are willing able to take cases now handled by OEO-funded legal programs, CRLA included, Zimmer insists.

Be that as it may, late in December, United Press International quoted William P. Clark, the Governor's executive secretary and himself an attorney, as saying: "The encouragement of litigation has perhaps opened the door too wide to the indigent client." CRLA attorneys "have imposed burdens on rural courts," Clark continued, "and their incursions into social legislation."

A day later, OEO forwarded the approved CRLA request for review by the Governor's office. Assured that Sargent Shriver would override a Reagan veto if necessary, Lorenz followed the proposal with a cannonade.

The Reagan administration, he told Los Angeles Times labor editor, Harry Bernstein, "apparently looks with favor on helping poor people with legal services only if they are suing other poor people."

On January 9, rather than veto the program outright and risk a rebuke from Shriver (Zimmer insists the Governor's office had no knowledge of Shriver's intentions), Reagan sought fifteen modifications of the CRLA grant. Some were slight; some had long since been part of CRLA's agreements with the state bar and OEO; others would have gutted the program.

CRLA was "to discontinue the practice of accepting or 'selective' or 'landmark' type cases and shall be available for legal assistance to any and all eligible clients," the Governor's office demanded. This, in time, would turn CRLA into just another case-heavy legal aid. CRLA was to request authorization from local bar associations in counties where CRLA offered legal aid. Lacking that approval, hard to secure since some were overtly hostile, CRLA would close up shop. Before suing a government agency, CRLA was to make certain that would-be clients had been turned down by three private attorneys and a other legal aid programs in the area.

On January 13, Laurence P. Horan, Western regional director for OEO, flatly turned down the recommendations of the Governor's office. For the third time, CRLA had scored on the Governor.

But CRLA's future is not unclouded. At the end of this year, the Governor will again have an opportunity for a veto, and by then a Democrat sympathetic to CRLA may not be heading OEO. Still, Lorenz and CRLA are not about to temper their program. A half-dozen suits already in progress will certainly alienate influential groups. More are in the offing.

Each successful case will add to CRLA's opposition and to its fame. That fame, ironically, may eventually hurt Lorenz from the firm, if the program itself can survive the annual Perils of Pauline episode. "Sooner or later the Mexican community will want its own man to run CRLA," he predicts. When it does, Lorenz, the sympatico Angeleno, is ready to step aside; CRLA will be able to go on without him.

Besides, how long can you walk a tightrope—even you are a professional?

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Heil Ho! The Frankfurt Fair

ANDRE SCHIFFRIN

Mr. Schiffrin attended the Frankfurt book fair as editorial director of Pantheon Books.

The Frankfurt book fair, in spite of the dreary city in which it takes place, is usually an enjoyable publishers' outing. True, the long days spent in the hangar-like buildings containing thousands of exhibits tend to be tiring and depressing, and even publishers, faced with so many new books, begin to have doubts. But the opportunity to meet friends and engage in late-into-the-night talks is attractive enough to lure people back year after year.

This year there were hints of change—but nothing to suggest that within a few days the fair and the heart of the city would offer the now familiar sight of massed students confronting rows of green uniformed police, a scene complete with water cannons and the clouds of smoke of exploding tear-gas grenades.

The fair has long been a major event in Frankfurt, offering to this provincial city and to German publishers an extraordinary look at the cultural life of nearly the whole world. But the fair is used and visited by all sorts of people—from left-wing Socialist students to Adolf von Thadden (the leader of the extreme right-wing NDP) who visited this year's fair.

Last year the students had mounted a series of demonstrations against Springer, and prosaically enough, at the small display of books from the Union of South Africa. At the time, we all joked about who would get it next year—the students had a broad enough choice—but the German officials running the fair were far more worried. A visit from von Thadden did not result in a loss of business, but student demonstrations might scare away customers, might even block the stands of certain exhibitors. In the year between fairs, the fair commission faced a problem increasingly familiar to university authorities throughout the world—what to do when the demonstrators come?

I sensed the coming storm during the fair's first days. I was dining with one of the professors at the university when, at a nearby table, we saw a group of his former students, now leaders of the (German) SDS. They had planned a teach-in but had heard that the police would be called in to forcefully eject them. The German publishers in charge of the fair were divided—a small minority stressing that the book business had for years been trying to lure youngsters into the fair. It was their view that free discussion should be allowed, using one of the fair's many empty buildings as a forum. The majority, however, had taken a hard line and had elaborated an extraordinary list of house rules, forbidding the distribution of political posters or buttons by publishers (a lot of Guevara poster sales had been made in 1967), preventing discussion groups of more than ten, etc. Tickets to the fair warned, in the "You-Vill-Obey-Orders" prose style still favored by German bureaucrats, that by stepping on the fair ground, visitors undertook to obey the rules formulated.

We were concerned about the situation. As exhibitors, we had not been consulted in the preparation of rules, and we certainly disliked the idea of calling in the cops to prevent a pro-SDS publisher from giving out "We Try Harder" buttons. A few of us hastily drew up a statement urging the fair authorities to allow free discussion and insisting that the police be called only if real crises were threatened. The next morning at the ritual cocktail parties, the statement, circulated in this makeshift fashion, drew hundreds of signatures from a very broad cross section of publishers and such visiting authors as Grass and Styron.

The statements seemed to work. A student demonstration began, a few policemen were called in, but a confrontation was avoided. The teach-in took place in the back of the German exhibit; a largish crowd gathered and then dispersed. We went to our Saturday dinners feeling that things were under control.

The next morning began differently. The students had chosen as the target of the protest the rather abstract figure of Leopold Senghor, president of Senegal, who was to receive the German book industry's annual peace prize. In the search for a black author, their commission quite arbitrarily, I suspect, had selected a figure described by the students as an Uncle Tom who had called in French troops to crush student and worker revolts. Like good admen seeking a hook, the SDS had seized on this choice as a way to concentrate on the problems of the Third World. However, most of the publishers, not to speak of the public, had barely heard of Senghor—or of African leaders to whom the students proposed giving a counter prize. The few leaflets they distributed sparsely outlined their indictment; and the press was hardly about to begin a debate on Senegalese politics. The gesture, in spite of the seriousness underlying it, was bound to be symbolic.

The ritual of confrontation was thus acted out in a scenario which even Herman Kahn could have predicted with complete accuracy. The students gathered outside the cathedral to demonstrate and to award their counter prize. The police, in ever-increasing numbers, insisted that paths be kept clear. (Whether a clash still could have been avoided had the police allowed the student ceremony is difficult to say.) At first both sides were remarkably restrained. Students milled about, many extremely chic, others wearing their battle garb of helmets and leather. The police—largely young cadets—held their ground with a good humor that we Americans admired and envied. Students argued with passers-by, forming small groups—a highly effective and purposeful device—hopelessly trying to convince the Sunday morning promenaders that they should concern themselves with Senegal. As I watched, a police truck tried to forge through the crowd, was stopped, pushed by, and, again, impressively, withdrew.

But then the length of the confrontation began to tell. The students tried to break through the barriers into the cathedral. The police pushed back, then charged, filling the air with the acrid smoke of tear gas. Cohn-Bendit (looking astonishingly like Mickey Rooney) was arrested and brutally carried off, to be severely beaten, according to a large number of witnesses. We found ourselves, as in a replayed newsreel, running down the street, eyes streaming, stopping to catch our breath before an array of NPD posters, which presented to my blurred vision the sight of the old Nazi flag—red field around a white circle, with the letters NDP where the swastika used to be. (No one seemed to have noticed this graphic tradition—the kind of symbols foreigners tend to notice in Germany.)

The students changed direction now, inexplicably breaking into the offices of the German publishing association, setting the stage for more arrests. Now

AUTUMN KITCHEN

The dead pheasant's feathers lie fanned across the man's hand.
His dog, practicing his part,
gnaws the gut of the frail bird,
I see the ribboned intestines, and, near them, a green curve
I know by instinct is its egg.
I ask for it: unused to guns,
I worship the softer divinities.
The man extends my gift.
This egg is green: as if to say we call the sun "yellow." It is smooth, still warm from flesh which brought it to my rooms.
In my hand shine my old lessons:
"container for the thing contained, symbol for the thing signified . . ."
and suddenly there is no possible metaphor, no soft-brown plumage will fan from this sweet shape, it is dissociate from roast birds whose predicted virtues I prepare endlessly and without deep thought for the tables of my years:
it cools, this egg, as I watch it.
Outside, the men still fire guns, teaching my small son the skill.
And talk of winter's venison.
That which I will surely cook in this brown, pale-green kitchen.

CAROL BERGE

LATE AUTUMN LEAVES

Late autumn leaves, taking new shapes, say goodbye to the bough.
Raccoons move through the night like warm bundles. A troubled friend wanders.

(White is the old landmark, a blue-green the best sea . . .)

In the East
scatterings of sparrows fall on the first snow watched by owls.

By the fire the cat lost in a dream of diamonds skillfully pretends
he's completely alone.

ROBERT PETERSON

DEPARTURES

My dog barks under an empty tree long after the squirrel has gone.
He barks and barks, as the squirrel leaps ten trees away, leaving the leaf tops trembling like trampolines after an acrobat is through.
And I stand gazing up at you who long ago stopped loving me, while my foolish dog still barks.

LINDA PASTAN

DISTANCES

You travel across the room.
Two chairs and a table are between us; the shapes of your words are between us.
Straight and cold as railroad track
I lie in my old roadbed measuring distances—waiting for you to pass over me once again,
on your way somewhere else.

LINDA PASTAN

A WRY MUSIC

(Seven are convicted at Meridian)

Wind
a wry music
the piney woods give it off like their own chill spice

Pelalahatchie

Big Black

Tishomingo

rivers thick with leaves come moping around the long curves walking on faces on long bones
on men's bound ankles narrower than flint

October

cotton-light
Summer lies in drifts in dunes
high on red wagons
Unwincing light the shadows of nothing human pick at it

In a hundred years one bee
may forgive the worst in us may stop to drink honey from a murderer's ear

ROSELLEN BROWN

THE NATION/October 14, 1968

mounted police arrived, greeted by hundreds of student arms outstretched in the Nazi salute and shouts of Seig Heil—too effective for many of us, even as jeers. "Senghor's soup is getting cold," the students then chanted, as the officials stayed on in the cathedral. They left only after their paths had been cleared by the police, now attacking with batons and water cannon.

Later in the afternoon the students headed for the fair. Panicking, its director asked for increased police reinforcements. Entrances were closed; the students sat down; more police charges and arrests. The previous day's mediation was shot, the fair began to look increasingly like an armed camp. A feeling of repression and anger grew, and some publishers started to close their stands in protest.

Then followed an extraordinary series of meetings. More than a hundred publishers met in a hotel lobby (its manager seemed apoplectic) to demand the withdrawal of police for the duration of the fair. Cohn-Bendit's various publishers and some others joined in the attempt to locate him to determine if he had been wounded, and whether the students arrested with him could be identified and given legal help. (This proved to be impossible. The police refused to divulge the identity of those arrested, and allowed the students to call only lawyers they knew which—apart from Cohn-Bendit, who did have a lawyer—was a meaningless right.) Late into the night other meetings continued—increasingly diffuse and impotent. No one was allowed to see the prisoners or to obtain lawyers. Militant Marxist analyses dwindled into the familiar question: Did anyone know anyone? Like a group of Reform Democrats looking for help in the White House, the students finally managed to think of a friendly Social Democratic party official who would ask the Socialist Mayor to listen to their requests. At first this seemed a good possibility, but it disappeared. Late at night, a much diminished group attempted a last symbolic visit to the Mayor's house.

On the next day, a final series of meetings took place. The fair authorities retreated somewhat and offered to withdraw the police, but several hundred now angry publishers demanded a more open attitude. A compromise resolution was finally reached, in which all agreed to maintain freedom and order, without police and without repressive house rules. A number of foreign publishers would join the fair authorities as a counterweight. Publishing, everyone agreed, could not flower in an atmosphere of bureaucratic regulations which needed police support.

Had any of this done any good? For the publishers it had been an unpleasant and time-consuming return to the status quo ante. Those running the fair were told to worry less about the political books and posters of some of the left-wing-German stands and to pay more attention to maintaining an open atmosphere in which the threat of a teach-in would be less frightening. The liberal and left-wing Germans found that many foreign publishers—whatever their politics—shared their dislike for authoritarianism. The students could—and did—claim this as their victory—the radicalization of the publishers, Cohn-Bendit said it.

The Germans themselves had shown a fascinating split, in part generational, between the older authorities and the younger publishers and students. And as I left, I was occupied with the contrast with similar situations in France, Italy and New York. In each place, students had formed themselves into an extra-parliamentary opposition, as the Germans call it. Either excluded from the traditional parties, or believing them to be totally ineffective, they had retreated into a series of symbolic confrontations. But unlike their French counterparts, the German students were alone—lacking working-class allies, undoubtedly opposed by the average citizen, covered by a largely hostile press. Though they were

Louis A. Ferman, Joyce L. Kornbluh, and Alan Haber, Editors

POVERTY IN AMERICA: A Book of Readings Just published
Revised and Enlarged. New Introduction by Michael Harrington

The completely up-to-date edition of this basic primer, described when it first appeared as "the most valuable work yet published since this latest rediscovery of poverty in the land of plenty" (The New Leader).
hardbound $9.75
paperbound $5.75

Louis A. Ferman, Joyce L. Kornbluh, and J. A. Miller, Editors

NEGROES AND JOBS: A Book of Readings

Foreword by A. Philip Randolph hardbound $9.00 paperbound $5.25

Kenneth E. Boulding

BEYOND ECONOMICS: Essays on Society, Religion, and Ethics

A brilliant collection of interrelated essays, revealing paths of Boulding's intellectual development during the last two decades. Included are sections on "Economics," "General Systems and Society," "Religion and Ethics," and "Towards Politics."
$9.50

Joyce L. Kornbluh

REBEL VOICES: An I.W.W. Anthology

"... an indispensable collection of documents for the history of the American labor movement." The Times (London) Literary Supplement
hardbound $12.50
paperbound $ 4.95

COUNTRIES OF DECISION—The first four volumes of the distinguished and widely acclaimed series, The University of Michigan History of The Modern World, now available in revised, enlarged, and updated editions.

J. Fred Rippy

Just published

LATIN AMERICA A Modern History $10.00

Warren B. Walsh

RUSSIA AND THE SOVIET UNION A Modern History $10.00

William Yale

The Near East A Modern History $8.50

Nathaniel Pfeffer

Revised by Claude A. Buss

The Far East A Modern History $8.50

The UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS
ANN ARBOR

trying hard to create a broader constituency, their hopes of convincing people by small group discussion on the periphery of symbolic demonstrations seemed wildly utopian. Though they argued that people would be radicalized by such confrontations, the opposite could equally be maintained. Critics such as Günter Grass (now very close to the Social Democratic leadership) have stated bitterly that the students would create a backlash, similar to that which we have seen in France and, of course, America.

Yet what is most striking in the whole experience is not the menacing strength but the basic weakness of the students. The very youngsters who, helmeted and armed with megaphones, had mustered hundreds of demonstrators outside the cathedral, late the same evening were huddled around the one telephone in a student hostel, trying to persuade the policeman answering the mayor's phone to let their appeal go through. They were not, as is so often said, unwilling to face the consequences of their actions, but were trying to get due process in a country that seemed surprisingly unconcerned—for though the police had obviously been told to behave, at least at first, no one seemed concerned that the courts behave. No German newspaper that I saw raised the question of the rights of the accused students or investigated the charge that Cohn-Bendit had been beaten—though their photos did show him being arrested, his face contorted by the arm lock on his throat, his feet grotesquely twisted, puppetlike, into contrary and, one would think, excruciatingly painful positions.

The students had succeeded in creating a major incident, had caused massive disruptions and gotten vast publicity throughout the world. Their impressive strategic and tactical strength worried, at times frightened, many of the older generation. Yet to an outsider, the impression of weakness and uncertainty persists. Faced with contemporary German society, the young could disrupt, but only in a vacuum. The debate they sought to precipitate would not take place. They would be met only with force, force which in itself frightens the older generation and further isolates the students. Had this been inevitable? Did the mere presence of Cohn-Bendit mean that the students would all take an uncompromising revolutionary stand?

It is interesting that on Saturday, when the police were withdrawn from the fair, the student teach-in took place in peace and quiet. And on Monday when the left-wing German publishers confronted the fair authorities, their demands were surprisingly mild and reformist. Indeed, the last meeting took on an extraordinarily German tone. While the real issue was the distrust of the fair authorities and a resentment of the repressive and harassing tactics, the debate centered on the need for a legalistic agreement which would clearly outline the rights of the public and of dissenters at the fair—an old-fashioned German approach reminiscent of Ebert rather than Mao.

I am not saying that some of the events did not suggest extreme left-wing attitudes. The breaking into the book publishing association office, the disruption of a reading organized by Suhrkamp publishers, showed this clearly enough. Like all movements, the students represent an ambiguous and mixed grouping, moving in the direction they are pushed, doing whatever seems possible at any given moment.

But what I do suspect is that a less resigned attitude by the older generation might have led to different events which could not escalate into violence and which could have shown the students that what they were saying, not just what they were doing, was being taken seriously.

The students had chosen to demonstrate against Senghor not just to cause trouble—any excuse would have been suitable for that—but because they genuinely want to precipitate a debate on the Third World. There are undoubtedly more pressing issues in German politics; yet it does matter what the government and, perhaps more important, the corporations are doing in this field. Would it have been impossible to provide a meeting to discuss this question, even to open the mass media to the embryonic student research and opinion? Might not at least the Social Democrats agree that such issues merit debate? Yet in the whole fair I saw no books on this question, and from the past I remember only a few studies of dubious independence.

Likewise, the fair management's rule raised basic constitutional questions about the rights of what have been called "private governments" to abrogate constitutional guarantees. As I tried to suggest in the discussion which took place there, the debate at the fair had touched on questions which no foreigner could answer but which did need to be discussed in a German context. But this did not happen either. As a result, the students found themselves not only in a political and social but in an intellectual vacuum, striking out, often provocatively, at a society whose very silence reinforced their apocalyptic analysis. It isn't after all just a students' world. The grownups too have their responsibilities, among which is not, on hearing the word student, to reach for their guns.

The Huxleys: Brave Voyagers

THE HUXLEYS. By Ronald W. Clark. McGraw Hill Book Co. 398 pp. $8.95.

ALDOUS HUXLEY. By John Atkins. Orion Press. 218 pp. $5.95.

THIS TIMELESS MOMENT: A Personal View of Aldous Huxley. By Laura Archera Huxley. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 331 pp. $6.95.

CALVIN BEDIENT

Mr. Biedent teaches in the English Department at the University of California, Los Angeles.

In 1846, Thomas Huxley set sail in H.M.S. Rattlesnake to explore marine life in the South Seas; and Huxleys have been setting forth in exploration ever since. Julian Huxley's work in evolutionary biology, Andrew Huxley's Nobel Prize in physiology, T. L. Eekersley's classic paper on long-wave propagation—clearly the genius of the family is scientific. The Huxleys sail under the agnostic banner of empirical truth; in a socially and intellectually responsible agnosticism lies their strength. "Agnosticism," said Thomas, who coined the term, "is not properly described as a 'negative' creed, nor indeed as a creed of any kind, except in so far as it expresses absolute faith in the validity of a principle, which is as much ethical as intellectual": the principle "that it is wrong for a man to say that he is certain of the objective truth of any proposition unless he can produce evidence which logically justifies that certainty." The highest aim of mental life, he declared, is the ascertainment of truth, not the attainment of faith—a position that, especially in Victorian England, required courage.

As "Darwin's bulldog," Thomas roused horror in the faithful. "If the question is put to me," he said in his famous confrontation with Bishop Wilberforce at Oxford, "would I rather have a miserable ape for a grandfather, or a man highly endowed by nature and possessed of great means and influence, and yet who employs these faculties and that influence [as Wilberforce had just done] for the mere purpose of introducing ridicule into a grave scientific discussion?"—I hesitatingly affirm my preference for the ape." Whereupon a certain Lady Brewster fainted. In Edinburgh the Christian press put Huxley down as "the advocate of the vilest and beastliest paradox ever vented in ancient or modern times." His evolutionary theory was denounced as "debasement"; but to Huxley what was genuinely debasing was resistance to the ascertained truth. He discovered little; it is his character that counts. He exemplifies the heroism of agnostic intellect.

Thomas' grandson Julian has continued the Huxley tradition—a tradition that he himself has defined, in part, as "hard but high thinking, . . . great outspokenness and moral courage, and . . . [the] sense of the ultimateness and supreme value of truth." He has continued it, however, in less antagonistic circumstances and in the evening, not in the noon, of great discoveries; and in consequence he makes a less dramatic figure. Nor has Julian had the intellectual or literary gifts necessary to make his thesis that "man's role is to be the instrument of further evolution on this planet" a stirring one—what is exciting in Teilhard de Chardin is in Julian rather flat and airless. Yet unlike Teilhard, Julian is an unequivocal representative of the difficult agnostic faith. He sails, like his grandfather, in a salt and actual sea.

And what of Julian's brother Aldous, the third of the three Huxleys to whom Ronald Clark, in The Huxleys, devotes most of his space? In a book that falls apart, even with respect to its prose, after the opening chapters on Thomas, Clark presents Aldous as still another exemplar of what he thinks of as the Huxley "ethos." One half of this ethos, he says, is the view that, in Thomas Huxley's words, "science and literature are not two things, but two sides of the same thing." Now, out of the thousands of sentences that Thomas and Julian and Aldous wrote, perhaps one or two dozen embody this "Huxley belief"—not enough to get to town on. The other half of this "ethos," Clark observes, is the view that reality is finally unknowable. Yet even if so commonplace a belief could really be said to constitute part of a definitive family ethos, what must be noted is that here we find Aldous sailing in different seas.

The only Huxley "tradition" worthy of the name is the agnostic tradition defined by Julian; and Aldous is all but at the antipodes of this tradition, a black sheep in the family. "You are marrying into one of the great atheist families," his aunt Ethel once warned a suitor of one of the Huxleys. "I know you are an atheist now; but will you be able to keep it up until you die?" Aldous, an atheist in his earliest novels and essays, was not able to keep it up: by the late 1930s he had become the exponent of "an existential religion of mysticism." John Atkins, in a "literary study" that does little more than summarize, brokenly, Aldous' already dryly explicit views, declares that, though this religion put Aldous into disagreement with Thomas "on the ultimate nature of reality," it yet did not involve a basic antagonism. But the truth is that Thomas, as befitted an agnostic, held an opinion as to the ultimate nature of reality; and it was precisely in claiming an understanding of absolute reality that Aldous broke with the Huxley tradition.

Aldous hauled down and threw aside in his own work the agnostic flag of "logical" evidence that his grandfather had so heroically helped to raise. To be sure, Aldous' religion of mysticism is based on evidence—on experienced feeling—rather than on faith: eternity, the chemically hallucinated hero of Island discovers, is "as real as shit." But the point to note is that the evidence of feeling is not what Thomas would call "logically satisfactory," and, further, that Aldous did not acknowledge the necessity of this standard. Since eternity could be felt as directly as a burn, it constituted an "existential" truth independent of logic and faith. Simply as experienced feeling, however, Thomas might object, the religion of mysticism belongs, after all, to "the region of uncertainty." Psychoanalysis, chemistry—these too afford explanations of the sensation of timelessness. To Aldous, however, such explanations are "utter bosh." To him there is no uncertainty about it: mystical experience evidences God. It is at this point that he passes beyond the coastal regions of agnosticism, making desire his only compass.

If Aldous thus defies the agnostic limits of science even as he honors the necessity of evidence, if he thus finds eternity so unmistakably certain, the reason would seem to be his obsession and disgust with sensual craving. He wrote always with a conscience stained by physical shame, with the self-abhorrence of the painfully idealistic, yet helplessly sensual, adolescent. In Brave New World, the shame of lust drives the Savage to suicide; and it appears to have driven the novelist himself into an eternity of transparency, where subject does not lust after object, where all is the centerless One, "which is love."

However that may be, Huxley was fully justified in claiming that an existential religion of mysticism constitutes "a transforming discipline," not a bag of words. At least it seems to have transformed Huxley himself, and the value of Laura Archera Huxley's book, This Timeless Moment, is in large part the picture it gives of a man whose love

"A picture of the patriot as a 20th-century revolutionary"

—THOMAS LASK,
New York Times

Ho Chi Minh

By Jean Lacouture

$5.95, now
at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Fall issue of Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10011

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT MUTUAL REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering to make except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

and pity were indeed—in the words of his favorite among his novels, Time Must Have a Stop—"informed by principle, enlightened by insight into the nature of the world."

Huxley lived his thought, and those who knew him could only gain by it. Perhaps he was even greater than his thought, being more warmly and sensually human. His relation to Laura Archera, his second wife, was evidently a peculiarly rich one, at once disinterested, tenderly intimate and an Indian summer of desire. "I . . . would like to feel that I can love you," he once wrote to her, "with so much understanding tenderness that I shall always know what to do, or what to refrain from doing in order to help you in your strength and support you in your vulnerability." The photographs of Huxley that accompany the text—showing an aged, beautiful face, both spiritual and sensual, and of sweet nobility—form a kind of testimony to the sincerity of these words and to the truth of the portrait his wife here draws from memory. Black sheep or not, Huxley gained a remarkable dignity of his own.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Mr. Alloway, former curator of the Guggenheim Museum, is at present visiting professor at the New York State University, Stony Brook. His forthcoming history of the Venice Biennale will be published by the New York Graphic Society.

Max Kozloff, art critic for The Nation, is on leave of absence. He will contribute occasional articles during the 1968-69 season.

Since Thomas Hoving became director of the Metropolitan Museum of Art there have been about forty-five "Special Exhibitions," to take the term used in the museum's monthly calendar of events. This sounds impressive, but on inspection the statistic crumbles a little. Seven of these Special Exhibitions were of single works, usually new acquisitions; others were as peripheral as "Chess: East and West, Past and Present," "Clock and Watch Designs," "Pleasing to the Eye and Ear Alike" (old musical instruments), 17th and 18th century sundials, and "An Awareness of Quality," which turned out to be twenty-five books published in 1967. Such trivia are more appropriate to an out-of-town community center than to a major city's major museum. They give an effect of activity, but culturally are no more than chicken soup for Hovniks.

All this is part of the new director's expressed intention of taking the museum to the public, as if it were not with the public already. However, there is nothing wrong with that intensified address, provided the audience is not subjected to McLuhanesque slogans about increased participation. Perhaps all the Met's little shows have been useful lures for visiting school parties, but some of the larger temporary shows have been no more satisfactory. This year, for instance, there was "Visionary Architects," a big print show, originated by another institution, which is better read as a catalogue than it was seen as an exhibition; and "Painting in France, 1900-67," a survey of the School of Paris that bombed disastrously, with its massive array of irrelevant artists and inadequate pieces by the right artists. But now, with "The Great Age of Fresco," the Met can finally be associated with an important, temporary exhibition on a scale that no community center could afford.

In the last two decades scholarly and technical arguments about the preservation of works of art have moved out of the laboratory and into public awareness. How much restoration of a damaged work is ethical? What degree of nakedness is tolerable in deteriorating works? Millard Meiss put it like this, in the fourth volume of the "Acts of the 20th International Congress of the History of Art, 1963": "The choice is between a spurious 'unity' and an initially fragmentary authenticity." In the catalogue of the present show he returns to the subject: "The authorities and restorers in Florence have wished to present only what remains of the frescoes of the great masters of the Renaissance. They have not tried to make these frescoes look complete, as though produced yesterday. Though the conservators are very skillful imitators, they have not in other words posed as Nardo or Castagno or Pontorno." The first time Mr. Meiss was addressing other scholars; the second time, five years later, the public. "The Great Age of Fresco" is as important for its contribution to this issue as for overcoming the logistic problems of moving frescoes around. Public interest was certainly sharpened by the floods in Florence three years ago and the publicity given to the water-damaged monuments. It is not only the Orientation Gallery, as the Met calls it, with photographs and live demonstrations that is relevant here. The paring of frescoes into layers and the simultaneous exhibition of the top layer of painting and of the preparatory drawing, previously concealed below, directs attention to frescoes in a new way.

The exhibition is superb, with frescoes that no earlier technology could have moved from Tuscany and with drawings that only present restoring skill could have released. The drawings were not worked out on paper and transferred to plaster, but drawn directly onto a level of plaster that was overlaid by another which carried the painted image. These preparatory drawings, usually in red, called sinopie, have been excavated by restorers, who peeled away the top stratum intact. As Mr. Meiss observes in the very informative catalogue, they are "a corpus of monumental drawings from a crucial period" of which "we previously possessed very few drawings of any kind." Sinopie are shown in the exhibition coupled with the paintings that they led to or begot. The marvelous drawings range from lean contours to shaggy adumbrations, from proliferating curves to brusque codes.

As the works have been physically peeled, problems and decisions of the artists, locked in the work, have been recovered. Renaissance art, which current synoptic art histories usually represent as a static and settled affair, is thus experienced in terms of change and discovery. Francesco d'Antonio's "St. Ansanus," for example, began as a fairly naturalistically posed figure but, in the course of the painting, became less bulky and more Gothic. "The Christ on the Cross with the Virgin and St. John the Evangelist" (catalogue numbers 32 and 33) is heavily Gothic as a painting, but elliptical and dashing as a sinopia. An art represented as one of Being has been turned into an art of Becoming, which is what it has probably been for a long time to those who knew most about it.

This exhibition is certainly one that will reach the public and it is doing so in a way I think admirable. It is a first-rate selection of important work that only experts will ever have seen in its entirety and which the wider public knows very little about. It is being presented in a framework of up-to-date relevant information that bears on the paintings themselves. The technical information about frescoes and their preservation supports the central insight into the choices of artists. Visitors to the museum are thus precipitated into a rich view of art as material evidence and of artists in the process of making decisions.

When a museum can reach its public with this kind of knowledge, both technical and aesthetic, I would take it to be operating at a high level of efficiency, but Mr. Hoving seems to think something more is needed. The installation of the fresco show brings out the most dumb and obstinate aspect of popularization: the use of decor as ancillary entertainment, as if to assure the public that art, like New York City, is fun. Renaissance-type architecture is symbolized by little umbrellas that dangle from the blacked-out ceilings to make cute little toy vaults, like decorations in a suburban hairdresser's. Andrea del Sarto's "Scenes from the Life of St. John the Baptist" are set in an arcade, built in shallow relief against the wall, but the decorator's arches don't coincide with the painted pilasters of the original. Seats are in the form of white wooden cylinders, like sections of fallen classical columns—as if a flip travel agency were using Goethe's Italy as a motif. And fat candles burn between Franciabigio's "Last Supper," "Annunciation" and "Nativity" for those who need to be reminded that these are ecclesiastical subjects.

FILMS

HAROLD CLURMAN

The German entry at the New York Film Festival (also the winner of the top award in Venice) is translated as Artists Under the Big Top: Perplexed (or Disoriented). At least four of the films I saw during the Lincoln Center fortnight were about disorientation, disaffection, dissolution. They each echo or reflect what we hear, see or feel all around us. In this sense, despite their emphatic stylization, the films are basically "realistic." Civilization is coming apart at the seams.

While the central emotion in these films is recognizable enough, it is symptomatic that they should all be composed as abstractions. Symptomatic and sadening. Though they employ specific images and concrete references, they end as evasions, often as a mess. This is particularly true of the German film just mentioned, in which the world is viewed as a circus, its belabored pachyderms all of us common folk.

In Godard's Weekend someone says that the only way to counteract the horror of bourgeois life is to exceed it in horror. The film begins in hilarious horror: first with a dialogue in which a lover and his mistress discuss their efforts to kill her mother-in-law in order to inherit her money. It then proceeds to the woman's account of a sex adventure so grotesque that the lover asks if it really happened or did she only dream it. The longest portion of the opening sequences deals with the fantastic traffic jams which most citizens of metropolitan areas run into as they attempt to drive out for their weekend holidays. The extravagance of Godard's satire—we are even made to laugh at the bloodied and shattered corpses strewn along the roads—rises to epic farce.

Then the picture begins to disintegrate into fragmented episodes—some of them acidly comic, others cruelly ugly—ending in calm cannibalism. At certain intervals a young man dressed in what looks like the correct habit for 1790 reads a speech about the futility of social rebellion, no matter how "progressive" it may be. The audience is repeatedly reminded that all this is said by film actors in fun and that therefore literal meaning, logic or coherent continuity are not required. Discontinuity is inherent in the film's "message." The different episodes are variants of a single theme.

Godard is enormously clever and cunningly distraught. Distraction and moral indifference constitute his content as well as his material. In the end one grows tired of his technique and resentful of his being. His art reveals itself not as protest against collapse but as the collapse itself. Except as cinematic innovations it is not a "revolutionary" art. It does not rouse the public from its spiritual apathy but is a contribution to it.

No wonder, as Tom Nairn pointed out in "Leaping Ahead of Theory" [The Nation, September 30], that a Godard film may serve the reactionaries in France by offering an artful sop to appease the dissent of the younger generation. It paves the way to a new fascism.

Godard's Breathless was memorably to the point: Masculine-Feminine evinced remarkable descriptive and journalistic insight; La Chinoise was sly, trenchant and funny. But his films at the festival—with occasional incisive flashes—betray a basic mindlessness within the sometimes dazzling brightness.

Bernardo Bertolucci's Partner, in French and Italian, opens another page in the testament of this asphyxiated civilization. It combines surrealism and symbolism with occasional sallies into dadaism. Pierre Clementi, its star, enacts a dual role: a more or less respectable artist and his other self, a destructive and maniacal rebel against virtually every cause. When one bleeds, so does the other.

I could not grasp all of the film's allusions. It is easy to discern such key images as the barricade of books which the artist builds to hide from the world—in this instance, a resplendent Rome. There was also a fine shot parodying one from Eisenstein's Potemkin in which the rebel (and a sexy salesgirl of detergents played by Tina Aumont) nonchalantly shove a baby carriage down a long flight of steps. The unsightliness of the new domestic architecture in the suburbs is derided by a girl's marking Xs on building walls. These are blown up into screen-size scars by painting them a vivid vermilion on the film itself. One after another, various teasers and shockers, all of them very knowingly and attractively photographed, are improvised. It is highly sophisticated, sometimes sharply amusing.

But what do these extended inventions purport? "The enemy," Clementi shouts directly to the audience, "is American imperialism! If you haven't understood this, you have understood nothing." To which my immediate response was "Bullshit!"—not in defense of American policies but at the notion that such a film may in any way shed light on them. On further reflection I began to wonder whether even Clementi's pronouncement was not intended as a spoof and self-mockery. In these pictures anything goes and anything may mean anything or nothing whatsoever.

Less ambitious but also much less pretentious than these films is John Cassavetes' Faces. It has its own boldness. Largely composed of close-ups of very well-chosen types (and actors) with something of a cinéma vérité effect and dialogue to a large extent improvised in the shooting, the picture conveys a

Now You Can Show the Classics of WORLD CINEMA In Your Home, Club and School!

SHOW the GREAT FILMS of ALL THE NATIONS!

LA STRADA • BICYCLE THIEF
3 PENNY OPERA • RED BALLOON
ALEXANDER NEVSKY • IXILLO
CARNIVAL IN FLANDERS • and others

Write for FREE catalog of 10mm films "WORLD CINEMA"

BRANDON FILMS, 221 W. 57 St.
New York 10019, Dept. N

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

10-14-68

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

sense of a directly observed actuality.

It concerns a double adultery. The husband, a wealthy businessman, disabused but good-natured, is estranged by his somewhat brittle wife who is at ease in her husband's company only in fun and games. He takes off one night on a toot with a good-looking dame who may not be a whore but who belongs to a "free" world of indeterminate character and a lavish apartment. The wife, who earlier in the evening has suddenly been threatened with divorce, goes out to a bar, picks up several matrons and a young man. On the departure of her lady guests she goes to bed with the nice boy.

While her husband's escapade has refreshed him and rendered him buoyant, her sin leads her to an attempt at suicide from which her night's companion saves her. When the husband returns home in the morning he understands exactly what has happened: he has seen the boy escape through the window from his wife's bedroom. He slaps her; she tells him it's too bad she doesn't love him. But for all that they will resume their customary way of life together.

The picture reports the surface of daily existence among people of the moneyed classes. And what an environment it is! This in a way is a more dreadful picture, because more smoothly banal and casually conventional, than the studied atrocities of the avant-garde film makers.

There is, however, a certain flatness in it because the richer sources of human feeling as contrasted to the aridity observed are implied rather than created. The negative in art must always adumbrate the positive. When this doesn't occur, as it barely does in Faces, one is left dispirited, cheated. Still there is in the acting of John Marley as the husband, of Lynn Carlin as his wife, of Gena Rowlands as the husband's bedmate, and of the various guests an authenticity and a sense of the living presence of people among whom we dwell, which turns the film into something altogether relevant.

STATEMENT OF OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND CIRCULATION (Act of October 23, 1962: Section 450, Title 39, United States Code).

1. Date of filing: October 1, 1968.
2. Title of publication: THE NATION.
3. Frequency of issue: weekly, (except for omission of four summer issues).
4. Location of known office of publication (Street, city, county, state, zip code): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
5. Location of the headquarters or general business offices of the publishers (Not printers): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
6. Names and addresses of publisher, editor, and managing editor:
Publisher (Name and address):
James J. Storrow Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
Editor (Name and address):
Carey McWilliams
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
Managing Editor (Name and address):
Robert L. Hatch, Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
7. Owner (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a partnership or other unincorporated firm, its name and addresses, as well as that of each individual must be given). Name: The Nation Associates, Inc., (no stockholders), 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10014; Carey McWilliams, Pres. and Treas., 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10014; James J. Storrow Jr., Vice-Pres. and Sec., 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y., N.Y. 10014.

8. Known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages or other securities (If there are none, so state): None.

9. For completion by nonprofit organizations authorized to mail at special rates (Section 132.122, Postal Manual). (Check one)
The purpose, function, and nonprofit status of this organization and the exempt status for Federal income tax purposes.

☐ Have not changed during preceding 12 months

☐ Have changed during preceding 12 months
(If changed, publisher must submit explanation of change with this statement.)

10. Extent and Nature of Circulation.

	Average No. Copies Each Issue During Preceding 12 Months	Actual Number of Copies of Single Issue Published Nearest to Filing Date
A. Total No. Copies Printed (Net Press Run)	45,100	44,805
B. Paid Circulation
1. Sales Through Dealers and Carriers, Street Vendors and Counter Sales	3,695	3,450
2. Mail Subscriptions	31,230	32,810
C. Total Paid Circulation	34,925	36,260
D. Free Distribution (including samples) By Mail, Carrier or Other Means	160	155
E. Total Distribution (Sum of C & D)	35,085	36,415
F. Office Use, Left Over, Unaccounted, Spoiled After Printings	10,015	8,390
G. Total (Sum of E & F should equal net press run shown in A)	45,100	44,805

I certify that the statements made by me above are correct and complete.
James J. Storrow Jr., Publisher

I must confess to an aesthetic prejudice: while film art is by its nature always less realistic than the theatre, it is chiefly through its capacity to convey the actual that it triumphs. Its artifices and all attempts to make it excel through pictorial imagination and beauty are usually less successful and less important than its ability to impart the illusion of being there in the midst of life.

If this be hotly contested, I can only say at the moment that my experience at this year's Film Festival is what I offer as evidence. I was more touched by the nonprofessional players in Mouchette and in Naked Childhood, a French film about a delinquent orphan boy adopted by several poor families in the provinces, than by most of the films played by well-qualified artists. There is a scene in Naked Childhood in which a woman puzzles over the phenomenon of her ward who is at once so devilish and so tender a being. There is a poignant simplicity in the woman's face which could hardly be matched by any of the professional actors during the festival's showings. But why was this film shot in color? Black and white would have given it its proper documentary tone.

When professional film actors are at their best they appear to be non-actors. That is the virtue of even the least striking of the Czech pictures. Their actors seem to be utterly artless; they appear to be parts of the landscape, the fields, the streets around them. One really believes them. Czech films are rarely "exciting." There is something slow, awkward, ponderously peasantlike and wholly disarming about them. Their humor is offhand, unconscious, canny. They sometimes seem "uncomposed," though they hardly ever resort to camera devices to produce that effect.

In Report on the Party and Their Guests, a prophetic parable about Czechoslovakia under Novotny and now under the Soviets, I did not find its specific story or surface events particularly arresting, but I watched it closely because

At 2:00 AM on May 17, 1967,
Police Officer Louis R. Kuba was killed on the campus of Texas Southern University in Houston.

Student John Markel was in the ...
Student Charles Freeman was 5 feet 11 inches tall, 155 lbs. ...
Student Floyd Nichols was 24 miles away ...
Student Douglas Wayne Waller was in jail ...
Student Trazawell Franklin was elsewhere on campus.

These five students have been indicted for his murder.

An act of murder which the state of Texas readily admits they could not have committed.

An act of murder for which the foreman of the indicting grand jury admits there is no evidence that any of them fired any weapons.

Yet, the indictment charges that these five students, together with others unknown "did, with malice aforethought, kill Louis Raymond Kuba, by shooting him with a gun."

What, then, is the basis for the indictment? The District Attorney of Harris County has stated that, in Texas, "anyone engaged in a riot can be held responsible for any offense committed, even if committed by another person."

NAACP takes action

Four of these students have come to the NAACP for legal assistance. We will not only defend them, but will work to nullify the manipulation and use of the law as a punitive measure to silence dissent.

A successful prosecution in this case could mean that any person, regardless of color, creed or political persuasion, who speaks out against injustice prior to a civil disorder, could find himself in the same spot as these students.

Responsible action must be taken to prevent such obvious misuse of the law. Not only in Texas. But in other states where similar statutes persist. Such action demands substantial financial assistance. The expenses of this Texas trial, alone, are estimated to exceed $100,000.

Since our efforts are supported solely by voluntary contributions to the NAACP Special Contribution Fund, we ask you, now, to join in our fight to help reinstate the constitutional right of justice for all Americans. As a responsible citizen, won't you help us act responsibly ... today.

Enclosed is my check for $_____ to help pay the expenses for defending the Texas Southern University students.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Your contribution is TAX DEDUCTIBLE.

Please make check payable to:
NAACP Special Contribution Fund.

Mail to: NAACP Special Contribution Fund
1790 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10019

NA-108

its events seemed to be really happening to real people.

That is also true of Capricious Summer which is "symbolic" in an entirely different way: its three middle-aged men are hardly likely to be as impotent or as shy of sex as they may at first blush appear. Their final passivity is resignation in the face of a reality of both the luscious young woman who attracts them and the general condition of their lives. It is a quietly humorous commentary on the kindly and sad common sense of simple country folk.

Most enjoyable and the least assuming of all the Czech films is Milos Forman's The Firemen's Ball, a loose-jointed, ambling, homey film about the plan a bunch of bumbling senior firemen devise to offer their retiring 86-year-old chief a special gift to be handed him by the winner of a beauty contest which they arrange for the occasion.

It is a delightfully funny and somehow touching film. Its group portrait of a lot of silly folk is affectionate without the slightest trace of condescension. There is no pressure in the conduct of its narrative, nor strain for comedy or craft effects. As this film begins we learn that the fire chief to be honored may be dying of cancer. This is not inserted to add pathos to the story: it is seen, as everything else in the picture, as nature. And in films that cannot be beat.

THEATRE

JULIUS NOVICK

A resident professional theatre may be said to have come of age on the day it moves out of its old cramped quarters in a converted cellar (attic, factory, drugstore, movie house), and into a gleaming, spacious, custom-built marble hall at the hot center of the local urban renewal project. This summer it was the turn of the Playhouse in the Park in Cincinnati, which opened its new Robert S. Marx Theatre on July 18 with a whizbang production of Camino Real by Tennessee Williams. But the Cincinnati company has come of age with a difference.

The Playhouse in the Park began its career in 1960 when a Victorian shelter house in Eden Park, on top of a hill overlooking downtown Cincinnati, was turned into a pleasant little thrust-stage theatre. The Marx Theatre has been built not somewhere in urban renewal land but in the park right next to the old one, which remains in use for new plays and other special events.

The new theatre, designed by Hugh Hardy, is nearly three times as large as the old one (672 seats as against 227). It cost some $870,000, an amazingly small sum for such a project. (The Vivian Beaumont Theater in Lincoln Center cost more than $9 million.) I can't exactly say that I like it, or that it will be a joy to come back to in twenty or fifty years (the shelter house has survived for more than a century with its charm undiminished). But it is, for better or for worse, very much a product and expression of our times, and it has as distinct and vivid a personality as any theatre building I have ever been in.

The old shelter house is a cozy, intimate place; the new theatre is about as cozy as a slap in the face, exemplifying the modern tendency toward art as an act of aggression against the spectator. It is a raw, harsh, yet immensely sophisticated structure, functional almost with a vengeance. It is built mostly of concrete block, inside and out, with surfaces here and there of stainless steel and glass. The back wall of the auditorium is made of steel mesh set in metal studs, with a long horizontal of bare bulbs for lighting; the vaguely suggests a prison. The stage is an odd asymmetrical space jutting from a corner of the auditorium, built by the same concrete block that forms the sides of the house; it seems to come to a point right at the foot of the ceiling. Overhead—above stage and auditorium alike—is a jungle of catwalks and girders, orange and black and less steel. It is not a nice theatre, it has its own kind of excitement, merely a masochistic excitement, and the experience is not chastening but securely bracing; a response associated with, with unconscious pride at being strong enough to take it.

Douglas Schmidt's big, busy, brilliant setting for Camino Real blends into the concrete blocks and catwalks of the building, and adroitly set off its solid elements with a clutter of Pop fragments. Overhead was a traffic light with a glowing red eye; bits of an movie poster bespeckled an upper wall; a lophouse was marked by enormous cutout blowup of Michelangelo's "David," with a big, flashing neon sign, "Ritz Men Only," across chest and down his arm. This setting was not merely an interesting and appropriate environment for the play; it was a witty and concise anthology of familiar current attitudes and feelings (despair, fragmentation and junk camp irreverence), and it made Williams grim never-land both contemporary and timeless.

Like the theatre, the production (directed by Michael Kahn) was harsh, jarring. Ceremonies and chases got full treatment; there were flashing strobes and shattering gunshots. The audience directions specify that at several points the action should overflow the aisles; these scenes worked particularly well in the Marx Theatre, where seems designed to blur the line that separates stage from auditorium, and from audience, and to unite both in charged and challenging space.

For the large, harsh, aggressive environment, centrifugal productions, this theatre in Cincinnati has already proved more than merely suitable. It is a splendid place in which to confront an audience. But is it good for anything else? A distinct personality can be a good thing, but a drawback for a theatre. But even if this new house should turn out to be somewhat lacking in versatility (which is by no means certain yet), it will still offer directors and designers a unique set of challenges and opportunities.

WINTER RENTAL

FURNISHED, Sherman, Conn. country house, fireplace, ideal for writer. Woods, lake, quiet. $125. Box #618, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

EXPORT AIR CARGO

Complete services available: documentation, banking, etc. PLUS greatly reduced air freight rates. Contact:

Berklay Air Services
P.O.B. 163, JFK Int'l Airport
Jamaica, N.Y. 11430

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FEATWIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.50

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

10-14-68

Crossword Puzzle No. 1267

RANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

This might make a winner of one in tunt the Thimble handsome. (4-7)
The hours of moonlight? Send out a catcher in return. (4-4) nd 25 down Things like stop-watches and sand-glasses under the hood? (6, 7) et nice results, if you seek what relates to the origin. (7)
Heard so indistinctly as an order, perhaps? (4, 3)
What I did to the stirrup in bringing good news? (6)
Reject stone about Mr. Franklin's make-up? (8)
Temporarily taking over part of the trade school curriculum? (8)
Hardly a quick-moving vehicle. (6) nd 24 The width of a false tooth should be like a temporary filling. (4-3, 7) separate. (6)
Can such a receiver be picked out without any problem? (8)
Question one closely, and you'll get into greater confusion! (11)

DOWN

How one on a 3 and 13 is supposed to keep his eyes wide-awake, as they say?
(2, 3, 4)
nd 13 Where one might ask for a bucket between low and high? (7, 5)

- 4 and 8 A follower of Roger, perhaps. (4, 3, 3)
5 A spot of heat for HST? (7)
6 His staying qualities seem to be limited. (5)
7 The composition of powder, in part?
(4-2)
8 See 4 down
13 See 3 down
16 Rage, perhaps, indicating a change of habit or control of the 3 and 13. (4, 5) 18 Tinker? No, he works in a different medium. (6)
19 A terrible type with a tool, but novel.
(7)
20 Inclined to be following? (7) 21 Quiet little stream, yet rather noisy at times. (6)
23 One couldn't say it is pretty flat! (5)
25 See 10 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1266

ACROSS: 1 Plaintiff; 6 Bigot; 9 Unarmed;
10 Ambace; 12, 11 and 13 Noncombatants;
15 Struted; 16 Candor; 18 Endive; 20
Bothered; 23 Taut; 24 Tiller; 28 On leave;
29 Thimble; 30 Nudge; 31 Pretended.
DOWN: 1 and 6 down Plumb bobs; 2
Adapter; 3 and 27 down Nominative case;
4 Indented; 5 Flagon; 7 Grained; 8 Treasured; 14 Father Time; 15 Sweet corn; 17
Roulette; 19 and 25 Double date; 21 Roadbed; 22 Line up; 26 Emend.

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY
CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1.54. Send for free catalog. Elyate Lecture Notes. Dept. N, 2710 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN
"Villiers of London—$2.00" is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."
—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SUMAC", a tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber, Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year. Ms. and Subscriptions, Box 29, Fremont, Michigan 49412.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1403
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

PERSONALS

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles.
For FREE literature write, giving age, to:
OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue,
N.Y.C. 10036.

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations,
Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept.
NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Migram,
Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment
Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write:
TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York,
N.Y. 10016

YOU HELP! advance PEACE, FREEDOM, HUMAN DIGNITY when you purchase from those dedicated to these Causes. Now 21 Cooperating Groups. Free Directory. Write COM-MUNITY MARKET, Newaygo, Michigan 49337.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.25 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
342-4444

'Informed sources revealed today...'

Who? What? Where? How often have you wished that a journalist would say what he means? would stop pretending to be objective, omniscient, and omnipresent?

Dan Wakefield has dared to emerge from behind the cover of his typewriter. Blatantly personal, BETWEEN THE LINES is his return to earlier subjects—but this time to tell the story with an admitted point of view, the way it happened. "The effort . . . is to reveal what was there all along, between the lines."

Eleven of these essays appeared in their original form in The NATION. Subscribe now and Dan Wakefield's book BETWEEN THE LINES will be a free gift to you.

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free Dan Wakefield's BETWEEN THE LINES.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues.) Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico;
$2 other foreign.)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N10-14

THE NATION

OCTOBER 21, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
OCT 31 1968
LIBRARY

THE BLACK VOTE

Negroes Go Local

ROBERT MAYNARD

The No-Choice Bag

L. F. PALMER, Jr.

New Game In Dixie

VERNON E. JORDAN, Jr.

MAX RAFFERTY: HIGH WIND IN CALIFORNIA

PHIL KERBY

Herzen: His Despair and Ours JOHN BERGER

5-69H PL-5537
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

no vote

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The delegates to our Democratic convention have surely taught us the bitter lesson that they, and not the people, nominate the President. The only way we now have left to change this system is to withhold our votes from their nominee and all the machine Democrats running in 1968, to teach them the even more bitter lesson that the people, and not the delegates, must elect a President.

Lilie W. Naness

silence

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: In Springfield, Ill., on Sept. 12, George C. Wallace said: "If the police could run this country about two years, they would straighten it out." That is a call for a police state—not behind some "curtain," not in some backward little country but right here at home.

Almost five weeks have passed since that ultra-rightist remark. Lyndon Johnson hasn't commented on it; nor has Everett Dirksen. Neither Hubert Humphrey nor Richard Nixon has disavowed such a proposal. (In fact, both of these worthies are proclaiming similar sentiments in their campaigns about "law and order" and "more money, power and armaments for the police.") Spiro Agnew and Edmund Muskie are strangely silent. There have been no indignant editorials in the press.

A serious candidate for President of the United States of America calls for a police state and there is no hue and cry. I contend that this is very ominous.

Paul E. State

a case of rigging

Brewster, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: The balloting in the American Physical Society reported in the editorial, "New Politics Among Scientists" (The Nation, Sept. 30), has had a surprising aftermath. The "Schwartz amendment" which, in Professor Schwartz's own words, was intended to promote "greater participation by the members . . . in studying how our professional concerns intermingle with public issues," was defeated by a vote of 9,214 to 3,553. It now appears that the balloting was, in a sense, "rigged." The September issue of Physics Today contains three letters protesting the enclosure, in the same envelope with the ballot, of a prejudicial statement by the APS Council. One of the letters, signed by nine members at the University of Pittsburgh and including both opponents and supporters of the proposed amendment, terms the inclusion "outrageous" and urges that the vote be declared invalid.

The APS Council offered a semi-apology, based principally on the fact that a separate mailing would have cost more than $2,000 but acknowledging that, "in view of the questions raised, this economy move was perhaps unwise." The term seems too mild. The amendment would probably not have carried in any case, but it can hardly be doubted that it would have drawn a larger vote if the council had stated its position earlier and refrained from "electioneering at the polls." Physicists are busy people and to follow authoritative leadership at the moment of voting is the easy way out of a complex, unprecedented, highly charged situation.

The council's obliviousness to its violation of elementary proprieties illustrates, I suggest, the tendency to regard political dissent as inherently disruptive, though actually it is a vital necessity in a free society. On that basis, almost any measure to curb it acquires legitimacy, and we know what that can lead to.

Carl Dreher

EDITORIALS

The Military Supermarket

Sen. Daniel Brewster, a member of the Armed Services Committee and a Democratic hawk seeking re-election in Maryland, toured the big war-planes plant of Fairchild-Hiller at Hagerstown last week, accompanied by a company executive and a representative of the United Auto Workers. Employment at the plant, reports George C. Wilson in The Washington Post, has nose-dived from 10,000 to 1,700.

On its face, this visit would appear to be a good example of how the military-industrial complex brings pressure to bear in election campaigns, the more so since Senator Brewster is running against Rep. Charles Mathias, a Republican dove. But Mr. Mathias also campaigns in the defense plants (Maryland is fourteenth among the states in military prime contracts), and he does not feel that the military-industrial complex—despite the mutuality of interest among Senator Brewster, the Pentagon, the companies and the workers—is lined up solidly against him. Mr. Mathias sees the question of political influence in a somewhat different light. "We have reached the stage in our development," he told Mr. Wilson, "where no longer is one man pioneering a weapon that could help the military. . . . We now have instead a kind of military supermarket in which the procurement services can shop around."

The shopping shows every indication of a careful political calculation. For example, Lockheed, the largest defense firm, last year opened a plant in Charleston, S.C., home of Rep. L. Mandel Rivers, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. Last year also, General Dynamics, second largest defense plant, placed an electronics subsidiary in Camden, Ark., after Sen. John L. McClellan, chairman of the Government Operations Committee, had visited the Fort Worth plant where General Dynamics makes the F-111 (TFX). Senator McClellan has said that he asked the president of General Dynamics to take a look at what Arkansas had to offer when he was being shown around Fort Worth by that gentleman.

Now and then big defense firms get windfall benefits from their far-sighted location of plants in politically strategic areas. For example, the way has now been cleared so that Lockheed may purchase the huge government plant it has been operating in Marietta, Ga., home state of Sen. Richard Russell of the Armed Services Committee. The installation covers 730 acres, employs 25,000 workers, and has what is called the world's largest aircraft assembly plant under one roof. It has been declared "excess"—that is, by present Air Force needs. Valued at $113,886,000, it will be knocked down to Lockheed at a price which is undisclosed but which Mr. Wilson reports will be much less than the figure quoted. Because Lockheed had put $60 million into the plant, the Air Force would not permit any other company to bid. Under government regulations Congress had thirty days after the plant had been declared "surplus" to object, to the deal, but the deadline passed and no legislator raised his voice.

The military supermarket may not have "goodies" for every state and community, but strategic distribution of resources can and does insure splendid political support. There is no need, as Mr. Wilson points out, for defense firms to engage in the old-style quid pro quo of American politics; careful cultivation of "the community of interest" among executives, stockholders, workers and political figures in key areas will do the trick. In a word, it is not the military-industrial complex per se that should be feared so much as the nearly universal willingness to accept the benefits that flow from the military supermarket in the name of national security.

Dick in Wall Street

Mr. Nixon's campaign foray into Wall Street occupied more than half of the first page of the business and finance section of the October 6 New York Times, running over into the inside pages. One story, "Nixon Over Wall Street: His Statement Is a Puzzle" by Terry Robards, originated in New York; the other, "Capitol View: A Blunder" by Eileen Shanahan, was a survey of Washington reaction. Both stories left unanswered the key question: what or who impelled him to do it?

The Nixon statement (which the candidate may not have examined with due care) is regarded by the reporters' sources as teeming with substantive errors. Not made public but sent to top executives in the securities business, it was a heavy-handed attack on the "heavy-handed bureaucratic regulatory schemes" of the Securities and Exchange Commission under the Johnson Administration, coupled with a strongly implied promise that a Nixon administration would deal more gently with the Wall Street segment of private enterprise. But since Wall Street has been getting along tolerably well with the SEC, even Nixon's friends are unable to see the need for such emphatic reassurance at this time.

In a seemingly wild swing, Mr. Nixon denounced the proposed reduction of sales commissions and the ban on commission splitting among brokers—measures which had been approved by the president and board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange and which are about to be voted on by the Exchange membership. Among other misconceptions is a blast at a pending study of the effects of institutional investment on the securities markets. This investigation was initiated not by the SEC but by a Republican member of Congress, Rep. Hastings Keith of Massachusetts; it was approved by Congress without opposition from any quarter and in fact the affected Wall Street interests testified in its favor. What, then, would Mr. Nixon propose to do about it? It could be as late as mid-1970 before he could secure a majority on the SEC. Nor do his assurances to his Wall Street contacts take into account the legal obligation of Presidents (whether Republican or Democratic) to allow regulatory agencies to function autonomously. When this rule is violated, it is usually done with decent circumspection.

The Times quotes a senior partner of a large securities

IN THIS ISSUE

October 21, 1968

EDITORIALS

386

ARTICLES

390 Vietnam: The War Corps

Blake Robinson

The Black Vote:

392 Negroes Go Local

Robert Maynard

394 The No-Choice Bag

L. F. Palmer, Jr.

397 New Game in Dixie

Vernon E. Jordan, Jr.

399 The Empire After Salazar

Antonio de Figueiredo

400 Rafferty: High Wind in California

Phil Kerby

BOOKS & THE ARTS

405 Herzen: His Despair and Ours

John Berger

407 Self-Destruction Directives

Shaun O'Connell

408 Letter from Berlin

Alexander Gross

410 The Hand Is Quicker Than the Eye or Nose (poem) William Virgil Davis

411 Theatre

Harold Clurman

412 Art

Lawrence Alloway

415 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHELPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERRY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN VOLES

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 13

firm: "I hate to say it, but what he has done is written a letter which, in effect, says, 'Look, send me some money and we'll lift the pressure off you when we get in.'" Consistent though this is with Mr. Nixon's earlier record, it appears to be an oversimplification, as implied by another top man who asked, "Is he that hard up for money . . . ?" Yet another senior industry official commented: "It is the first serious mistake of his campaign. He had the votes and he had the money, so why did he have to do it?"

It may be that Nixon was used as a cats-paw by interests opposed to current regulatory compromises in Wall Street. If so, his staff work is not as good as it is reputed to be. Moreover, he lost sight of the major problem of the prudent men in the Street: to preserve a respectable façade behind which so-called "investors" can play the stock market as other gamblers (or the same ones) play the horses. The present balance between regulators and regulated is conducive to this end: Nixon is no friend of Wall Street if he upsets it.

Illiterate Greeks

Two days after the referendum on the new constitution in Greece (September 29), an insistent rumor gained currency in New York: the junta's strong man, Colonel Papadopoulos, had arrived in New York unexpectedly. While pickets started forming outside the Hotel Pierre and radio and TV networks were seeking to interview him, it became known that the visitor from Athens was actually Foreign Minister P. Pipinelis, who promptly arranged appointments with members of the American Establishment, from Senator Javits to Secretary Rusk.

Incredible as the rumor may seem, it still points to the fact that the Greek junta considers the United States its sponsor, and feels that its members may seek inspiration and solace here. The opposition to the junta (liberals, loyalists, conservatives and leftists) tacitly accepts this view, with the result that most of its exiled leaders living in London or Paris have refused to visit the United States, with the exception of Mr. Andreas Papandreu, a former American citizen.

The referendum can be viewed only in this context: as an instrument whereby the junta seeks to impress some of its American friends—and possibly receive full-scale military aid, which was curtailed on April 24, 1967. It is not sufficient to say that the referendum was rigged or that it was conducted under martial law; the question is why it was conducted at all. The answer may be that the junta wanted not only an additional excuse to keep the initiative for itself, and impress "friendly" Americans in the State Department and at the Pentagon, but also to confuse its enemies. It is characteristic that while most American newspapers, including The New York Times and The Washington Post, have blasted the Athens regime for rigging the referendum, they have conceded that the new constitution is not all that bad. The New York Times even guesses that the Greeks might have voted for it in a free referendum.

It would seem that these newspapers cannot have read this constitution. The point is not whether it is liberal or illiberal, or that it suspends certain articles; the point is that the as-yet-unknown drafters of the document are profoundly illiterate. They confuse constitutional principles, laws, statutes and even police ordinances. They base the governmental system on the three powers (executive, legislative, judiciary), but somehow list at least six, adding the church, a National Council and the army.

One of the few known contributors to this charter is D. George Kousoulas, professor of political science at Howard University, and formerly with the USIA, who has been commuting between Athens and Washington for the last year and a half. So it seems that American know-how has contributed not only to a climate conducive to military dictatorship but also to a lowering of the level of constitutional literacy in "underdeveloped" Greece.

A Secret No More

The Secretariat of the World Federation of Trade Unions (Communist controlled) has, by an 8-to-1 majority (the one dissenting vote being cast by the Soviet representative), condemned the Russian interference in Czechoslovakia. The action was taken on August 28 but was kept secret until quite recently, when it was made known in Italy. The fact that the action was taken on the apparent initiative of the French and Italian affiliates—Louis Saillant, veteran Communist and former secretary of the General Federation of Labor in France, serves as Secretary-General of the WFTU and Renato Bitossi, an Italian Communist Senator, is Chairman—does not detract from its significance.

The WFTU has some fifty-seven affiliates and through them claims a total membership of 120 million. Two issues in particular have in the past prevented the East-West cooperation of trade union and left-of-center groups: a belief on the part of Communist organizations that socialism necessarily implies some form of one-party control, and the related belief that a measure of uniformity of opinion, particularly among artists and intellectuals, must be enforced to safeguard Socialist regimes. The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia has badly shaken these dogmas.

For the first time since 1945, therefore, an opportunity is arising to build a measure of East-West opposition among left-of-center groups to the drift toward war. If all varieties of Left leadership in the non-Communist world would now formally welcome and support the WFTU position on Czechoslovakia, that might well constitute the first step toward international Socialist action—if not to end the cold war, at least to strengthen East-West "left" opposition to it.

The Action Gap

After a long and hard sell, President Johnson and his economic and fiscal aides persuaded Congress to boost income taxes, so as to keep the economy in check and inflation from becoming rampant (as the phrase usually goes). When people begin to feel the tax bite, the Administration argument went, they'll trim back their spending, and pretty soon economic equilibrium will be restored.

But here it is two and a half months after the tax hike, and inflation is as rampant as ever. Even some of LBJ's associates, like Treasury Under Secretary Joseph W. Barr, are beginning to confess publicly that "the response to the surcharge thus far has been slower than anticipated."

The people speak somewhat more harshly. "One of the reasons given for the 10 per cent surtax on incomes was to combat inflation," a letter writer complained in The Washington Post. "However, in August the cost of living went up, an increase in inflation. This is another definite example of the American people being sold a bill of goods by LBJ and his incompetent financial advisers."

In August the consumer price index went up for the nineteenth consecutive month. Prices have risen a whopping 4 per cent in the last eight months, the sharpest such boost in eleven years. And, to compound the devilry, a Bureau of Labor Statistics spokesman comments: "There is every sign that the figures will continue to increase throughout the rest of the year."

Nor, so far, has the higher tax scale (which was retroactive on business to January 1) had much effect on the economy as a whole. A poll of the nation's leading private economists forecasts only a "brief hesitation late this year and early in 1969," for "inventory adjustments" in the private sector. This 183-man group, members of the National Association of Business Economists, also cautioned that inflation would be a continuing problem, and that it would become worse if Humphrey wins in November. The economists see the Vice President as a bigger spender than Nixon.

If LBJ and his team had got around the country more (instead of limiting their appearances to business lunches and conventions), they would have found that today's American family is solvent as hell, despite the gripes. For example, fewer home owners in the country are two or more payments behind in their mortgages than at any time since mid-1960. Delinquency ratios on bank-installment loans are the lowest in nine years. Personal bankruptcies declined in the twelve months ending June 30 for the first time in sixteen years. Sitting pretty, the American family therefore took the bigger tax bite in stride and kept right on spending. In fact, retail sales reached a record in August, and there's every sign that another record was set in September.

"The indisputable fact of the matter," said a recent investment letter published by Goodbody & Co., "is that the economy's buoyancy has many of the government's top experts flabbergasted. The expectations, so firmly voiced last May and June, that the income tax surcharge would provide the necessary brakes for excessive exuberance, and the makings of what could become a runaway inflation, just haven't materialized."

Another economic thought is now emerging. There is general agreement, even among some Nixon men, that the 10 per cent surcharge will have to be extended beyond next June 30, the present expiration date. When he committed the nation to the land war in Vietnam, the President for too long delayed owning up (in public at least) to the costs involved. Had Johnson asked for higher taxes in 1965, he—and the Vice President—might have escaped the gap now building up around the 1968 surcharge.

Gruening

Senator Gruening, the gallant 81-year-old physician, newspaper reporter, editor (of The Nation among other publications), author, Latin American expert, and distinguished administrator, has now decided to go along with a write-in campaign which he did not initiate. The facts are these: In the August 29 primary, Senator Gruening was defeated for the Democratic nomination by Mike Gravel, 38-year-old speaker of the Alaska legislature, by the slim margin of 1,954 votes. The Republican nominee is Charles Rasmuson, chairman of the board of the National Bank of Alaska and reputedly the richest man in the state.

Senator Gruening was quite willing to accept the primary verdict; at his age and after a lifetime of notable achievements he did not need another Senate term to round out his career. However, the voters—notably those in college communities (University of Alaska, Alaska Methodist University)—set in motion a write-in campaign. "The war is the overriding issue with us," said one college student, "and this business of two evils just won't do any more. The Senator is a positive candidate."

Once the write-in was under way, the Senator agreed to campaign and is doing so with the vigor and enthusiasm of a young Eskimo. (At 81 he still does twenty-five push-ups plus sixteen other sets of calisthenics every day, and then plunges into a tub of cold water!) "These people," he said of those who initiated the write-in, "represent the hope of the future and I can't let them down."

Write-in campaigns are difficult, but the Senator has substantial support. The Daily News of Anchorage and the Juneau Empire are giving his campaign excellent coverage and may well endorse his candidacy. What the campaign needs is money. The best—and quickest—way to supply it is simply to send contributions to Senator Ernest Gruening, Anchorage, Alaska.

The Negro Vote

Always a matter of journalistic interest in Presidential elections, the Negro vote has assumed novel dimensions this year. What percentage of that vote will the Democratic nominees receive? Will Nixon get the one-third he won in 1960, or the 5 per cent that went to Goldwater in 1964? What will be the size of the Negro turnout, and will it show variations, North to South? What effect will George Wallace have on Negro voting behavior this year? What do Negroes think and feel about this year's Presidential nominees? More important, what do they think and feel about their own relation, as voters, to the political process at the national level?

What some Negroes say, what many Negroes think and feel, and how most Negroes will vote are, this year, separate if related questions. John F. Hatchett, until recently director of the Afro-American Student Center at New York University, has referred to Nixon and Humphrey as "racist bastards." Mr. Hatchett, who feels that no white American is free of racism (are all Negroes, one wonders, immune from the same virus?) has to say of George Wallace: "At least he is honest about what he stands for." Honest, perhaps, but not candid. Hatchett's point of view is interesting, but is it representative?

In full awareness of the novel overtones to "the Negro vote" in this year's election, The Nation turned to three Negro reporters: L. F. Palmer, Jr., in Chicago; Robert Maynard in Washington, D.C. (he has been traveling with the Muskie entourage in the Midwest industrial cities), and Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., stationed in Atlanta, who is an expert on Negro voting in the South (see articles beginning on page 392).

VIETNAM: THE WAR CORPS

BLAKE ROBINSON

Mr. Robinson, after sixteen months in Vietnam, where he worked in the pacification program in Gia Dinh Province as assistant provincial representative for psychological operations, resigned his post during the summer. At the same time, he left the U.S. Information Agency, in which he had served for more than eleven years in Asia, Africa and Washington.

An Indian journalist not without sympathy for America's dilemma in Vietnam was among the first to use the phrase, the "War Corps," to describe the conglomerate American presence, civilian as well as military, in that sad land. The irony of the term stems from the fact that the sizable segment of America's brawn and brain now present in Vietnam is a sort of perverted Peace Corps. The enthusiasm and courage of the Peace Corps, as well as the condescension and press agency that sometimes attach themselves to it, have been harnessed in Vietnam to a lost, and in the truest sense, a losing cause.

Vietnam has brought thousands of civilians into the business of making war. Just as "pacification" has little to do with peace, civilians in Vietnam are hardly to be distinguished from soldiers. Not surprisingly, Vietnam has provided new careers for many retired military.

Much has been written about what the war is doing to the Vietnamese. "You have made prostitutes of our women, beggars of our children, and Communists of our men" is an oft-quoted description of the impact of the American presence. Less attention has been paid to the psychological fruits on the American side. There has been some mention of the martial skills and heightened social expectations which the black GI is bringing home with him. More important are the inner revulsion, the cynicism and lack of self-respect—in sum, the dehumanization—which tens of thousands of Americans of every race are being asked to inflict upon themselves in Vietnam.

A national as well as an inestimable personal loss is involved. Apt comparison has been made between these men and the "good Germans" of World War II—those who, while part and parcel of the Nazi system, "knew not what they did." The "good Americans" out in Vietnam bring an evangelical fervor to their disparate tasks. That what they are doing contributes directly or indirectly to destruction appears after a time no longer to concern them.

In Vietnam the American concepts of efficiency and team work, the ideals of the frontier, have mutated wildly.

The job, most people out there will admit, is often its own end, but unfortunately for the Administration soothsayers, the job constantly gets itself undone. According to one official, "The computers are doing a grand job of winning the war. As long as you keep asking them the wrong questions, of course they will give you the 'right' answers. And we're paid to ask those wrong questions."

Leaving aside the bulk of the military for whom war, just or unjust, is simply there to be fought, the Americans in Vietnam fall roughly into three categories. Those in category one, while numerically the fewest, give the War Corps its tone. They are the very young, the naive who really do believe in what they are doing. They are the spiritual descendants of the men who rallied to Saint Bernard's cry, "God wills it!"

One such whom I know is, like most Americans, three times as big as the average Vietnamese. He strides the narrow paths of the paddyland in his tropical GI boots, clipboard at the ready, eager to avenge the cheated villager or to root out the unrecognized VC cadre. One would like to believe that he is a good man. Unfortunately, in today's Vietnam as in Graham Greene's, he is just another "good boy," who thinks he is doing the work of a man. The men in category one will risk their lives, often several times a day, knowing that their cause is worth it. There is woe, however, when one of these aged adolescents begins to understand the game. Then he is no longer content to know that if he dies in action his soul will soar to heaven like a "Huey" in high gear.

The category-two man is also in a minority. For the moral fervor of category one he substitutes a thirst for glory. He is the careerist of the Vietnamese War and, like most of his kind, not very attractive. He is, however, of one piece, and in the long run is the easiest to take of all three categories. Chances are he is carving an empire in Saigon. When he goes out inspecting, his eye may be watching for booby traps but his inner eye looks far beyond Vietnam. It sees the executive desk awaiting him in Washington, the AID directorship in another underdeveloped and potentially "CI" (counterinsurgency) country, or even some "class B" ambassadorship.

The man in category two is past master at briefings and pep talks. He knows what the omnipresent press wants and what his "team" will take. He will say with the eye-bulging candor of the true believer, "In Vietnam, 'Rev Dev' (revolutionary development, the latest term for pacification) is really where it is." Or, "The . . . Division is about the greatest thing ever to happen to this province."

The careerist's Vietnamese "counterpart" is likely to be a major or above; probably a bad soldier but a good family man. They get along famously. That buddy system has changed somewhat recently, as more and more Americans try their hand at direct rule and by-pass or push aside Vietnamese officials. Yet it is still true, as one AID technician put it, "All American advice is welcome here, as long as it takes the form of piasters."

But the American in category two is, with few exceptions, himself clean as a whistle. What he is looking for is not the quick buck (although he is paid handsomely) but a lifetime salary in the upper five figures and the prestige that comes from being a super-executive in the American New Order. He is getting in on the ground floor of this nation's new colonial service. One day we may speak of sons and relatives who "went out to Vietnam."

The War Corps would, however, fall flat on its face if it were forced to rely exclusively on these two categories. The main body, the infantry so to speak, is made up of men who do not take to Vietnam as a duck to water. They must adjust, and adjust they do. They convince themselves that they are there for good and sufficient reason. In fact, much of their energy while "in country" is devoted to convincing themselves of just that.

These are the tens of thousands who make up category three. They are the men who, perhaps even more than those whose lives are lost to VC booby traps and mortar shells, represent a loss to America. By taking part in the war they suspend both their political and moral beliefs.

While neither uneducated nor underfed, they remain essentially as passive as the Vietnamese peasantry. And in that respect they are typical of the bulk of the nation.

In category three one finds the "dead ender," who is using Vietnam to revive a dying career. Here also is the man who has fled "the land of the great PX" to exorcise (or exercise) a private devil—a hunger or a thirst that could not be fully satisfied at home. Of course, he may also be there for the money.

But these are exceptions; more often than not the man in category three is not seeking "artificial paradises" and is not a pure mercenary. He has come to Vietnam because he feels he has no choice. He has few real skills, is too long in his career, has too many children, or too demanding a wife to make a clean break of it. For him it is not "whom" but "what can I turn to?"

All these men, the competent as well as the incompetent, the dullards as well as the brilliant, tend to talk about what they are doing with a certain mocking trepidation. From one I got, "Hm, Rev. Dev.—certainly no revolution there and damn little development."

These men live for their SMA (visit to a "safe haven" country to see the wife), which most of them can get every five weeks, but which they take less frequently now because the government will pay their way only twice a year. Then they go off to swinging Bangkok, comfortable Taipei or stylish Hong Kong. Others take the big leap three times a tour, returning to the States to visit the family in the suburbs of San Diego or Poughkeepsie.

The biggest chunk of the War Corps is made up of men in the middle grades of government service and in middle age. These category-three warriors are often only too glad to get away for a spell from the wife and kiddies, the suburban grind, bureaucratic infighting or diplomatic socializing.

Americans in Bao, Saigon.
Gerald Scarfe—Vietnam.

Tribune (London)

Many of them are not members of any branch of the military services or career employees of any civilian agency. Vietnam is full of contractees, as well as employees of firms dependent on AID or the military. For them, too, Vietnam can be dangerous, but the risks are offset by splendid wages, differentials, free housing, cheap liquor, good food at below supermarket prices, servants, and the irresistible bonus of a "butterfly" or two between visits to see the "little woman."

In this land of displaced persons a Vietnamese "girl friend," even with the high demand, can be had for a fraction of the price of a housemaid back home. These men, when one of their fellows is about to return to the States, ask him what his PCOD (Pussy Cut Off Date) is. And while the boys down their third or fourth drink, they will play the game of "Categories," defining the number and nature of the kinds of people working in Vietnam. Only rarely will they dare ask themselves, "What category am I?"

Vietnam is producing a race of men who do not respect themselves or their country. They are the real "good Americans" of the Vietnamese War—not only a waste in human resources for the United States but the basic manpower source for more Vietnams, both abroad and at home.

THE BLACK VOTE

Negroes Go Local

ROBERT MAYNARD

Mr. Maynard is a reporter for The Washington Post.

Washington

He was the kind of ward hustler known in all big cities. The once flashy suit was slightly wrinkled, the off-white shirt had seen a whiter day. But he was a professional, a man paid to do a specific job and with pride in his reputation for reliability. He was not happy.

The job in Ward 24 of Cleveland is to help the organization of Democratic Mayor Carl Burton Stokes turn out a sizable vote for Hubert Humphrey and the Democratic slate on November 5. The pro was standing in the steamy ballroom of the Sheraton Cleveland Hotel, his brown brow glistening with perspiration as he listened to one politician after another proclaim that Ohio was safe for the Democratic column "right down the line."

"These cats ain't for real," the pro confided. "They ain't about to carry this state, or this county for that matter, and they damn well know it. You know what they got to do to carry this state? They got to get every black man and woman into the booth—maybe some of 'em twice—and they can't get 'em all even once."

Blacks, he said, are not all that interested in this Presidential election, despite the fact that whites in Cuyahoga County are defecting in droves to George Wallace. The state-wide organization, the pro said, "don't act like they want the black folks' vote this year. I guess they want it, but they ain't doing a whole lot to get it."

That is hardly an isolated view of the Democratic campaign in the black communities. The impression that prevails is that Humphrey is keeping a safe distance from blacks, in the hope of hauling back into the Democratic column those myriad whites now marching to the polls to the music of George Wallace. "Intellectually," said a prominent Negro Democrat, "they know the black vote is essential, but emotionally, they can't deal with that reality."

The only Democratic bright spot at midpoint in the 1968 campaign is George Corley Wallace. As reports of his strength spread through the black communities, Democratic professionals hope to stampede voters to the polls, telling Negroes that their votes are needed to keep the White House from falling into the hands of a blatant racist. In fact, assisted by several Agnew slips of the tongue, the Democrats hope to make the argument work against Nixon as well.

But so far, nothing seems to click for them in the Negro communities, where the Democrats hope to garner 80 per cent of whatever vote is cast. And it is a not inconsiderable vote, if it can be mobilized in the final few weeks. If Hubert Humphrey can successfully be portrayed to blacks as the least of three evils, the Democratic National Committee figures to turn out 8 million blacks on Election Day. That is 3 million shy of the number eligible to vote, but the size of the task can be measured by noting that in 1964—when blacks went to the polls with a vengeance against Barry Goldwater—6 million voted. That kind of anger is simply not being generated by the present campaigns.

It is particularly not being generated where it might really count—in the industrial North. The turn-out in the South, where 3 million blacks are registered in eleven states, is expected to be so heavy that some Democrats dream that a strong black vote in Mississippi could carry the state for Humphrey, with Nixon and Wallace canceling each other. Elsewhere in the South, however, no such hope exists.

But there are several Northern states—New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio and Michigan in particular—where a heavy black vote and a little bit of luck could hold the line for Humphrey.

"It's ironic," a black Auto Workers official in Detroit was saying recently. "I remember when it was predicted that the Negro vote would one day be a swing vote and we could influence Presidential policies. Now, when that day is just about here, nobody seems particularly interested. My people tell me they aren't even making out well in getting people registered. What do you think is going to happen November 5?"

The war in Vietnam, of course, has played the heaviest part in eroding Negro enthusiasm for either Humphrey or Nixon. But beyond that, Humphrey, the potential beneficiary from a heavy black vote, has damaged himself by equating the "extremism of Stokely Carmichael" with that of George Wallace. Even Negroes who consider Carmichael a demagogue resent his being lumped in with a man whom most blacks consider a deadly enemy. Nor has Humphrey's flirtation with the law-and-order and crime-in-the-streets issues endeared him to a Negro electorate becoming ever more suspicious that those terms mask a form of racism.

But still another reason, going beyond those negative concerns, is the shift in focus of the black community. In the years since the urban uprisings began, black communities have become increasingly introspective and internally concerned. The emphasis on national leadership has given way to a preoccupation with what is happening at the local level, even the neighborhood level.

Neither in civil rights nor in politics have national figures been as important as local ones during the past several years. Partly with anti-poverty funds and partly because of the rise of nationalism and black identity, organization at the neighborhood level in the black communities has drawn attention away from the great figures. And the two men who could most easily have broken through to the local level—Martin Luther King and Robert Kennedy—are gone.

Thus an odd comparison can be made between the behavior of working-class blacks and working-class whites in this election year. The whites, frightened by violence and crime—but even more by aggressive Negro aspirations—are turning in large numbers away from the liberal Center of Humphrey to the wild Right of Wallace. In doing so, they are banking on Wallace's ability to contain the black threat by invoking greater police powers, which traditionally is not a Presidential responsibility but a local one. Thus it could be said, they propose to vote for a President as though they were selecting a tribal chief or a king. They are asking the President to serve as their defender against crime on the street corner, as though the job had become too big for the police chief; as though too much were at stake for the matter to be resolved by the man in City Hall.

The black component of the working class, meanwhile, is being told at the local level that there is nothing Negroes can gain from the Presidency, nothing to be had from Washington, no matter what man heads the government. That this should be so is especially striking when one notes that even some super-militants will concede that "Johnson did more for black people than any other President."

Black leaders like Ron Karenga, founder-chairman of US, the Los Angeles cultural black nationalist organization, exert profound influence locally, within several miles of their home bases, but little influence on the rest of black America. Part of the reason is credibility. After listening for years to empty promises from politicians and civil rights leaders, the black communities have turned to men they know and who are close enough at hand to be held to account.

Thus the Democratic Party, the "party of the working people," goes the last few halting steps to Election Day with its white blue-collar voters looking to a national figure to solve local problems, and with its black constituency looking to local leaders for solutions to problems that plague them nationally. Meanwhile, black and white radicals are talking—separately, of course—of forming new parties with new concerns and new goals for the nation. A private survey among politically oriented blacks turned up a surprisingly large number of supporters for the idea in cities in middle America. Behind the move for a black new politics there lies the feeling that the major parties are so frozen into old commitments and alliances that they will never free themselves to respond to black people.

Negro Democrats had hoped that the nomination of Channing Phillips and Julian Bond would show Negroes that they have a place in the party. They certainly assumed that the GOP nominations would prove that party closed to black aspirations. Channing Phillips has been on the road, telling disaffected black and white Democrats alike that the party's rebuilding must be done by them, and

Drawings by Pat Fink

"Man, in France They Wants Worker Power and We Ain't Even Past the Worker Part!"

that they can succeed if they stick with it. But he reports that they often seem to doubt him; they remember Mayor Daley too vividly.

With a quality of great distance in her voice, a black woman, and a regular Democrat in New York, said: "It's a very strange election. It's all as though it were an argument among white folks that hardly involves us. Yet—don't you feel this?—more than anything else, it's about us. How odd this fall seems."

She and a couple of her friends had gathered in a favorite bar and were chatting in remote tones about what it all meant—losing Bobby, in whom they had believed so deeply; the McCarthy candidacy, which shook the party to its foundations, but yet seemed, save for a handful of college kids, to have almost no contact with blacks; the bizarre scene in Chicago. And then the sudden realization that George Wallace was not a quadrennial political joke but a serious contender for the Presidency of the United States.

"I wish," said one of the women, "that we could begin this year all over again. I feel so strange inside. Nothing tastes right." The others nodded assent.

The No-Choice Bag

L. F. PALMER, Jr.

Mr. Palmer is a reporter and columnist for the Chicago Daily News, and a special correspondent for the Newspaper Enterprise Association.

Chicago

Chicago's black voters could help topple Mayor Richard J. Daley from his national power perch on November 5. By refusing to vote in the Presidential election, Negroes could help throw Illinois to the Republicans, and Daley must deliver Illinois to Humphrey if he wants to maintain his party ranking. This is probably one of the most difficult assignments the veteran boss of Chicago has ever had to face.

It is an intriguing thought, but, as the cats on the street would say, whitey's got the brother in the trick bag again. The black voter in Chicago—and anywhere else, for that matter—has got to vote for Humphrey because there's no place else to go.

No matter how you add it up, the answer comes out the same. Use the old math of the rigidly controlled, survival-oriented Democratic machine and the conclusion is inescapable: blacks will come out for Humphrey on November 5. Use the new math of the black militant spokesmen who are preaching a vote boycott, but add in the facts of life, and the answer remains unchanged: black voters will vote and they will vote Democratic.

In Chicago, the black vote has long been locked into the Democratic machine. In the fantastic 1960 Presidential election, when John F. Kennedy took Illinois from Richard Nixon by less than 10,000 votes, here's how a few of Chicago's black wards voted: The 2nd Ward cast 21,100 Democratic ballots and 5,353 Republican; the 3rd Ward went for Kennedy 19,990 to 5,003, and the 24th Ward gave Kennedy 24,211 votes to Nixon's 2,131. In any one of these three black wards—and others delivered returns almost as effective—the plurality was sufficient to swing the entire state of Illinois to the Democratic nominee.

Four years later, when the specter of Sen. Barry Goldwater stirred Chicago's black voters to a little movement on their own, the pluralities in these same districts were extraordinary. The 2nd Ward turned out 23,238 for Lyndon B. Johnson and 1,276 for Goldwater. In the 3rd Ward, the Republican candidate could muster only 982 votes to Johnson's 33,851, and in the 24th Ward he got 304 to Johnson's massive 21,662.

A lot has happened since 1964. Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., was assassinated, his death putting an end to the nonviolent movement as a national force. Sen. Robert F. Kennedy was wiped off the political scene in the same unbelievable manner, and another hero of black Americans was eliminated. Cities burst into flame, Chicago among them. The black pride movement caught hold and suddenly black people started thinking for themselves—some of them, at least.

In Chicago, one of these is Calvin Lockridge, who convened the Black Consortium, a confederation of about forty militant black organizations. When the conventions were over and the Presidential campaigns had begun to tick along, Lockridge startled blacks and whites alike by proposing a double-barreled anti-Establishment strategy. He first called on blacks to vote for Wallace in an effort to throw the election into the House of Representatives. Starting from the assumption that neither Humphrey nor Nixon will offer a meaningful program for the liberation of the black man, Lockridge said: "The ultimate goal of the vote-for-Wallace strategy is to break the two-party system. The system is what is strangling black people. So if you think black people voting for Wallace is extreme, you'd better know that we'll do anything to destroy the system."

But Lockridge came to recognize that this approach is too sophisticated for the black masses, and he began calling instead for a boycott of the polls, a protest technique to be fashioned into a national strategy. A few ministers and independent politicians have joined the boycott movement in Chicago, seeking to persuade black voters that it is suicidal to keep on playing lackey to the Democrats. They argue that once the major parties know that the black vote is not automatic, meaningful bargaining can begin.

Daley is being used as bait in the Chicago boycott attempt. Militants are saying that a nonvote is a vote against Daley, who is running for nothing except his political reputation, which took on national proportions during the bloodletting of the Democratic convention. But the boycott does not appear to be catching on in Chicago, nor apparently in other urban areas. A major reason is the threat of Wallace and Nixon-Agnew. In their October 5th issue, the Chicago-South Suburban News, a Negro weekly, urged voters to defeat Wallace, while the Chicago Daily Defender, one of two Negro dailies in the country, inveighed against Nixon.

The News strung a two-line banner headline across the top of its front page: "Black Voters Must Go to the Polls En Masse To Curb Wallace Fascist Threat." The story, appearing just after hundreds of thousands turned out for Wallace's visit to Chicago, said in part:

If it was not clear before, it became clear Monday afternoon in Chicago that black voters cannot forgo the voting booth this year as various people have asked them to do . . .

The situation one month before the election calls for some deep thinking on the part of black people in the state of Illinois and throughout the nation. There is a clear and present danger that George C. Wallace and his legions will personally or by proxy lead to a Hitler regime in this country. Never before in the history of this country has the black vote individually or as a whole meant so much as it does this year. A vote not cast is a vote for Wallace. A vote for Wallace is a vote for a Fascist, Hitlerite America.

Voicing much the same fear of Nixon, the Defender said in an editorial:

Though some of his strategists try to fashion him in the image of a new leader with a profound sense of vision, Richard M. Nixon remains unchanged. . . . Should [he] win the Presidency in November, the nation will be rocked by some of the most oppressive and repressive measures ever devised by an American President. The ominous change can be perceived through Nixon's running mate, Governor Agnew, who is opposed to demonstrations of any kind and who advocates drastic limits to "permissive dissents." We would be living not in a democratic state with a representative government to sustain the ideology but in a garrison state where the people are voiceless and forbidden to resent any abuse or infringement of their rights or an excessive use of power under the subterfuge of national interest.

These are matters that the black voter must consider before entering the voting booth.

Assuming the boycott technique to be an effective one, which I do not, it must be worked at, like any other political device. It is not being worked at in Chicago because the militant-independent coalition lacks the means and the discipline to carry on a relentless, precinct-level, door-to-door-campaign. Therefore it can succeed only by a miracle. That is one reason why the black voter today is in a steel-lined bag, trying to get out with a can opener: a strong political organization is nonexistent in the black community, outside the Democratic machine.

By contrast, the Daley machine continues to hum. Less than two months after the Chicago Mayor had zipped into his fourth term in April, 1967, with a winning plurality of more than 500,000 votes, Negro Democratic officeholders from across the country assembled in Washington for a workshop conference. A major item on the agenda was Daley's enormous victory and its significance for Negroes in the party and for the Democratic Presidential nominee. It seems evident that even then party leaders were concerned about holding onto the black bloc vote. Most delegates to that Democratic parley no doubt went home determined that the message brought by state Rep. Cornelia A. Davis, a veteran Chicago Democrat, was the rallying call for the days ahead: "The Negro's salvation is organization. We've got to be organized. We must be part of an organization. We cannot stand alone."

Then the June, 1968, primaries came to Chicago and produced one of the lowest turn-outs in recent history. In the black wards, the stay-at-homes were so numerous as to be alarming. The white vote was down about 30 per cent, but among blacks it was about half of what it had been in the 1964 primary.

"Man, Oh, Man, Talk About White Elephant Sales!"

A. A. (Sammy) Rayner, who got into Chicago's City Council by unseating a regular Democratic organization man, failed to oust Rep. William L. Dawson in that primary. Rayner had some thoughts on the small turn-out, disagreeing with those who argued that the death of Senator Kennedy caused black voters to stay away from the polls: "We thought Senator Kennedy's death would actually enhance the vote. I think Negroes may be becoming disillusioned with the political process. If that's so, I'm very concerned."

Leon M. Despres, the white independent councilman known for his maverick ways, concluded that "people are voting with their feet. They feel alienated, uninvolved, rejected." The low turn-out, Despres said, was "an eloquent but ominous sign for the fabric of the city."

But Daley is as sensitive to such signs as a mechanic who detects a foreign sound in the motor of his beloved machine. At once the screwdrivers and pliers were playing over the innards of the Democratic political mechanism, looking for short circuits, points that needed adjusting, plugs to be replaced. For the machine needed a perfect tune-up for the race on November 5. Now, in the days before the election, the hum of efficiency is again heard in Chicago's black wards. The 3rd Ward is a good example. Ralph H. Metcalfe, one-time Olympic hero, is alderman and Democratic committeeman of the ward. Chairman of the powerful Building and Zoning Committee of the City Council and an astute politician, he is thought by many to be the heir apparent to the Congressional seat of the aging Dawson.

"Certainly we see the vote boycott as a threat," Metcalfe said. "It will continue to be a threat so long as we do not address ourselves to it. But we are pointing out that any person who advocated that black people refrain from voting is no friend of the race." Metcalfe says that, in view of the threatened boycott, his organization has stepped up its campaign for Humphrey. "We advanced our timetable considerably. Our precinct captains are getting vote estimates much earlier this year, so we can get an idea of what the picture is. And we are making it crystal clear to residents of our ward what a danger Nixon and Wallace represent." Metcalfe predicts that a larger percentage of Negro voters will turn out on November 5 than did in 1964.

The NAACP, the Urban League and some labor organizations are also conducting vigorous "nonpartisan" get-out-the-vote campaigns. The A. Philip Randolph Institute has come out in support of Humphrey-Muskie and is actively opposing the boycott in Chicago and other major cities. One flier which the institute distributed to blacks speaks a plain language: "Nixon and Agnew and Wallace scream about 'law and order' and 'crime in the streets.' Whom do you think they have in mind? It's us. What do you think they really mean? They mean to scare the Southern racists and Northern backslashers into voting for them so they can 'put the nigger in his place.'"

That is very effective propagandizing. Combined with the bread-and-butter campaigning of the Democratic organization's precinct captains, it will get the black voters to the polls on November 5, although there is enormous hostility to Humphrey in the ghettos—especially among younger voters who view the Vice President much as they view the NAACP: great in its day but unable or unwilling to shift with the times. "What am I supposed to do?" one black voter asked. "Sit on the sidelines and watch the world go by? Obviously, I can't vote for Nixon. The voter-for-Wallace bit is too silly even to talk about. So that leaves me with Humphrey. We're in a bag, brother."

Another group of blacks who will vote for Humphrey, though it goes against their militant grain, are those who have fought in Chicago's political wars, have been run over by the machine, but who are still looking for somewhere to turn.

Bennett J. Johnson is one such. Though he is now project director of the Milwaukee Urban League's Labor Education Advancement Program, he is in and out of Chicago and very much a part there of the independent political scene. Still nettled because he was offered $3,000 to drop out of Chicago's 42nd Ward aldermanic race in 1959, Johnson told the recent Black Power conference in Philadelphia that he offered to withdraw his candidacy if his political enemies gave him $1 for every black man, woman and child in America. "I ran and I lost," Johnson recalls. "The campaign cost the 42nd Ward regular Democratic Organization $35,000 to defeat me. But we built the North Side contingent of the Chicago League of Negro Voters which led every protest movement for the next nine years."

Johnson said he could have become a political dropout and "it would have made sense to some people if I had joined the boycott movement." But to him it just isn't that simple. "Politics is power. The acquisition of this power is a science. We who believe that black people must control our own communities must first learn how to become skilled at this craft. Then we must use this science to free ourselves and our brothers."

Johnson then put his finger on the core of the dilemma. "The most influential organization in Chicago and many other urban areas is not a religious denomination, a fraternal group or a civil rights organization. It is the Democratic Party. The warp and woof of the Democratic Party are the precinct captains and the functionaries such as election judges. But these black party faithful do not come from the middle class; they are not the black bourgeoisie. They are the grass-roots people who have found some identity and some way to make a living through the political organization."

To launch a program to exterminate them, Johnson said, would be fratricide and would leave a vacuum of employment and service "we are not prepared to fill." To put it another way, the Democratic organization in Chicago and in many urban centers is a way of survival for many Negroes. At the same time, because the organization does not respond to the needs of the black man, it is also a way of death for the hopes and dreams and aspirations of a people. There, again, is the bag that engulfs black voters on the eve of the 1968 Presidential election. It is suicidal not to vote, yet a vote for Humphrey is a vote for the machine.

Ironically, the three black candidates currently running for President are virtually forgotten in the whirl and swirl of electioneering. Ask any black man who they are and he'll be able to name Dick Gregory—perhaps. Eldridge Cleaver, the Black Panthers' minister of information, who is running on the Peace and Freedom ticket, and the Communist Party's Charlene Mitchell have not stirred even as much interest in Chicago as Dick Gregory's campaign "dollar bills." The number of blacks who will waste their votes on these three candidates will not even ripple the political waters.

And so, given the widespread belief that the Democrats will be hard put to carry Illinois for Humphrey, I return to the intriguing thought that Chicago's black voters could help push Daley off his pinnacle of power on November 5. From emotion, militancy and impulsiveness they just might indulge themselves in this kind of orgy of revenge. But, more in self-defense than anything else, the black vote is almost certain to wind up in Humphrey's pocket. Whether or not it will be enough to put him over, most black voters are convinced that they are better off in somebody's corner than to find themselves even more stranded than they are today.

Richard H. Newhouse, a black state Senator from Chicago who bucked the machine to win his seat, has been preaching a bit of Black Power to his colleagues in the Illinois General Assembly. Like Bennett Johnson, he sees politics as power and is trying to weld black state Representatives and Senators into a power bloc. "The time has come," Newhouse said last year, "when the Negro voter must recognize that voting is not an exercise in futility. Good, clean, legal American power is within grasp—if we just remember to stretch forth our hand." He is not having much success with his unity program.

In time and under the right circumstances, Newhouse's admonition could have great meaning. Under the circumstances of the upcoming election, the black man's vote is little more than an exercise in futility. In Chicago and across the nation, he is going to act on his franchise, he is going to stretch forth his hands. But what the political system is going to drop into those upturned palms will not be "good, clean, legal American power."

New Game in Dixie

VERNON E. JORDAN, JR.

Mr. Jordan is director of the voter education project of the Southern Regional Council.

Atlanta

It is ironic, in this year when both major parties (and of course George Wallace) are soliciting Ole Massa's vote, that the black man can be the decisive factor in how the region goes. In 1964, just over 2 million Negroes were registered to vote in the South. This year the figure is up to 3,112,000. Since 1962 Negro voter registration in the South has more than doubled, with no comparable increase in white registration; the face of every sixth voter in the South today is black.

In contrast with his historic alienation from, and victimization by, Southern politics, the black man has recently been making solid political gains throughout the region. As a registered and active voter, as an office seeker and officeholder, the black man has become in the 1960s a major participant in the South's political process.

Negroes are gradually reshaping Byzantine Southern politics by struggling from a position of virtually no political status in 1944 to the point where they have been able to decide many state and local races. Similarly, Negroes can now determine how Southern states will cast their electoral votes in 1968.

The Presidential election of 1964, and the state-wide and Congressional elections in the South in 1966, supply precedents for saying that the Negro vote can swing this year's election in the region, and (who knows?) in the nation. A study by the Southern Regional Council of the 1964 election shows that of the six Southern states carried by Lyndon Johnson, four (Arkansas, Florida, Tennessee and Virginia) would have gone for Goldwater had it not been for the black vote. One other, North Carolina, might have gone Republican. Only in his native Texas, among the eleven states of the South, did Mr. Johnson clearly receive the majority of white votes. And in the five states carried by Goldwater, Negro registration was abnormally low, lagging behind the regional average.

In the 1966 election, the black vote supplied the winning margin for a U.S. Senator, one and probably two governors and at least two Congressmen. In addition, a number of Negroes were elected to public office at state and local levels. Today there are nearly 300 black elected officials in the South and the number is expected to go above 300 in this November's elections.

To be sure, the growing black vote has not silenced racism in the South, as was hoped several years ago. The 1966 gubernatorial campaigns in Georgia, Alabama and Florida are examples of racist victories. The same could be said of the 1967 Mississippi governor's contest. Indeed, it could be argued that the rise of black political influence, along with other advances made by the Negroes, has intensified racism in the region. The white South obviously feels that the blacks have gone too far in their demands for justice and equality. Integration of lunch counters and public facilities, desegregation of the voting booths and token desegregation of the schools—although fought at every turn—are thought to be enough, if not too much. While the percentage of Negro voters is up, in some parts of the Deep South new white registration has matched, or nearly matched, new Negro registration.

Events this year have also demonstrated what black people have known all along—that the South has no monopoly on racism. George Wallace's incredible campaign has made obvious this sociological fact. In the Johnson-Goldwater race for the Presidency racism was a controlling factor in the South. Johnson and Goldwater offered two distinct views on the race question, and the issue therefore caused mass defections of previously Democratic white voters to Goldwater, and of previously Republican black voters to Johnson. But in 1968, with "law and order" a major issue, the shadow of racism hangs over an entire national campaign.

Given all this, along with the candidacies of Humphrey, Nixon and Wallace, where will the Southern Negro vote go in November? The fact is that the Southern Negro has the franchise but no choice. As in 1964, the Republicans have failed to offer the black people a candidate for the Presidency; they wrote off the Negro vote at Miami. Wallace, of course, provides only additional incentive to vote for Humphrey.

"I'd Settle for Some Closed Housing."

This does not mean that Southern Negroes are irrevocably committed to the Democrats. They vote their interests and they vote for the candidate or party acceptable to their aspirations and their dignity. For example, in Pine Bluff, Ark., in 1964, Negroes voted 97.8 per cent for President Johnson and 88.5 per cent for the Republican candidate for governor. In 1966, Negroes in South Carolina and other parts of the South gave key support to Democratic candidates. In the Arkansas governor's race, however, Negroes gave decisive support to the Republican nominee.

Nor is there, this year, great personal affection for Mr. Humphrey. Had Robert Kennedy lived and won the Democratic nomination, he would have enjoyed the overwhelming support of black people in the South. He was a man who cared about their problems, and they remembered his brother. They also remembered Robert Kennedy's service as attorney general; they listened to his speeches. They saw him in the Mississippi Delta investigating and seeing firsthand the desperate plight of the black man. The death of Senator Kennedy, along with that of Martin Luther King, leaves a void in the hearts of black men in this election year.

Of course, Hubert Humphrey is no stranger to blacks in the South. Negroes either remember or have heard of his courageous leadership in behalf of civil rights at past Democratic conventions. Southern Negroes recognize that he has long championed the cause of justice and equality, and continues to do so.

As Vice President, however, Mr. Humphrey's image has been somewhat tarnished. His photographed embrace of Georgia's Gov. Lester Maddox was very disturbing. What kind of politics is that, the Negroes asked? Humphrey's obvious courtship of Southern Governors in his bid for the Democratic nomination was poorly received. Did he really believe he could count on McKeithen, they ask in Louisiana? What is his actual position on Vietnam? The blacks are becoming increasingly concerned about that faraway war. Finally, why would Sen. Robert Byrd of West Virginia be the keynote speaker at a recent South-wide Humphrey-Muskie organizational meeting in Atlanta? Negroes were puzzled.

Nixon has no positive record in the field of civil rights, nor has he been identified with the cause of black people. His call for law and order, his criticism of the Supreme Court, the reported promises to Southerners on school desegregation, and the roles of Strom Thurmond of South Carolina and "Bo" Callaway of Georgia in his campaign are not calculated to win him the black vote. From what we have seen and heard in the South, the crowds Nixon attracts across the country are lily white, attracting few, if any, Negroes.

Wallace, of course, is not in contention for black votes. However, his presence in the campaign will be a factor in getting Negro citizens to the polls on Election Day. Many blacks will vote against Wallace as much as they will vote for one of the other candidates. The Wallace brand of racism generally insures a good black turn-out wherever it is applied.

The 1966 governor's race in Alabama illustrates this point. Wallace was a de facto candidate for governor, with his wife standing in. In the primary, 74 per cent of the 235,000 Negroes registered in Alabama voted. This was a remarkable showing, since more than half of the Negro registration had been added in the months leading up to the election and thus were voting for the first time in their lives. The white turn-out in the election was 61 per cent of the white registration.

Candidates aside, the 1968 conventions of the major parties are additional influences on the black vote in the South. The Republican delegations from the South were almost entirely white, a departure from the older tradition of heavy black representation on Southern delegations to GOP conventions. There were only four Negro regular delegates from the region—two from Arkansas, one from Tennessee and one from Georgia. Black representation nation-wide at Miami, delegates and alternates, was only 3.5 per cent. Except for the address by Sen. Edward Brooke, Negroes were almost invisible.

At the Democratic convention, on the other hand, 381 black delegates and alternates provided 7 per cent of the total. From the South alone, even before the seating of the Mississippi and Georgia challenge delegations, there were forty-three regular Negro delegates and fifty alternates.

Four years ago, Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer of Ruleville, Miss., was on the outside trying to get into the Democratic convention. This year, black people across the nation saw Mrs. Hamer inside the convention, speaking from the podium and trying to get her black brothers from Alabama into the hall. In addition to seating the biracial delegation from Mississippi, the convention decided to divide the Georgia vote between the regulars and the challengers, driving the enraged Lester Maddox out of the convention and letting Julian Bond in. The abolition of the unit rule was an important change for Negroes. The nominations of black men for President and Vice President, however symbolic, had real meaning for black people.

Thus Negroes in the South tend to see more hope for their aspirations and needs within the Democratic Party. Their actions at the ballot box in November may reflect more an appreciation of the national Democratic Party, and its deeds, than a loyalty to the nominee.

As the election approaches, it becomes increasingly clear that Nixon has little hope of attracting black voters. His October Southern tour offers no evidence that the candidate is trying to draw black voters, though obviously his Southern strategy must somehow include them.

At the same time, if Humphrey is to carry any state in the South, he must have an enthusiastic turn-out of black voters—plus (such as it is in the South) the moderate-to-liberal white vote. This combination, along with a split in the rest of the white vote between Nixon and Wallace, could put Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee and Arkansas in the Democratic column. I would concede only Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana to Wallace. Georgia could go either way. The nearly 350,000 Negro votes in Georgia could provide Humphrey with the 34 per cent of the vote needed to get the state's twelve electoral votes. Florida is the only Nixon certainty in the South. Texas being too vast and unpredictable to analyze.

Unlike some blacks in the North, Negroes in the South are not indifferent about the current Presidential race. Yet you cannot feel today the enthusiasm and excitement that existed in 1964. Nor do Negroes anticipate victory as they did then. On the contrary, they grudgingly acknowledge that Nixon is likely to win.

This November, thousands of black people in the South will be casting their first vote for a President. A large number of additional black voters will be participating in a Presidential race for the second time. Voting is still a novelty for Southern Negroes and a Presidential election is one they are least likely to pass up.

The crash get-out-the-vote campaigns now under way and growing, under the direction of civil rights organizations and local groups across the South, could lead to a black turn-out at least proportionate to the white turn-out. If that happens, the Democratic nominee has a better chance in the South than most political observers give him. Certainly, the key to a Democratic victory in the South is the black voter. And should the Democrats be victorious, Negro voters will expect them not to forget that fact.

THE EMPIRE AFTER SALAZAR

ANTONIO DE FIGUEIREDO

Mr. Figueiredo is a Portuguese economist now living in exile in London, where he represents the Portuguese Democratic Movement. He is the author of Portugal and Its Empire (Victor Gollancz).

Never one to give up without a fight, 79-year-old Professor-cum-Dictator Antonio de Oliveira Salazar, after four weeks of agony and several extreme unctions, fell into a coma, was officially declared moribund, and was replaced as Prime Minister of Portugal by Prof. Marcello Caetano.

A man of many paradoxes, Salazar is likely to go down in the history of his country as the rebuilder of an overseas empire he never even saw. Having been given absolute powers after a coup d'état in 1926, he balanced the finances of the exiguous and unstable country that came under his hand and integrated the remnants of a far-flung empire into an "escudo area" which in 1967 showed convertible reserves of $1.6 billion. Today the rich and booming territories of Angola and Mozambique, more than twenty-two times the size of Portugal, almost as big as

Western Europe, and developing at a faster rate than most independent African countries, contain 12 million blacks and more than 400,000 white settlers (15 per cent of the total white population of southern Africa). Between them the colonies buy 25 per cent of Portugal's exports, supply most of the raw materials for its expanding industry and, overcoming Portugal's own chronic trade deficit, leave a surplus in the "escudo area" balance of payments.

In the first decades of Salazar's rule, much of the visible urban and industrial progress, and capital accumulation, was achieved at the expense of forced and cheaply paid labor from the overwhelmingly rural populations of both European Portugal and the overseas territories. After the Angolan uprising in 1961, when Portugal came to be involved in three colonial wars in Guinea-Bissau, Angola and Mozambique, Salazar forsook his parochial, slow but determined methods. Though he had boasted of keeping Portugal out of the Spanish Civil War and World War II, he was to proclaim the colonial wars as an inherent feature of modern Portuguese "dynamics." Having retained the overseas territories as a preserve for Portuguese capital and the living space with which to reduce pressure for much needed agrarian reforms in Portugal, he ignored his own previous warnings as to the dangers of investments and loans from foreign sources and mortgaged the economic future of Portugal, Angola and Mozambique with long-term commitments, in some cases extending to twenty-five years.

As of now, his accomplishments are difficult to assess. It would perhaps take less than another forty years to spread the wealth generated by the Salazar regime beyond the bankers, industrialists and the growing urban middle classes in Portugal and the African territories (from which the regime has of late been enjoying considerable support). But the wall of censorship and propaganda hides the full significance of certain facts in the politico-social scene. Over the past few years, Portuguese have been fleeing the country at the rate of 100,000 annually, "voting with their feet" on the way to France and Western Germany. In any year, more leave than are born. And in Africa, Portugal faces guerrilla warfare on several fronts, waged by organized groups on behalf of millions of Africans as eager for self-determination as for social and economic progress.

And the neglected ordinary Portuguese and African will certainly have to wait a long time before their needs are recognized. Defense currently absorbs half of the entire budget, some 6.7 per cent of the gross national product; it is the highest percentage in all Europe, except for the Soviet Union. And defense, conscripting 200,000 young Portuguese for terms up to four years in the active and reserve army units, has absolute control over expenditures for public works, education and social services.

Moreover, Salazar leaves his country at a turning point in its history. Lacking adequate support from its NATO allies for its colonial exploitation, Portugal, the creator of multi-racial Brazil, has come to rely on a close military and economic alliance with South Africa. Apartheid is so incompatible with Portuguese traditions that one can only assume a game of political expediency. On the one hand, Salazar may have hoped to achieve a situation whereby, while enjoying the support of South Africa in the hardening white-supremacy context of southern Africa, he could still offer to the outside world a contrasting picture of Portuguese racial moderation. In its turn, South Africa would be willing to give a helping hand because Portuguese schemes call for increasing numbers of white settlers in its African territories. The most significant of these schemes are the $320 million Cabora Bassa Dam, in Mozambique, and the $220 million Cunene Dam, in Angola, which will provide, respectively, for the settlement of an estimated 1 million and 500,000 Portuguese. Both are backed by South African assistance. Then, the survival of the emerging white nationalisms of neighboring Angola and Mozambique would certainly be bound up with that of white South Africa. The example of Rhodesia is pertinent.

Led away from Europe and back to the empire to assert its independence from Spain, small Portugal is so overwhelmed by the implications of its presence in southern Africa that it runs the risk of losing its autonomy to South Africa. Already many of the army generals and civilian party leaders have settled most of their interests in the rich overseas provinces of Portugal. And it is they who now want to impose a continuing Salazarism without Salazar. Prime Minister Caetano, a widely traveled and more modern-minded man than Salazar, is better equipped to understand the implications of the Portuguese dilemma. In the ambiguous language peculiar to all totalitarian regimes, experts may read some hope of liberalization. "Portugal," Caetano said at his inaugural, "has grown accustomed to be governed by a man of genius, but from now on it will be governed by ordinary men, as are other countries."

The Portuguese, shedding their disputes and calling for a transition to democratic rule, might be expected to cooperate with him in proving that in the long run common democratic sense will profit Portugal more than the visions of a supposedly genial recluse—who rebuilt an overseas empire and led faraway jungle battles from an armchair. By, and large, the ordinary Portuguese wants his small country to become part of a wider Europe, rather than to persist in pouring out the lives of millions of Portuguese and colonial peoples on empires that come and go. The dream of empire has intoxicated the rulers of Portugal for 500 years; as long as it holds sway, there may be more or less liberalism in the country, but there will never be democracy.

Rafferty: High Wind in California

PHIL KEADY

Los Angeles

Dr. Maxwell Lewis Rafferty flew to Los Angeles and called a news conference at a downtown hotel. Facing a roomful of expectant radio, television and newspaper reporters, the California Republican candidate for the United States Senate put it simply: "We candidates have a duty, as the kids say, to cool it."

This was a switch for Rafferty who, since he gained national prominence—or notoriety—has made full use of his considerable flair for personal invective, unhampered by any nagging doubts of his own rectitude. But now, reviving a phrase used by the "old Nixon," Rafferty told the newsmen he detected a deplorable tendency among political candidates to "go for the jugular." By pat coincidence, he singled out for his concern one candidate in particular, Alan Cranston, the 54-year-old liberal Democrat who opposes him for the Senate. Rafferty accused Cranston of contributing to the "brooding climate of violence" and thereby risking the danger of stimulating further assaults on public figures, there being "too many loose nuts running around this country." Rafferty added, almost by reflex, "I could say all kinds of things about my opponent, but I will not." (Laughter.) Apparently, Cranston had contributed to the "brooding climate of violence" by replying to Rafferty's attacks, instead of ignoring them, as Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel had done when battling Rafferty in the Republican primary. It turned out that Kuchel had made a fatal political misjudgment. As an example of the kind of restraint he practices on his opponents, Rafferty later in the campaign charged that Cranston had moved "perilously close to . . . treason" when he urged a halt to the bombing of North Vietnam.

For the past six years, since he was first elected State Superintendent of Public Instruction in California, Rafferty had said "all kinds of things" about personalities and issues; his current popularity, like that of George Wallace, may tell more about the country than it reveals of the man. The stakes in the Senate battle are high. A victory for Rafferty would indicate that, against the backdrop of war abroad, war in our streets and general confusion and rancid conflict, the conservative tide that elected Gov. Ronald Reagan and Sen. George Murphy is still running in California and may not have reached its peak. The national significance of political trends in California is obvious. The state's economy is now so large that some statisticians claim it would rank, if separated from the rest of the United States, fifth among the nations of the world.

Rafferty makes headlines and catches the eye of the television camera with short, staccato bursts of opinion like the following:

On Vietnam: "If the North Vietnamese do not respond [to a seven-day ultimatum on the peace talks] then we should turn [our] objectives over to the military to achieve."

On draft resisters: "Creeps, cowards, Communists." (In World War II, Rafferty appealed his I-A classification twice and finally was rejected for flat feet.)

On foreign aid: "It's not my fault there's starvation in Asia, despite what our one-worlders are saying. There has always been starvation in Asia, largely because the Asians insist upon breeding like rabbits."

On riots: "I would favor declaring martial law immediately in any riot zone and provide for military courts-martial to deal with rioters and looters right on the streets."

On crime and punishment: "I've had it up to here with sob sisters who insist we should be kind to creeps who prey on us or punks who stamp helpless polio victims to death."

On students (at Berkeley): "Who pays the tuition for their four-year course in sex, drugs and treason? I will tell you. You and I do."

Max Rafferty is a political accident, but that may be said of many politicians. Richard Nixon, this generation's most pragmatic practitioner of the art, says a politician's greatest asset is being in the right place at the right time. With no advance warning to the state or notice to him, fate showed Rafferty from relative obscurity as a district school superintendent to administrator of the largest educational system in the nation. Six years later he had knocked out of office the 57-year-old Kuchel, a veteran of fifteen years in Washington, minority whip of the Senate and a man who had never before been defeated in thirty-two years of politics.

Rafferty was born in New Orleans fifty-one years ago and moved with his family to California in 1931. He graduated from Beverly Hills High School at 16, a bright product of the educational system he has so incessantly attacked. He graduated from UCLA with a degree in history and took an M.A. in school administration, but the clue to the future Rafferty can be found in UCLA student politics of thirty years ago. He was an ardent member of a group called UCLA Americans, organized to rid the university of "Communist activities." Stanley Rubin, editor of the college paper, The Daily Bruin, and now a Hollywood movie producer, told David Shaw of the Long Beach Independent Press-Telegram: "I remember he got so angry over an editorial I wrote that he came crashing into the office in his ROTC uniform and boots, looking every bit like a storm trooper. He had two big football players with him, and they said they were going to beat the hell out of me."

After returning to UCLA in 1939 to pick up teaching credentials, Rafferty disappeared into the Mojave Desert, where he began his career as a football coach and English instructor in a small-town high school. While working his way slowly up through the system's bureaucracy, he obtained a doctorate in education from the University of Southern California. In 1952, when Rafferty sought to become principal of a new high school in San Bernardino, he was rejected by the superintendent, who recalls: "I . . . heard stories about how he criticized [football] officials so vehemently that he whipped the crowds into a frenzy, and the officials were so frightened they ran from the field and drove off right after the games without stopping to shower and change clothes." Rafferty's later political opponents know how those officials felt.

In the middle 1950s, Needles, Calif., where it is nearly always too hot to bother about anything, was having a brawl over "progressive education." The town, a Santa Fe Railroad preserve with a solidly unionized working class, rallied behind the "three Rs" and threw out the entire school board; the school superintendent and three principals resigned. Rafferty was brought in as the new superintendent to restore order. He did that and more. One newspaper commented that, after five years of Rafferty, the school children of Needles were getting "one of the best public educations in the state."

Shortly thereafter he was called to La Cañada, a wealthy Los Angeles suburb which had been through a school unification fight with the usual casualties and was looking around for a new superintendent. And there, in the spring of 1961, Rafferty became famous. He had not yet unpacked when the school board president asked him whether he would like to address a public meeting. He would, he did, and became the leader of the right-wing assault on public education in California.

Rafferty delivered "The Passing of the Patriot" seven years ago, but it is still included in his standard campaign kit. One redolent passage from this celebrated declamation reads: "The results [of our system of public education] are plain for all to see: the worst of our youngsters growing up to become booted, side-burned, duck-tailed, unwashed, leather-jacketed slobs whose favorite sport is ravaging little girls and stamping polio victims to death; the best of our youth coming into maturity for all the world like young people fresh from a dizzying roller-coaster ride, with everything blurred, with nothing clear, with no positive standards, with everything in doubt. No wonder so many of them welsh out and squeal and turn traitor when confronted with the grim reality of Red military force and the crafty cunning of Red psychological warfare."

Referring thus to the behavior of some captured American soldiers during the Korean War, Rafferty did not mention that their average level of education was ninth grade and did not remind his middle-class audience that its sons had been sheltered from the draft. Such omissions mattered not at all to the legions of the Right, disgruntled by recent setbacks at the polls. They whooped it up for the superintendent, and soon he was booked into every right-wing rally in the state.

Rafferty's sudden acclaim could not have happened at a time more propitious for him. Dr. Roy E. Simpson, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, was retiring in 1962, and the ultraconservatives knew opportunity when they saw it. Easily persuaded to become their candidate, Rafferty won the nonpartisan office by out-talking a UCLA professor of speech, Ralph Richardson. "He clubbed me to death with the progressive education issue," Dr. Richardson says, "even though progressive education had not been used in California in ten years." After his election by 200,000 votes, while Richard Nixon was losing to Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Rafferty consolidated his hold on public attention with nonstop oratory. His themes were the war, uprisings in the ghettos, student riots, pornography and narcotics, often bundled into one inspirational package.

Glum predictions to the contrary, Rafferty has not been a disaster for education in California; indeed, he has not had much effect on it. Even if he had been utterly convinced by his own rhetoric—which, given his intelligence, is not likely—he would have found it difficult to accomplish radical change. The Superintendent of Public Instruction in California, while an elected official, is the administrative officer of the Board of Education, appointed by the governor; his power is limited. And in Rafferty's case, nine of the ten board members had endorsed his opponents in 1962. (Since 1966, Governor Reagan has appointed six new members who are more closely akin to Rafferty's philosophy.)

Of the twenty-seven changes Rafferty advocated in 1962 for California education, nineteen, he says, have been adopted—a phenomenal record. But a closer reading suggests, as one observer put it, that most of the reforms are "sweetly scented with anti-climax." They range from "an end to progressive education as the official philosophy of the State Department of Education" to "production by the State Department of Education of recommended lists of children's classics to be sent to all elementary and junior high schools." Among others: "Adoption of music textbooks containing such patriotic songs as Columbia the Gem of the Ocean, You're a Grand Old Flag, and Yankee Doodle Boy." These are listed under the category, "Education in Depth—a California Revolution." Some of the reforms have more substance. Rafferty shifted control of teacher training from the school of education in each state college to the Liberal Arts and Science Departments. In teacher training, he placed more emphasis on subject matter and less on methodology. He obtained extension of free public education to the mentally retarded and sponsored compensatory education for dropouts, and he has consistently pressed for more state aid for local schools and a consolidation of school districts to cut costs and increase efficiency.

These moves hint that the new superintendent had something of the "sound educational philosophy" credited to him by one critic, who went on to say that Rafferty, unfortunately, overlays this philosophy "with Philistine attitudes and ideological views that are irrelevant to the battle for basic education." But Rafferty's "Philistine attitudes and ideological views" were not irrelevant to his career. Once settled in office, he troubled himself far less with problems of education than with national and international affairs. Exceptions were emotion-packed, news-making episodes like the row stirred up by The Dictionary of American Slang, a volume comprehensive enough to include most of the more uninhibited sexual expressions. This book found its way into school libraries, and Rafferty denounced it as "a practicing handbook of sexual perversion." He condemned the Supreme Court for its decision on prayers in public schools and is currently attacking the appointment of Eldridge Cleaver as a guest lecturer in a special course on racism at the University of California at Berkeley.

There is no evidence that Rafferty cared very deeply about such issues, but they were useful to him as political steps to higher office. When he announced for the Senate—appropriately on Washington's Birthday—some Californians may have been surprised, but the record should have prepared them. And the time was ripe.

In the spring of 1968, Senator Kuchel, an easy-going moderate of 57 and a product of the Earl Warren era of tranquillity in California, was vulnerable. Kuchel when other politicians were discreetly silent, had earned the enmity of the hard-core Right by denouncing the John Birch Society for its attacks on Chief Justice Warren, who had appointed him to the Senate in 1953. The Senator slammed the point home by refusing to support Barry Goldwater, Sen. George Murphy and later Governor Reagan when they declined to repudiate the society.

Governor Reagan's pulsating dislike of Senator Kuchel whom he tagged by inference during the Goldwater campaign as one of the "traitors" to the Republican Party, was well known. But as Reagan's staff began to persuade him that he had a chance for the GOP Presidential nomination the Governor began to think more of party unity and less of ideology. Trying to prevent a Right-liberal split in the California Republicans, Reagan reached a gentlemen's agreement with Kuchel; the Senator would go along with Reagan's ambitions and Reagan would remain neutral in the primary. Reagan kept his end of the deal, rather effectively, it appears, blocking financial support for Rafferty from the wealthiest of the conservatives who had financed his own victory over Brown. That turned out not to matter very much. Rafferty's campaign manager, Dick Darling, reported that $950,000 rolled into the primary campaign from 73,000 individual contributors. Rafferty spent $135,000 more in the primaries and plans to spend $1.5 to $2 million—if he can raise it—against Cranston. In October, money, unexpectedly, became a problem. It was reported that big GOP contributors, watching Rafferty sag in the post-primary opinion polls, were not returning his telephone calls with much zest.

Rafferty's unctuous oratory may offend the sensibilities of moderates, but he can stir up the faithful to a pitch of fervor. After one of his window-rattling jousts against vice, crime and the Supreme Court, a young Republican lawyer wryly observed, "He came on a little strong, didn't he?" A sweet-faced, middle-aged woman who had been listening with palpating attention turned on the lawyer: "He's a great man, a fine man, an honest man who tells the truth." The lawyer, embarrassed by her insistence, nodded agreeably, but she would not be put aside. "Do you know," she asked him, "what's happening in our schools? They put on plays there, with Negro and white children kissing each other."

Rafferty is adept at playing on the fears of such people, but he was not elected and re-elected superintendent of schools solely by bigots, nor did he win over Senator Kuchel with the aid only of the embattled Right. He got heavy support from the middle class and cut deeply into blue-collar areas that have been traditionally Democratic. The concerns that motivate the supporters of Rafferty, Reagan and Nixon are the basic concerns of everybody: the inconclusive war in Vietnam, riots in the ghettos, the revolution among the young, spiraling crime, big government, big taxes, big spending—and circling over all this the terrifying pace of change that threatens established institutions and inherited values.

"Something has gone wrong with this country," says Dick Darling, a bedrock conservative. "There is a breakdown in morality, a lowering of all standards. Loyalty to family, friends and country no longer count for anything. The pendulum has swung too far toward the welfare state. This irritates the average citizen." But Darling, an affable real estate man from Riverside, claims some sympathy for the New Left rebellion against "the system." The New Left, as he sees it, is currently making the mistake that the Goldwater conservatives made four years ago: "Four years ago we were too extreme. We would argue, but we would not reason. The same people who worked for Goldwater worked for Reagan, but they were tempered by their Goldwater experience." Darling's sympathy for the New Left, held carefully within bounds, may stem from a Left-Right common hatred of the "liberal establishment." (As Cranston gathered strength, Rafferty dropped Darling, called Reagan for help, and Reagan sent in a rescue squad of his top aides.)

Darling's average citizen, whoever he is, may be only irritated, but a strong current of fear, frustration and hatred is coursing through the country. These emotions surface more readily on the Left and the Right, but it is apparent that the great majority of the voters—Richard Scammon's "unpoor, the unyoung, and the unblack"—also are beginning to respond. The right-wing appeal in traditional working-class districts has been evident for several years. In an area of southeastern Los Angeles County with a 63 per cent Democratic registration advantage, Governor Reagan beat Governor Brown by nearly 2 to 1 two years ago, and George Wallace is strong there. The residents of the area, 94 per cent white, and heavily unionized, voted 5 to 1 to repeal California's open housing act. The district borders on the heavily Negro neighborhoods of south-central Los Angeles.

In some respects, the blue-collar class—workers getting

Conrad, Los Angeles Times

"Watch Out for His Mud-Ball!"

$6,000 to $10,000 a year—are as alienated as the ideological Left and Right. The causes are not hard to discover. A professional campaign manager in Los Angeles, mapping an appeal to traditional working-class Democrats, found workers "fed up" with higher taxes, inflation, the war and fear of "encroaching Negroes and violence." As he said, "taxes hit them harder than anyone else, more of their sons go to war, and integration makes heavier psychological demands on them than on the better educated. Most of them can't afford to send their kids to college, and yet every night on television they see the middle-class kids rioting on the campus and chanting 'Ho Chi Minh.'"

In appealing to the discontented, whatever the origin of their anger, Max Rafferty stirs up fear with one hand and ladles out flattery with the other.

"I'm here to say a good word for the United States of America," he began in typical fashion recently to a receptive dinner audience of young businessmen and their wives. The phrases fell neatly into place: "We are accused of the terrible crime of being American." On the war: "Don't blame our government for the suffering in the villages of Vietnam. We are there only because they begged us to come." On racial outbreaks: "Don't blame me. I'm not a sniper, a looter or a burner." On poverty: "I did not cause it. You did not cause it." On the Supreme Court: "Social reformers, political hacks, child-marrying mountain-climbers." The innocents of the world, it seems are the comfortable middle classes.

A man less talented than Rafferty would have had difficulty converting mild Senator Kuchel into a great "sick '60s" symbol of pornography, dope, violence and lawlessness, but Rafferty accomplished it in this way: "Washington . . . is a place for a man who believes unhesitatingly in morality, in love of country, obedience to the Constitution and our laws. . . . I leave you to decide whether my opponent is this kind of Senator—whether he has ever been this kind of Senator." And further, "I cannot tell you why my opponent hasn't led a Senatorial campaign against dope; I can only tell you that I will."

This was overkill, and while Rafferty defeated Kuchel, his margin was only 69,000 in a vote of more than 2 million. Alan Cranston hopes to pick up a large slice of the nearly million votes that Kuchel received, and the polls show that he may. Former Governor Brown predicts: "Many Republicans are so mad at Rafferty for what he did to Kuchel that they will vote for Cranston."

Cranston is assiduously cultivating the anti-Rafferty reaction among Kuchel supporters and the results are beginning to show. "Max Rafferty, you're guilty of another big smear." Attached to this statement, which appeared in boxcar-size type in newspaper advertisements throughout California, was the name of Mrs. Lee Sherry, who is no partisan Democrat. She was formerly vice chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, director of the California Federation of Republican Women, and served as Women's Co-Chairman for Sen. George Murphy when he defeated Pierre Salinger. "I couldn't vote for you, Max," Mrs. Sherry continued in a chatty, conversational tone, "or for any other politician, Republican or Democrat, who has so little regard for the truth." What upset Mrs. Sherry was Rafferty's delightful invention that Kuchel had voted to give U.S. financial aid to China to build steel mills. Sanford Weiner, a professional campaign director who before has always handled Republican campaigns, is now working for Cranston. Weiner explains, "Rafferty's election would destroy any chance to elect a moderate Republican in California for years."

Cranston, a moderate much like Kuchel, was a founder of the liberal California Democratic Council fifteen years ago. In later years, as an influential Democrat and twice-elected state controller, he has pulled back from some CDC positions, and is not on the roster of its current heroes. Two years ago, Cranston collaborated with Governor Brown to force Simon Casady out as CDC president, although both had supported him for the post. Casady was guilty of prematurely opposing the war in Vietnam, and his taunting attacks on President Johnson became an embarrassment to the party in an election year.

Cranston's credentials predate the CDC by many years. As a foreign correspondent in Germany, he early recognized the significance of the rise of Hitler. He compared the German-language edition of Mein Kampf with the watered-down propaganda version distributed in the United States, and on returning from Europe in 1939 edited a new version that followed the original text. The book sold half a million copies in two weeks, after which the courts stopped the sale by ruling that Cranston had infringed the copyright.

During World War II, Cranston became chief of the foreign language division of the Office of War Information, later resigning to enter the Army. After the war, he wrote The Killing of the Peace, a history of Wilson's struggle for the League of Nations. The New York Times called the book one of the ten best of the year. Before returning to California to enter politics, Cranston held two important nongovernment posts in Washington. He headed the Common Council for American Unity, organized to reform immigration and naturalization laws, and was president of United World Federalists.

Cranston suffers from some of the same disadvantages that plagued Kuchel. A political sophisticate, tall, bald and a little glum looking on television, he has difficulty competing for public attention against a bouncy, graying Rafferty with the hearty good looks of an Irish cop. Cranston advocates an immediate bombing halt in Vietnam and urges de-escalation of the war, but maintains that the United States "can't cut and run out of Vietnam." He is for law enforcement combined with "tangible help" for the ghettos. These propositions are not easy to match against Rafferty's simplistic decisiveness, but Cranston after watching Kuchel go down, decided nevertheless that he had to carry the fight to Rafferty. Cranston is effectively pushing this theme throughout California: "My opponent says the answer to violence abroad and violence at home is more violence. He advocates revenge and retribution. I advocate reason and reconciliation."

Three Southern California counties—Los Angeles, with 40 per cent of the state's population, Orange and San Diego—are where the action is. In beating Nelson Rockefeller in the 1964 California primary, Barry Goldwater lost forty-four of the state's fifty-eight counties, but piled up a plurality of 134,000 votes in Los Angeles, Orange and San Diego Counties to carry California by 68,000. The Rafferty-Kuchel outcome was markedly similar. Rafferty lost forty-three counties to Kuchel, but amassed a lead of 218,000 votes in Los Angeles, Orange and San Diego to win state-wide by 69,000. Goldwater went on to disaster and Cranston's backers hope that Rafferty will meet a similar fate. They have history on their side, if history counts for anything this year. In California politics, the winner of a divisive primary struggle loses in November.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Herzen: His Despair and Ours

MY PAST AND THOUGHTS: The Memoirs of Alexander Herzen. Translated by Constance Garnett. Revised by Humphrey Higgs. With an introduction by Isaiah Berlin. Alfred A. Knopf, 4 vol. boxed set. 1908 pp. $30.

JOHN BERGER

Mr. Berger is a regular contributor to New Society (London). His Art and Revolution, a new work on the role of the artist in the USSR, will be published by Pantheon this month.

"Many times in moments of weakness and despair, when the cup of bitterness was too full, when my whole life seemed to me nothing but one prolonged blunder, when I doubted myself, of 'the last thing, all that is left,' those words came into my head; 'Why did I not take the gun from the workman and stay at the barricades?' Struck down by a sudden bullet, I should have borne two or three bullets with me to the grave."

Alexander Herzen died almost a century ago. He was 58. Most of what we read of his was written during the preceding two decades. This brings us straight away to the crux of the matter. On one hand why does Herzen seem so peculiarly modern? And on the other how do we (or at least some of us) differ from him because we belong to the middle of our own century? If we cannot answer these questions and come to terms with what lies behind them, we should logically accept the despair which overtook Herzen and helped to kill him.

Many readers must have been introduced to Herzen through E. H. Carr's book, The Romantic Exiles (Beacon). It tells the very readable story of the private lives in exile of Herzen, his lifelong friend Ogarev, and Bakunin; it tells it accurately and sympathetically. But despite my respect for Carr's later works as a historian, this early book seems to me to falsify by being overurbane. It presents the three men and the women with whom they were in love as though they were self-evidently foreign: as though there were an inevitable distinction between their unbalance and our balance. We are shown them as through a sheet of aquarium glass.

Herzen's Memoirs were originally translated by Constance Garnett in the 1920s. The four volumes now issued consist of a revised and augmented version of this translation. Considering the price of the set, what is offered looks mean. There are no illustrations (to find and improvise images to accompany Herzen's text would be a marvelous commission for a graphics artist). The notes at the end of each volume are taken piecemeal from the Soviet edition of the Complete Works. Isaiah Berlin's introduction fails to situate Herzen in anything but an academic syllabus. But the impact of the memoirs themselves makes the rest seem unimportant. Their proper representation would be in illustrated paperback.

A brief outline of Herzen's life may be useful here. He was the illegitimate son of a rich Moscow aristocrat. His father acknowledged him and later left him his very considerable fortune. But his childhood was bleak. The first volume opens with his nurse telling him about Moscow burning in 1812, the year of his own birth: a description very similar to Tolstoy's in War and Peace. (There are certain resemblances in character and circumstances between Herzen and Pierre Bezukhov.)

He was 14 when the plot of the Decembrists was uncovered. He was present at the religious service in the Kremlin which commemorated the execution of the five leaders. And he swore then that to avenge these five he would devote his whole life to fighting "the throne, the altar and the cannon."

At Moscow University he and his friend Ogarev were among the most outspoken critics of the regime in the name of a kind of Saint Simonist socialism. In 1834 he was arrested for these opinions (he was never involved in any actual conspiracy), and after nine months in prison he was exiled to Vyatka.

Through the influence of his father he obtained in 1838 a government post in St. Petersburg. But an indiscreet sentence about the police in a letter which was opened by the censor cost him another year of exile in Novgorod. After the death of his father in 1846 he left Russia for Paris and never returned. Living in Nice, Paris, Geneva, London, he became the friend and supporter of Mazzini, Bakunin, Orsini, Proudhon, Garibaldi, Kossuth, Louis Blanc and many other well-known and lesser-known revolutionary patriots. He offered them intelligent—even if increasingly skeptical—friendship, money, and the good offices of his occasional influence in certain official quarters.

For ten years from 1857 Herzen and Ogarev edited The Bell, a monthly magazine which, printed in the Russian language in London (later Geneva) and distributed half secretly and half openly in Russia, became the first effective instrument of revolutionary propaganda directed against the Russian autocracy. The first four years of its life were the most important. In 1861 Alexander II met one of its principal demands—the freeing of the serfs. In the same year Herzen wrote passionately in support of an anti-Russian Polish uprising. The Bell ceased to be a unifying focal point. The young Left found it merely liberal; the Center condemned it as unpatriotic.

Herzen died in Paris, disillusioned, worn out, lonely, fourteen months before the Paris Commune was proclaimed.

The easiest charge to bring against him is that he was a dilettante. But this depends on the role you wish to accord him. He was neither a political leader, nor a revolutionary activist, nor a political philosopher, and least of all a fighter obeying orders. Men in each of these categories trusted him and were grateful to him. But he was not of them. He himself only half realized what his true role was. It was to pay homage to, to exemplify, and to record the spirit of the year 1848 and its aftermath. "Our historical vocation, our work, consists in this: that by our disillusionment, by our sufferings, we reach the resignation and humility in face of the truth, and spare following generations from these afflictions."

Throughout the four volumes, which begin with his childhood and often refer to the late 1860s when he was still writing them, one feels the fatal gravitational pull of the year 1848. Toward it, all aspirations lead: from it, all disappointments arise.

One feels this all the more strongly because of a strange personal coincidence. The year 1848, besides being the year of revolution and its defeat, was the year in which Herzen's hitherto romantic and idealized marriage began to be destroyed, and the agony of its destruction continued through the four years of France's mounting political corruption and confusion. Finally Herzen's young wife, as a consequence of her sufferings during those years, died on May 2, 1852, the very Sunday of the guaranteed election, whose coming and whose democratic threat so haunted Napoleon III that he had to forestall them with his coup d'état of December 2, 1851.

Herzen never recovered from the tragedy of his marriage. It turned him, at the age of 40, into a kind of elderly stoic: skeptical, limited in ambition, consoled to some degree by the memories of his youth, capable of appreciating the energy of others, but incapable of fully committing himself, withdrawn.

The Memoirs are brilliantly discursive and in a characteristically Russian manner continually move between the personal and the public, the historical and the introspective. And so what they offer is an extraordinarily contradictory, deeply cut but homogenous cross section through a life lived and history observed. The writer's nostalgia for the purity of his youthful aspirations gives a contrary dimension to the bloated revival of the Napoleonic legend; his skepticism illumines in the same negative way the profound vulgarity of the Second Empire; his aloofness throws into relief the new "democracy" of commerce; his aristocratic assumptions reveal the measure of the French bourgeois triumph. And all the while he mixes with men who persist with different visions of liberation and revolutionary change.

Herzen and Marx were mutually disagreeable about each other. Yet it is hard to imagine a work more complementary to Marx's Eighteenth Brumaire than Herzen's Memoirs. The memoirs encompass the experience—or a very great part of it—which Marx's great model essay explains.

However, to return now to the original question, why do the Memoirs strike us as peculiarly modern? First, because no Socialist revolution since 1848 has yet succeeded in a highly industrialized capitalist society. Political events often still follow the same pattern. For example, the manner in which during the recent crisis de Gaulle was able to maneuver and level the electorate and the constitution was remarkably similar to Louis Napoleon's. Furthermore, there are many prophetic pages in Herzen about what he calls "the great trade routes" of consumer societies. Second, because Herzen's style—perhaps because he was an exile writing for friends—is remarkably free of 19th-century public rhetoric; in this respect, if in no other, he somewhat resembles Stendahl. Third, because his attitude toward authority and therefore toward most social situations is profoundly unbourgeois; the temper of his reactions is libertarian in the broadest sense of the term—his sympathies are not with those who maintain order but with those who recognize the arbitrariness of that order.

Insofar as they can be demonstrated in a single passage, these characteristics are evident in the following:

"This time he led me into a big office. There a tall, stout, rosy-cheeked gentleman was sitting in a big easy-chair at a huge table. He was one of those persons who are always hot, with white flesh, fat but flabby, plump, carefully tended hands, a necktie reduced to a minimum, colourless eyes and the jovial expression which is usually found in men who are completely immersed in love for their own wellbeing, and who can have resource, coldly and without great effort, to extraordinary infamies.

"You wished to see the prefect," he said to me; "but he asks you to excuse him; he has been obliged to go out on very important business. If I can do anything in any way for your pleasure I ask nothing better. Here is an easy-chair: will you sit down?"

"All this he brought out smoothly, very politely, screwing up his eyes a little and smiling with the little cushions of flesh which adorned his cheekbones. 'Well, this fellow has been in the service for a long time,' I thought.

"You surely know what I've come about.' He made that gentle movement of the head which everyone makes on beginning to swim, and did not answer.

"I have received an order to leave within three days. Since I know that your minister has the right of expulsion without giving a reason or holding an inquiry, I am not going to inquire why I am being expelled. . . ."

Yet, why, finally, does Herzen, belong to a different historical period? How are we able to avoid sharing his despair?

To answer this fully one would have to treat of numerous world-historical developments. But there is an answer in microcosm. Compare the quotations from Herzen with this typical one from the Eighteenth Brumaire of Louis Bonaparte:

"Finally, the culminating point of the 'idées Napoléoniennes' is the preponderance of the army. The army was the point d'honneur of the peasants, it was they themselves transformed into heroes, defending their new possessions against the outer world, glorifying their recently won nationality, plundering and revolutionizing the world. The uniform was their own state dress; war was their poetry; the smallholding, extended and rounded off in imagination, was their fatherland, and patriotism the ideal form of the property sense."

The substance of what Marx is saying here, although brilliant, is beside our purpose, but not the manner of seeing and thinking. Every articulation of the thought involves a connection between opposites. Simply to call this dialectical may be to miss the point. The words do not accumulate to confirm one another; each articulation supersedes the preceding one, lending it a temporarily new orientation. One might argue that this is in the nature of writing itself, in life one begins at the beginning; in literature one begins at the end. But in Marx's mode of thinking the degree to which each superseding phase of the thought modifies the orientation of the preceding phase is new, because it plays upon a new notion of discontinuity. The model is no longer an edifice constructed stone by stone or phase by phase, but a pivotal balance like that of a pair of scales or a seesaw. The total of the phases no longer covers an extensive area, but instead defines a single point occupying no

The leaders—Cohn-Bendit and the others—speak out on The French Student Revolt

In the first book on the subject, Daniel Cohn-Bendit, Jean-Pierre Duteuil, Alain Geismar, and Jacques Sauvageot explain why, and how, the revolt spread so rapidly—and almost engulfed all of France in a social revolution. With a Foreword by Hervé Bourges, and an interview between Cohn-Bendit and Jean-Paul Sartre. $3.95; paper $1.50 space at all. From paragraph to paragraph one proceeds by leaps from point to point.

HILL & WANG
141 Fifth Ave., New York 10010

Many Marxists and anti-Marxists have been so eager to prove or disprove the letter of Marx's prophecies that they have ignored one of the ways in which he was most profoundly and incontrovertibly prophetic. The mode of discontinuity demonstrated by Marx's thinking has now become an essential part of the modern means of communication. Discontinuity is now intrinsic to our view of reality.

For Herzen, continuity was the condition of civilization. This continuity is implicit in his manner of relating and writing. Each phase confirms the next. He is never aware of the force of what is not being said (which is perhaps a test for judging truly modern writers). A serious break in continuity means for him chaos, disintegration, barbarism. He sees revolution as the culminating point of long cherished ideals and aspirations. He underestimates the revolutionary element of explosive desperation. And this is because he is blind to the gaping discontinuities within society, within the world. He is fully aware of the terrible inequalities which exist, but he does not see that they are such that, as between classes, as between the privileged and the exploited, everything changes its entire value and meaning. Finally he despairs at the recalcitrance of a monolithic mankind.

This is not to suggest that political despair can no longer exist. At times it may be even more total, but it will be less final. Today such despair borders on the revolutionary recognition that continuity in the world, as it is, is impossible and intolerable.

Self-Destruction Directives

THE SUICIDE ACADEMY. By Daniel Stern. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 173 pp. $5.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL

Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

Traditional generic distinctions in the novel have broken down. The Sot-Weed Factor is a historical romance which debunks both history and romance by combining an 18th-century narrative style with a modern, black-humored vision. Catch-22 turns the war novel away from battle cries toward farce. Lolita adapts the sex novel to philosophical speculations on the perception of reality. The development of hybrid forms allows writers to push beyond the restrictions of realism, to make actions vastly symbolic, characters allegorical, institutions microcosmic. There is no arguing the success of Barth, Heller and Nabokov. But problems develop when writers push too hard, leap to abstract significance before they have convincingly delineated the particular terms in which their characters exist.

For his sixth novel, The Suicide Academy, Daniel Stern has formed a hybrid; as the dust jacket says, it is "part spy story, part existential parable." It also combines realism and allegory, plays one against the other, in a novel which asserts itself by pretending it is not what it is. In an important way, the novel is circular, about itself, its own excuse for being.

Stern's central character, Wolf Walker, seems a plausible human being. As director of The Suicide Academy he is a petty bureaucrat—somewhere between a Bartleby and a Joseph K.—shuffling his papers in a world whose contours gradually bend into loony shapes, whacked-out. The academy is an institution which provides those interested in suicide with one day of reflection and indoctrination on the advantages and disadvantages of self-destruction so that they can make an informed judgment: a service organization. Wolf's anti-Semitic Negro assistant, Gilliatt, continually brings formal charges against Wolf, who is Jewish, for secretly favoring life over death when, as director, he should be neutral. Wolf has impregnated a co-worker who toys with suicide plans. He also successfully drives suicide out of the mind of his beautiful ex-wife, Jewel. Thus, it seems, Gilliatt is right—Wolf favors life; larger still, Jews stand for renewal and rebirth. As Wolf puts it in a moment of exuberance, "I am the Burning Bush. Even while I'm burned by the fires around me I speak, and I refuse to be destroyed." Thus Stern's character becomes an allegorical, representative figure; other characters stand for the Negro, Beauty, Relativity, Sympathy, and so on.

The leap from realism to allegory is often sudden, not always convincing. In one scene Gilliatt argues with Max, Jewel's new husband, over the nature of the Jew. Realistic dialogue recedes into philosophizing. Suddenly, while they argue, they start throwing snowballs at each other. "It was a mad scene—a white slapstick of spraying snow and muttered philosophical curses." But, in fact, the two levels do not complement each other. The argument had been too stiffly formurecommends:

Robert C. Weaver* Secretary Department of Housing and Urban Development

RELOCATION

In Urban Planning:
From Obstacle to Opportunity
By Paul L. Niebanck

"This study is a real contribution to the whole field of urban planning, for relocation is the keystone to effective redevelopment of the urban scene. Both planners and citizen workers will benefit from the findings and recommendations set forth in this book."*

RELOCATION

describes the plight of the elderly who are subject to displacement in our cities and makes practical suggestions for alleviating their problems by means of the Model Cities Program.

RELOCATION In Urban Planning: From Obstacle to Opportunity

By Paul L. Niebanck
New

$4.95

University of Pennsylvania
Press Philadelphia 19104

lated to sound convincingly human; the snowball fight is too sketchily described to serve as a plausible analogue, to pin down the gas. By mixing modes Stern would have it both ways, but often his realism and allegory work to diminish each other.

Stern writes beautiful prose, indeed rhetoric is the strongest side of his novel. He can delicately evoke abstract states, in the manner of Fitzgerald. He includes Pinter-like dialogue exchanges. He echoes Bellow with chopped, punchy sentence fragments and lengthy appositives. But his best style is his own, a witty, balanced manner of statement which turns back on itself, inverts and reverses assertions until they mount in intricate paradox, a verbal house of cards on which one would not dare breathe.

I met Jewel when I played Petruccio to her Katharina. I was tamed at once. How could I have known the desperate lack of form that lay within that beautiful form? I, the supreme artist of choice, fell instantly in love with a beautiful Jewel absolutely incapable of choosing.

Style is perfectly suited to vision; balanced paradox is the novel's theme as well as method. Wolf directs the academy, an institution which insists that only endings are important; Jewel carried a baby in her womb for fourteen months, implicitly insisting that only beginnings matter. Max writes poetry to express his feeling that he has died and been reborn to the realization of "the insane/ Divine equalness/ of everything," while Wolf writes prose—narrates this novel—which insists on man's choice. So it goes. Characters are reflectors for other characters. Plot circumstances are annotated in analogues. Everything balances, as on a master's chessboard. Design is vision.

Stern seems most concerned with the way of erecting a plausible, realistic allegory, not with drawing conclusions. He tries to do this by denying any allegorical dimension. As Wolf says:

But this is no allegorical crap about how the Suicide Academy is really a microcosm. Don't let them kid you. It's just a place where people come when they want out of everything for good.

But, of course, in the denial is the assertion. The academy is Modern Society, isolated and particularized, Stern accompanies its description with his own methodological justifications. He has Wolf say that the academy exists, like metaphor or any form of parody, "so that which we cannot actually experience may still be somehow lived." To accept the academy is to validate the novel. The novel, therefore, becomes its own subject, and contains its own rationalizations for being.

Perhaps as a result of his methodological concerns, Stern's vision is balanced, inconclusive. We are left with poised paradox, Wolf's humanism recedes; we last see him listening to the unintelligible words of an ominous woman, "poised before revelation," a revelation which we are sure will never come. The point seems to be that revelation and resolution are illusory in the novel and in life. Balance is all, conclusion is illusion. If this reading of Stern's novel is correct, then it seems unfortunate that so talented a writer would place himself at the disadvantage of allowing his concerns with form to dictate his theme, rather than—like Barth, Heller and Nabokov—to devise new modes to capture new themes.

Letter from Berlin

ALEXANDER GROSS

Mr. Gross, a playwright and play translator, has been living in Berlin for the past two years on a grant from the Ford Foundation's Artist in Residence program.

With each new report of events in Czechoslovakia, the citizens of West Berlin have been digging themselves in more deeply for their own crisis. It is something they were looking forward to during most of the summer, and they will probably be unhappy if it fails to materialize. For many months, amounting now to years, the Springer press, which enjoys an almost complete monopoly in West Berlin, has seized on every passing rumor to predict the worst—as though Berliners desperately need continued crises to create any sense of civic identity for themselves. Given the city's history since the war, this is partly understandable, and there is also little sign that the East German panic, which contributed to the events in Czechoslovakia, has fully exhausted itself. A recent buzzing incident in the air corridor has done nothing to quiet nerves, nor have the sonic booms created by Russian fighters over the city (they increased considerably during the height of the Czech crisis) helped to improve local tranquility.

But the real Berlin crisis, if it should actually come, will spring as much from within as without—it will no longer be possible to blame it entirely on the East Germans, the Russians or the wall. The West Berliners are responsible for their own state of mind and, whatever may be the true situation militarily or with regard to the three Western protecting powers, they are psychologically in rather poor condition. West Berlin, that great citadel of the free world, that bastion of democracy, is no longer what it once was.

The neon lights may glow as brilliantly as ever on the Kurfürstendamm, but they seem to go off earlier and earlier with each passing year. With the building of the wall, West Berlin's role as a model of free enterprise, capitalism's own Cuba in Eastern Europe, has lost much of its reason for being. So, it would seem, have its inhabitants—the city's celebrated ironic humor has not lost its bite but there is now so much to be ironic about that it often fails to register.

West Berlin can now claim a few statistics not likely to be envied by other communities. It has perhaps the oldest population of any modern city and sexually the least favorable—one out of three West Berliners is a woman over 45. She usually looks her age, and the tourist riding the U-Bahn often feels he is surrounded by an invincible new German army entirely composed of plump, scowling, cloche-hatted senior citizens clutching their umbrellas. Even more striking, the city now enjoys that distinction many observers had erroneously attributed to Sweden: according to World Health Organization statistics for 1964, West Berlin had the highest suicide rate in the world—scoring 41.7 per 100,000 of population—and almost twice as high as Austria, the runner-up for that year. Most of these suicides are among the aged, who have been reduced to living on meager pensions and blasted dreams. A particularly pathetic example last spring involved a pair of 73-year-old twin sisters, who hung themselves in their tenement flat.

At a time when the Bonn government is pouring subsidies into Berlin, the young and talented continue to pour out into West Germany. Few companies will send their best men to Berlin, and new industry thinks several times before settling there. Berlin is simply not a real city; it lacks real suburbs and a surrounding countryside (these are now part of East Germany) to make its economy turn. Even more humiliating, its problems are multiplying while East Germany and its portion of Berlin are beginning to make significant economic progress. Perhaps the most meaningful sign is that the right-wing editors of the neo-Nazi weekly National-Zeitung and the left-wing theorists among the students both agree that the West has lost Berlin, that it is only a matter of time before the city must merge with the East German countryside. It is difficult to

Richard J. Daley

LOAN EXHIBITION
OCT. 23-NOV. 23

Lee Bontecou
George Cohen
Helen Frankenthaler
Red Grooms
Ray Johnson
Nicholas Krushenick
Roy Lichtenstein
Barnett Newman
Robert Rauschenberg
Seymour Rosofsky
Richard Smith
Theodoros Stamos
Tom Wesselmann

Enrique Castro-Cid
William Copley
Leon Golub
Charles Hinman
Allen Jones
Gerald Laing
Richard Lindner
Claes Oldenburg
Larry Rivers
Peter Saul
Tony Smith
Frank Stella
John Willenbecker

Christo
Sam Francis
Adolph Gottlieb
Robert Indiana
Philip King
Stanley Landsman
Robert Motherwell
Irving Petlin
James Rosenquist
Aaron Siskind
Harry Saviak
Jack Twarkov
Derrick Woodham

list incomplete

RICHARD FEIGEN GALLERY
226 EAST ONTARIO STREET
CHICAGO, ILLINOIS

disagree with them; no matter what subsidies are provided, only an unforeseeable change of heart or politics in both German governments is likely to alter present trends.

Given these problems, it is not surprising that West Berliners have been casting around for a scapegoat and even less surprising that they have found one in the young. It is dangerous being a scapegoat in Germany. The generation war, now in full swing everywhere, is fought in West Berlin with a ferocity that must be seen to be believed. On the streets and in buses old people often upbraid and even lay hands on students or people who look like students. This can happen even if the students do not appear particularly beat or hippy. In some cases the young may provide the provocation, but the old have proved incredibly easy to provoke.

If there is any courage left in Berlin, it is to be found among these new young Germans, although it is a courage unlikely to reassure cold-war strategists in Bonn or Washington. The students do not give a damn about the Berlin question as it was understood in the years after the blockade and before the wall. The shooting of Rudi Dutschke has hardened them in attitudes which were scarcely soft to begin with; they are convinced that their parents are either Nazis or hypocrites (or both), and are merely waiting for a pretext to put the new emergency laws into force and their children into prison. How realistic these fears may be remains to be proved. [See "Heil Ho! The Frankfurt Fair" by André Schiffrin, The Nation, October 14.]

Some student leaders predict a new upsurge of violence in the autumn, particularly if events in France go that way also. Attempts are being made to organize high school students to come to the aid of their university brothers, and some speak openly of the need for a student militia, however reminiscent of the Hitlerjugend this may sound. But other leaders are doing their best to prevent such developments; whatever happens

THE HAND IS QUICKER THAN THE EYE—OR NOSE

*The most recent attraction at the Smithsonian Institute,
In addition to elephants looking alive enough to shoot,*

*Statues ready to walk, planes to fly, cars to run,
Skeletons to clatter into life, and everything else under the sun*

*That makes that dead world seem alive and verbal
And matches the living world to the last detail,*

*Is the added sense of smell to those of touch and sight.
The odors are blended just right, so even the blight*

*On the partly decayed grapes (modeled molded in plastic and wax)
Give off a slightly rotten scent; the spinning wheel roped with flax*

*Smells Early American; the expertly twisted jungle undergrowth
From Africa has its own native perfume, even though Pygmies seem loath*

*To sniff it, standing with small brown hips thrown out
And bosoms bare in its very midst—without a doubt*

*They are at home in their cardboard huts without it.
But visitors find the sense of place more appropriate, more fit,*

*When they can trust their noses in addition to their hands and eyes
About the places that they choose to visit, or surmise*

They have already been, or were indeed, before. It is Reported that an elderly gentleman recalled the truth of his

*Youth by the smell of the country store. He confirmed
The scent of chocolate for the experts. By now they've learned*

*To adjust the apparatus just so, and proper amounts
Of each odor are released, on cue, from hidden fountains.*

Into the different rooms at intervals. The directors invite You to test your sense of what is true against the polite

*Synthetic smells of their creations. The only suggestion
They make is that you leave at home all powers of imagination.*

WILLIAM VIRGIL DAVIS

in France, it is evident that the German students will enjoy almost no support from the working class. This means that any violent encounter will probably end in a bloody defeat for the students—the police, many of whom are ex-storm troopers, are brutal enough, but the real danger could come from ordinary citizens out to defend their Ordnung. This is even more likely to happen in West Berlin than elsewhere; another reason for hoping that no external crisis is imposed on the internal one.

Many observers have sought to find a parallel between Germany now and Germany in the thirties. The comparison is tempting, and a few supposedly liberal English sources have gone so far as to label the students "Red Nazis" and to praise their parents, who were in fact the Nazi generation, as upholders of law and order. It is certain that the young, even at their most liberal, still think and talk like Germans: democratic procedure is rarely observed at SDS meetings (the initials here standing for Sozialistischer Deutscher Studentenbund), and appeals are more often made to esprit de corps than to reason. But the fact remains that the content of what the German students believe is absolutely anti-authoritarian, even to the point of being pedantically so, and that the real Nazi forces in Germany are shocked beyond words by the students. The young have studied their history thoroughly; they know what happened to Germany in the past, they know what happened to the Jews, and they are genuinely incensed by it. The real posture of young Germany today is that of a generation painfully trying to pull itself up by its own bootstraps. It is never an easy position to be in, and the young are likely to be off-balance should a further crisis arise.

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram, Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

In Robert Shaw's The Man in the Glass Booth (Royale Theatre) Donald Pleasence appears first as Arthur Goldman, a tycoon of German-Jewish origin whose weirdly sumptuous office looks out on his property—most of the buildings in midtown Manhattan. He is witty, generous, madly eccentric. We suspect a "secret," and it is disclosed at the end of Act I. Pleasence is not the millionaire Goldman but Karl Dorff, a notorious Nazi colonel who was active in the slaughter of the Jews. Three Israeli agents spirit him off to their country.

In the second act Goldman-Dorff chooses to defend himself inside a glass booth in the Eichmann manner. At the start, his arguments make a certain sense. Justice demands, he says, that the court confine itself to his individual case without generalizations on the terrible fate of 6 million Jews. The plea fails to hold up because the man soon begins to boast of those he killed with his own hand. He then declares that he had only followed orders. In a spasm of insane eloquence he describes the Führer's charismatic power: the hope and love he inspired in the German people through his incorruptible devotion to their welfare. The German Jews themselves, Goldman-Dorff screams, would have followed Hitler had they not been his victims.

The harangue is interrupted by a woman who quietly asserts that the speaker is not Dorff but his Jewish cousin who had been enlisted in the Nazi service and had then committed himself savagely to their program. Goldman-Dorff immediately breaks down. He had meant his previous speech to make the Nazis more vile than ever; he had anticipated and desired capture by the Israelis. He wished to expiate his crimes and declare his loathing of the Nazis. When he escaped their domination after the war he avenged himself on them with all possible brutality. He weeps with the woman who has exposed his identity and one sees them finally in an embrace of mutual commiseration.

The play is earnestly meant. The first act builds suspense. The central character is colorful and brilliantly played. Act II falters badly; one cannot credit any of its circumstances. The revelation scene lacks tension, and one is astonished that no one in the court challenges its details. Moreover, its staging is feeble. But by this point we are no longer concerned with melodrama or stage guile; the play has entered the realm of "ideas."

What it attempts is to state all the oft-repeated and ultimately wearisome arguments—no matter how much they may contradict one another—apropos of the Hitlerian holocaust. Anti-Semitism is not an exclusively German vice, it exists everywhere; Jews went to their death without protest. But then they could not conceive of what was in store for them. They might have followed Hitler along with the other Germans, but, it is suggested, not with the same ferocity. Some Jews collaborated with their tormentors. Desperate men will follow any leader to any lengths if they believe him unquestionably dedicated to their salvation, etc., etc., etc.

Such all-inclusive "objectivity"—apart from the dramatic confusion it leads to—is emotional and intellectual nonsense. Neither the author nor we are gods; we take definite positions in every real situation. Life and death matters are always acted upon according to specific temperament, need, tradition and faith. The personages in The Man in the Glass Booth are figureheads and not full-bodied characters; its theatrical dillydallying with history, psychology and mental concepts becomes distasteful, not to say, shameful.

A modicum of skill may be credited

Readers who were startled by G. Scott Reynolds's recent article in The Nation, "Life Insurance: The Immaculate Deception," can get a lot more information in his book:

THE MORTALITY MERCHANTS

The legalized racket of LIFE INSURANCE and what you can do about it

by G. Scott Reynolds

This is the book the life-insurance industry has unsuccessfully tried to laugh off because it shows how to pay much less for much more life-insurance coverage.

"Wonderfully well written," says Library Journal. "This is a much-needed book, an important one for both young married couples and middle-aged citizens to study seriously.... It will do its readers a world of good where it counts—in the pocketbook."

At all bookstores • $4.95 to the play, and Pleasence's virtuosity is inescapably interesting. Audiences during the early weeks of the New York run of such plays are given to fatuous exaggeration. Harold Pinter's direction (in Act I only) is crafty, not "sensational." And Pleasence has a voice that is powerful and cutting, his every attack and reading is admirably calculated and executed, his characterization is complete, so that (despite, in this instance, some indistinctness of speech) he remains constantly fascinating. But despite these virtues he is not genuinely moving. His acting here is superb melodrama.

There are other nice performances, particularly those of Tresa Hughes as the woman who unmasks Dorff-Goldman, and Lawrence Pressman as his loyal private secretary. The office setting of Ed Wittstein from one by Voytek in London also contributes to the success of the evening's first part.

Such forms of popular entertainment as the turns of stand-up comics, night-club acts, blackout revue sketches, hit parade songs, sometimes contain a crude nugget of honest observation. There is something of this in Renee Taylor and Joseph Bologna's four one-act comedies, Lovers and Other Strangers (Brooks Atkinson Theatre).

The first is rather routine. A male squirt is trying to make a female jerk, a girl given to quoting contemporary sages for protection in the harmless combat of sexual play. The skit is redeemed by Zohra Lampert's ungainly grace and breathy rationalizations.

The next bit hits a little harder. A married woman battles to arouse her tired businessman to his connubial obligations. He can't make love to her (that night) he claims, not only because she is too aggressive as a person and too successful at her work but because that day he himself failed to put over a big deal. She hadn't realized the dependence of his sex life on the volume of his sales. Renee Taylor, the play's co-author, acts well with a vaudeville comedy touch.

The third trifle pictures a panicky young man giving his fiancée every plausible reason why he has decided not to marry her. Slightly amazed but nonetheless imperturbable, the future bride brings the guy to his senses (as she will to the altar) by inquiring about arrangements for the wedding. Both Marvin Lichterman and Mariclare Costello are amusing.

In the best slice of the evening's pudding an Italian laborer and his wife attempt to dissuade their son from divorce. They uphold the sanctity of marital vows and of the home. "We are strangers to one another," says the young man, speaking of his wife; to which his father replies, "In marriage we become deeper strangers, which is a kind of love." The material may be commonplace but an earthy humor imbues the sketch with sympathetic life.

Here too a solid truthfulness and a delicate sensibility within the uncouth in Richard Castellano's acting add warmth to an evening from which only unrefined laughter is foreseen.

The direction by Charles Grodin is, of its kind, excellent, though now and again it shows through too markedly in the acting. Actors should never seem to have been directed.

ment. Now, six years later, critical scrutiny is necessary and, in fact, overdue. Every big show of work by a recently dead artist forces the questions: how good was he? This time there is another question as well: How should we look at Kline's work?

The second question is important, because Kline was a member of a generation of American painters (those born from 1903 to 1915), the strength and originality of whose paintings outpaced critical response. The result is that inadequate and partial theories have prospered. One false theory persists in labeling the generation as Abstract Expressionists. This is, basically, a version of the theory of art as self-expression masquerading as American innocence. According to self-expression theory, emotion guides the artist's hand and the painted form is passion's trace. American innocence came in as freedom from the habits and conventions of prior art, most of it European.

The characterization of art as seismic spasm or tremor seems to be accepted by John Gordon in his informative catalogue next to the Kline exhibition. He writes of Kline's "almost brutal spontaneous power," and reckons that "this feeling of energy is the essence of Kline." He has, here, the support of the artist, whom he quotes as saying that the test of a painting is, "does the painter's emotion come across?" However, a more acute sense of the artificiality of art, a clearer sense of its definition as a structure, contrasts today with the work-in-doubt of the existential forties and early fifties.

The more aware we become of art's artificiality, the more dubious must we be about ideas of art as equivalent to a cry, orgasm or trip. The supposition that the artist is going to paint when most desperate or most tortured is no longer as awesome or as likely as it once seemed. It sounded plausible when the impact of the work of art's newness was taken for the artist's emotional rawness, but nearly twenty years later how relevant are expressionist theories of art as applied to American abstract art?

The renewal of the knowledge of art's artificiality is not the same thing as recognizing the formal properties of art, though it is part of it. The work of the younger artists of the sixties has contributed to the new emphasis. The inner man who, in expressionist theory, suffered and excreted his problems into the outer world as paint deposits, has been blocked or disdained by most Pop artists and by the Minimal artists. By drying out the more ostentatious symbols of self by presenting systematic concepts in factual form, Minimal artists have resisted the organic and emotional theory

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

10-21-68

323 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Mr. Alloway, former curator of the Guggenheim Museum, is at present visiting professor at the New York State University, Stony Brook. His forthcoming history of the Venice Biennale will be published by the New York Graphic Society.

Max Kozloff, art critic for The Nation, is on leave of absence. He will contribute occasional articles during the 1968-69 season.

The Franz Kline retrospective at the Whitney Museum of American Art is the second given to this artist. The first, in Washington in 1962, six months after Kline's death in May of that year, was too close to his death for critical detach-art that overstressed the general elements of American painting. In addition, happenings and other performances have accustomed the public to dissolving art forms, in which the media are mixed and the formal limits of art become complex interfaces. By comparison, the work of the so-called Abstract Expressionists is compact and legible; in short, its status as art is visible and insistent in its demands for evaluation.

If Kline's signs are not to be regarded as the index of feeling, what are they? Mr. Gordon has tried to have it both ways and proposes that the "brutal" forms are the product of "careful structure and loving handling." The passion and the painting remain unrelated episodes in Kline's life, as Gordon presents them. If it is we reject the hypothesis that art can be the direct outcome of unmediated emotion, we are left with, simply, "careful structure and loving handling." In effect, Kline is a conventional and weak painter to whom such stock expressions as this are wholly appropriate.

Kline composed frequently with entered forms, but always with asymmetries to mitigate monotony; he stretched big horizontals across a canvas, but modulated it by secondary verticals. He played with contrasts of large and small forms, generally avoiding too much of either. By this ever-present system of checks and qualifications he separates himself from the innovative American painters of his generation, such as Pollock, Newman, Still. Kline made an effort to transform his art, as other Americans were transforming theirs, by working large, by direct handling, by reducing diversity, but his art remained essentially a diagrammatic version of traditional compositions.

Kline's best works, to my eyes, all come in the first half of the fifties, are crisp and incisive ones in which black and dead black and white a solid plane. "Chief," "Cardinal" and "Wotan" of 1950, and "Accent Grave" of 1955, currently at the Whitney, are of this type; so are "Thorpe" (1954) and "Wanapaker Block" (1955), both missing from the show. This exhibition, like the first retrospective in Washington, gives an veritable helping of the cloudy, tonal works. These are the paintings, the majority, in which a barrage of grays corrodes the density of black and white, and in which color also acts as half-tone, to blur the basic armature rather than to illuminate space. (A small untitled work of 1950, No. 31 in the catalogue, uses color as mass rather than as atmospheric one, but Kline never followed up this color possibility.) As it loses maximum tonal contrast, Kline's surface becomes sulpy and his chiaroscuro schmaltzy.

Kline, it is worth noting, did not paint in groups or series, whereas Pollock, Newman, Still, Rothko, Motherwell and, to an extent, de Kooning have all done so. In these groups, the whole set rather than any single piece, is the unit of meaning. The permutation of known formats, of recurrent images, is an original factor in American painting since World War II, but Kline never extended his paintings by repetition in time. To him, a painting was an irreducible and noncontinuous form. There is no reason why a painter should not hold this view; the point is offered as a description, but it does confirm the conservative features of his composition.

His paintings have impacted cues, specific but clenched references to the human figure, furniture, architecture, the themes that Kline had used as a realist. However, his realistic work was banal, as is demonstrated in the selection of early work at the Whitney. He was not fundamentally the kind of painter to work in the way that he elected. Imagine Picasso trying to be Picasso or Guttuso trying to be Matisse. Kline, feeling the pressure of his generation, turned out to be only Icarus.

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" -LIFE

Don't ever stop chasing rainbows...

Finian's Rainbow

STARRING
FRED ASTAIRE · PETULA CLARK · DON FRANCKS
INTRODUCING
KEENAN WYNN · AL FREEMAN, JR. · BARBARA HANCOCK AND
TOMMY STEELE AS THE LEPRECHAUN
BOOK BY E.Y. HARBURG AND FRED SAIDY · LYRICS BY E.Y. HARBURG

MUSIC BY SUPERVISED BY SCREENPLAY BY PRODUCED BY DIRECTED BY BURTON LANE · Ray Heindorf · E.Y. HARBURG & FRED SAIDY · JOSEPH LONDON · FRANCIS FORD COPPOLA
TECHNICOLOR® PANAVISION® From WARNER BROS.-SEVEN ARTS W

TICKETS NOW AT BOX-OFFICE OR BY MAIL

EVES (Mon. thru Thurs.) Center $4.00, C. Left & C. Right $3.75, Side $3.25
EVES (Fri., Sat., Sun., Hols. & Hol. Evens.) Center $4.50, C. Left & C. Right $4.00, Side $3.00
MATS. (Wed.) Center $3.25, C. Left & C. Right $2.75, Side $2.50
MATS. (Sat., Sun. & Holidays) Center $4.00, C. Left & C. Right $3.75, Side $3.25
Note: Mats. all 2:30 Evens. all 8:30, except Sun. & P.M. Extra Holiday Mats. Nov. 5, 11, 28, 29, Dec. 21 thru Jan. 3, 1959 at Holiday Prices.
New Year's Eve performances 8 P.M. & Midnight: $5.50, 5:00, 4:00
SPECIAL ARRANGEMENTS for Groups, Organizations & Schools; call or write: Carol T. Herold (212) 246-0995, or 1585 B'way, N.Y., N.Y. 10036

PENTHOUSE THEATRE

Broadway & 47th Street, New York, N.Y. 10036
A PACIFIC EAST THEATRE

BOX-OFFICE OPENS DAILY 10 A.M.-9 P.M./SUNDAY 12 NOON-9 P.M.

Reconstruction —What's that?

Silly question? History courses often gloss over this most hopeful and exciting time in the American past—and with reason. Whatever happened to the great promise to give some real meaning to the emancipation of black people in this country?

John Richard Dennett, an assistant editor of The NATION from 1866-69, traveled throughout the South in 1865 and 1866. He sought out and interviewed people of both races and of various occupations and social classes, and reported his findings in a series of thirty-six articles in The NATION.

Collected now in book form, entitled THE SOUTH AS IT IS, 1865-1866, this account of the fateful beginnings of Reconstruction will be a free gift to each new subscriber to The NATION.

The good fight
is now in
THE NATION
—Why not
join now?

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free John Dennett's THE SOUTH AS IT IS.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico;
$2 other foreign.)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N10-21

Crossword Puzzle No. 1268

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

Francis Scott might begin it with a couple of flats. (3,9)
Unrefined ore is in this, but it's not so soft. (7)
Live, when not out of use. (7)
Is in very warm surroundings, but you can get a lift from it. (5)
A traveler might have to find someone to do it to his tongue. (9)
One of the things disputants are at might prove a turtle. (10)
One of these might have a local designation in England. (4)
In the manner of a professor? (10)
Only middling net results called for on the gridiron. (4,5)
Evidently the shape of the twinkly star. Mr. Crane had been warned that one had lost his head. (7)
Would certainly never serve as the Night Watch! (7)
Managed to get out of unpredictable and dire times. (12)

DOWN

Going out on the stage? (7)
Modulate? It might be important in Anderson's "Typewriter." (5,3)
Puts on a decorative effect arranged from shearings. (9)
Inclined to be an early contest. (5)

- 6 They should be used to putting you in your place. (6)
7 Prohibition doesn't seem completely to grab me, when the subject comes up! (7)
8 and 16 across In such a divine round trip, there is bound to be a little unpredictability! (2,3,3,2,3,4)
9 Senior class emblems? (6,7)
15 Literally a cure for drunkenness stays them possibly, with what sounds like quarts of source material. (9)
17 Sergeant broken and required to keep at a distance? (8)
19 Its bark could be improved, with proper carriage. (7)
21 Saw a cure for a headache? (7)
22 "Antony and Cleopatra" performance where the first part of the play concludes with an uncertain comment. (6)
24 This joint always comes up with a musical group, it seems! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1267

ACROSS: 1 Good-looking; 9 Part-time; 10 and 25 Timing gear; 11 Genetic; 12 Shad roe; 14 Sprang; 15 Abnegate; 17 Spelling; 20 Hears; 22 and 24 Stop-gap measure; 26 Detach; 27 Eligible; 28 Interrogate.
DOWN: 2 On the ball; 3 and 13 Driving range; 4 and 8 Over and out; 5 Kitchen; 7 Make-up; 16 Gear shift; 18 Potter; 19 Ivanhoe; 20 Healing; 21 Shril; 23 Plain.

TRAVEL

JET LOS ANGELES/TOKYO R.T. $389. Departing 6:23:59. 39 days. $95 confirms. Send your inquiries c/o AMERICAN ADVENTURE-TOURS, 3765 E. Colorado, Pasadena, Calif. 91107. 213/794-8575.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EXPORT AIR CARGO

Complete services available: documentation, banking, etc. PLUS greatly reduced air freight rates. Contact:

Berklay Air Services
P.O.B. 163, JFK Int'l Airport
Jamaica, N.Y. 11430

REAL ESTATE

DO YOU HAVE A DREAM? Here is your chance to live it. Charming ivy-covered brownstone for sale off Central Park West—low 100's. Renovated—7 room duplex and income or delivered vacant. Garden. MO 3-1050.

PERSONALS

SELF-HELP PROGRAM. Non-profit Ecuadorian Organization mails, directly from Ecuador, the best Ecuadorian Handicrafts created by gifted Craftsmen. Write for free colorful catalog: OCEPA 5, Box 2948, Quito-Ecuador

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC. Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

PUBLICATIONS

UNDERGROUND PRESS DIRECTORY

Over 220 listings domestic and foreign
$1.00 per copy
Box 396
Stevens Point, Wisconsin 54481

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco. Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

TECHNOCRACY

says

political elections won't fix America's problems

The problems of America aren't vague and nebulous. They are physical problems that demand physical solutions. They can be fixed by scientific 'know-how' — the very same 'know-how' that got us atomic energy, the polio vaccine, and the cotton picker. America's problems are beyond the scope of politicians and political parties.

So, what are our problems? They include:

Poor facilities and congestion in mass transportation and housing

Air, water and soil pollution

Poverty in the midst of abundance

'Abundance' means there's plenty for everybody. Why not run our technology wide open, around the clock, and produce enough for everyone? America has the resources, the technology and the technically-trained manpower to provide more goods than every man, woman and child on the entire continent can consume. Technocracy is the means of distributing this abundance.

Technological America needs objective, efficient technological administration in order to pass on to every citizen the full benefits of our new 'machine age.'

SUBSCRIPTION ORDER

TO: TECHNOCRACY'S MAGAZINES

5509 University Way N.E.

Seattle, Washington 98105

Enclosed herewith is $_____ To Cover_____ Subscription(s) to Technocracy's Magazines for_____ Year(s). Three magazines, 12 months, 12 issues, $4.00.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Country _____ Zip _____

CURTIS LeMAY ROBERT G. SMERRILL

THE NATION

OCTOBER 28, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
RDV 7 1968
LIBRARY

NOVEMBER WATERSHED NEW ISSUES, NEW COALITIONS

JOHN T. DEMPSEY

DEMOCRATS FOR '72

TED SMEBAKKEN

Death in Stockton No Ordinary Black Man MARTIN SMITH

JOHN BARTH BY ALFRED APPEL, Jr.
CESAR VALLEJO BY JOHN KNOEPFLE

Israeli Book Month MICHAEL ENDLER

01096 VO ENWON1808
BURLINGAME CA 94010
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
5-698 PL-5337

LETTERS

Too late

Lewisburg, Pa.

DEAR SIR: You merit respect as veteran opponents of capital punishment and no doubt hoped to advance the abolitionist cause with your editorial on "Playing God" [The Nation, Sept. 2]. Alas, your means betrayed your purpose. Dragging Pat Brown out of his deserved obscurity to say a few words against legal murder is the rough equivalent of asking Humphrey for his mature reflections on self-reliance, or inviting Curtis LeMay to lecture on the sanctity of life. By his own admission, Brown refused to stand between the gas chamber and forty-two of the sixty victims whose cases came before him as governor of California. A "notably kindly" man, you say?

When you come right down to it, a weeping executioner is more offensive than an impassive professional. And were Brown also to repent—now that political pressures have subsided—of having supported Johnson's war, having sent cops onto the Berkeley campus, having smeared an opponent for "being soft on homosexuals," this would hardly make him an authority on decency and courage. The liberal will to destruction followed by prudently deferred regrets—this has by now become an established tradition in the Democratic Center.

So Brown, stripped of his power, now wishes that he "had commuted every single one" of the capital punishment cases. Bravo! So do I; but can't our reluctant executioner hear ghosts, among them Chessman's, snickering from death row?

Richard Drinnon

a vote for Hayes?

Aberdeen, Miss.

DEAR SIR: Those who oppose the election of Humphrey are burying the second Reconstruction. This is 1876 and Nixon is Hayes, though not as kind or honest. The sell-out of the first Reconstruction caused more American deaths than the Vietnamese War—and among both races; the end of the second will cause even more. The South won the Civil War politically in 1876; will it win it again in 1968?

Charles G. Hamilton

Huxley papers

London, Eng.

DEAR SIR: I have been invited by Alfred A. Knopf and Harper & Row to write the official biography of the late Aldous Huxley, with the consent and cooperation of his widow and family.

I should be very grateful if any of your readers who knew Aldous Huxley personally, or who had dealings of any kind with him, or who may have documents which would be of assistance to me, would be so kind as to get in touch with me through Alfred A. Knopf, 501 Madison Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10022. Any documents sent to Knopf will be copied and returned at once.

Sybil Bedford

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

EDITORIALS

As We See It

Most voters are understandably unhappy with the three leading Presidential contenders, Nixon, Humphrey and Wallace. An appalling percentage of ballots this November are going to be cast "against" rather than "for." Even many of those who vote for Wallace and LeMay—at least outside the Deep South—will be casting protest votes.

Comments on the choice offered voters range from "dismal" (Walter Lippmann) and "distasteful" (Tom Wicker of The New York Times) to the unprintable. Apart from the Wallace constituency, those who have decided to vote despite their dismay and distress will be influenced in the main by one or the other of the following arguments. Some feel, as Mr. Lippmann does, that the Republican Party, even with Nixon at the helm, is better able to govern than the tired, discredited, sharply divided Democratic Party. Others argue—David Broder is one—that in the unhappy situation in which most voters now find themselves the man is more important than the party. Mr. Broder is impressed by the fact that "from the rich array of talent in the Republican Party, Richard Nixon chose Spiro T. Agnew for his Vice Presidential candidate," while "in the supposed ruins of the Democratic Party, Hubert Humphrey found Edmund S. Muskie."

While The Nation is inclined to agree with much of what Mr. Lippmann has to say about the Republican Party, if we were to make a selection on the basis of likability, we could discover in ourselves a preference for Humphrey and Muskie. But a central issue in this year's election transcends parties and personalities. In the 1964 campaign the electorate was offered what it had every right to assume was a choice—not an echo—on the vital issue of the war in Vietnam. The choice seemed clear-cut: a military victory through escalation (Goldwater) or "no wider war" (Johnson), which implied an honest effort to seek settlement through negotiation. The electorate gave Johnson an overwhelming mandate to pursue the policy he had unambiguously stated, but even before Election Day he had quietly set in motion preparations for escalation. In retrospect, the dubious Gulf of Tonkin resolution, so frequently cited as the basic authorization, appears to have been part of the President's advance planning for the unannounced course of action he had determined to follow. A self-respecting electorate would be most unwise to permit such a deliberate deception on a matter involving the honor and security of the United States to go unrebuked. We recognize, with Lincoln, that an element of moral ambiguity may be inherent in politics, but there are limits beyond which ambiguity cannot be made to stretch. We consider the President's deception about his intentions in 1964 to be an affront to the ethics of political leadership in a democratic society.

We could not possibly have endorsed President Johnson if he had sought re-election, regardless of whom the Republicans might have nominated. Nor can we endorse Vice President Humphrey, even though Richard Nixon is his principal opponent. We have not forgotten that when the Administration—with the cooperation of N.B.C.—decided to rebuke Martin Luther King after he had come out against the Vietnamese War, it was Mr. Humphrey who undertook the unsavory assignment. We have never thought of the Vice President as merely a loyal lieutenant serving a general of whose policies he disapproved. On the contrary, we have always assumed that the Vice President agreed with the President's policies, including the decision to escalate the war; his own statements over the last four years, delivered with characteristic fervor, make his position quite clear. To assume otherwise would be to place a very low evaluation indeed on the Vice President's courage, intelligence and integrity.

Nor can we endorse the Nixon-Agnew ticket—not even as a protest, not even to offset the possibility that Wallace may tumble the election into the House. As we have said many times, while we regard Nixon as an intelligent, hard-working, astute politician, we also regard him as a man without settled principles, values or convictions—a view that finds striking confirmation in his egregiously irresponsible selection of Spiro T. Agnew for a running mate. If Nixon gets to the White House (a prospect we do not relish), he will owe his election to the performance of the Johnson-Humphrey Administration, capped by the disgraceful spectacle of the Chicago convention. We see no need to say what we think about the Wallace-LeMay ticket. In deciding to make no endorsement, we have considered the possibility that the election may be thrown into the House, but we do not think this likely (see article on page 425 of this issue).

It has been urged that failure to endorse the Humphrey-Muskie ticket will injure the chances of some excellent Democratic nominees, but in our view these nominees will fare better to the extent that they can separate their campaigns from the national ticket. Humphrey not only has no coattails to offer them; he is trying to ride on Muskie's. We are impressed by the fact that many of the Congressional leaders of the Democratic Party who were for Humphrey before and during the Chicago convention are now unwilling to give his candidacy active support, although most of them would welcome the support of Senator McCarthy. If the Vice President had spoken out against what happened at Chicago, in the convention and on the streets, he might have been able to restore a measure of unity. Critics within the party, Humphrey complains, have not rallied to his support. The fact is that the Johnson-Meany-Daley axis has done nothing to help these critics and is, in a variety of ways, conniving at their defeat. In Illinois, for example, the Democratic Senatorial nominee, William Clark, is not receiving the party support to which he is clearly entitled.

It is said, also, that if the Democratic nominees for President and Vice President are defeated, the party will fall apart and the pieces will be picked up by the old guard. But the Democratic Party is not going to fall apart, and the forces of the "New Politics" have a good chance in 1972 to win the victory they did not win this year. Time is running out on such bosses as Barr, Tate and Daley, and on such "labor leaders" as George Meany. Even though the All-Negro National Committee of In-

IN THIS ISSUE

October 28, 1968

EDITORIALS

418

ARTICLES

422 Curtis LeMay:

A Normal American Killer

Robert G. Sherrill

The November Watershed:

425 New Issues, New Coalitions

John T. Dempsey

427 Democrats for '72

Ted Smebakken

429 Death in Stockton:

No Ordinary Black Man

Martin Smith

432 Peru: Oil and the Army

Stephen L. Rozman

434 Conglomerates: The Total Corporation

H. L. Nieburg

BOOKS & THE ARTS

438 The Future: Less and Less Security

John Gliedman

439 Literal & Free

John Knoepfle

440 The Offering (poem)

Leonard Nathan

441 The Art of Artifice

Alfred Appel, Jr.

443 Book Marks on Israel

Michael J. Bandler

444 Films

Robert Hatch

445 Theatre

Harold Clurman

446 The Grate Society (poem)

George Bowring

447 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL SEAT

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHEK; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 14

quiry has voted not to endorse Humphrey (he notified Rep. John Conyers on September 25 that he did not have time to meet with the committee, a broadly based group of Negro moderates and militants with 1,000 members in thirty-two states, to discuss issues of interest to Negroes!), those Negroes who do vote, North and South, will probably be for Humphrey and Muskie. In many states the effect may well be to make Negroes the base of the Democratic Party, which this year has been deserted by so many of the elements that made up the New Deal coalition. Julian Bond, the Rev. Channing Phillips, Charles Evers, Aaron Henry and others are campaigning for the Humphrey-Muskie ticket—not with an excess of enthusiasm but to preserve the position that Negroes have won in the party. It is reasonable to assume, therefore, that the party will be refashioned between now and 1972 through pressures operating from within, such as the New Democratic Coalition (see article on page 427) and from without, such as the New Party, the Wallace adherents and the various new national constituencies.

It is said, finally, that citizens are always under an obligation to vote, even though they may not like the proffered choices. But this ignores the fact that abstaining is a kind of vote—a vote of no confidence (Wisconsin provides a place on the ballot to register such a protest)—and that under present circumstances it can be a very effective way of using the franchise. Old coalitions are falling apart, new coalitions are trying to form. As long as the electorate dutifully lines up behind the candidates whom the Democratic and Republican Party professionals see fit to run, the professionals will continue to offer candidates whose chief virtue is that they defer to the professionals. But let it be seen that a significant segment of the public has emancipated itself from a fanciful duty to vote for someone—anyone—and is reserving its endorsement for a candidate it likes, then the parties will find such men. (That they would not be hard to find was evidenced this year by the presence of Governor Rockefeller in Miami and Senator McCarthy in Chicago.) A "lesser evil" is still an evil (usually a hack). What this country must seek is a greater good. Whereas reasons can be cited for voting for Nixon or voting for Humphrey, there are at least as good reasons this time around for passing: the country might get a new deck of cards.

We hope nonetheless that there will be a large turn-out of voters on November 5. The feeling of distaste expressed by many voters for the Presidential nominees gives added importance to the contests in the Senate and House. Here is where voters sharing our point of view should invest their time, money and energy. Candidates endorsed by The Nation include the following:

Senators Seeking Re-election. Fulbright, McGovern, Morse, Church, Nelson, Ribicoff, Clark, Gruening (a write-in). We call attention to the fact that four of these are members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee—Fulbright, Clark, Morse and Church.

Senatorial Nominees. Clark (Illinois), Cranston (California), Eagleton (Missouri)—with a cheer or two for his Republican opponent, Rep. Thomas Curtis, who has been a consistent critic of the draft and of present levels of military spending—O'Dwyer (New York), Gilligan (Ohio), Hughes (Iowa), Collins (Florida), and Mathias (Maryland)—a Republican.

Representatives Seeking Re-election. Arizona: Morris K. Udall, 2 CD; California: John Moss, 3 CD; Phil Burton, 5 CD; Don Edwards, 9 CD; Augustus Hawkins, 21 CD; George Brown, 29 CD; Edward Roybal, 30 CD. Illinois: Sidney R. Yates, 9 CD. Indiana: John Brademas, 3 CD. Iowa: John Culver, 2 CD; Neal Smith, 5 CD. Michigan: John Conyers, 1 CD; Donald Reigle, 7 CD; Charles C. Diggs, Jr., 13 CD. Missouri: Richard Bolling, 5 CD. New Jersey: Frank Thompson, 4 CD. New York: Benjamin S. Rosenthal, 8 CD; William F. Ryan, 20 CD; James H. Scheuer, 21 CD; Jonathan H. Bingham, 23 CD; Richard Ottinger, 25 CD; John Dow, 27 CD. Ohio: Charles Vanik, 21 CD. Oregon: Edith Green, 3 CD. Texas: Ken Eckhardt, 8 CD; Henry B. Gonzales, 20 CD. Wisconsin: Robert Kastenmeier, 2 CD; Henry Reuss, 5 CD.

New Contenders. Alabama: William Branch, 5 CD. California: Urban Whittaker, 11 CD; Stanley K. Sheinbaum, 13 CD; Fred Warner Neal, 26 CD. Connecticut: Robert Cook (Independent), 3 CD. Georgia: Charles Weltner, 5 CD. Illinois: Abner J. Mikva, 2 CD; Marc Karson, 14 CD. Massachusetts: Chandler Harrison Stevens, 3 CD. New Hampshire: David Hoeh, 2 CD. New York: Allard Lowenstein, 5 CD; Franklin Miller, 6 CD; James Farmer, 12 CD; Edward L. Koch, 17 CD; Paul Davidoff, 26 CD.

Columbia: Onus of Violence

In the lull between police actions at Columbia last spring, members of the faculty appointed an investigating commission headed by Archibald Cox, a Harvard University professor of law and former U.S. Assistant Solicitor General. The release of the Cox Commission Report in the form of a paperback volume entitled Crisis at Columbia (Random House) will help to correct some of the false impressions promulgated by the news media about Columbia's campus insurrection.

In the carefully measured cadences of a lawyer's brief, the report redistributes the onus of the disturbances, hitherto heaped largely upon the students, to all the other participants: administration, trustees, faculty, police and community. The report definitively abolishes from respectable discourse the demonologic theory that Columbia's troubles began when Mark Rudd and a few others got past the Admissions Committee. It flatly rejects "the view that ascribes the April and May disturbances primarily to a conspiracy of student revolutionaries." In this reassessment, it is impossible to avoid the implication, however much explicitly rejected by the commission, that Columbia University's trustees and administrators were inept and intransigent in their handling of the issues and events. As adults and as executives who seek the responsibility of husbanding the university's well-being, the members of an administration must hold themselves accountable to higher standards of truth, charity and efficiency than any other segment of the university. One can safely draw the conclusion that the students were correct when they insisted that the administration's claim to authority was paired by arbitrary and unresponsive attitudes and practices. The report describes the administration's "cold inference," its "resort to improvisation," its analyses and expectations which "proved utterly false," and its willingness to match SDS (Students for a Democratic Society) in mutual desire" . . . for . . . "further confrontation." The report also dispels any doubts about the symbolic if not immediate seriousness and justice of the two principal demands of the strikers: abandonment of the racially empoiled gymnasium and severance of institutional ties with the war-embroiled Institute for Defense Analysis.

The commissioners evidently share large areas of agreement with the dissident faculty and striking students; yet they strongly condemn the refusal of the students to come out of the buildings when ordered to do so by the administration under threat of forcible eviction by the police. Faculty who stood before the buildings and who thus encouraged the students are also severely condemned.

The report attributes the large-scale injury and excessive violence—veritable police riots—ultimately to a peculiarly long list of imperfect arrangements and negative features associated with Columbia University: substandard dormitories; overcommitted and underpaid faculty; unrepresentative trustees; urban blight. The commissioners, whose exemplary commitment to the defense of liberal values and rule of law shines through on every page, might have pondered an alternative interpretation of Columbia as a university. It may very well turn out that the thousands of Columbia students who have now learned the art and acquired the courage of resisting illegitimate and corrupted authority will be needed in the darkening perspective of this country's future in ways as yet unanticipated by fact-finding commissions. The reason why the unbearable tensions of the war in Vietnam, the breakdown in national political processes, and the national racial crisis achieved expression at Columbia and not elsewhere may not lie in any egregious defects of Columbia's administration, campus or facilities. In the light of Chicago, it may rather be that Columbia's faculty and student body stood closer to the realities of what it will take to prevent this country's latent potential for fascism from overwhelming the commissioners' fine-honed sense of liberal properties.

A keener sense of self-preservation, if not of charity, would have helped to improve this important document. Can we really condemn a college generation which is demonstrably better informed, socially and politically more involved, ethically more sensitive, and mentally and physically more courageous than the youth of any previous generation in our history? Are these not the qualities and capacities upon which the preservation of our democracy ultimately depends?

MARVIN HARRIS

The Legion vs. Marcuse

In the Joe McCarthy era, when people in show business, great and small, were being blacklisted by professional Red-hunters, local officials of veterans organizations, were often the most effective agents in striking terror into the not very courageous hearts of the TV and radio producers,

Now Gladwin Hill reveals in The New York Times (October 6) that the current agitation against Prof. Herbert Marcuse at the University of California, San Diego, was started by Harry L. Foster, the 69-year-old judge-advocate of the American Legion county organization.

A "semi-retired" construction engineer, Foster had never heard of Marcuse until last May, when an anti-Marcuse editorial appeared in a San Diego paper and was picked up by American Legion Post No. 6. Almost overnight the post raised $20,000 to donate to the university to buy up Marcuse's contract. The university declined the offer.

"The Marcuse matter," Foster says portentously, "was brought to my attention by certain officials of the community here whom I'm not privileged to name, who hoped the Legion would move because otherwise there might be considerable trouble on the campus here." The Legion's role, it would appear, was that of protector of the university against Marcuse, who had been accused by papers of the conservative Copley chain of "fomenting dissent." Dissent is a serious offense in San Diego County, which counts among its chief sources of revenue defense plants, no less than twenty-one military bases, and retired military personnel. The Navy-Marine payroll alone dumps $1.2 million a day into the San Diego economy.

For a while, however, Marcuse is likely to remain a thorn in the side of San Diego's militant conservatives. The University's chancellor, Dr. William McGill, does not favor dismissing professors at the behest of the Legion and the John Birch Society; even if he did, he would find himself in difficulty with his own faculty and students, and a nucleus of liberals who read the Los Angeles Times in preference to the Copley papers. Two or three times a week, Dr. McGill goes around to civic clubs and similar groups, trying to convince them that Dr. Marcuse is only a man of ideas, after all, and not a menace to the government of the United States—or even of San Diego County. Although he has failed to convince many of the Marcuse-phobes, the most likely outcome is a prolonged deadlock. The university will not be the easy mark that show business was in the fifties.

Brothers in Arms

When soldiers are used against war protesters—Chicago being a case in point—the demonstrating youth frequently chant "join us" to the GIs called in to break up their street and park assemblies. But one group of Regular Army soldiers who were in the Chicago call-up didn't need to hear the chant on Michigan Avenue and in Grant Park. Stationed at Fort Hood, Tex., the forty-three black soldiers (twenty-six of them veterans of Vietnam) sat down in a parking lot and refused to budge when they learned that their new commander was to be Mayor Richard Daley. Said one:

"We feel that we've done enough for our country. We shouldn't have to go out there and do wrong to our own people. I can't see myself spraying tear gas on my fellow people."

After vain pleadings by the soldiers' division commander, Gen. John K. Boles, Jr., that the men give up their protest, the forty-three were arrested and led off to the Fort Hood stockade.

"A lawful order must be obeyed," said a Pentagon general. "It's as simple as that." But as Time observed, in one of the few published accounts of the Fort Hood soldiers' strike: "It is not, of course, by any means as simple as that." According to Time, "the Army may well be summoned into action in Negro ghettos in the future, and the generals are troubled by the possibility that black soldiers will find that they owe higher fealty to the black community than to the U.S. Army." "The problem is so fearful," said one officer, "that we won't even discuss these people as Negroes." The Army seems to be handling the forty-three as gingerly as court-martial justice allows.

But perhaps the problem is even greater than the Army imagines. It was evident—first in Grant Park and later in front of the Conrad Hilton Hotel (see "The Hilton Hotel Incident," The Nation, September 16)—that the protesters for the most part got along fine with the National Guard soldiers and that the latter seemed to feel little hostility toward the protesters. At one tense moment the Illinois National Guard was even cheered by the crowds when they replaced the brutal Chicago police force that had been surrounding the Hilton and attacking bystanders as well as members of the anti-war group.

The protesters talked freely to the National Guard soldiers, even though the latter remained silent, under orders not to respond. But there were smiles from the soldiers, and individual protesters quipped that they looked like the guy next door and asked them what they were doing pointing bayonets at their neighbors.

In this one-way conversation it was obvious that the young anti-war whites had their own ideas about soul brothers, and many of the soldiers appeared to be getting the message. Perhaps white soldiers will come to feel as did the forty-three black soldiers at Fort Hood and refuse to shove their neighbors around. Then where will the generals, the Richard Daleys and the other leaders with fixations on a distorted idea of "law and order" turn for their shock troops?

CURTIS LeMAY

A NORMAL AMERICAN KILLER

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

When Curtis LeMay was a child, he earned spending money by killing sparrows and selling them to a lady as food for her tomcat. One gathers from his autobiography, Mission with LeMay, that that is his happiest boyhood memory. His most exciting memory is of seeing a stunt flier die buried in mud. A lonely, plodding boy, LeMay had a vile temper which he did not learn to control, by

'Newsroom' Switches On

During the San Francisco newspaper strike last year, the local educational television station, KOED, offered an hour of news each day as an emergency measure. When the strike ended, the program went off the air. Now, however, thanks to a $750,000 grant from the Ford Foundation, it is back, and better than ever. Newsroom, KOED public affairs director, has assembled a group of skilled reporters who each weekday offer viewers Newsroom, an hour of intelligent, literate reporting and analysis.

The Newsroom staff does such an excellent job of digging up and interpreting the news as to make the offerings of the commercial stations seem pale and monotonous. The program brings in a wide variety of guests, commentators and also runs short films on various personalities and topics. This "opening up" of the hitherto mechanical, headline-reading format for disposing of the news on the air is having an increasing influence in the San Francisco area, and KOED's innovations are now being imitated by several of the local commercial broadcasters.

It is quite likely that the Newsroom coverage of the Walter Baskett shooting, in which an off-duty policeman killed a 28-year-old Negro, led to the reopening of the case and to a murder indictment against the policeman. The program has offered continued and detailed coverage of this case, which is the biggest local story in San Francisco and one whose repercussions might possibly lead to the reorganization of the police department and the resignation of its chief, Thomas Cahill. Newsroom also keeps a sharp eye on other aspects of the San Francisco scene—race relations, education, entertainment, urban renewal, conservation, etc.

The success of this undertaking suggests that vast potentialities in television—for news programs as well as other kinds of programs—have yet to be realized. Television can be turned into a creative force by people with imagination and original ideas. The numbing commercial medium as it now exists is not the only way to fill the air.

his own admission, until he was an adult. His life at school was completely drab and uninspiring. No teacher took an interest in him: "It is a common human experience to have enjoyed, during school years, the companionship and encouragement of some particular teacher. . . . I don't remember anything of that sort occurring to me." Outside school, he seems to have worked constantly and had no time for sports or club activities or what he calls "boy-and-girl stuff." At home, the other members of the family all but ignored him. "One LeMay didn't butt into another. LeMay's business. I don't think anyone gave it much ought or cared whether I would get through or flunk it, or what."

Life, in any real sense, did not begin for LeMay until he joined the U.S. Air Force. He is one of those strange creatures who have sprung from our military incubus—easy, if not unhappy, except when they are planning devastation. Like many of this breed, LeMay has considerable insight into his own character and is rather straightforward in describing what he sees: "I have been accused and still am accused of possessing a single-track mind. Guess they are right."

He is the complete warrior. Bravery and skill at killing are what matter to him, not ideology. He speaks kindly of Mao Tse-tung, recalling a samurai sword he received from the Chinese Communist overlord during World War II. He says LeMay: "Wouldn't be surprised if Mao had taken himself in hand-to-hand combat. He has a good reputation as a scrapper." Nazi scrappers draw similarly amiable appraisals from LeMay—as fighters, not as Nazis. On the other hand he is immediately suspicious of soldiers who claim combat fatigue; a person can be the most loyal capitalistic democrat in every other respect, but if he tracks mentally under the strain of battle LeMay is likely to dismiss him as "the louse, the bum, the yellow so-and-so . . . this stinko character; he's just scairt." (Breaking physically is, by LeMay's standards, permissible.) One wonders if he knows that his Presidential running mate was mustered out of the Air Force with a 10 per cent disability rating for "psychoneurosis" after being hospitalized for "severe anxiety state, chronic, manifested by tension states, anxiety attacks, anorexia. . . ."

When LeMay retired in 1965 at the age of 58—hurried onto the shelf by President Johnson because of his perpetual feuding with Defense Secretary McNamara—he had been a general for twenty-two years, and a four-star variety for thirteen years, which was longer than any other person had held the rank. The moment of greatest pride in his career was probably the bombing raid he masterminded that left 16 square miles of Tokyo in rubble, and caused more deaths and injuries than any other single military operation in history. He had wanted to lead the raid from the air, he said, but was obliged to direct it from headquarters and "it was no fun."

Now that LeMay has emerged again from his Los Angeles suburban home in Bel Air and taken temporary leave of his job as head of Network Electronics Corp., in Chatsworth, Calif., to join the American Independent Party ticket as Vice Presidential candidate, a large segment of the press is attempting to portray him as a uniquely frightening addition to the political picture. And of course he is frightening; but it is a distortion to make him seem so exceptional. He is little more frightening than Humphrey or Agnew or Nixon or Muskie; they, like LeMay, and like ninety-eight of the 100 U.S. Senators and a similar proportion of the U.S. House of Representatives, favor a Pentagon budget of $72 billion, the largest in history and one that is not entirely honest because it does not cover certain war-related expenses, such as the cost of keeping up veterans' hospitals and GI Bill expenses and veterans' pensions. LeMay is certainly no more frightening than the Pennsylvania labor leader who denounced Senator Clark's efforts to shave the Pentagon budget as "a threat to the safety of United States fighting men and the jobs of Pennsylvania workers." The trouble with ballooning him into such an impressive ogre is that we may be inclined to heave a sigh of relief when he and Wallace are defeated—as though it made all that difference. So, just to keep a proper perspective on this most normal American killer, let us run over LeMay's positions:

Curtis LeMay

He, like Nixon, is against the multilateral nuclear ban. He reasons that, while other nations backed away, Red China would fudge and keep developing A-weapons and eventually gain superiority.

He was the first, or at least the loudest, top official in the Pentagon to urge bombing North Vietnam; he has never urged use of atomic weapons in the war, although he has counseled against saying we would not. Wallace's own firm statement that he would never use atomic weapons in Vietnam seems to have been no more than a panicky reaction to the way the press jumped on LeMay's "just another weapon" appraisal of nuclear bombs. But Wallace's staff, an oily crowd, began at once to explain

Wallace's aversion to radioactive dust in sentimental terms. Paul W. Valentine of The Washington Post wrote: "Part of this feeling, his associates say, came from talks with doctors in Houston while his wife was receiving radiation treatment for cancer that ultimately was fatal to her. Through those talks, they said, Wallace came to realize how much radiation can damage the body." Maybe. But this postdated solicitude for Mrs. Wallace's health is a bit hard to take, since he had her out campaigning for governor less than four months after her first cancer operation and kept her in harness almost to the end, her hold on the governor's office giving him a good base of operation.

LeMay's proposals for A-bomb usage have gone far beyond Vietnam. Back in the days when we had the A-bomb and Russia did not, LeMay is said to have called a secret meeting of top officials and proposed wiping out Russia. He doesn't deny this very firmly. He says, "I don't ever remember having called such a meeting," but he admits that he might have told "some of my people at one time or another. 'We've got this capability. Maybe the nation ought to do it.' I might have said that off the cuff. But never did I make any such formal suggestion." But he came very close to making it formal. And in any event, he still likes to say we may "look sadly back" to the time when Russia either didn't have the bomb or didn't have a sufficient stockpile to retaliate. "That was the era when we might have destroyed Russia completely and not even skinned our elbows doing it." What's more, since the same conditions still exist apropos of China, he now asks if we aren't missing a chance there. We still could do it "before the Chinese military potential grows worse than it is today."

LeMay's mind is so uncluttered and his reasoning so simple that he sees nothing odd in quoting from an Air Force/Space Digest editorial as objective support of his own objectivity. He is startlingly naive. While most military men and politicians pretend that a military-industrial power ring does not exist, LeMay goes out of his way publicly to encourage this group to take a firmer hand in shaping government policy. At a meeting of the National Security Industrial Association in Washington three years ago, he rallied "the military, industrial and scientific communities" to a firmer display of patriotic propaganda "in direct proportion to the responsibility we bear for defending the country"—which, as a look at the budget shows, is a very great proportion indeed.

LeMay does not think the civilian branch of the government should interfere in the slightest with the plans of the generals, except to put back on the money if it can. "If a Secretary of Defense says, 'No, you cannot have this system because we cannot afford it,' we accept his decision. What we did object to was the Secretary's saying 'no' to something the military wished to do, and giving a military reason." Since he would limit the civilian administration to fiscal controls, he is giving the civilians no control at all, for Congress never denies the military anything on grounds of economy.

LeMay is a right winger but a very clumsy one. He has written a book that is almost a Bible to the right wing, but he used a collaborator, McKinley Kantor, who Andersonville was one of the favorite targets of the right wing a few years ago because of its cuss words and naughty images.

LeMay knows all the right-wing cliché positions, but he takes them in a very gauche manner. "I'm for welfare programs, Medicare, for instance," he says. "Certain this country ought to provide medical care for everybody but I don't say the government has to do it." On civil rights: "I can't understand all the fuss about this civil rights business. The trouble is being caused by a bunch of professional no-goods, Communists. I think the Communists are up to their eyebrows in the civil rights movement. As a matter of fact, I know it. I've seen some of the reports. These reports were never made public (Apparently shown to him by his close friend J. Edgar Hoover, who enjoys passing "confidential" files around among a select circle of pals.) He even has a right-wing cliché for the war, which he says he would end by the total destruction of North Vietnam—"leaving not a brick stuck to another" but done in what he calls "the most humane manner possible."

The only effective right-wing organization to which LeMay belongs is the American Security Council—an anti-subversive outfit which has been guided over the past few years by such illustrious far-outs as Adm. Be Moreell, USN retired, and Gen. A. C. Wedemeyer, USN retired—but which nevertheless sneaks some of its propaganda into top places. Last year, for example, The New York Times played up a front-page story saying that the American Security Council had discovered we were desperately behind in the missile race—and did not mention that the ASC was a right-wing front.

After LeMay's maiden campaign speech, an outburst of candor which got him in immediate trouble with Wallace (but gave the newsmen priceless quotes, such as "I'll be lucky if I don't come out of this sounding like drooling idiot"), Wallace has used the tactic of displaying LeMay but letting him say very little. It's just as well for his cause. LeMay has always been a poor speaker. He has a dead-pan face, a tendency to drone and to say "uh," and a weakness of mental will that allows him to wander off into the dullest kind of homey trivialities.

As for the dead-pan part, spectators can give him little sympathy on that. It is caused by a stroke he suffered in the early 1940s. That stroke, plus some deafness (Wallace also suffers from deafness), plus poor eyesight plus prostate trouble, prompted a medical officers' board to give him 60 per cent disability when he was mustered out of service.

Still, one must be a bit cautious with sympathy. After all, LeMay was flying jets right up to the end of his service—and drawing flight pay for it—and on the afternoon he retired from the Air Force, FAA Administrator Najeeb Halaby hoked up a special ceremony in which he presented LeMay with a private pilot's license. And the 60 per cent disability rating allows him to avoid income tax payments on about $10,000 of his $16,464 retirement pay.

Wallace and LeMay are indeed a pair of monsters, and must indeed be defeated. But the bigger worry still remains—with whom are you going to defeat them?

THE NOVEMBER WATERSHED

New Issues, New Coalitions

JOHN T. DEMPSEY

Mr. Dempsey is professor of political science at the University of Michigan (Dearborn), and co-chairman of the state Civil Rights Commission.

not for what it settles but for what it delays, not for what it reveals but for what it conceals, not for what it accomplishes but for what it portends, 1968 will go down in American history as an important political year. There is pulse in the flow of American politics. Periodically, the nation arrives at a watershed, a convulsion, a fundamental realignment of the political scene; thereafter, politics and the country are quite different. Half a dozen such moments have occurred in the American experience, and another is fast approaching.

In 1800 the political party came of age as an instrument of government in our limited democracy, marking the end of the dominance of those who had led the Revolution and established the Constitution. In 1828 Jackson's election symbolized the political maturation of the frontier. Lincoln's victory in 1860 marked the end of the plantation economy which had dominated so much of the American scene, as well as a rapid end to the legal existence of slavery; the preservation of the Union also resulted. In 1896 big business overwhelmed American politics; the 1912 triumph of Wilson heralded the new freedom. FDR and the New Deal arrived in 1932. These are the watershed years of American political history; 1968 is obviously not one of them.

Yet in each of the above heroic instances, the previous election foretold the approaching convulsion. Jefferson's victory in 1800 came four years after the first breakdown in the electoral process and the inability of the Federalists to maintain their position, or their unity. In 1824 the dominant party was unable to agree on a single candidate, and the election was thrown into the House of Representatives. No party in 1856 could nominate a candidate able to face squarely the overwhelming issue of slavery; Lincoln was found four years later. The election of 1892 settled nothing, except to accentuate a split within the Democratic Party and pave the way for McKinley and Hanna. In 1908 the Republican Party turned its back on progressivism, and helped assure Wilson's election in 1912. And in 1928 both parties failed to address themselves to the plight of the farmer or the storm signals in the economy, concentrating instead on the politics of joy. The depression and the New Deal followed. Now 1968 takes its place among these years of short sight and low morale. Both major parties have taken their stands on the issues and the slogans of the past, and have dissembled on the problems of the present. Thus 1968 paves the way for the convulsions of the future.

At least four major issues confront the American people this year: the war in Vietnam, the future of race relations in the United States, the condition of the cities, and the character and dignity of life for all Americans. The three major candidates for President are each addressing themselves to these issues in terms ambiguous at best. Hubert Humphrey holds out peace in Vietnam, or at least an end to the bombing of the North—maybe. Richard Nixon promises peace with honor, even while he supports (at least tacitly) the policies which produced the war. George Wallace promises he'll turn the war over to the Joint Chiefs of Staff, evidently believing that those gentlemen have not previously been consulted on the subject. Or perhaps he'll just turn it over to Curtis LeMay, leaving himself free, if elected, to concentrate on the home front.

Richard Nixon talks of "building bridges to human dignity," but does not believe economic sanctions should be used to help achieve it. Hubert Humphrey promises much more of what has been done, evidently feeling that past programs have been resoundingly successful. George Wallace says he will so be President of "all the people"; and to those who tag him "racist," he points out that lots of Negroes voted for Lurleen—which was a comment, primarily, on the views of her opponents.

Mr. Nixon would turn over the major part of the rebuilding of the cities to private enterprise, which has not up to now leaped to take on the task. Vice President Humphrey would have the federal government lead the way in urban reconstruction, causing some to wonder what Washington has been doing for the past thirty-five years while the cities were decaying. Mr. Wallace says little about rebuilding cities, preferring first to make the existing streets safe for the people; pleasant communities will grow up, presumably, around the much enlarged police stations. Concerning the question and meaning of life for the average American, no candidate is saying much. Each offers to guarantee law and order and a stable dollar—and that's what life's all about anyway.

None of this implies that any of the major candidates is being dishonest or deliberately deceitful. Rather, each apparently believes that the citizens will vote principally on the basis of their emotions—or, more simply, their fears. Wallace appeals to fear of the black man; Nixon appeals to fear of the Democrats, and of the recent past; Humphrey appeals to fear of the Republicans, and of the remote past—the ghost of poor old Herbert Hoover. Not one of the three seems to realize that while such appeals may have a limited and temporary success, a stable society can be constructed only by overcoming fear, not by catering to it. And each of the men overlooks a central fact of American development—the people are more highly educated and informed today than ever before; the emotional approaches of the past simply lack the strength they once had. In this fact lies the cause of the widespread apathy, and of the disunity which is just below the surface of both major parties.

It is fashionable today, in at least some circles, to compare the Wallace appeal with Hitler's in the Germany of the 1920s. While this is no compliment to the "mighty bantam from Alabama," it's a downright insult to the American people as a whole. The United States of 1968 is not the Weimar Republic of 1930, and to suggest that it is seriously to distort history. The United States has not been totally defeated in war, it has not witnessed ruinous inflation, it has not seen its middle class wiped out—quite the contrary. The Wallace appeal stems partly from a weariness and resentment at politics as usual, at promises made and not kept, at lack of leadership and lack of ethics in so many, many places. Many say: "He tells it like it is," "He's the only one who talks like a real American," or simply, "At least he's honest—he says what he believes." A large vote for Wallace on November 5 will be interpreted as a white backlash; it can also be a clear indication that many people have become tired of the two major parties, with their reliance on outmoded solutions to contemporary problems.

If there is any meaning in the remarkable record of the candidacy of Eugene McCarthy, or the rapid surge of the late Robert Kennedy, or the popular appeal of John Lindsay or Nelson Rockefeller, it is that their supporters believed these men were "relevant" to what really matters. Certainly glamour, charm and, in some cases, money were all involved; yet Romney and Percy and Reagan also have these qualities. Just as Wallace's appeal is greatest among the least educated in the United States, and among the older citizens—those who, like him, see life in the most simple terms—so the appeal of McCarthy, Kennedy, Lindsay and Rockefeller is greatest among the best educated and the young, who realize that life cannot be simple. This is encouraging, because each year the American electorate grows younger, and on the average better educated. It's just that the leaders of the political establishment haven't quite awakened to the facts of modern life.

Yet we cannot dismiss George Wallace quite so neatly, at least not in 1968. For he is a mischief-maker who can knock the political train off the tracks. This possibility arises from the fact that, for whatever reasons, he does appeal to many, coupled with circumstances under which the electoral college can select a President. With a little luck, Wallace can throw the election into the House of Representatives, for the first time in 144 years (the 1876 election went there, not to elect a President but rather to determine whom the electors had elected: the House in the end settled on a process which produced Hayes—and a suspicion that has never really been laid to rest).

As of now, Wallace is almost sure to take at least thirty-nine electoral votes, and he could take more (he claims a minimum of 170, but he may well have the capacity to be wrong, like the rest of us). In some normally Democratic states he may draw enough support from Humphrey to give the electoral votes to Nixon; and in some normally Republican states (there are a few) he may take enough from Nixon to give the state to Humphrey. As a result, prediction at this moment is almost impossible—or at least foolish. Yet the effect of the Wallace candidacy may be to throw the election into the House. If this should happen, the next President is certain to be Hubert Humphrey.

This safe prediction is possible because of the distribution of votes in the House. In choosing a President each state has one vote in the House, a vote decided by the partisan control of the Congressional delegation from that state. Today, Democrats control twenty-nine state delegations, Republicans control eighteen, and three are evenly divided and therefore could not vote if all Representatives were present. This balance may well be different after November 5, but unless Nixon achieves a landslide (in which case the election wouldn't go to the House), there is at most no chance that the Republicans will control twenty six state delegations in the next Congress (the number needed to elect). Thus Democrats would be in firm command.

"Move Along"

To be sure, at least five of the twenty-nine Democratic delegations are today controlled by Wallace supporters who could demand concessions and promises and all sort of political booty—from either loyalist Democrats or Republicans. However, it is not in the cards for Republicans to give them what they would most need, committee chairmanships and Congressional powers, so in the end "Democratic Party unity" would surely prevail.

If Hubert Humphrey should become President in this fashion, the already damaged Democratic Party will be further injured; if such a result followed an inconclusive electoral college vote in which Richard Nixon secured a plurality of the popular vote but was then denied the Presidency, the result could shatter the Democratic Party beyond repair (it has already lost many of its supporters to the New Party, or to others on the Left). And the damage to America's prestige abroad would be incalculable.

we can't explain the normal functioning of the electoral college to most foreigners; how to explain its malfunctioning?). So Wallace is a major threat—and he at least knows it.

Yet suppose we escape all of the above, what is likely to be the result? As of now, it is probable that Richard Nixon will win, but certainly with less than half the popular vote (probably less than 45 per cent). Hubert H. Humphrey will run second, and George Wallace a strong third. The new Congress will be much more conservative than its predecessor. The result will be at least two years, and probably four, of inaction on the major problems which plague America. So the 1968 election will then not really have settled anything, and the disillusionment with vague platforms and fancy but empty campaign promises will grow. It has all happened before!

In 1972, the young voters who are today demanding answers will be even more numerous. The educational level of the electorate will have climbed still further. Many of the elderly who this year follow George Wallace will have left this troubled planet; yet the troubles will not have eased. Each of these developments will have a major effect on the next election.

It is my belief that in 1968 we see an unraveling of the political alignments that have held generally since 1932. This is to assert a commonplace. Yet it is also my belief that we are witnessing the end of the old style, and the decline of the old issues. The Civil War ended for all time constitutional questions about the nature of the Union which had been fought over since the beginning; granted, it took a generation or two for the settlement to seep through to some parts of the land. Similarly, the Great Depression and the New Deal ended the political questions as to whether the government has a role to play in the economy, and a responsibility for the welfare of the citizen; granted, it has taken a generation or two for that settlement to be recognized throughout our society. Today, the problems which plague the American people are largely social ones, including the relationships of man to his environment and to his fellow man, as well as his responsibility for his fellow man and for his environment. The Presidential candidates in 1968 do not realize this change because they were raised on the old issues, and trained in the old rhetoric. Yet an increasingly large portion of the electorate does realize that the world has changed, and the election will push their impatience to the fore. In that sense the 1968 election is a prelude to tomorrow.

Democrats for '72

TED SMEBAKKEN

Mr. Smebakken is on the staff of the Minneapolis Star.

Minneapolis

Donald O. Peterson listened to the seemingly endless discussion with rising irritation. At issue was the structure and membership of a temporary organizing committee for the New Democratic Coalition (NDC), and the debate over two competing proposals seemed to be deteriorating into bickering over personalities and considerations of minor magnitude. In fact, a St. Louis psychiatrist had suggested the inclusion on the committee of a group dynamics specialist, contending that one was essential if the assembled liberals' penchant for nitpicking and verbosity was to be controlled.

Peterson prefers less talk and more action. The Eau Claire, Wis., businessman helped found the "dump Johnson" movement in the early fall of 1967, led the successful McCarthyite drive for control of the Democratic Party in his home state, and attracted a measure of national attention when, as chairman of the Wisconsin delegation, he defied Mayor Richard J. Daley on the floor of the Democratic National Convention.

Delegates to the conference, Peterson finally told the group, had gathered in Minneapolis as an "act of faith," a demonstration that the movement launched by Democratic insurgents around the issues of Vietnam, race, poverty and the urban crisis, and behind the candidacies of Eugene McCarthy, Robert F. Kennedy and George McGovern, was not shattered in the violence and repression of Chicago. "Let us continue that faith," he said. "I think it's time to begin. Let us begin."

A beginning of sorts was made at the NDC's organizational conference in Minneapolis during the weekend of October 5-6, but only time will tell whether McCarthy-Kennedy liberals, Negroes, Mexican Americans and Indians, rebellious elements of organized labor, farmers, the poor, students and others can be welded into a permanent political force. It remains to be seen whether their commitment is sufficiently deep that they will perform the hard, often dull party chores, on a precinct-by-precinct, county-by-county, state-by-state basis in the months ahead.

But at least the Minneapolis conference achieved the sharply limited objectives for which it was called. The major task was to replace a thirteen-member steering committee, formed the day after the Chicago convention, with a broadly based organizing committee entrusted with the task of convening a late winter convention at which the NDC will be formally constituted as the national political arm of the Democratic Left. This committee was chosen; it comprises thirty-five members, and includes representatives from almost every group the coalition hopes to gather under its wing. Delegates who attended were also directed, as a committee of the whole, to assume responsibility for stimulating the formation and growth of NDC reform movements in their own states.

Open conflicts that could destroy the coalition before it becomes anything more than a paper organization were averted, but warnings were sounded. The steering committee's decision to bar discussion of the Presidential campaign was unpopular with some, and younger delegates and minority group representatives charged that the coalition was essentially a McCarthyite enterprise, created by and for white middle-class liberals.

Radical peace groups were excluded from the organizing committee, a decision that was also unpopular with younger delegates. Student leaders cheered when New Left spokesmen Rennie Davis and Tom Hayden were nominated for the organizing committee. When the votes were counted, however, Davis had seven and Hayden six—a clear repudiation.

That did not sit well with Adam Walinsky, a former Kennedy speech writer. "After all," he told one reporter, "they were right about the war long before most of us, and right about the fundamental problems of race long before most of us, and they're groping for answers to problems many of us barely know to exist."

The most serious friction—reflecting the persistent coolness between the McCarthy and Kennedy camps—developed when Gerald Hill, chairman of the California Democratic Council, was labeled the caretaker of McCarthy's long-range political interests. This allegation which appeared in the Minneapolis Tribune prompted the immediate calling of a press conference at which Hill vigorously denied that he was acting as an agent for McCarthy at the conference.

Others decried the injection of personalities into coalition proceedings. "It's very unfortunate to describe this as an organization around the candidacy of one man," said Jack Gore, a quiet labor economist from the University of Colorado who has emerged as a moving force behind the coalition. "We think that after the election the Humphrey, Kennedy, McCarthy and McGovern labels will disappear." Earl Craig, a 29-year-old Minneapolis Negro who is serving as the coalition's full-time executive director, stalked from the press conference after objecting to NDC sponsors being consistently "forced into a box" by the press over personalities.

While the representation—224 delegates from thirty-nine states and the District of Columbia—was heavily weighted in favor of ex-McCarthy partisans, it was nevertheless impressively broad. From Alabama came John Cashin, the Negro dentist who lost the fight at Chicago for legitimization of his biracial National Democratic Party, but whose NDP candidates will battle George Wallace's regulars again in local elections on November 5. From New York came Allard K. Lowenstein, principal founder of the National Conference of Concerned Democrats, the anti-war umbrella that was instrumental in bringing McCarthy into the Presidential race in November, 1967. In the big Minnesota delegation was William W. Smith, a young Minneapolis Negro who originated the black favorite-son concept that led to the nomination at Chicago of the first Negro candidate for President, the Rev. Channing Phillips. From Delaware came Mrs. Gilbert J. Sloane, a housewife who leads the newly formed Delaware Conference of Concerned Democrats, which hopes eventually to take over that state's Democratic Party. From Window Rock, Ariz., came Raymond Nakai, chairman of the Navajo Tribal Council. The list goes on, with individuals of diverse backgrounds.

Conference participants made no attempt to act a statement of principles, elect permanent officers, or prove an organizational structure. That will come up the convention in February or March.

They were given, instead, the outline of a program chew on. Michael Harrington, whose Toward a New L has been widely discussed in New Left circles, suggested at an opening-day session on "Changing Government Policy" that the NDC should work toward three ends.

First, he said, if radical change is to be achieved in democratic and nonviolent way, it will come only by means of a majority party.

Second, the link joining middle-class reformers, minorities, poor people, blue-collar workers and others or near the lower end of the social and economic ladder must be forged on "visceral" domestic issues. Specifically, Harrington argues, the NDC should develop a program that will stress the inter-relatedness of domestic problems.

Finally, in the foreign affairs arena, post-Vietnam policy must be directed toward persuading Americans that their long-range interests will be best served if they help foot the bill for the nonviolent development of developing countries, through the United Nations.

What of the NDC's immediate prospects? Gore, the acting NDC chairman, was cautiously optimistic at the close of the Minneapolis conference. He noted that the basis from which the NDC springs is far more potent than generally recognized. McCarthy-Kennedy forces control Democratic Parties outright in nine states, and NDC organizations are active or in the formative stages in at least fifteen others. "I think we found sufficient agreement among the people who did come, and a formula for reaching the people who did not," he said.

Possibly the most striking aspect of the conference was the broad commonality of interest. The delegates appeared to agree unanimously that the old liberal-labor-Negro coalition of the New Deal era is dead or dying. Chicago was its last hurrah. Its spokesmen are worn and tired, its remedies exposed as futile.

The insurgents want to forge a new, broadly based coalition that is truly liberal and in many respects radical. It will be structured on several levels to provide geographic representation for the states, as well as for special interest groups. It will speak for the poor, the affluent suburbanite horrified by the war, the militant black on the verge of open domestic warfare, for the farmer and for rebellious elements of organized labor whose leaders have grown fat and complacent, for people concerned about the quality of contemporary life, about air pollution, mass transit, leisure time and the population explosion.

It is an immense and at the same time a delicate undertaking, since all parts of the coalition must be effectively represented if the thing is to stick together. Harrington, like Gore, is among the optimists. "After all," he said, "we picketed outside the Democratic convention at Los Angeles eight years ago. This year we picketed inside."

NO ORDINARY BLACK MAN

MARTIN SMITH

Mr. Smith is a Sacramento newspaper man who covers politics and the State Capital.

Stockton, Calif.

Until a few minutes after midnight last June 2, Cliff Watkins had much going for him; certainly more than most black men—or white men, for that matter. A college graduate, earning $8,000 a year at the start of a career in the federal Public Health Service, highly thought of by his fellow employees and his supervisors, the 24-year-old Watkins was a rising member of the Negro middle class.

Today he is having trial set for December 10 on a charge of armed robbery. He is accused of participating, with his older brother, Ted, in the robbery of a liquor store in this northern San Joaquin Valley community. Only Cliff is being tried. Ted was killed by four bullets fired by the store manager.

Stockton law-enforcement officials are upset by suggestions that the incidents surrounding the death of Ted Watkins and the mess in which Cliff Watkins finds himself should be viewed as anything but a routine, or as some have phrased it "a classic," case of armed robbery of a liquor store. But a number of doubts are being raised over the police handling of the case and the quick acceptance by officials of the view that the violence erupting in the Delta Liquors and Sporting Goods Store was just another instance of a couple of Negroes pulling a cheap robbery. The questions are being asked not only by the black community of Stockton but also thousands of miles away in Canada where Ted Watkins was a star professional football player for the Hamilton Tiger-Cats and earned $15,000 a year. The relative affluence of the two young men—Ted was 27—and their clean backgrounds are some of the reasons why Canadian newsmen, sent to investigate the case, question the official version of what happened.

Operating one of Stockton's sixty-five liquor stores is no easy business. Holdups seem to be increasing in the area from year to year, and liquor store clerks are the frequent victims. One elderly clerk was shot to death in another store before the Delta episode. Three black youths are accused of that murder and await trial. Many liquor store operators in Stockton take advantage of California's lax gun-control laws to keep firearms handy.

Fred Larsen, 25, the white manager of the Delta, demonstrated his proficiency with a gun in 1966, when he put two bullets into an obscure black man, Lonnell Perry. Larsen said Perry swung on him with a can of beer while attempting to rob the store. Captured, patched up and hauled into court, Perry pleaded guilty to attempted robbery and was sentenced to a year in jail. He was paroled in two months. Before dropping out of sight again, Perry said that he had not really tried to rob the store but had pleaded guilty in the belief that his word, from one with a criminal record, would not be accepted and in the hope that he would thus get a light sentence. Perry claimed a fight had developed when Larsen, in the heat of an argument, ordered him to "get your black ass out of here." No one paid much attention to the incident at the time.

From 1959, when Ted Watkins made a high school All-America team in Modesto, 30 miles south of Stockton, he was not obscure. His proficiency at football and other sports won him an athletic scholarship to the University of the Pacific in Stockton where he was an outstanding performer until he abruptly quit college before graduating. He then signed a contract to play football with the Ottawa Rough Riders in Canada.

Some who knew him at that time say Ted Watkins was moody and restless. Other friends recall that he was becoming increasingly concerned over the plight of the black man. He was not happy in Ottawa and was traded to Hamilton's Tiger-Cats in southern Ontario where he got along well. His football associates and his neighbors in the Hamilton suburb of Burlington thought highly of him. But his concern over racial matters deepened, and led him into the Black Power movement in Canada, an involvement which was to be noted with interest in California after his death. Watkins had something to do with the publication of a mimeographed sheet, Al Kita Sudan or The Black Book, and was also active in the Afro-American Liberation Fund. After the assassination of Martin Luther King, he took part in a demonstration before the American consulate in Toronto. When he said publicly that bias against Negroes was evident in Ottawa, he was persuaded to discuss race relations on Canadian television. He spoke gloomily of the likelihood that race riots would occur in Canada when black immigration from the United States had increased substantially.

His younger brother, Cliff, seems a less complex, possibly less interesting, personality than Ted Watkins. But Cliff Watkins gives the impression of being a steady, very likable man. He inspires confidence. After being arrested, he offered to resign his Public Health Service position, but his supervisors refused the offer. Instead, they confirmed a promotion which was due him. He turned that down "until this thing is cleared up."

Cliff Watkins' fellow employees in Stockton and nearby Sacramento organized a defense fund to assist him. Contributions to it recently totaled $1,800. Other colleagues have been assisting the defense by conducting investigations into various aspects of the case. Funds are also being raised in Canada for the widow and daughters of Ted Watkins.

Cliff, too, was named to a high school All-American team. Oregon State University gave him a football scholarship, and he played in the backfield in the 1966 Rose Bowl game. Professional teams showed interest, but that career was closed to him by a neck injury he suffered in college football.

He was graduated from college as a sociology major, and has been working toward a master's degree in psychology. His marriage to a white college classmate ended in divorce after they had one child. Last year Cliff Watkins joined the Public Health Service as a communicable disease specialist seeking to identify and have treated those who carry syphilis.

Nearing the end of his vacation with his wife and four small daughters, Ted Watkins called on his brother at his Sacramento apartment early in the evening of June 1. The brothers first visited a friend in Sacramento, then headed south toward Stockton, 45 miles down the freeway. The evening there was spent with friends Ted had made while attending the University of the Pacific. They drank wine: Cliff says he did not have much. About midnight they were in the car again, going through south Stockton toward the freeway for the drive back to Sacramento. But Ted pulled the car off West Charter Way to stop near the Delta Liquors and Sporting Goods Store. Cliff says his brother wanted to buy another bottle of wine and some potato chips. It was a store Ted had patronized when he lived in Stockton.

Cliff browsed at the magazine stand, while Ted approached Fred Larsen, who was at the cash register. Another employee was in the rear of the store and a third was outside by the trash cans.

Cliff says he did not hear what passed between his brother and Larsen—a radio was playing and a store motor also muffled the conversation—but he gradually became aware that a dispute had developed. Looking up, Cliff saw what he describes as "a hate look" on Larsen's face. He says that Negroes know what a hate look is.

With a few vital differences, Cliff Watkins' story of what happened during the next seconds agrees with the version accepted by the police. But the few differences are why Cliff Watkins is standing trial for armed robbery.

Ted swung on Larsen. District Attorney Laurence Driven, basing his statement on Larsen's story, says Ted used the wine bottle as a club—the weapon in the armed robbery. Cliff says he did not notice whether or not the bottle was in his brother's hand. Then Ted leaped over the counter. Larsen raised his pistol. Larsen told the police the weapon was under the counter; Cliff says he is convinced Larsen drew it from his person.

The younger brother rushed forward. In the most vital difference of all between the two accounts, Cliff says he was trying to stop the fight, while Larsen says Cliff reached into the cash register and took money.

Ted Watkins and Larsen grappled. Two shots were fired, according to Cliff, before the men fell halfway through a plate-glass window, the shattered glass nearly severing Ted's arm. Cliff says he rushed out the front door and around to the window in which the men were lying. Larsen on the bottom, the limp body of Ted Watkins on top of him.

From his supine position, Larsen, as Cliff recalls it, raised his pistol back over his head and fired at the younger brother as he approached. Cliff retreated several steps and, while hesitating, was shot by another armed employee of the store, Louis Huerta, who had run from behind the store. After shooting Cliff, Huerta fled into the store while Cliff, struck in the shoulder by a bullet which also entered his lung, ran to the automobile in which Ted had left the keys in the ignition. Thinking Ted dead and believing that he also might be dying, Cliff drove to Sacramento.

An issue, subsidiary in the pending trial, but which has stirred black resentment, now developed. How long did officers wait before moving Ted Watkins to a hospital to see if his life might be saved? A militant black, Ralph Lee White, later charged that the first police on the scene showed more interest in finding Cliff Watkins than in attending his gravely wounded brother. White says he urged officers to help Ted but was told to keep out of the way. Stockton Police Chief Jack O'Keefe the next day denied that there had been any avoidable delay in getting Ted Watkins to the hospital. O'Keefe said the police were first called at 12:30 A.M. and only nineteen minutes later had delivered Watkins to the San Joaquin General Hospital where he was pronounced dead on arrival. However, a Toronto Star Weekly reporter later quoted a Stockton bail bondsman as saying that he had heard of a reported shooting at the store when he was in the Stockton jail, looking after the interest of a client, at a time no later than 12:06 or 12:07 A.M.

Cliff Watkins had meanwhile driven to Sacramento. Stopping at a friend's house, he telephoned a doctor who directed him to go to a hospital. Police officers found him there as he was being treated.

Press coverage of the case has been much greater than for a run-of-the-mill liquor store shooting. Canadian newspapers, radio and television stations, especially, have bombarded law-enforcement authorities with questions. District Attorney Drivon responded thirty-six hours after the shooting with a general statement in which he accepted Larsen's version of the event. He said:

The investigation of the incident at the Delta Liquors and Sporting Goods Store, 519 West Charter Way on June 2, 1968, reveals that Theodore Watkins while in the perpetration of the robbery of Fred Earl Larsen, manager of said store, struck Larsen on the head with a bottle of wine, knocking Larsen backwards; Larsen reached for his gun which was under the counter and Theodore Watkins came over the counter at Larsen. It was then that Larsen saw Clifford Watkins reach into the open cash register till and take some monies therefrom. Theodore Watkins then forced Larsen against the plate-glass window breaking same. While Larsen was hanging partially out of the broken window and struggling with Theodore Watkins, Clifford Watkins ran outside and tried to grab the gun from Larsen. It was then that Larsen fired his gun at Theodore Watkins, four bullets entering Watkins' upper torso resulting in the latter's death.

After reviewing all of the facts presented to me, I have concluded that the shooting of Theodore Watkins by Fred Larsen was in self-defense and in the prevention of a robbery and therefore justifiable. The investigation further justifies the prosecution of Clifford Watkins for robbery and, accordingly, a complaint charging him with the robbery of Fred Larsen has been issued this date in the Stockton Municipal Court.

Except for this statement, law-enforcement authorities have established a nearly complete news blackout on details of the case. Queries to Drivon now get only an offer by him to read his statement first issued during the afternoon of June 3. He has also said, in response to suggestions he may have made a mistake in issuing a statement flatly labeling Ted Watkins a criminal, that he can see nothing wrong with the statement. He has hinted that, were it not for Supreme Court restrictions on pretrial statements, he could tell a story that would settle all doubts.

"This is a classic case, in my mind, in which all the information as it develops should be laid out for all to see," he asserted to one reporter. "I feel as though I'm walking a high tightrope. I'm afraid to go one way or the other."

He has also denied that there are any living witnesses to the killing other than Larsen and the surviving Watkins. Apparently neither of the other two employees was able to see the events which Larsen and Drivon say constituted the act of robbery.

Skeptical Canadian reporters were thorns in the side of official Stockton for several weeks after the shooting. District Attorney Drivon appears to have been bothered less by the newsmen than were Police Chief O'Keefe and some other authorities.

One Stockton jurist, Chris Papas, the senior municipal judge in the county and a man obviously in sympathy with the problems of liquor store operators (his family has been in that business in Stockton ever since prohibition ended), remarked acidly to one Canadian:

"I wonder if the same interest would be shown if Watkins had killed the clerk instead."

Just because Ted Watkins played football doesn't mean he could not have committed robbery, the judge told the reporter. Judge Papas also inveighed against "these people [who] happen to feel because they are black the federal, state and local government owes them something."

Papas, a lower court judge, will not preside at Cliff Watkins' trial, but his remarks portray the feelings of a representative of the Stockton establishment, of which he long has been a prominent member. The judge wanted the reporter to understand he is no bigot. His family, he said, has a Negro family to dinner every Easter.

In direct opposition to the official Stockton position, associates and friends of the brothers show no disposition to accept the district attorney's version of the affair. Canadian football commissioner Jake Gaudaur said of the elder brother: "His behavior was always exemplary, and I just can't believe from anything that we saw of him in Hamilton that Ted could be involved in something like this."

But doubts about the case are engendered not solely by the esteem in which the two Watkins were held. There is also the matter of the bullets in Ted Watkins' body. Cliff says he was aware of two shots being fired at Ted before he and Larsen crashed through the window. Then Larsen, still according to Cliff's story, fired at him. Cliff says that before he fled, he did not hear or see other shots fired by Larsen.

The autopsy disclosed that four bullets struck Ted Watkins. One hit him straight-on and fatally, right in the heart. Another struck him in the neck below the right ear, another in the left side, and the fourth completely from the rear, lodging below the left shoulder blade. The variety of angles appears unusual.

And why would the brothers rob a liquor store which Ted Watkins had visited in the past and where he might be remembered? If a robbery was committed, it was an appallingly stupid crime. Both brothers were regarded as intelligent men. Why would they risk their careers, indeed their lives, in a cheap holdup? They could scarcely have been that desperate for a small sum of money.

But if not a robbery, what caused the fight? The answer could be provided only if the conversation between Larsen and Ted Watkins, which Cliff says he could not hear, were known. Ted Watkins is dead. Fred Larsen is not talking to reporters.

Whatever Stockton policemen may think about liquor stores, shootings and Negroes, the facts of the case transcend the routine clichés, and it will be no ordinary trial that will begin in Stockton on December 10.

One Stockton black man, the militant Ralph Lee White, mentioned above, has commented: "Life would be a lot simpler for white folks around here if Ted Watkins had been just another nigger." Lonnell Perry would probably be quick to agree.

PERU: OIL AND THE ARMY

STEPHEN L. ROZMAN

Mr. Rozman, an assistant professor of political science at The University of Nebraska, is a student of Latin American, particularly Peruvian, affairs.

The October 3rd golpe de estado (military coup) in Peru was the third occasion in twenty years when the military of that country overthrew a democratically elected civilian government. In all three cases the seizure of power was associated with steadily deteriorating economic conditions, accompanied by inflation, wage-price spirals, labor unrest, strikes and political violence. A severe drop in export prices was on each occasion primarily responsible for the decline and instability. Serious inflation followed by political chaos are by no means unique to Peru in the Latin American area. However, nowhere in Latin America is the military more ready to assume direct control of the government to counter such a situation.

In general, the Latin American countries have colonial economies based on the export of raw materials (agricultural and mineral products) in exchange for manufactured and processed goods. Both import and export trade are oriented toward and dependent upon the United States. When the demand for raw-material exports increases in the U.S. market, the foreign exchange balance of the Latin American suppliers improves. Even basically conservative governments have undertaken impressive public works projects during such relatively good periods, and have received some support from the masses in return.

General Odría's military junta and Presidency of Peru, which encompassed an eight-year period following the overthrow of the Bustamante government in 1948, ruled during a time of relatively low inflation, high employment and public works programs—an artificial situation created by the Korean War boom. Similarly, the government of Fernando Belaúnde Terry had been bolstered by favorable sales of fishmeal and cotton, and enjoyed relative stability and apparent military support, a propitious environment for carrying out its moderate reform program. However, a rapid downturn during the past year, which caused the devaluation of the once stable sol from twenty-seven to forty per dollar, shook the foundations of the government, severely undermined Belaúnde's high popularity, and produced a wave of growing instability and violence, which the government was unable to check. The loss of two by-elections (one in Lima itself) last November marked the rapid decline of Belaúnde and his Popular Action Party and impelled the PAP's partner, the Christian Democrats, to abandon their governing coalition.

The PAP itself then began to split apart, with a serious factional division taking place almost on the eve of the military coup. The PAP candidate for the June, 1969, Presidential election, Edgardo Seoane, joined his voice to the increasingly indignant clamor against Belaúnde's weakness in dealing with the economic deterioration (including a staggering foreign debt which had reached $200 million, and his questionable behavior in signing a new oil sales contract with the International Petroleum Company, a subsidiary of Standard Oil.

IPC's ownership and exploitation of Peru's richest oil fields, la Brea y Pariñas, has long been an aggravation to nationalists from the extreme Left to the extreme Right, including, significantly, some key military officers. During my interviews with Peruvian army officers in 1965, I detected a strong current of nationalistic pride and intense indignation over the control of Peruvian mineral wealth (particularly the aforementioned oil fields) by U.S. interests. An enduring undercurrent of anti-U.S. feeling comes periodically to the surface in Peru. The reception of Vice President Nixon during his ill-fated Latin American good-will trip in 1958 is an example.

Today, there is another nationalistic outpouring. A month before the coup, the president of the Peruvian national oil enterprise, Empresa Petrolera Fiscal, resigned on the ground that President Belaúnde's stand toward the IPC was very weak, and to the detriment of the country's interests. He then caused a governmental crisis which was to end with Belaúnde's overthrow by revealing that the government had misplaced the last page in the IPC contract, the page detailing safeguards for Peru.

The head of the Peruvian joint chiefs of staff, army Gen. Juan Velasco Alvarado, expressed the concern of the military over this development and announced that the three branches of the armed forces would give the matter careful study. A month later, General Velasco headed the military junta, whose first pronouncement, after exiling Belaúnde to Argentina and assuming the reins of government, was a rebuke to the ousted President for sacrificing national dignity in his relationship with the IPC. On October 9, his government took possession of the Brea y Pariñas fields.

Peruvian nationalistic fervor had been aroused earlier this year when the United States suspended economic aid in reaction to Peru's purchase of sixteen French Mirage supersonic jets at a cost of $20 million, along with an order of Canberras from Britain and some light tanks from France. U.S. officials decried such expenditures by a country with severe socio-economic problems and inequalities at a time when its foreign debt was already large. Peruvians, however, suspected that reaction was so strong because the purchases were from France and Britain rather than from the United States. Indeed, there is considerable indignation throughout Latin America that the United States ties economic aid so closely to the purchase of goods.

In spite of these factors, it seems unlikely that nationalism and the IPC affair fully explain the military take-over. With the 1969 elections approaching, the military was probably looking around for a likely successor to Belaúnde. Since the Christian Democrats, the National Odrista Union and the PAP itself had all suffered serious factionalism, the basically cohesive APRA party (the traditional enemy of the military) had been steadily strengthening its position. The military coup of 1948 had followed by three weeks an abortive coup on the Left involving some Apristas and minority military factions. The resulting military government severely persecuted APRA leaders and forced the party's founder and chieftain Victor Raul Haya de la Torre to take refuge in the Colombian embassy for five years before an amnesty was finally granted.

Similarly, the 1962 coup canceled a Presidential election in which Haya was threatening to emerge victorious. (None of the three candidates had attained the necessary one-third plurality but the new Congress seemed destined to favor Haya.) The military today seems split over APRA. Some remember when they had difficulty distinguishing it from the Communists and feared that an Aprista government would dismantle the traditional military institution and create a new, revolutionary military in its place. Others pay little attention to the party's evolution, remembering only the Trujillo massacre of 1932, when some Apristas captured a military barracks and slaughtered all the officers (impelling the military to round up some 6,000 Apristas and summarily execute them). However, an important sector of high-ranking officers has come to accept APRA as a legitimate political force, which if it gained power would no longer threaten military interests. Evidently, this group has not yet gained the ascendancy and it probably will not do so until the aging Haya relinquishes control of the party or at least ceases to be its Presidential candidate.

The military's traditional association with conservative groups must also be considered. Belaúnde had recently received authorization from the Congress to exercise emergency decree powers, and he had undertaken a program to establish a general property tax to obtain more revenues from the well to do; he was about to increase taxes on Peruvian investors who had placed their money in overseas banks and stock corporations; and he had already introduced a program banning imports of goods considered to be luxuries and adding a 15 per cent tax on other imported goods. Many of these measures were openly opposed by rightist elements, and one must be careful not to confuse the military's nationalistic fervor and perhaps anti-U.S. sentiment with a turn to the left.

Like earlier military juntas in Peru and elsewhere in Latin America, the Velasco junta has expressed scorn for the civilian parties and politicians. A cabinet crisis had ensued in June when Gen. Morales Bermúdez, the Treasury minister, resigned after the cabinet had failed to draw up a meaningful plan for economic recovery. In a publicized letter, General Morales said, in effect, that the civilian politicians were too pliant, lacking the discipline and commitment of the military. It remains to be seen whether General Velasco can reverse the current economic downturn, especially if he follows through on a policy of ardent nationalism, which would perhaps cut off the sources of necessary foreign credit.

Another major question is whether other civilian governments in Latin America are soon to fall victim to military coups from inability to cope with deteriorating economic conditions and consequent political instability. Two of South America's major countries, Brazil and Argentina, have already come under the rule of the military and seem destined to remain there indefinitely. Chile and Uruguay have long been exalted as shining examples of democracy in Latin America, with traditions of nonintervention by the military in politics. However, both are currently suffering very severe economic conditions and increased political instability. And both are surrounded by neighbors whose governments have come under military control. Should the military seize power in those two countries, perhaps students of Latin American politics will become less fascinated by the contrast between democratic and nondemocratic government and will focus their concern on barriers to socio-economic development.

CONGLOMERATES ...

THE TOTAL CORPORATION

H. L. NIEBURG

Mr. Nieburg teaches political science at the University of Wisconsin (Milwaukee). He is the author of In the Name of Science (Quadrangle) and Nuclear Secrecy and Foreign Policy (Public Affairs Press).

When Litton Industries begins to build ore carriers, Ling-Temco-Vought to make tennis rackets, and Aerojet General to manage California's traffic problems, what is happening? The new rationalized giants are going into fields previously organized in smaller units. With the systems approach, they are in effect pursuing the logical culmination of highly centralized operations and planning made possible by computers and by the capability to design technology to perform almost any task.

A handful of huge industrial organizations are becoming quasi-public utilities, dominating all areas of production and distribution, creating a self-sustaining, self-serving, self-justifying and self-perpetuating industrial oligarchy as the price for efficiency and progress. This is the predominant fact of American industrial life today. In the name of "private enterprise" giant corporations control their environment and immunize themselves against all external discipline, especially that of the market place. Through separation of ownership from management, the new giants are emancipated from stockholders. By reinvesting profits they escape the capital market and the financier. They neutralize consumer sovereignty by Madison Avenue manipulation of their clientele. By government contract, pressure-group activity, personnel interchange, etc., they share power with the state. Whatever the corporation cannot do for itself, it accomplishes through government; through policies and programs to maintain full employment, through subsidies for research and development, through support to education that will assure a supply of scientific and technical skills. The industrial giants come to perform society's planning functions, while preserving the myths of an anti-planning culture. The market place is dead, private property is dying, and impersonal and anonymous power structures are acting out Galbraith's "technological imperatives."

In 1968 more than 3,000 corporations will be consolidated into larger financial enterprises in the greatest merger wave in the country's history. As a result, the character of U.S. industry is being radically transformed. The typical corporation of the 1970s is apt to look like General Motors in the mid-1960s. Many such companies are sharply increasing their sales (eighty-three U.S. companies reported gross revenues last year of more than $1 billion each), enlarging their profits (eighty-two manufacturers had net earnings of $50 million or more in 1965), and expanding their international commitments (American firms are increasing their overseas investments at a rate of more than $10 million a day—see "Europe Defies the Dollar" by Michael Tanzer, The Nation, September 23). The era of the huge, diversified, international conglomerate is here. At the moment 200 corporations (out of a total of approximately 200,000) control nearly 60 per cent of the country's manufacturing wealth.

In 1963, 1,000 companies disappeared through merger in the United States; in 1964, almost 2,000. The number grows each year and is projected at 3,400 for 1968. Not only is the absolute number of mergers high by any standard of comparison (fewer than 200 firms vanished annually a decade ago) but a great many large firms are involved. In 1965, Pure Oil (with assets of $750 million), Richfield Oil (assets: $500 million), Consolidation Coal (assets: $465 million) and ABC-Paramount were acquired by, respectively, Union Oil, Atlantic Refining, Continental Oil and International Telephone and Telegraph. Between 1948 and 1965, more than 800 companies, with assets of at least $10 million each, were assimilated into larger empires, mostly those ruled by the 200 biggest manufacturing corporations. Art Buchwald may be right that "the whole country will soon be merged into one large company."

At one time most mergers involved direct competitors, or suppliers and their customers. Today more than 70 per cent of all mergers are of the conglomerate variety. Conglomeration has carried many firms into widely diversified product and geographic markets. Borden, a dairy company, is heavily engaged in chemicals. Lipton Tea (a subsidiary of Unilever, the English-Dutch colossus) controls Good Humor. R. J. Reynolds, commonly associated with cigarettes, sells poultry, canned soups, catsup and soft drinks. International Telephone and Telegraph, for years in the communications business outside the United States (it still is, with 150,000 employees in its foreign manufacturing plants alone), has acquired an odd assortment of enterprises: Hayes Furnace Co., Aetna Finance, Great International Life Insurance, Hamilton Management Co. (a $400 million mutual fund), Avis Rent-a-Car, ABC-Paramount (itself diversified, with broadcasting, theatre, phonograph records and publishing assets), and Airport Parking (with facilities at air terminals in fifty-nine of the nation's largest cities). Continental Baking Co. (Wonder Bread, Hostess Cupcakes, Morton Frozen Foods, etc.) became in September a wholly owned ITT subsidiary by an exchange of shares totaling $270 million. In late September, Xerox tendered an offer to acquire CIT, the nation's second largest finance company (insurance, banking, X-ray equipment, greeting cards, steel furniture, etc.) by pooling about $1.5 billion worth of common stock.

Gulf and Western Industries, Inc., is another prime example of a fast-growing conglomerate. Five years ago, it was an unheralded producer and distributor of auto parts, with sales of $107 million a year. Last year, Gulf &

Western had sales of $1.3 billion. Its volume in the current fiscal year is expected to reach $2 billion. The company's rapid-fire acquisition program has carried it into such fields as motion pictures and television, sugar, cigars, metal-working machinery, tools, bearings, consumer finance, insurance and paper manufacture. The company is currently bidding for a controlling interest in the Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, a big producer of farm, electrical and construction equipment that was unsuccessfully wooed last year by Ling-Temco-Vought and several other companies. Gulf & Western recently acquired 1.6 million shares of Pan American World Airways, about 5 per cent of shares outstanding, worth about $39 million.

Aerospace firms (the major repository of advanced technology because defense and space innovation have for twenty years been the dominating factor in the organization of industrial life) are the most aggressive conglomerates, building on the foundation of profits and equities earned in the performance of government contracts. These industries claim priority in the operation of the nation's system controls. As spending for strategic weapons systems and space at last begins to inch downward ($40 billion for aerospace contracts in 1968) and as domestic problems simultaneously sharpen, the aerospace companies are making this special capability available for the operation of Job Corps camps, the management and planning of poverty programs, crime fighting, waste management and urban transportation. Thus as public facilities and domestic needs at last begin to receive official attention, the quasi-public utilities are moving into areas where civil servants of municipal, state and national agencies or non-profit universities once did the job. They are converting every urgent social need into a profitable business.

Congressman Wright Patman has alerted the Justice Department to the role of commercial banks in the conglomeration process and the growth of concentration in banking itself. A staff study by the House Banking Committee contends that the banks' influence is exerted largely through the estimated $607 billion in assets—many of them corporate stocks with voting rights—which banks hold as trustees for pension funds, foundations, private trusts and other actual owners. In addition, the report says, influence is exerted by directors who serve on the governing boards both of banks and of other businesses, as well as by the normal function of banks as sources of credit. "A few banking institutions are in a position to exercise significant influence, and perhaps even control, over some of the largest business enterprises in the nation," Patman reported.

To a considerable degree, the apparent financial success of new conglomerates is a fraud, destined to be transitory unless new acquisitions continue as a method of acquiring assets and cash reserves that can be reported as income by the holding company. Most of the mergers and acquisitions are carried out by exchanges of stock, a method which often enables the parent to buy a company with the latter's own assets. Complicated financial maneuvers accompany the merger; "paper pyramids" are constructed, involving convertible preferred stocks, convertible and nonconvertible debentures, warrants and the like. Without any reduction in costs, without any of the claimed improvements in management and marketing, the stock and market value of the parent soars on the day a new company is acquired by a "pooling of interests." Because the stock of the acquired company had been selling at a lower price (relative to earnings) and because its assets have already been depreciated on its books, the parent conglomerate can "buy earnings" and create an impression of unusually rapid growth. Further, by reorganizing the acquisitions into a variety of new companies and then, on the wave of rising stock values, floating new securities, enormous sums can be milked for new absorptions.

The Los Angeles Times (August 6) reported a whopping jump in the earnings of Occidental Petroleum Corp., occasioned by the acquisition of two non-oil firms whose normal tax indebtedness would henceforth be sheltered by the 27.5 per cent depletion allowance.

In spite of a belated flurry of interest this year by the FTC and Justice Department, the federal government has provided little correction or control. Antitrust enforcement has checked mergers between some competitors (the merger of Bethlehem and Youngstown Steel was barred, for instance), but it has not seriously grappled with conglomeration. Fewer than 1 per cent of such mergers have been formally protested by the antitrust agencies.

Last summer, the FTC announced a sweeping investigation. It notified Gulf & Western to expect trouble if its plans to take over Allis Chalmers were pursued. Maremont Corporation has been put on notice that the FTC may some day order it to give up forty firms that it acquired over a fifteen-year period. The Antitrust Division of the Justice Department has been less eager to tackle conglomerate mergers, although nothing in the law prevents the government from seeking to unscramble them. Justice did zero in on a proposed merger of Bethlehem Steel and Cerro in March, 1968, and it was called off. In June, the division issued some guidelines that indicate rather clearly that other conglomerate mergers may be challenged. The Federal Communications Commission announced that purchase of A.B.C. stock by Hughes would be subjected to scrutiny. The FCC had previously blocked a merger of A.B.C. into International Telephone and Telegraph.

Donald I. Baker, acting assistant chief of the evaluation section of the Antitrust Division, has said that the conglomerate movement "represents a trend toward greater overall concentration in the economy," and expressed doubt that "there are any real economies of scale to be achieved by putting a number of disparate enterprises together in a single corporate structure."

Mr. Baker suggested three possible legislative changes which "Congress might make to deal with this trend . . . if it were to determine that some action were desirable." The first, he said, would involve some form of administrative approval for acquisitions by a company that had reached a specified size. This would require an administrative body, such as the FTC, to make rulings in each case. The second would involve requiring a company above a specified size to dispose of assets of comparable value each time it made a new acquisition. This might encourage large conglomerates to evaluate their acquisitions more carefully. A third possibility would be for Congress to modify the tax provisions that make it attractive for the owners of an enterprise to sell to a conglomerate. The law now permits such an exchange of securities without capital gains tax.

Outside the government, some leading accountants are calling for changes in accounting practices that would make it harder to claim increased earnings as a result of mergers. Some would ban any mergers in industries that are dominated by a fairly small number of firms. Others would lay down a flat rule: no more mergers for the 100 or 200 largest companies!

The Securities and Exchange Commission entered the fray in September (1968), proposing a change in financial reporting by conglomerates to make it easier for investors to evaluate real profit. If the new rules are adopted, conglomerates will be required, on registering securities, to break down sales, income, and assets for separate divisions and subsidiaries that account for 10 per cent or more of volume. "Comparable data on revenues and earnings received from foreign sources and from government procurement or any single customer are also to be reported."

These proposed rules may be viewed as an SEC response to the threat of investigation by FTC and Justice. Two top conglomerate-builders have heatedly attacked the trend. James J. Ling charges "business McCarthyism and witch hunting" which, he says, has harmed thousands of investors. Glen McDaniel, chairman of Litton Industries, denounces the use "of abstract theories" to judge the legality of mergers. Candidate Richard Nixon has made conglomerate-freedom-from-investigation an explicit part of his campaign, promising in a recent document (October) that the securities industry will, if he is elected, be spared "the heavy-handed, bureaucratic, regulatory schemes" of the Johnson Administration.

Financial observers do not believe, however, that the trend will slow because of the FTC study or the Justice Department's warnings. They expect the study to take a long time and question whether Congress will implement it. Some suggest that the merger rate will rise as companies hasten to make acquisitions before a policy develops. The history of antitrust activity against traditional concentration does not inspire optimism in the efficacy of government to reverse the evolution of corporate power without far more basic changes in American society.

The process of concentration is self-perpetuating. With the trend being toward larger and fewer producers, raw-material suppliers and labor must organize defensively to maintain their bargaining power. On the other hand, the producer seeks to bring his suppliers and his distributors under his own control. The result of this circular process is continued concentration.

The price structure expresses the relative bargaining power of corporate organizations vis-à-vis one another, the consumer and the government. It becomes, in effect, a political fact, determined by political relationships. Each manufacturer seeks to improve his position by manipulating to the degree he can the levels of production and prices. Suppliers who are economically divided and weak can be exploited by more concentrated buyers who drive down the cost of raw materials. The consumer is weakest of all, and the administered prices of the goods he buys are set so as to shift to him the cost of all the bargains which the manufacturer is forced to make with bankers, suppliers and labor unions.

This is very unlike the theoretical market of Adam Smith, where the savings of technological innovation and increased productivity are passed on to the consumer, thus increasing effective demand and production. In the quasi-monopolistic markets of a mature economy, production is set at a level which will maintain prices and acceptable profit margins in terms of costs, invested capital and the attractiveness of corporate paper to investors. The result is artificial restriction of production to stabilize prices at a high level. Technological innovation and other kinds of saving may produce a cutback of production to maintain the same or a higher price level.

Chronic high-level slack in the economy was obvious prior to the 1965 Vietnam escalation. In spite of five unprecedented years without recession, unemployment still stood at 6 to 8 per cent for white Americans, and twice as high for Negroes and teen-agers. U.S. productive capacity was about 12 to 18 per cent underemployed. The effects of the $14 billion tax relief enacted in steps during that period, and of large peacetime federal budgets, soon wore off and the slack reappeared. Most startling of all is the evidence that even the fever prosperity of Vietnam escalation has been grinding to a halt during the past year, in spite of the injection of a $24 billion to $30 billion a year war stimulant. Growth of the GNP in 1967 was a disappointing 2.6 per cent.

Cartelization and quasi-monopolistic administered prices produce the paradoxical situation in which liquid capital accumulates in the accounts of those least able to find new ways of consumption and investment. Most people have great unsatisfied needs but limited effective demand, which produces the vicious circle by which corporate efforts to maintain profits act to reduce employment and income still further. To evade this circular effect, government is driven to increasing quantities of pump-priming and subsidy in order to augment purchasing power. But the power of the corporate giants to administer prices eventually soaks up additional consumer income with creeping (or, since 1965, galloping) price inflation, and leads once more to production at reduced levels and to the danger of more drastic contractions of economic activity.

Creeping inflation becomes a way of life, softened and maintained by periodic injections of public funds through tax reductions, welfare programs, subsidies to education, and the maintenance of employment and income levels through nongrowth government expenditures for R&D, space, defense and intellectual make-work projects. This dynamic gives the centers of concentrated economic power a vested interest in government spending, including welfare programs that do not threaten the status quo. Thus the most powerful elements of American business have converted to Keynesianism—but this new Keynesianism produces growth as a by-product of other processes which only enhance the distortions of power and income, thereby forcing government to maintain an ever larger subsidy defense against recurrent crises.

Federal budget expenditures on a cash basis now equal approximately one-quarter of total national income. Total public sector impact can be calculated in different ways: if one adds to the military budget all end-product expenditures by the federal government (including such things as military assistance, atomic energy, conduct of foreign affairs, space research, agricultural resources, public housing, urban renewal, etc.), one derives a figure of roughly $87 billion. Similarly, end-product expenditures by state and local government amount to about $27 billion (for education, highways, public welfare, health, hospitals, policy, etc.). One may also include what Robert Solo calls "politically directed expenditures to support consumption or investment by entities outside the political economy," but paid for by the public—about $80 billion (including tax benefits, direct and indirect subsidies, etc.). To this may be added what Solo calls "politically directed income distribution," about $8 billion in federal, state and local public assistance and welfare, $20 billion in various social insurance payments, and $4 billion to groups such as veterans and farmers. This gives a conservative estimate of some $232 billion that is politically controlled, more than 25 per cent of the GNP. It is massive by any reckoning.

Business has prospered immensely under recent administrations and has come to accept government as a useful ally. Stimulated by a consciously expansionary fiscal policy, the economy has grown rapidly since 1961, sending corporate sales and profits to record heights. Until recent years, federal pump-priming aimed mainly to subsidize accumulation of capital in order to maintain employment and induce expansion by fostering investment. Tax benefits and traditional subsidies largely favored investment. A fundamental policy shift, which beckoned prior to 1965, was intended to expand the consumer market through tax relief at lower and moderate income levels, and to inject greater equity of effective demand into the chronically depressed sections of the civilian market. But this shift was corrupted into tokenism by the escalating Vietnam costs and by Congressional resistance.

The relative and chronic contraction of consumer purchasing power has been a serious drag on economic stability (not to mention positive growth). In addition, the inflation of paper equities increases the future share of income to be derived from interest and dividends, thus steadily adding to the drag. So-called liberal economists have since the Great Depression believed this mechanism to be primarily responsible for the modern pattern of cyclical contraction and general stagnation of the American economy. This became the official doctrine of the Kennedy-Johnson administration and, wonder of wonders, is now widely reflected by conservative and business economists. There is no longer an argument as to federal responsibility to make effective use of all policy instruments; the new controversies concern how, when, how much, for what ends, and in whose interests. In other words, "who gets what, when and how?" And the technical assessments can no longer be abstracted from the more pragmatic question: "How much power do they have, in Congress, at the polls or in the streets?"

The state has long since abandoned its classical pose of hands-off observer of the market, as well as the more recent one of balancer among private power groups under conditions of imperfect competition. In a real sense, national coordination and policy making have integrated every aspect of economic life, a trend which also threatens other areas of private action. Political relationships have replaced supply and demand; group bargaining and pressure politics have largely replaced private bargaining and contract.

The old distinction between what is private and what is public is in the process of being abandoned; but an explicit role which will protect democracy and the public interest has not been formulated. The traditional means of checking corporate power has been some sort of direct regulation. The possible techniques range from a system that would require big companies in concentrated industries to give formal advance notice of price increases and provide evidence of need, to utility-like regulation that would call for detailed government control. Such plans are at present academic; the Administration has steadfastly refused even to acknowledge the possibility that some day the government might have to assume statutory authority to back up wage-price guidelines. The route of regulation is not promising; most studies of utilities disclose a tendency to define the public interest in terms of the profits and financial growth of the regulated companies.

The convergence of politics and economics reflects important changes in our national problems and institutions; the guarantees of pluralism based upon private property have all but passed away, revealing underlying political power relationships in a manner which converts almost all the traditional areas of private economic bargaining into political activity and policy dialogue. The political process, always close to the surface of economic organization and activity, has broken through and political factors increasingly assert their predominance. The breakthrough is induced by war and diplomacy, the multiplication of instruments for public intervention in economic life, the massive role of government procurement of goods and services, the forms of public subsidies and contracting, the tendency of the economy to lapse into high-level stagnation, the intensified concentration of private economic power, and the impact of accelerating technological innovation. Centralized and concentrated institutions produce a volatile and dangerous brand of political pluralism, but apparently the only kind that can challenge a computerized military-industrial society.

What must come is a system of values and institutions to replace economic initiative and private property as guarantors of political independence and pluralism. As economic pluralism disappears, only political pluralism, safeguarded by new institutions of representation, can make the exercise of power both responsive and limited. A heightened and more representative infra-structure of interest groups is necessary at all levels of society from local school boards to national regulatory agencies, in private as in public institutions. The contemporary politicization of the economic system is creating new constituencies whose ultimate effect upon public policy, already apparent, is to revise and reform the status quo. The monopoly of social purpose, too long in the hands of too few, cannot escape the challenge.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Future: Less and Less Security

UNLESS PEACE COMES: A Scientific Forecast of New Weapons. Edited by Nigel Calder. The Viking Press. 243 pp. $5.75.

JOHN GLIEDMAN

Mr. Gliedman is a graduate student in psychology at M. I. T. and is at present at work on a spy novel.

The weapons of World War II already have an antediluvian air about them: the B-17, the B-24, the B-26, when not remembered as a jumble of letters and numbers or as items in the latest CIA operation, are recalled as lumbering prehistoric creatures limping under their load of heavy armor plate, bristling with gun turrets and radio antennas. Even the V-2 seems remote and dated, something from a Fritz Lang film rather than Peenemünde. Whether today's weapons will appear quite so tame from the perspective of another twenty years is problematic; but what is clear is that the next two decades will witness a terrifying proliferation of new and not so new weapons of mass murder and control.

More than an inkling of these prospects was provided by Herman Kahn and Anthony Wiener's chapter on technology in their book The Year 2000; for boldness, scope and originality, their treatment cannot be surpassed. But the topic is enormous and there is a great need for complementary efforts. One such study has just appeared, a collection of essays edited by Nigel Calder: Unless Peace Comes: A Scientific Forecast of New Weapons.

Surprisingly, the book is rather conservative in its approach. Of course one can glean from it a list of possible weapons which sounds like something from Central Casting—robot submarines and aircraft, perhaps "walking bombs" and robot soldiers; weather control used to cause droughts and devastating storms in an enemy's heartland, even the triggering of nearly irreversible changes in the climate; floating airfields and vast undersea submarine bases; laser "ray guns," diseases of exceptional virulence which can be easily spread by a few saboteurs; gases and mind poisons still worse than the ones now in the arsenals of the major powers. And the prospect of the wide diffusion of at least some of these weapons (along with nuclear explosives) among nations of nearly every size is terrible enough.

But many of the "advances" most likely in weaponry are overlooked or slighted. The potential for misuse of the "second generation" of psychic agents (tranquilizers, hallucinogens and the like) is barely treated, as are the Brave New World possibilities for biology, now that the manipulation of the genetic code and the production of clones seem within reach. Nor is the revolution in electronic miniaturization traced adequately—a process which has reached the point where some engineers believe they are twenty years away from being able to build as compactly as nature. (For an excellent discussion of these topics, the reader should consult Kahn and Wiener's The Year 2000.) Most seriously, perhaps, no attention is given to the future technology of guerrilla war and counterinsurgency.

And yet, even with these important omissions, the book illuminates perhaps the greatest of the many ironies of the arms race: that it often feeds upon breakthroughs in civilian fields—an irony which is all too easily overlooked because of the peaceful application of certain kinds of military research. Reactors which generate electricity create plutonium as a natural by-product; and so by 1971 the nuclear power plants of seven countries will be producing enough fissile material for each of them to make fourteen A-bombs a year—Canada, West Germany, India, Italy, Japan, Sweden and Spain. As for chemical weapons, it is argued in one essay that:

each piece of medical or psychopharmacological research undertaken for humane purposes in order to alleviate illness and save life, and each fundamental biochemical investigation undertaken in order to understand and satisfy our mind, may lead to possible military applications.

Nor are the contributors themselves immune to the air of cruel paradox which pervades the volume. Some of them lapse into manners of expression which belong to the future they warn of, a future in which man is reduced to something less than a machine. "The vulnerability of a target," writes one of them, "to the impacting energy depends in a complex way upon the nature and duration of the energy and the characteristics of the target, which is not uniformly vulnerable."

Another speaks of a strange creature called a soldier: "The traditional function of a soldier, whether on foot or in a vehicle, is to find the enemy soldier and destroy him with a weapon. To do so he must propel himself across the land until he is close enough to detect the enemy by sight and aim his weapon. All these functions can be performed far better by a compact armored robot with a sophisticated walking mechanism." A third writes: "Until now, the twentieth century has simply allowed latent infections to develop until violent conflict becomes inevitable. Any preventive treatment would be preferable to our drastic cures." Only the last of these examples of Newspeak comes from the pen of a general; the others are by scientists. He who fights devils, said Nietzsche, must be careful not to become one himself.

But what strikes one most forcibly about the book is the extraordinary insecurity of the future world which it depicts, an insecurity which may provoke awesome countermeasures. When any of fifty nations can devastate a great power by infiltrating a few saboteurs armed with powerful toxins or psychic poisons; when a criminal ring or a band of political extremists can hold a city in ransom with the threat of an A-bomb explosion or a plague; when a single scientist, a technician, or in some cases anyone with a certain minimum of intelligence and access to a laboratory can synthesize a weapon of mass murder, the distinctive markings of a nation's enemies and its citizens will be hopelessly blurred; and there will be an immense premium upon surveillance of every imaginable sort. Just how far this could go is suggested by Kahn and Wiener in The Year 2000:

A capability for listening and recording temporarily (or even permanently) can be made very inexpensive. One can imagine the . . . recording of an appreciable percentage of . . . telephone conversations . . . [and] "bugged" conversations in bars, restaurants, offices. . . . It would then be feasible to scan these conversations rapidly by means of a high speed computer—at least for key phrases—and then record any conversations that meet some criteria for justifying special interest. . . . Indeed future computers and programs should be able to carry out much more complex operations—possibly responding to nonverbal information, such as an unusually angry or threatening tone of voice. Such computers may also be able to apply a great deal of inferential logic on their own . . . making hypotheses and investigating leads in a more or less autonomous manner, all the while improving their techniques as they accumulate information about patterns of criminal behavior—or any other kind of behavior that authorities decide ought to be observed.

Whether this is just a paranoid fantasy or not, what Harvey Wheeler calls in his essay on "The Strategic Calculators" the "revolution in the handling of intelligence information" is already well under way:

The United States has been operating four intelligence analysis centers in Saigon, with computers reportedly operating twenty-four hours a day. Over a thousand workers add to their computerized files more than 100,000 items each month. . . . The long term aim is nothing less than to account for all enemy material and troops. Ultimately the system will be able to apply to enemy forces the same procedures of accounting and analysis that computerized inventory systems in industry use to account for the amount and location of production items. . . . If military information processing ever produces truly reliable projections of probable enemy actions, the consequences are clear. In the first place, decision-making will leave the hands of both field commanders and political authorities to become an adjunct of the information-processing system; then the computers may indeed take charge. Secondly, the tendency will be to make all military actions pre-emptive. . . . With the world brought under continuous surveillance operations, capable of piping masses of strategic information into real-time computer-analysis systems, the military prospect is for the advent of an age of pre-emptive warfare, triggered and directed by computer.

Physics, biology, medicine, psychology, cybernetics, geophysics, oceanography—the list of fields capable of producing or assisting major breakthroughs in weaponry grows longer and longer. Nearly twenty years ago, a pioneer in one of these fields, the late Norbert Wiener, seriously considered suppressing his work in cybernetics because of its great potential for misuse; but he decided against it:

After toying with the notion for some time, I came to the conclusion that this was impossible, for the ideas which I possessed belonged to the times rather than to myself. If I had been able to suppress every word of what I had done, they were bound to reappear in the work of other people, very possibly in a form in which the philosophical significance and the social dangers would be stressed less. I could not get off the back of this bronco, so there was nothing for me to do but to ride it.

The social evils which Wiener foresaw involved the effect of automated factories on the economy. One wonders if he would have ridden his bronco if he had taken seriously all the military and police-state possibilities of cybernetics—not out of any rational calculation of good and evil but simply to avoid being associated with such an ambiguous enterprise. At any rate, when the issues were clearer, his position was unequivocal. Asked to assist a scientist working on the missile program, he categorically refused; and ended his letter explaining his position with these words: "I do not expect to publish any future work of mine which may do damage in the hands of irresponsible militarists."

At the end of their article on chemical warfare, Marcel Fetizon and Michel Magat write: "We must either eliminate science or eliminate war." Both alternatives are, of course, as extravagant as a world which has spent a trillion dollars on "defense" since World War II and is sure to spend still more on its weaponry in the next twenty years. No doubt it will get its money's worth.

Literal & Free

POEMS HUMANOS/HUMAN POEMS. By César Vallejo. A bilingual edition. Translated from the Spanish by Clayton Eshleman. Grove Press. 326 pp. $8.50.

JOHN KNOEPFLE

Mr. Knoepfle is a member of the English faculty at St. Louis University. He is the author of a book of poems Rivers Into Islands (University of Chicago Press).

César Vallejo, Peruvian poet who spent the last decade or so of his life in Europe, assembled some ninety-four poems in the months before his death in Paris in 1938. These poems were originally published by his widow in the following year. They have now been fully translated by Clayton Eshleman and have been printed by Grove Press in a volume with matching Spanish and English texts.

Vallejo's name is most often linked with Pablo Neruda's. These two men are considered to be the greatest Latin American poets of the first half of the 20th century. Vallejo was born in 1892

"At last, we are given a proper context for grasping the full, ugly meaning of America's involvement in the Vietnam war." —Richard Falk

Richard J. Barnet

Intervention and Revolution

America's Confrontation with Insurgent Movements Around the World

"Brilliantly argued and devastatingly detailed."

—Ronald Steel, N.Y. Review of Books

"A most sophisticated, well-documented critique of American foreign policy."

—Library Journal

$6.95 at bookstores

An NAL Book

WORLD PUBLISHING

Times Mirror

New York and Cleveland

in a small town in northern Peru. He died in a Paris clinic, his death hastened by the fall of the Spanish Republic whose fortune he had adopted as his own. In Peru his pride, his talent and his background, Indian and Spanish, caused his existence to be one of triumph and misadventure. He left his native land in 1923. The next fifteen years of his life are part of the history of Europe in the thirties; friends in Madrid and Paris whose names are now legendary, conversion to Marxism, trouble with the police, constant political activity and constant writing. During these hand-to-mouth years he produced in addition to his poetry several plays, novels, essays and a variety of newspaper articles. Much of this work remains to be collected and translated.

Vallejo is a difficult poet and a challenge to any translator. He has contempt for the poetic. He strews his thought like some primordial creature hurling boulders. When he wants to, he can write a superb idiomatic Spanish, but much of the time he jams and tortures his sentences. He is an engineer of speech; he arranges his words at will; and when he feels like it, he makes up his own words. At his best he overwhelms a reader. Even when he is grumbling fatalistically and sentimentally, he has appalling power.

Clayton Eshleman has been working on his translations of Poemas Humanos for at least six years. He has lived in Peru for some of that time in an effort to get as close as possible to sources of Vallejo's art. In the preface of the volume, Eshleman states that he put each poem through nine revisions, and that he has learned that it is best to be as literal as possible in rendering Vallejo's poems into English. In an issue of The Nation (April 24, 1967), he wrote that a translator should "annihilate himself, facing another's inspiration."

This is indeed a noble ideal, and surprisingly, Eshleman is able to suppress a translator's normal impulse to arrange Vallejo, to smooth him out and to rewrite him. Eshleman has certainly worked hard at this. Earlier versions of the translations published in the quarterlies are poorer stuff when compared with the copies printed in the Grove Press volume. Eshleman has modified his initial conception of Vallejo's voice: Vallejo no longer sounds like a talented Village dropout. There is an evident respect now for the compactness of Vallejo's line; an admirable attempt has been made to reproduce the pace and fluidity of that line.

Eshleman's labor gives us again and again translations which reveal moments of excellence. These lines from "Life, this life" are literal where a translator should be literal, and free where he can be free:

*Bursting ineffaceable doves, fragrant doves, handwounded they'd come, would turn
up along hazardous digestive routes to tell me their phosphorescent things, storytelling birds,
transitive long-lobed birds*

In this passage it is "bursting ineffaceable" and "would turn up" and "storytelling" where he made a choice among various possibilities and took what he thought best for his purposes. In the more unexpected phrases of Vallejo, he keeps to the strange and the literal: "hazardous digestive routes" and "transitive long-lobed birds." The result is a beautiful rendering of Vallejo's impossible poetry.

Being literal for Eshleman means that he will go to strange English constructions when Vallejo is doing the same in Spanish:

*A pillar supporting solace, pillar other,
duplicate pillar, pillarish*

In the poem which opens with the line "Sweetness through hearty sweetness," Eshleman has coined the makeshift "hearty" to approach the rich density of Vallejo's corazona.

On occasion, however, Eshleman does violence to his own ideal as a translator.

THE OFFERING (Allahabad, India)

*Just where two sacred rivers join,
Worshippers offer yellow flowers,
Cupfull of milk, and a silence so fluent
The creak of a boat or a heron's cry
Seems trying to sound assent
And even the rag spinning by was given
By someone in token. I offer
My hand to the waters.*

*You can follow the smouldering shine of bathers
Down to where corpses smoke, and temples
Behind, and houses squeezed like a mob
Trying to get at the shore to drop
Something in, if only their silence,
And it's all one motion, you feel it by hand,
As your fingers blindly tug Toward the only ocean.*

LEONARD NATHAN

In "I'm laughing," he transposes barbados de barba inmemorial into "bearded with immemorial beards," a horror in English which cannot be justified from the Spanish. The poem "Violence of the hours" is well translated for the most part, but the conclusion suffers because Eshleman milks velándola of a meaning that is not in the word. It can mean "to keep watch over" or "to hold a wake," but not "to wake up." Eshleman's "waking it" for velándola leaves the reader sprawled on a pun, not knowing whether something is being awakened or watched over.

Sometimes passages in the translations defy a reader. In "Telluric and Magnetic," the reader has to confront "and I make myself understood on a quena." The word quena is a loan from Quechua and means "a kind of Indian flute." It is an inhorn term in English and for all a reader can make of it, Eshleman could just as well have served up dimit or whoosha. In "A pillar supporting solace" the line las tablas de esta frente becomes "the tablas of this forehead," an example of a number of instances where Eshleman translates from one language into the same language. Footnotes would have been helpful in such cases.

At least in one poem, the beautiful "El Libro de la Naturaleza," Eshleman's devotion to the literal seriously obscures the meaning. Vallejo is sustaining a conceit throughout this poem which involves, among other things, a deck of cards. Phrases such as "three of cups," "horse of golds" and "king of swords" have English equivalents in hearts, diamonds and spades, but are meaningless as they stand in the translation.

And then there are times when Eshle-man forgets that he is a disciple and tries to re-create Vallejo; and whenever this happens the reader's hackles rise. The last line of "Poem to be Read and Sung," for instance, makes Vallejo's plain Es una historia into "What a fucking story!"

These translations have evident weaknesses, but the cumulative effect of the volume is strong and impressive. The bad spots usually are limited to a word or a line at the most. More often than not, Eshleman has managed to follow Vallejo through his changes and most of the time he has not confused his own style with Vallejo's. The book is readable and flashes page by page with good things. These lines begin "Anniversary":

*How much fourteen there's been in existence!
What we believed in the jog on a corner!
What a synthetic diamond the skull is!
How much more sweetness lengthwise, deeper surface:
how much fourteen there's been in so little one!*

And these conclude "Well? The pallid metalloid heals you?":

*And the hen lays her infinite,
one by one;
beautiful earth comes out of the smoking syllables,
you are depicted standing next to your brother,
under the bed the dark color thunders and the octopi race and collide.*

*And then, lord slave?
The metalloids work in your anguish?*

Eshleman has approximated the tortured, deliberate scientific rhetoric and sudden poetry of the great Peruvian who looked at men and God with the eyes of Job.

The Art of Artifice

LOST IN THE FUNHOUSE. By John Barth. Doubleday & Co. 216 pp. $4.95.

ALFRED APPEL, Jr.

Mr. Appel is a professor of English at Northwestern University. His annotated edition of Lolita will be published by McGraw-Hill in 1969, and he is preparing a critical study of Nabokov for New Directions.

"How does one write a novel?" asks the narrator of John Barth's first novel, The Floating Opera (1956). "I mean, how can anybody possibly stick to the story, if he's at all sensitive to the significance of things? As for me, I see already that storytelling isn't my cup of tea." And now, half a million printed words later, Barth's fifth book makes it clear that storytelling is definitely not for him. Of the fourteen short fictions in Lost in the Funhouse, only three could be called "stories" in the old-fashioned sense of character, point of view and linear development. Two of them, "Ambrose His Mark" and "Water-Message," were first published in magazines five years ago and are quite conventional. The evocation of boyhood in "Water-Message" surprisingly recalls Sherwood Anderson and Hemingway ("The Three-Day Blow") and, in the context of the highly experimental fictions surrounding them, these stories appear as dinosaurs in a mirror-lined museum. The remainder were written during the last three years—that is, since the completion of Giles Goat-Boy—and represent Barth's contribution to what he has called "the literature of exhausted possibility" (in an article published last year in The Atlantic).

Because he is one of the most intelligent fiction writers around, Barth has confronted the fact that most bright folks no longer read novels for information of a high sort, as they once did, and that the media and behavioral sciences, as well as novel reportage (Mailer) and a new kind of historical novel (Schlesinger's A Thousand Days), have helped to make programmatic literary realism an anachronism.

What is more, Barth is not alone in thinking that a fiction writer's efforts to articulate unique, if not all but ineffable, states of mind and feeling are unhappily circumscribed by the conventions of language and literature. "Oh I wish there were some words in the world that were not the words I always hear!" bemoans Snow White, in Donald Barthelme's novel of that name. "Only in the tritest of terms," says Nabokov's Humbert Humbert, "can I describe Lo's features: I might say her hair is auburn, and her lips are red as licked red candy . . . oh, that I were a lady writer who could have her pose naked in a naked light!" "Everything's been said already, over and over," writes Barth in "Title," one of the most interesting tales in Lost in the Funhouse. "I'm as sick of this as you are; there's nothing to say. Say nothing. . . . The fact is, the narrator has narrated himself into a corner." From their respective corners, however, a handful of writers—Barth included—have nevertheless produced an important and distinctive body of work.

It is a cerebral, hard-surfaced, often fantastic fiction, whose forms evolve constantly in unexpected, quantum-quick ways. Its creators employ erudition (real and bogus), game, parody and self-parody—in short, artifice of one sort or another—in order to distance the reader from its dappled, often dazzling surfaces. Characters are not identified with so easily, and the stories, such as they are, do not encourage vicarious participation. The wonder, awe, terror or laughter variously evoked by these fictions is usually experienced at arm's length from the work. Metaphysics, rather than depth psychology, is often the rule, and readers are asked to think as well as feel.

Even more upsetting to certain readers

Went to the river, hoping you'd come,
Your eyes full of lightning, your hair all undone.
—Mad River 1:3

BOOKING INFORMATION: Harry Sobol • P.O. Box 3256 • Berkeley, California 94781 • (415) 235-9842

is the presence in these fictions of an authorial voice (or voices) whose intrusions involute the work. The word "involution" may trouble some readers, but one has only to extend the dictionary definition. An involuted work turns in upon itself, is self-referential and conscious of its status as an invention. An ideally involuted sentence would simply read, "I am a sentence," and Barth's "Title" and "Life-Story" come as close to this dubious ideal as any fiction possibly can. The components of "Title" sustain a miraculous discussion among themselves, sometimes addressing the author ("Once upon a time you were satisfied with incidental felicities and niceties of technique"). One can only envy "Life-Story" for its ability to criticize itself with a coldly ironic succinctness: "self-conscious, vertiginously arch, fashionably solipsistic, unoriginal—in fact a convention of 20th-century literature. Another story about a writer writing a story! Another regressus in infinitum!"

This kind of fiction is indeed by now a convention, though it is ironic that too many readers do not know this. Neither do they realize that Barth, age 38, is already part of the second generation of post-modern (or post-realistic, post-symbolist or post-Freudian) writers, whose masters are Samuel Beckett, Jorge Luis Borges and Vladimir Nabokov, those virtual septuagenarians who are today what Joyce, Proust and Kafka were to the previous generation of writers.

Barth has expressed his high opinion of Borges, and several turns in Lost in the Funhouse—especially the formal locutions of the prose—echo the Argentinian belletrist. Thus Barth's "Two Meditations" recalls Borges' parables in Labyrinths, and "Life-Story" in part suggests "The Circular Ruins." The studied paradoxes distributed throughout Funhouse are fully in the spirit of Borges' marvelously titled essay, "A New Refutation of Time," while Barth's "Menelaoid" is a brilliant, extended Homeric improvisation on a comment by Borges. Yet the problem of Borges' "influence" is finally irrelevant; "every writer creates his own precursors," says Borges, and Barth's remarks in The Floating Opera and his exhaustion of both form and reader in The Sor-Weed Factor and Giles Goat-Boy suggest he would have arrived at his present position (if not manner) with or without Borges' inspiration. Genuinely troubling, however, is the effect on Barth of McLuhan and so-called "mixed-means" or "intermedia" art.

"Fiction for Print, Tape, Live Voice" reads the subtitle of Lost in the Funhouse, and the jacket photograph shows the author at ease in an electronics lab. But Barth's "Author's Note" is more cryptic than not: "Glossolalia" will make no sense unless heard in live or recorded voices, male and female, or read as if so heard; "Echo" is intended for monophonic authorial recording, either disc or tape. . . . "Title" makes somewhat separate but equally valid senses in several media: print, monophonic recorded authorial voice, stereophonic ditto in dialogue with itself, and so forth. It is rumored that Doubleday initially planned to issue a long-playing record with the book, and it is too bad they did not produce this potential "Top 40" disc ("And now kids, some boss sounds: let's give a spin to John Barth's latest side"), for the various voices are not always as distinguishable as Barth would hope. He might well have found typographical equivalents for them, such as different colored inks, or italics, which he uses most effectively in the excellent title piece. "Title" lends itself to dramatic form, and the taping itself might have been dramatized, unless this would have seemed too reminiscent of Beckett's Krapp's Last Tape.

Barth's tentative efforts to assimilate "intermedia" art suggest that being up to date is not in itself a virtue. Characteristically, Barth himself says as much. "That some writers lack lead in their pencils does not make writing obsolete," declares "Title," "Unfashionable or not," it continues, "what goes on between [people] is still not only the most interesting but the most important thing in the bloody murderous world, pardon the adjectives." And in "Life-Story," an author stops short of "throw[ing] out the baby with the bathwater."

Its survival is demonstrated by "Petition," which is narrated by a Siamese twin who suspects that his brother is going to kill him. The story's epistolary form is hardly new, and its connection with the traditional Doppelgänger tale is clear enough; even the specific idea of the Siamese twins has already been used (by Nabokov, among others). But old-fashioned or not, "Petition" is a haunting fiction, and its deeply affecting paranoid energies make it a highlight of Lost in the Funhouse, however paradoxically.

Conversely, "Night-Sea Journey," in conception the most original tale in the volume, is nevertheless one of the least successful. Although many readers may not recognize it, the swimming hero is a spermatozoan. Because it is the Moby Dick of the species, its journey is pregnant with too, too many Meanings (the three poor puns above are all intentional, and of a kind Barth is not above making). The overly schematic allegorical overtones may recall similar elements in Giles Goat-Boy. If "Lost in the Funhouse" is the best fiction in the book, it may be because Barth has it both ways, moving the reader back and forth between realistic and fantastic realms which finally cohere: "the bloody murderous world" that is the funhouse of Ocean City, N.J., visited by a youthful avatar of the author, and the funhouse that is artificer Barth's wing in James's accommodating "House of Fiction."

Paradoxes abound in Lost in the Funhouse. Its most involuted fictions, such as "Title," recognize that they are trying to go beyond the purview of fiction, of language itself: "literature's not likely ever to manage abstraction successfully, like sculpture," and Barth may have in mind the states of immobility which Beckett's most recent works can only attempt to express, but which Giacometti managed well enough.

Strangely unsettling are the ways in which Barth's funhouse fictions anticipate the reactions of hostile or impatient readers: "Who doesn't prefer art that at least overtly imitates something other than its own processes? That doesn't continually proclaim 'Don't forget I'm an artificer!'" This is, of course, ironic. Works ostensibly about themselves are concerned with much more besides the formal properties of art, and a backstage, workshop, drawing-board view of the artificers of fiction suggests a good deal about the fiction of reality.

When the first sentence of "Title" says, "Beginning: in the middle, past the middle, nearer three-quarters done, waiting for the end," it is not merely talking shop with itself but is engaging the reader in an eschatological farce that is ultimately his own "story."

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

10-28-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ Six Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Book Marks on Israel

MICHAEL J. BANDLER

Mr. Bandler spent more than three years as a member of the United Nations bureau of The New York Times.

THE ROAD TO JERUSALEM. By Walter Laqueur. The Macmillan Co. 368 pp. $6.95.

In the days and weeks following the Israeli-Arab lightning war, the first books describing the event began to appear, consisting mostly of newspaper and photography accounts. Within several months, more detailed works by Randolph and Winston Churchill, Yael Dayan, Robert Donovan and Roderick Macleish were published. By the first months of 1968, some works entered the market which dealt only tangentially with the war: Chaim Raphael's Midrashic work, The Walls of Jerusalem, was delivered to the publisher on the day that those walls were captured by the Israelis—there was no other connection. Days of Fire by Samuel Katz, an absorbing insider's account of the pre-statehood Jewish terrorist organization, the Irgun, was not really related to the war of 1967 either. Others, however, such as Maurice Samuel's Light on Israel and Hugh Nissenson's Notes from the Frontier, did deal with the effects of the war upon the civilian population in Israel and the Jewish people around the world.

During the summer months, other analyses have emerged. They complement one another, covering all shades of opinion—from the most passionately Zionist to the neutral and Palestinian views. All that is lacking, unfortunately, is the story as told by the Arabs, though some of those available attempt to relate and analyze the Arab position.

One of the best of these is Walter Laqueur's The Road to Jerusalem, a distinguished work that covers the prewar and postwar crises, but omits the chronicle of the battles. Professor Laqueur explains in his introduction that for the student of politics, the three weeks from May 15 to June 5, 1967 "are of even greater interest than the war."

Concluding that "there is an Arab as well as an Israeli case," the author describes the deep malaise of the Arab world extending far beyond the military setback. He traces the causes of the crisis historically and cites the decisive moments as May 15, 1967, when the UAR troop movements were disclosed: April 7 of the same year, when the Syrian-Israeli air battle occurred; the November, 1966, Israeli retaliatory attack in force on the village of Es-Samu; the beginnings of guerrilla activities in January, 1965; the Suez crisis of 1956; the declaration of independence by Israel in 1948; and the first wave of European immigration to Palestine in 1882.

His book includes a good analysis of the changes that were occurring in the Arab countries during the 1960s, and in the minds of the leaders. He discusses the initial confrontations at Sharm El-Sheikh and in Sinai, and concludes that Secretary-General Thant—the recipient of much abuse in May and June—"acted precipitately, but he is not the main villain; it was not his war."

ISRAEL AND WORLD POLITICS. By Theodore Draper. The Viking Press. 278 pp. $5.75. Paper $2.25.

In Israel and World Politics, Theodore Draper offers his thesis on the causes of the war. He argues that the Soviet Union decided to fight a war by proxy in the Middle East. Their scare tactics, foisted upon the Syrians and Egyptians, together with the overwhelming hubris of President Nasser, made the conflagration inevitable, and he quotes a Soviet spokesman, who said in an interview in Le Monde: "Nasser should have proceeded in a more prudent and especially a more moderate fashion. He should not, in any case, have made threats to exterminate the state of Israel."

Draper is unrelenting in his condemnation of the role of the United States, Britain and especially France during the four weeks in 1967 from May 15 to June 15. He reserves some of his sharpest criticism for Richard H. Nolte, a man with "an excessive deference for Arab sensibilities" whom President Johnson sent to Cairo as ambassador on May 31, 1967. When asked his view of the impending crisis upon his arrival, he replied, according to one version, "What crisis?" and, according to another, "There is no crisis in the Middle East. This thing will not amount to much."

Draper also criticizes those politicians who would link Vietnam and Israel in one framework, and make support of U.S. policy in one instance conditional upon support of it in the other. He warns against the wars of proxy fought by the Soviets in the Middle East in 1967, and by the United States in Cuba in 1961, noting that "war by proxy still remains the most dangerous game of armed conflict the great powers are playing today." A helpful series of appendices contains texts of press conferences, speeches, letters and aide-memoires of key figures in the conflict.

ISRAEL WITHOUT ZIONISTS. By Uri Avnery. Macmillan Co. 215 pp. $5.95.

Uri Avnery is a controversial member of the Israeli parliament, the Knesset. In Israel Without Zionists, he sets forth his proposal for Arab-Israeli cooperation through a federation of two states which would embody the two nations in Palestine—Israel and the Republic of Palestine. He cautions Zionist advocates that the only alternatives for Israel are the ceding of the occupied territories or the annexation of additional areas. The refugees must be given a choice between compensation and repatriation, something that the author asserts should have transpired immediately after the war. Avnery's scheme, when placed in the context of Zionist history as he describes it, holds some merit; it is at the very least in the interests of the people among whom he resides.

THE SANDSTORM. By David Kimche and Dan Bawly. Stein & Day. 319 pp. $6.95.

The most comprehensive book to be written on the war, surpassing even the fine Laqueur work, is The Sandstorm, by Jerusalem Post correspondents David Kimche and Dan Bawly. This is an objective study of the war, the events leading to it, the aftermath in both Israeli-occupied areas and in the Arab lands, and the big-power involvements.

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" —LIFE

PARAMOUNT PICTURES presents
a Franco Zeffirelli Production
ROMEO & JULIET
No ordinary love story...

TECHNICOLOR® A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

The Pais 5th Avenue & 58th Street - MU 8-2013

Kimche and Bawly disclose several new pieces of information, based on captured documents and battle reports. One issued by UAR Field Marshal Amer (who later died mysteriously in his Egyptian cell) asserts that the Israeli Government did not succeed in obtaining United States support before the war. This contradicts the distorted tale concocted by Nasser and Hussein immediately after the war and later reversed.

The authors include the moderate Arab views of Bourguiba and Houranti, contrasting them with the Al-Ahram stands; on the political front, they praise the efforts of special UN representative Gunnar Jarring, and refrain from criticizing Secretary-General Thant.

They see peace arriving only "when new leaders take over and when the Middle East is removed from the grip of the cold war." The Sandstorm is a sober, well-written account of a cautious push toward that peace.

ISRAEL: POLITICS AND PEOPLE. By Leonard J. Fein. Little, Brown and Co. 338 pp. $6.95.

Leonard J. Fein's book discusses the centers of power in the country, the parties and their ideologies and the relationship between the government and the people. Noting the problems faced by the new nation in its rapid development, he observes in a postwar epilogue that ... the country which had been so agonizingly in search for itself had found, if not a total definition, at least a scrap of understanding. That understanding would not solve the myriad problems, but it would, by placing them within a new perspective, make them bearable. Henceforward they were likely to be seen as problems rather than pathologies; henceforward they would, no doubt, be faced with greater confidence, as would the whole experiment with nationhood itself.

This excellent summation provides a reasonable picture of what the Israeli man in the street is thinking today, and how he may react to events in the near future.

MISSION SURVIVAL. Edited by Ruth Bondy, Chad Zmora and Raphael Bashan. Sabra Books. 503 pp. $7.95.

One of the few anthologies on the subject, this collection, edited by three Israeli journalists, contains writings and speeches during the two-month period of the crisis, its prelude and its aftermath. It ranges from such contributors as Abba Eban, General Dayan, Nasser's spokesman, Mohammed Heykal, to Nahum Eisenhalt, a 5th-grade student in Tel Aviv. The book is interesting not only as an insight into the trials of people caught up in an impending catastrophe but also a prime source book for press conferences and major statements during the crisis.

ISRAEL ON THE SEVENTH DAY. By Ruth Gruber. Hill & Wang. 214 pp. $6.50.

Recollections of Israel's development, from the days of illegal immigration in the 1940s to the recent war. The author was in the tiny nation at the time of its independence, during the 1948-49 war, and since that time on numerous visits. She describes her visit after the 1967 war to Shederot, a development town near the Gaza Strip, and comments on the care that was taken by the Israeli forces to preserve the holy places in Jerusalem intact. "Many Jewish soldiers lost their lives," she remarks, "that buildings might live." Miss Gruber's concise semi-autobiographical work is an excellent basic book on the history of the state, as seen through the eyes of one of its most frequent visitors.

THE HAND OF MORDECHAI. By Margaret Larkin. Thomas Yoseloff. 256 pp. $5.95.

This is a vivid portrayal of kibbutz life, as well as a solid account of the history of one of Israel's most famous settlements, Yad Mordechai, near Gaza. Margaret Larkin recalls the founders of the settlement, the wave of Polish immigration, the 1947 partition plan of the UN which placed the kibbutz on the Arab side, and the famous, even legendary siege in the year of independence. She attributes the Egyptian failure to capture Yad Mordechai in 1948 to the invading army's lack of preparedness for war, its low morale and the poor physical condition of its troops.

BIBLE AND SWORD. By Barbara W. Tuchman. Funk & Wagnalls. 412 pp. $6.95. Paper $2.95.

A reissue of a work originally published in 1956, which traces the origins of Britain's Palestine mandate from Roman times to the Balfour Declaration in 1917.

AFRICAN ZION. By Robert G. Weisbord. Jewish Publication Society. 347 pp. $6.

A scholarly treatise on the period at the turn of the century when feelings ran high in favor of creating a Zionist state in Black Africa. Weisbord presents the diverse reactions to the plan expressed by the press in Great Britain, in the Sephardic community and among the white settlers in East Africa.

STRIKE FIRST! By David Dayan. Pitman Publishing Corp. 292 pp. $6.95.

Strike First! is a day-by-day account of the six-day war by the chief correspondent of the Israeli army broadcasting service, reconstructed from the many dispatches he received from all branches of the armed services. From these and from additional taped interviews, Dayan conveys not only the feelings of his army but also those of the enemy that the Israelis encountered in the field. Included are numerous battle maps tracing the route of the victorious forces.

ISRAEL. By Oden Meeker. Charles Scribner's Sons. 358 pp. $7.95.

In a book about Israel unconnected to the war, Oden Meeker, a reporter and former executive of CARE, divides his subject into geographical areas and devotes a chapter to each region's cultural, religious, aesthetic and political histories. He sees Israel "in a kaleidoscope held to the light, slowly turning, the jagged mosaic of bits of colored glass, harsh reds and greens and yellows and purples sharply sporadically shifting, yet always forming a pattern." Meeker sees the future of Israel as "ein brera," meaning there is no choice; no choice, he says, but to fight to preserve the state as a living, sovereign political entity. He recalls the past of Safed, of General Allenby, of the holocaust, of ancient Phoenicia and of Masada, and includes detailed portraits of contemporary people, among them Abie Nathan, the peace pilot; Dr. Rolf Pauls, the first West German envoy to Israel; Dr. Nelson Glueck, the archaeologist; and Miriam Mirvish, a handicraft shopkeeper. It is a beautiful study of a people and of a nation.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

What Zeffirelli's film version of Romeo and Juliet puts across very well is the extreme youthfulness of the principals. They are young in years and young for their years—a couple of silly kids, swept away by their green lust. And given that emphasis, one sees the play as a tragedy of immaturity. What with those old brawlers, Montague and Capulet, blustering behind gangs of street boys led by the hysterical Mercutio (John McEnery) and the braggart Tybalt (Michael York); what with the recklessly meddlesome Friar Laurence and the sentimentally irresponsible Nurse, there are no adults about—unless it be the County Paris, who was at least soberly negotiating a suitable wife for himself.

The film makes this point specifically in the pivotal duel between Mercutio and Tybalt: they are shown as a couple of neighborhood warlords, vaunting their courage with grandstand high jinks, trying for a victory by humiliation, and giving no strong impression of a taste to kill or be killed. Tybalt's sword slides home by accident as Romeo tries to part them. Verona was a city of children—beautiful, gay, cruel, and tumbling toward disaster.

This is a valid approach and, as the saying goes, I was not sorry to see it. I could, however, have been a lot happier. The ads boast, "no ordinary love story"—which is understatement, for once—but the trouble with the film is precisely that it has become a rather ordinary story. Romeo and Juliet is a tragedy constructed on the highly contrived machinery of Elizabethan comedy: it is not the plot but how Shakespeare used it that counts. And how he used it is scarcely given a chance by Zeffirelli.

In the first place, the language is gone. Cut and mauled and shouted above the tumult of what often seems a musical comedy in full spate, the lines flicker and die like despairing strains of music in a public catastrophe. Beyond that, there is a pace to Romeo and Juliet—a quick ascent to the spark of meeting, a sustained moment of stillness around the lovers, and then the world crests up and thunders down on them. But Zeffirelli magnifies scenes for his cinematic pleasure, inventing diversions, stringing a few staccato lines across long passages of melodramatic business, capitalizing on architectural delights, and losing sight of the fact that the attendant action was not provided for its own picturesque sake but to enclose, to protect, and then to sweep the lovers away. Zeffirelli so distorts the pace that the meetings of Romeo and Juliet become fleeting incidents in the extended riot and revelry of Verona.

The director indulges himself in this way partly, I suspect, because, like Mercutio and Tybalt, he enjoys showing off. But beyond that he cannot work to the focus of the principals with the performers he has chosen. Olivia Hussey and Leonard Whiting are kids indeed, not actors, and they are by far the least interesting figures on the screen. It is a dramatic disaster when the death of Mercutio becomes more memorable than the awakening of Juliet, when you cannot readily distinguish Romeo from the other rowdies, when the balcony scene is better remembered for its architecture than for the vows exchanged.

Any pretty young couple can enact the story of Romeo and Juliet: if you like, they need not speak or act at all—the action around them will sustain the plot. But if it is to be "no ordinary love story," you require actors of no ordinary talent, ones who can seem to exhaust the experiences of a lifetime in two days of knowing each other, so that in a sense they do not die young; who can make legend out of a theatrical machine. The magic is in the poetry, in the timing, in the fragile isolation of the stupendous duets. Romeo and Juliet is a play peculiarly ill-suited to show business, and the appetizing sight of the lovers naked in bed together is no fair exchange for Shakespeare.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

There are more than a few people in Europe and America who believe that the company known as The Living Theatre (Brooklyn Academy of Music) is making a vital contribution to the theatre. Having seen three of its four presentations I judge that Le Living (as the French call it) is more concerned with "living" than with theatre.

The company disarms criticism. Its productions are a way of life, closer to religious manifestations than to either art or entertainment. Though it borrows haphazardly from various arts and artists, The Living Theatre is anti-art. One cannot blandly declare that its performances are boring because they lack measure, every turn, scene and sound being prolonged to our breaking point: "rituals" are always enervating to the uninitiate. "Be bored, you brutes!" the company might retort. "Get sore! Go crazy!"—then at least you will be open to emotion!" The usual points made against the "Living's" group exhibits are not relevant to its intention.

My initial impression on seeing Frankenstein, the first item in the four-week program, was not of the company's rancor but of sweetness. No matter how absurd the covetings, I thought only of the company's childlike dedication, the passionate commitment of kids to their games. The sillier the things I beheld the more sympathetically naive and primitively "idealistic" they seemed. People who have suffered ridicule, abuse, penury, perhaps even persecution, and who can still hurl themselves about with wild fury, shrieking apocalyptic slogans in generally untrained voices and worse diction, can't be all bad.

It has been objected that Frankenstein is no play. It certainly isn't drama, that is, literature. But it is all play, approximating what is loosely termed "total theatre." As theatre there were only two effective things in Frankenstein. One was the scene in which Man was operated on, all his organs being extracted so as to fashion a new Creature, a dismembered monster. The operation, with its multicolored tubing and electric gadgets crisscrossing in an inextricable tangle over the prostrate body of the victim, reminded me of Matta's paintings of intricate sadism by machinery. When the Creature emerged it was as an enormous, grotesque figure composed by the assembled players in an elaborate acrobatic stunt. That was the second effective moment.

For the rest there was noise, sloppy

"In the decade of the credibility gap, Wallace is the only candidate who is credible because he openly embraces the realities that lie beneath the surface!"

—Dave Dellinger, Lessons from Chicago, in the current LIBERATION.

Also: Wilfred Burchett on the Paris talks, Sidney Lens and Richard Taylor on Czechoslovakia, Julius Lester on white radicals, Keith Lampe interviews four highschool rebels and two poems by Gary Snyder.

NOTICE!

Subscribe now and save $2. For 11 issues of depth analysis clip this ad and send it with $5 to

LIBERATION

5 Beekman St. New York 7 10038

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

► Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
20 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

(though strenuous) movement, caricatural statuesque poses and unsightly exercises for "purification," in the second bill, Mysteries and Smaller Pieces; and in Brecht's Antigone, the company's third bill, crude borrowings from Brecht, Grotowski, Yoga, Hindu chants, and whatever else might arise from the flotsam and jetsam of improvisation.

If you complain of a dreadful lack of professional skill in these proceedings the answer might well be that professionalism is anathema here: these folk are fanatics of amateurism. I have already suggested that the company is only marginally a theatrical organization. It is a cult and a cult must have a doctrine. What is theirs? It is a utopian anarchy. Its passwords announced (in an incense-filled atmosphere) by the company's high priest, Julian Beck, and chorally repeated by his ragged acolytes, are: Stop the War, Freedom Now, Stop the Draft, Free the Blacks, Free the Poor, Abolish the Police, Open the Jails, Abolish Money, Abolish Banks, Abolish the State.

In Antigone, the heroine (Judith Malina) says that it would be better if the victims of tyranny gathered the expression of their protests and did something useful with them. That was the one moment I was inclined to applaud. For what The Living Theatre is now doing is hardly useful, unless one be-

THE GRATE SOCIETY

The Pentagon's anti-personnel bombs are made in equal-opportunity factories.

Fragments for the war on poverty.

GEORGE BOWERING

lieves that any and all expressions of dissent are valuable and that any departure from convention is a liberating force. I fear, on the contrary, that the basic lack of discipline—of craft and mind—in this as in many other present-day forms of dissent is an invitation to repression, a beckoning to both martyrdom and fascism. For with all the good will of which one is capable, one must recognize mental deficiency in this particular mode of protest. The religion becomes hysteria, the ritual inept, the catharsis flat.

"The horror has failed to horrify," Brecht says in his interesting version of Antigone. This applies a fortiori to the work of The Living Theatre. The more impassioned it is, the louder its members scream, grovel on the ground, howl, snarl, spit, mock, bluster, fume, pile "dead" body on body, the less we care. And this precisely because there is so little art in it—that is, original inspiration plus thought, rigorous calculation, skill and self-critical application. Boldness is not enough; it frequently turns out to be foolishness.

The Great White Hope by Howard Sackler, directed by Edwin Sherin, first presented at Washington's Arena Theatre and now to be seen at the Alvin, is a real good show—and a few other things besides.

It succeeds as "propaganda" by not seeming to be exactly that. One reason for this is that, being largely based on the life and times of the former world heavyweight champion Jack Johnson, the first black man to win the title, it is situated in what for most of us is the distant past: the years before and during World War I. The detachment gives the audience, now presumably free of prejudice, a chance to view the depicted events as an episode in the history of our shame of which it need not feel personally guilty. Jack Johnson, like the Jack Jefferson of the play, won the crown fair and square, but being a black he was traduced and hounded by the white community until, almost an old man, he was battered down by the great white hope.

There is a wonderfully funny and telling speech in the play in which a fight promoter appeals to all the world to consider the calamity which has befallen the "Caucasian" race: it wouldn't have been so shameful if the black man had achieved eminence as an entertainer, a singer or even as a scientist, but to have triumphed in the ring—!

On a happily broad scale the play offers comedy, agony, still applicable social comment and rousing theatrical energy. The cast, by the shrunken standards of present-day Broadway drama, is colossal in number and sweep. It is a pleasure to see the stage once again take on size, buzzing and fermenting with a vast variety of types, accents, costumes and passions. Almost everyone has a taste for expressive spectacle, and in this instance the spectacle is vulgarly and excitingly American.

The Great White Hope is a bracingly popular play. There is no mystery, no private meanings, hardly any avant-garde pretentiousness. The writing is roughly eloquent with occasional lapses into anachronistic lingo. Now and again the play swings wild and muffs its objectives. Two soliloquies might well have been cut. A kind of "Black Power" rhapsody occurs twice and would prove much more dramatic if employed not as a declamation but as part of the funeral scene.

The effect of the whole is that of a giant poster. I wondered for a while whether a somewhat more naturalistic approach, that is, a more "interior" style of direction, less slapdash and "fair-ground" than the one chosen, might not have served the play's purpose better than the mixture of Brechtian devices (the actors frequently turn to us to make their points), with something like convention hoopla. (Brecht's productions, remember, are always spoken with great relaxation and memorable calm.) Still what has been done with the production works, and its directorial design, making the play rather more clangorous than moving, may be right.

What I have said here in regard to the script and its treatment also goes for James Earl Jones who plays the triumphant and tortured champion. His presence is splendid; his motor power and good-humored abandon are tremendous. Except for one excellent scene of pathos, his performance is almost totally without nuance. But in the end we can do nothing but congratulate this robust, hard-working, whole-hearted actor. Quieter and more delicate, as the role of Jefferson's white mistress demands, is Jane Alexander. She is genuinely touching.

The Great White Hope deserves its success.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeigels (Viking, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $2.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 133 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

10-28-68

Crossword Puzzle No. 1269

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 See 11 across
- 6 Uncle Frank doesn't get what one does to the unneeded as a symbol. (4)
- 10 A number in the manner well-suited to be held so? (7)
- 11 and 1 across Each one might mark "one-upmanship" in an aggressive back-lash movement. (17)
- 12 Those not in could imply a change to us. (4)
- 13 Scotch or Irish whiskey? (10)
- 15 An interdiction on Russian waters? Don't concern yourself! (7)
- 16 Iron, for instance, or what makes it capable of pressing. (7)
- 17 Making things groovy, or just criticizing the sound of it? (7)
- 20 It might be expressed as a rule. (7)
- 22 Manufactures weapons such as Tommy might throw. (5,5)
- 23 It makes the parting sweet naturally. (4)
- 25 A striking deed to use for one's selfish purposes! (7)
- 26 Tell his stagework? It's very distinctive! (7)
- 27 Stone used in jewelry, sometimes associated with onyx. (4)
- 28 Is one thrown casually on the floor? (7,3)

DOWN

- 1 Seemingly intelligent crowd, not typified by Pi. (8,7)

- 2 But the old province didn't only take care of the blind! (7)
- 3 One might be slinky to toss a hoop. (4)
- 4 Attempt to get a few last words in for a biochemical converter. (7)
- 5 Good choppers should. (7)
- 7 Little companies represent a type of it. (7)
- 8 Is the watch so existing? At least temporarily! (3,3,4,5)
- 9 Beadle, perhaps, at an old-fashioned get-together? (You can prove it'll never fly!) (9)
- 14 One can be so taken in by this, it is acknowledged! (9)
- 18 A singular tool, in replica! (7)
- 19 Costing a little change, as one knows! (7)
- 20 The wrong abettor to beat, perhaps, or at least stand! (7)
- 21 Things that are might have more baths, too. (7)
- 24 A female tennis-player? Quite a man, rather! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1268

ACROSS: 1 Key signature; 10 Noisier; 11 Inhabit; 12 Hoist; 13 Interpret; 14 Loggerhead; 18 Pubs; 20 Ostensibly; 23 Fair catch; 25 Rhomb; 26 Hessian; 27 Sundial DOWN: 8 Administered. DOWN: 2 Exiting; 3 Shift key; 4 Garnishes; 5 Alt; 6 Ushers; 7 Embargo; 8 and 16 In the lap of the gods; 9 Status symbols; 15 Amethysts; 17 Estrange; 19 Britska; 21 Bromide; 22 Actium; 24 Tenon.

PERSONALS

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC. Dept. NA, 811 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

CONTRIBUTE to Al Lowenstein's campaign in Long Island. Buy Bumper Stickers and Buttons. 50c a piece, $4 for 10. Write: 121 E. Park Avenue, Long Beach, N.Y.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta. New York City 10017

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

HANDCRAFTED MEDALLIONS—Peace, cross, six others. Stoneware disc on thong. Free Brochure. Peter Leach, Dept. N, 2295 Dodd Rd., St. Paul, Minn. 55118.

PUBLICATIONS

HAIKU MAGAZINE: Haiku poetry from many countries. Plus articles, reviews, sketches. Cash and book prizes. Write: Box 866, Station F, Toronto 5, Ont., Canada.

"SUMAC", a tri-quarterly, will appear in September, publishing poetry, fiction, criticism. The first issue includes work by Robert Duncan, Louis Simpson, Kenneth Koch, John Thompson, Denise Levertov and others. Edited by Dan Gerber, Jr. and Jim Harrison. $3.50—one year. Ms. and Subscriptions, Box 29, Fremont, Michigan 49412.

UNDERGROUND PRESS DIRECTORY

Over 220 listings domestic and foreign

$1.00 per copy

Box 396

Stevens Point, Wisconsin 54481

"SELECTED POEMS" OF GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound" —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco. Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION

P.O. Box 1413

Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 33 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

What? An honest politician?

There are a few—Ernest Gruening for one. See for yourself.

As a young man and a NATION correspondent, he traveled to Mexico to document his support for the Mexican revolution. As an editor of The NATION, he published the first exposure of Hitlerism. Long before it was fashionable, he fought for the rights of black people and American Indians.

And later as Governor of the territory of Alaska, he obstinately battled to end "three forms of absentee control — absentee industry, absentee government, absentee labor."

His was the first Congressional voice, in 1964, to denounce the war in Vietnam, and he and Wayne Morse were the only Congressional opponents of the Tonkin Gulf resolution.

Today Ernest Gruening continues to fight as a U.S. Senator from Alaska. Deprived of his party's renomination, he is now campaigning (at the insistence of his friends) as a write-in candidate.

GRUENING OF ALASKA, by Sherwood Ross, tells of the life and character of a consistent fighter. This book will be a free gift to each new subscriber to The NATION who acts now.

The good fight

is now in

THE NATION

—Why not

join now?

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free, GRUENING OF ALASKA.

☐ I'll try you for 3 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 other foreign)

Name

Street

City State Zip

N10-28

NIXON'S NOSTRUMS RABBIT & SERRI

THE

NATION

NOVEMBER 4, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
NOV 12 1968
LIBRARY

THE SCAR OF WALLACE

EDWARD SCHNEIER

American Pox

WENDELL BERRY

Abyss of Progress

E. J. MISHAN

The Two Lives of Malraux PAUL ZWEIG
Our Elusive Upper Class VERNON K. DIBBLE

7-698 PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

question for Nixon

New York City

DEAR SIR: Gen. Curtis LeMay's statement that in his view nuclear weapons are just another weapon and should be used if they will "do the job" brought forth cries of outrage. It would be wise, however, to recall that over the years this same opinion has been publicly expressed by "responsible" military and civilian leaders, among them Richard M. Nixon.

Mr. Nixon today is politically "sophisticated"; he would not be likely to volunteer any comment about nuclear weapons during a Presidential campaign, and the press abstains from pressing such questions. In the past, however, he did not hesitate to express his views bluntly. For example, in the spring of 1955, during the crisis over the Chinese islands Quemoy and Matsu, Mr. Nixon told a gathering of business and industrial leaders: "Tactical atomic explosives are now conventional and will be used against the targets of any aggressive force." (The New York Times.)

Mr. Nixon has told us that "when" he is elected President, he will stop the Vietnamese War. He has not explained how. We ought to know—before the election—under what conditions he, as President, would authorize the use of any sort of nuclear weapons. Helen Mears

Guevara's reminiscences

New York City

DEAR SIR: Thank you for Jose Yglesias' review of Che Guevara's Reminiscences of the Cuban Revolutionary War [The Nation, Sept. 30], and for calling it the "smoothest reading" edition. I am afraid Mr. Yglesias has misunderstood a number of things. His notion that we produced the book in haste to meet the demand for Guevara material at the time of Che's death is erroneous; we began work on this book more than a year before Che's death. Nor did we "add" articles to the text of a book written by Che. He never wrote a book: he wrote articles which appeared in various Cuban periodicals, only some of which were collected by the Havana house, Ediciones Unión, in 1963, when some two-thirds of the articles had appeared.

American and British publishers interested in a hasty book merely rushed this slim volume into print; having been working on the project for a long time, we had collected the post-1963 articles and were able to produce a much more nearly complete volume. We made a completely new and much more careful translation (from the original Spanish—only three articles were done from French when it proved impossible, after a search here, in Cuba and in Paris, to locate the originals).

I should also point out that the twenty-six Guevara letters we added as an appendix are not "goodies" but have an extraordinary historical value: their inclusion was highly praised by scores of readers and almost every reviewer.

We did not give credit to an editor because this book was done with entirely in-house editing and it would be a pretentious violation of publishing custom for a house editor to take such credit. The responsibility for the editing is thus that of Monthly Review Press. We believe it was done in a careful manner in order to make available the fullest possible text of Guevara's writings on the Cuban revolutionary war, in a clear translation.

Harry Braverman, Director, Monthly Review Press

New York City

DEAR SIR: Harry Braverman's letter is as puzzling as Monthly Review's version of Che Guevara's book, which Mr. Braverman says he never wrote. True, the chapters
(Continued on page 468)

EDITORIALS

Party-Splitting

Ticket-splitting has become an increasingly common practice among voters over the last several decades. Many Democrats voted for Eisenhower, many Southern Democrats for Goldwater, many Republicans for Johnson. At the state level, ticket-splitting is in some states (Michigan for one) virtually the prevailing mode of selecting officials. This year we are witnessing a matching trend, party-splitting on the part of candidates, some of the best illustrations of which may be found in New York.

Item: New York papers carry double-page advertisements for the Humphrey-Javits ticket sponsored by the Non-Partisan Committee to Elect the Best Man. The ad strongly urges New York voters to "forget the bosses" (what bosses?) "and the party machines" (what machines?) and vote for "the best men."

Item: James L. (the other) Buckley, Conservative Party nominee for the Senate, has been trying to catch as many Republican votes as possible by appearing to be more Republican than Senator Javits, who is trying to be more like Humphrey and Muskie and less like Nixon and Agnew. At the same time, the Conservative Party is fighting off constituents of George Wallace as though they were lepers, despite the fact that the Wallaceites love them and that it is virtually impossible to distinguish Wallace's general position on issues from that of the Conservative Party.

Item: Senator Javits is endorsed by the Liberal Party, which is savagely attacked by Spiro T. Agnew—who appears at a dinner of the Conservative Party, which is running a candidate against Javits. Senator Javits, an old hand at the new politics, is running simply as "The Senator." As the nominee of the Javits Party, the Senator is in the habit of saying that he voted against the Eisenhower administration one-third of the time and if necessary will vote against Nixon "60 per cent of the time." Logically, Nixon should stimulate the formation of a "Non-Partisan Committee" to elect Nixon and Buckley as "the best men." No doubt he would if he were not so busy pursuing the "undecided" and chasing after Democratic voters in the South.

In California, Jesse Unruh, the operating head of what used to be known as the Democratic Party, is directing a campaign against President Johnson, who is not running—on the theory that the harder he attacks the President, the easier it will become for Democrats to vote for Humphrey. Mr. Unruh is Speaker of the Assembly by grace of a Democratic margin of two votes, and this year the Democrats face opposition not only from Republicans but from Peace and Freedom candidates and from Wallaceites (California is about the only state in which the Wallace movement has fielded a large number of candidates for the state legislature and for Congress).

The cream of the jest is that while all this elaborate party-splitting is going on, spokesmen for both major parties keep up an incessant chatter about the vital importance of the two-party system. In an article in which he details his nearly complete agreement with Wallace on the issues. Barry Goldwater concludes that it would spell "disaster for America" if anything happened to the two-party system (which is already a four-party system: Democrats, Republicans, Undecideds-and-Independents, and Wallaceites). As a matter of fact there are several minor parties and two new groupings that are almost distinct enough to be designated as parties, namely, "weak Democrats" and "weak Republicans." With approximately 55 per cent of the electorate—by some estimates—showing no party preferences, it is a little difficult to accept, at face value, the imperative of the two-party system. Party-splitting simply completes the process set in motion by ticket-splitting. In the past, even if there seemed to be little differences on issues, the party labels were distinctive; now even the labels are porous. What looms ahead is not so much the "multi-party" system that everyone fears but the "one-party-with-several-names" system—or, more aptly, "the no-party system."

Politics and Peace

It is to the political interest of George Wallace and Curtis LeMay to sabotage the negotiations in Paris. In this endeavor they are assured of the support of President Nguyen Van Thieu of South Vietnam. Conversely, if hopes for peace were rising on Election Day, the chances for election of Hubert Humphrey and Edmund Muskie would probably be enhanced. Though Nixon and Agnew could be disadvantaged by such a development, Nixon is too shrewd to lay himself open to attack as a candidate opposed to an early peace; besides, his lead may be sufficient for him to win, peace or no peace. But Wallace and LeMay need hardly bother to disguise their identity of interest with the hawks, here and in Asia.

In accordance with this pattern, the candidates deliver their lines as if they were reading from a script. General LeMay returns from a "fact-finding" mission to South Vietnam with the "facts" everyone knew he would find: he wants to restore the bombing to its former level and escalate from there. Aware of the sentiment for peace—in which even the stock market now joins—Wallace speaks in prudent terms but demands that Hanoi's concessions in return for a bombing halt be publicized. This would be disruptive in itself, but Wallace goes on to tell Hanoi and the Johnson-Humphrey Administration what concessions he deems acceptable. Hanoi is to de-escalate the fighting in the South (it appears to have done so, but Wallace would have it made official), end terrorist activity, cease all acts of war against the United States and the Saigon government, and force the Vietcong to do likewise. In return for a cessation of the bombing the United States and its allies are to be presented with the only honorable form of peace: victory.

Thieu's stand is familiar. According to Gene Roberts' dispatch from Saigon (The New York Times, October 21), Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker has been meeting Thieu, apparently to sound him out on possible proposals for a bombing halt, and Thieu has been less than obliging. Like Wallace, Thieu has his own list of conditions that Hanoi

IN THIS ISSUE

November 4, 1968

EDITORIALS

450

ARTICLES

454 The Scar of Wallace

Edward Schneider

457 American Pox

Wendell Berry

458 African Austerity

John Hatch

461 Michigan Walk-In:

New Politics for Democrats

Douglas Crase

Nixon's Nostrums:

463 Tax Bait in the Ghetto

Charles Rabb

464 Conviction Hoax

Frank Serri

466 Abyss of Progress

E. J. Mishan

BOOKS & THE ARTS

469 The Two Lives of

André Malraux

Paul Zweig

470 Our Elusive Upper Class

Vernon K. Dibble

474 Three Poems (Translated by Aijaz Ahmad & Carolyn Kizer):

If I Were Certain

Faiz Ahmad Faiz

A Woman There Was

Meeraji

Obscure Vocabulary

M. Salim-Ur-Rehman

475 A Child of Paradise

Louis T. Grant

475 Music

David Hamilton

477 Theatre

Harold Clurman and Robert Hatch

479 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

FEEL KIRBY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHEM; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 15

must accept: Hanoi must promise to continue the lull in fighting around the DMZ and to stop shelling cities in South Vietnam. Hanoi must accept a South Vietnamese delegation at the Paris talks, but the National Liberation Front is not to be represented there. NLF officials may attend as members of the Hanoi delegation, provided they represent themselves as North Vietnamese!

These conditions impelled Mr. Humphrey to ask who was doing the bombing anyway? He pointed out that it was, in fact, a "peculiarly American" tactic in the war. This is true in every sense: the greatest of military powers has unleashed on one of the smallest a killing machine unmatched in history. Mr. Humphrey remonstrated that Mr. Thieu, while necessarily concerned with the issues, should not be given a veto over U.S. decisions on whether or when to halt the bombing.

But a veto is precisely what Thieu insists upon. Asked whether there was a possibility of a coup in Saigon to overthrow the Thieu government, Mr. Humphrey became "very grim" and said that he did not think the American people would "tolerate" such unconstitutional action. Apparently he is still vacillating between his unmodified pro-Johnson stand and his desperate need for immediate peace moves in Southeast Asia. But if the Wallace-LeMay-Thieu coalition is to be broken up, Thieu's pretensions must be forcibly stepped on, both to put our puppet in his place and to thwart his American accomplices in the prolongation of the war.

Midnight at the Ball

Ever since the wedding announcement, which for a few days made the 500-acre island of Skorpios a focus of greater world attention than Saigon, the international public has been asking, "Why did she do it?" It is a question that interests us too, but we think it is hardly our concern. Mrs. Kennedy had mourned her husband long enough, and if her taste ran to an elderly man with an unenviable reputation for rapacity in both his business and his private life, the choice was hers to make.

What does concern us is the reverse question, "Why did he do it?" Mr. Onassis, like his enormous tanker fleet, flies flags of convenience. He enjoys dual Argentine and Greek citizenship, and it is known that his great wealth has never contributed notably to the tax rolls of any nation. The United States Justice Department was once forced to indict him, receiving $7 million in settlement. He has spent much of his time on his yacht—a suitably slippery perch for his international dealings. Since the military seizure of power in Greece, however, he has shown some signs of being willing to come home.

Indeed, the sudden nuptials suspended momentarily Mr. Onassis' negotiations with the junta, whereby it is believed that for certain tax concessions he has offered to invest heavily in industrial and tourist enterprises designed to improve Greece's economic situation. It remains to be seen just how much Mr. Onassis will improve any fortunes except his own, but the colonels obviously believe in him. Government helicopters protected his hymeneal tranquility, a government press officer issued his bride's statement as to the dreams of privacy indulged in by famous people, Greek soldiers locked newspaper men into a shack when Mrs. Kennedy landed at a military airfield after a flight that began at Kennedy Airport by bumping ninety passengers off a plane of the airline owned by her husband-to-be. (Ordinary travelers may in future think twice before booking on Olympic Airlines; they will never know when Mrs. Onassis may have a sudden need for their plane.)

Many signs, thus, point to a rapprochement between the colonels and the magnate; he may indeed become the new "king of Greece," making up in money for what he lacks in ancestral lines. If so, he now has the acknowledged popular queen of the world to preside at his side—tragic, radiant, ever ready to bestow that enigmatically perfect smile on persons considered useful enough for her husband to invite aboard the yacht. Jack and Jackie created Camelot in Washington; Ari and Jackie may create Golconda on an isle in Greece.

If the popular judgment continues to see the former Mrs. Kennedy as a fairy princess, this will have been one of Mr. Onassis' shrewdest deals: his manipulations of power and money will henceforth be "sanctioned" by her good magic. But if the world decides that she was not a fairy princess after all—just another American of the "International Set," eager to snatch the richest man from under the noses of her sisters in idleness—he will have done no more than take a handsome, but exceedingly expensive young wife to his bosom. We hope the latter proves to be the case: Onassis can stand the overhead and it will be better for the rest of us if his wife loses the Kennedy prestige along with the name, the Secret Service attendants and the postal franking privilege. Melina Mercouri, the actress and most vocal enemy of the present regime in her native Greece, offered a wedding present of advice to the bride (who scarcely needs flat silver or chafing dishes): She hoped that, now she had become "a little Greek," Mrs. Onassis would not forget Robert Kennedy's declaration, shortly before he died, that "if he became President he would cut off all military aid to the junta in Greece." The news immediately following that reminder was that the aid had been restored in full measure—NATO must go on!—and the deal was obviously completed before Mrs. Onassis appeared on the scene. For the future, she cannot be asked to thwart her husband; it will be enough for the rest of us if she proves unable to abet him.

Clausewitz Updated

Everyone who can read is reminded a dozen times a year that war is the extension of policy by other means. This dictum needs to be domesticated: A nation that maintains warlike, aggressive, counterrevolutionary policies abroad is a nation that will eventually pursue these same objectives at home. Thus domestic politics becomes the extension of war by other means.

The Defense Department is not unaware of this development. A UPI story from Washington (September 14) reports that it "is being drawn ever more deeply into the problem of domestic violence in America" and cites the movement of 6,000 Regular Army troops from Texas, Oklahoma and Colorado to Chicago during the Democratic convention to restore order if the local police and National Guard were overwhelmed by the hippies and Yippies. The Army also provided the Secret Service with agents, helicopters, communications support, air reconnaissance, vehicles and experts on defusing bombs. As it turned out, the Chicago police clubs were more than sufficient to control the demonstrators and put the fear of Daley into the hearts of bystanders, but the "pre-positioning" of federal troops for a political convention in an American city is surely a significant innovation.

Chicago presents only an isolated instance of the Pentagon's role in quelling or preventing riots. A 180-man Directorate of Civil Disturbance Planning and Operations, commanded by Lieut. Gen. George R. Mather, was set up in April as the nerve center for such activities, and a Civil Disturbance Steering Committee, headed by Army Under Secretary David E. McGiffert, meets about once a week. During the summer Army teams visited more than 100 American cities to discuss riot-control plans with local officials and study the layouts of police precincts and communications to insure that the police, National Guard and federal authorities could cooperate in civil crises. "City profile" books incorporating the findings have been compiled for future use. An Army school at Fort Gordon, Ga., gives a week-long course in civil disturbance planning for troop commanders of the Regular Army, National Guard and city and state officials. Some 160,000 Regular Army troops have received thirty-two hours of riot training. Including Reserves and Guard units, riot-trained military forces in the United States are stated to comprise more than 500,000 men.

The UPI survey does not touch on an important phase of federal aid in civil crises which may well be in an area so sensitive that publicity is best avoided. However, another of Clausewitz's teaching is apposite in this connection. He was a pioneer in total war: instead of the traditional armies clashing in battle, the citizens, property and territory of the enemy nation should be attacked by all available means. In the present situation the enemy nation, so to speak, is within the national borders and the Clausewitz doctrine, if adopted by its military segment, leads to the concept of total guerrilla warfare and unlimited sabotage.

More than half the population of the United States now lives in urban and suburban areas which are completely dependent on distant sources for food and water and only partially self-sustaining in electricity. The cities are thus less vulnerable within their boundaries than at innumerable external points, perhaps dozens or hundreds of miles distant. To guard major highways, bridges, aqueducts and transmission lines day and night will be a large order, even if the defense uses the latest technological equipment and the troop strength of the Army, Guard and Reserves.

It would seem less expensive and more prudent to forestall such developments by other than military means, yet with varying emphasis all three Presidential candidates are fostering the idea that law and order are to be preserved almost exclusively by force. No doubt Clausewitz would agree.

Our New Junta Crop

In the wake of the military take-over in Peru (see "Peru: Oil and the Army" by Stephen L. Rozman, The Nation, October 28), has come the coup in Panama. As might have been expected, the press has been full of feature stories about the cyclical alternation between civilian and military governments in Latin America, the present wave of military coups being the second since the end of World War II. The usual articles and editorials have also appeared about the sputtering out of the seven-year-old Alliance for Progress and the need for a new Latin-American policy.

It remained for Senator Gruening, a real expert on Latin America, to raise an underlying issue that continues to be evaded in most of the port-mortems. By and large, the stage has been set for the recurrent military coups by U.S. military assistance programs. As Senator Gruening points out, we have given Peru more than $139 million in military assistance, and other Latin American countries have received a total of about $1.1 billion in military hardware. The effect has been to put civilian governments, when they have managed to gain power, in the position of "literally peering into the barrel of a gun, their every move subject to checkmate by military cliques." Yet every time a military junta takes over, Washington issues statements of concern and disapproval, as though we were unaware that by building up the strength of the military we had invited the inevitable overthrow of civilian governments.

The most recent seizure in Panama is particularly instructive. The 4,800-man National Guard is equipped and counseled by the U.S. Army. Most of the Guard's officers have attended training schools run by the U.S. Southern Command in the Canal Zone—where they have been properly briefed on the proposition that in a democracy the military should always be subject to civilian control. More to the point is the fact that the Southern Command administers the various military assistance programs in Latin America, and these are mostly intended, as Henry Giniger reports in The New York Times, "to protect the area from subversion." Yet the military leadership elsewhere in the hemisphere cannot fail to note our apparent inability to dissuade the Guard from seizing the government in Panama.

By some accounts, we are now confronted, at least in Peru, with "a new breed" of officers—military technocrats, so-called, who feel that they know how to run the economy more efficiently than do the civilians, and also that it has become possible to negotiate better trade arrangements with countries other than the United States. So in the end we may well find ourselves shorn of our private investments—in the case of Peru the $208-million American-owned International Petroleum Company (Standard Oil of New Jersey)—as well as a substantial portion of the region's trade.

In the process of fending off subversive guerrillas, we seem to be turning the countries over to voracious gorillas (the epithet used in Latin America to describe military dictators). These new military technocrats, as Jeremiah O'Leary reports from Lima in the Washington Star, know how to stage their power grabs with a flourish calculated to silence, for the moment, the opposition forces, as well as uniting the nation in a wave of patriotism behind the junta. The take-over in Peru was presented as "the day of dignity." The Marine Corps and First Light Infantry Division moved into International Petroleum as though the plant and facilities had been defended by a military force. A French-purchased jet made jubilant passes over the oil fields. The expropriation itself was announced with fanfare by General Velasco in the Gold Room of the Presidential Palace. However, the distribution facilities of the company have not been seized by the junta, and after it has obtained whatever political advantages it can from the dramatic occupation of the plant it may quietly work out a new arrangement with Standard Oil. But what has happened in Panama and in Peru must be put down as fresh setbacks for the military-assistance program.

THE SCAR OF WALLACE

EDWARD SCHNEIER

Mr. Schneier is in the Department of Political Science at the City College, New York. He is the author of "New Tide of National Politics" (The Nation, January 22).

In 1964 George Corley Wallace, in his words, "shook the eye teeth of the liberal establishment" by polling more than one-third of the primary vote in Maryland, Indiana and Wisconsin. This year Wallace's American Independent Party will be on the ballot in all fifty states; and if the Gallup and Harris Polls prove accurate, the liberal establishment will be shaken right back to its wisdom teeth this November. Even if he polls but half of the 22 per cent recently predicted, George Wallace will receive more popular votes than any third-party candidate since Theodore Roosevelt.

Wallace is not running for show; he believes he has an outside chance of being elected President in his own right, or failing that, of playing a major role in deciding who will be elected and how. With solid support in Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and South Carolina, Wallace could win the electoral votes of as many as eleven Southern states. Even in Texas, with its prize of twenty-five electoral votes, Wallace is considered a strong contender. In the North, however, he is unlikely to receive the 35 or 40 per cent needed to carry many states in a three-man race, so that even if he wins all 120 Southern electors, he will be far short of the 270 he needs to win.

But whatever the outcome in 1968, Wallace will have left his mark. His candidacy has already altered dramatically the calculations and strategies of both Democrats and Republicans. It is he more than Nixon, McCarthy, Humphrey or Johnson who has set the tone of this campaign. It is his issue—"law and order"—that has dominated the campaign dialogue, not just in the race for the Presidency but in countless Congressional, state and local contests. It is to his followers, not to those of McCarthy, Kennedy or Rockefeller that the major-party candidates have made their pitch. And whatever its impact in 1968, the Wallace movement may be still more formidable by 1972. For unlike the Dixiecrats of 1948, the American Independent Party cannot be dismissed as a regional phenomenon. Nor, at this point, does it appear to be an ephemeral puff of popular passion. On the contrary, Wallace has tapped streams that run deep in American society, and has won the allegiance not just of a radical fringe but of a solid cross section of a disaffected electorate. More than any popular uprising of this century, the Wallace movement threatens to reshape the American political system. For all that Left talk about a new politics, it is the Right that now threatens to produce it.

Given its now obvious political significance, the Wallace movement has received remarkably little serious attention. The press has learned that Wallace cannot be ignored (until September his campaign entourage included only one full-time reporter), but it still tends to view his candidacy as a quaint bit of political exoticism, somewhat on the order of the World Flatists, Vegetarianism or Technocracy. Political scientists, perhaps because we have been so well sold by our own arguments about the stability of the two-party system, have tried to pretend that Wallace doesn't exist. But ignoring George Wallace has not caused either him or his followers to go away. What it has caused is some rather serious distortions of fact and interpretation. Seldom has so significant a political phenomenon been so underestimated and misunderstood.

When Wallace tells his supporters that "there are more of us than there are of them," the "them" are not difficult to identify. Negroes, implicitly, and more directly intellectuals, beatniks, The New York Times, student demonstrators and federal bureaucrats are the bogey men. The "us" are not so easily defined. For all the speculative essays written in the long wake of the 1964 primaries, we still know very little about the kinds of people who voted, and who will again vote, for the former Governor of Alabama. Indeed, a close look at the 1964 returns, as well as at data gathered earlier this year by the Gallup organization, indicates that many of the most common assumptions about the constituency that has grown up around George Wallace are quite wrong.

Foremost among these erroneous assumptions is the myth of ethnic revolt. Comforting as it may be to charge one minority group with discriminating against another, the white backlash was not basically an ethnic phenomenon. Wallace in 1964 did not make his best showings in foreign-stock areas. In Baltimore, for example, thirteen census tracts are more than 40 per cent foreign stock (first- or second-generation immigrants). These districts gave Wallace an average of 16 per cent of the vote. The twelve white neighborhoods with less than 10 per cent foreign stock gave the Alabama Governor a whopping 68 per cent. Many of the high-foreign-stock neighborhoods are Jewish, and Jews were second only to Negroes in their hostility to Wallace. But even in the distinctively Polish areas of southeast Baltimore, Wallace ran less well than he did among suburban WASPs. Similarly, in both Gary and Milwaukee, among comparable socio-economic groups, native-born, native-stock whites were at least as inclined as Poles or Italians to vote for Wallace.

The most telling factors associated with support for Wallace in 1964 were home ownership and income. In all three states where he took part in primary contests, middle-income, suburban home owners were the backbone of the backlash. Thus Wallace carried Baltimore County but not the city; he carried the Washington suburbs of Prince Georges County and won majorities in more than half of the suburban communities surrounding Milwaukee, Gary and Indianapolis. He carried Lake County by 2,600 votes, but lost the city of Gary by 3,500. In all three states, Wallace won a majority in the suburbs, trailed in the cities, and ran poorly in rural areas. He did well with ethnic voters because he did well in the kinds of neighborhoods where ethnic voters now live.

The Wallace vote in 1964 was generally highest in middle-income areas. In Gary, for example, he carried all fourteen of the all-white census tracts, but in doing so he averaged 10 per cent better in middle-income ($6,000 to $8,000) than in either high- or low-income areas. His best showing (79 per cent) was in a district with a median family income of $7,093, his worst (58 per cent and 59 per cent) in districts with median incomes respectively of $9,703 and $5,910. Poll figures for 1968 show a similar pattern: Wallace supporters in the North have numbered from 8 to 12 per cent of those with incomes of less than $5,000; 14 to 15 per cent in the $5,000 to $7,000 bracket; and 5 to 8 per cent of those with incomes of $7,000 or more.

Finally, housing is a key variable. In 1964, Wallace voters were a majority in 64 per cent of the urban and suburban white areas where home ownership was high (more than half); he carried only 40 per cent of the other white districts. Thus if there was a typical Wallace voter in 1964, he was a suburban, white, middle-income home owner, of no particular ethnic group (though not Jewish). Contrary to widespread assumptions, he was as likely to be a clerk as a steelworker, a Methodist as a Catholic, an Anglo-Saxon as a Pole, or to live in a securely all-white suburb as in an increasingly Negro central city area.

In many parts of the country it takes courage to display a Wallace button or bumper sticker; in other areas it takes courage not to. Both pollsters and politicians have been careful to hedge their bets, believing that many people are lying about, or have not yet faced, their real preferences. And of course the returns from 1964 cannot be taken at face value if only because votes in a primary do not have the same meaning as votes in a general election. Nevertheless, it is possible to predict what some of the short-run consequences of the Wallace candidacy will be and, more important, to evaluate the long-range meaning and significance of the movement.

Mauldin, New York Post

"So Much for Domestic and Foreign Problems . . ."

In the short run, the Wallace candidacy hurts Nixon more than Humphrey. Despite the oft publicized defections of such normally Democratic groups as union members and ethnic minorities, the polls have consistently shown that there are only slightly more Wallace Democrats than Wallace Republicans. And when one considers that many Southerners who call themselves Democrats seldom vote the Democratic ticket nationally, the overall picture is one that, if the tide of opinion were less strongly anti-Administration, would seriously worry Mr. Nixon. One recent poll of union members showed Wallace with 49 per cent, Humphrey with 39 per cent, and Nixon with 12 per cent. This and similar polls have been widely interpreted as being most damaging to Humphrey; but when one considers that Nixon won 36 per cent of the union vote in his 1960 campaign against Kennedy, it appears that both major parties have lost about equally. Similarly, an erroneous tendency to regard the South as solidly Democratic has led some analysts to conclude that Humphrey has more to lose than Nixon from Wallace's Dixie drive. Nixon, however, trailed Kennedy by less than 1 per cent in the South, and Republican strength there has grown in the intervening eight years. With Wallace in the race, Nixon will do well to match Barry Goldwater's total of forty-five Southern electoral votes, or even his own 1960 total of thirty-three.

What this suggests is that Wallace is helping Humphrey by siphoning off protest votes that might otherwise go to Nixon. In 1964 Wallace ran best in Wisconsin's Republican areas. As Michael Rogin wrote in the Public Opinion Quarterly: "Wallace's vote . . . was strikingly concentrated in the middle- and upper-class, native stock, suburbs. Apparently, Republican voters in these suburbs crossed over into the Democratic primary to vote for the Alabama Governor." Ironically, however, similar neighborhoods gave Wallace his biggest margins in Indiana and Maryland, where cross filing was not permitted. Democrats who voted for Wallace were, it would seem, demographically marginal Democrats: that is, they were registered Democrats whose economic, social and ethnic characteristics are normally associated with Republicanism. In this autumn of discontent, most of them could have been expected to vote Republican or not at all. The Wallace candidacy allows them to express their hostility to national policies without severing their traditional party ties.

One of the most interesting questions in this year of surprises is what such voters will do with the rest of their ballots. "Franklin Roosevelt is like a ferry boat," local Democratic candidates were assured in 1936, "he'll bring in a lot of garbage in his wake." In this sense, Wallace is like a scow—his candidacy may carry a lot of garbage out to sea. For whatever else it proves to be, 1968 is likely to tumble many incumbents out of office, particularly those from suburban areas where Wallace is strongest. The structure of committee power in the House of Representatives is thus almost certain to be significantly altered this November.

Much as Wallace may unsettle us in 1968, it is the long-range effect of his candidacy that is most interesting and perhaps most significant. Wallace has built his campaign on a politics of pure status. It is, indeed, the clearest manifestation of status politics that this country has witnessed since the temperance crusade of fifty years ago. Joseph Gusfield, in his study of the American Temperance Movement, defines status politics as those in which what is at issue is the position of the relevant groups in the status order of the society. Such issues polarize the society along lines of status group differentiation, posing conflicts between divergent styles of life. They are contrasted with class issues, which polarize the society along lines of economic interests.

Gusfield describes the drive for Prohibition as a "symbolic crusade," a culturally sanctioned means of expressing deeper social, ethnic and religious hostilities. Passage of the Eighteenth Amendment symbolized the "superior power and prestige of the old middle class in American society."

Similarly, the Wallace vote is a symbol of the power and prestige of the new middle class. It provides a culturally sanctioned means of expressing hostilities, not just toward Negroes but toward a wide range of social groups and values. The Negro, in fact, is not the principal scapegoat. "The real target ain't race," Wallace says in almost every speech. "The real problem is all these intellectual liberals, who can't even park their bicycles straight, trying to run people's lives." To his detractors this is hokum: to them Wallace's cries for law and order and States' rights are euphemisms for keeping blacks in line. For his followers, however, the equation is not so simple. Indeed, in a society permeated by the rhetoric of equality, few of Wallace's supporters consider themselves bigots, and Wallace's vulnerability to the charge of racism probably hurts rather than helps his campaign.

Instead of race, what exercises the typical Wallace supporter is a sense of remoteness from government. The major issues of the past three decades seem irrelevant to his concerns. Wallace offers a new politics, a politics of conviction, of limited interference in people's lives. It is a politics that will not trouble people with issues like poverty, urban renewal or rent subsidies that are irrelevant to their day-to-day lives; a politics that will keep such troublesome phenomena as narcotics, crime, peace demonstrations and college protests out of sight. In this context it is significant that Gallup found voters in the 21 to 29 age group considerably more likely than older voters to be Wallace supporters. For older voters, memories of the Great Depression, or even of the recession of 1958, are too strong to enable them completely to abandon class politics. Issues like the minimum wage, Medicare, Social Security and right-to-work laws still agitate those who have lived through the battles. After a decade of prosperity, however, today's young worker takes the security of his job almost for granted—he has never been through a recession and he doesn't expect to see one. And if he should be laid off—well, there's always unemployment compensation.

This, in short, is the politics of prosperity: the politics of those who can afford to use their vote not to achieve economic objectives but to express moral indignation. This kind of politics has not displaced the old politics of economic and class issues, but it has been laid down on top of it to produce a confusing, sometimes contradictory pattern.

In every previous era of American political history, the emergence of a fully developed system of status politics has been checked by the emergence of a new and overwhelming class conflict. As Gusfield has said of Prohibition:

The most significant element in the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment was not directly related to the cultural conflicts and struggles for status that had precipitated the Prohibition issue. It was the change in the tone of political life brought about by the Great Depression that killed the Eighteenth Amendment.

Such a change of tone is unlikely in our times. Our growing ability to manage economic affairs in such a way as to avoid economic catastrophes effectively precludes the dominance of class politics. Class conflicts exist and will continue to exist, but in the political arena they will be forced as never before to compete with status issues for the attention of the electorate. The Wallace campaign has demonstrated the appeal that such issues have for a large segment of the American voting public.

Political commentators will interpret the 1968 election as a turn to the right in the attitudes of the American people. But even if Hubert Humphrey finishes third, it may not symbolize that at all. Lyndon Johnson's landslide victory in 1964 was based primarily on voter reactions to two issues: nuclear war and economic policies. The fear of Goldwater's positions on Social Security, Medicare and nuclear weapons buried him in an avalanche of "leftist" votes. In 1968, attitudes on these issues have not changed; they have simply become irrelevant. Hubert Humphrey has tried desperately to resurrect them; thus far, he has failed, and his failure may be the handwriting on the wall for the future of American politics.

Lyndon Johnson once said that a great society would be one which asked not just "how much?" but "how good?" Many Americans cannot yet afford to raise this second question—their stakes in the economic services of the government are too high. What sets the Wallace supporters apart from the rest of the community is that they see themselves as sufficiently affluent to raise this question, and they are in fact raising it.

American Pox

WENDELL BERRY

Mr. Berry is a poet who lives in Kentucky. He is teaching this fall and winter in the English Department at Stanford University. His latest book is Openings (Harcourt, Brace & World).

The American pox is insignificance. One of the consequences of our history up to now is that we have a large and growing number of people who suspect that they don't mean anything—or who are certain that they don't. The ones of these who are white make up the Wallace constituency, and after spending several hours among them at the October 13th rally at the Cow Palace my sense of them takes me a good deal by surprise.

Since I am a rural Kentuckian with some conservative impulses, I expected the rally to produce a distinct charge of reactionary political outrage that I would recognize and be touched by, even though I would not agree—as a skeptic might find himself swinging a little with a good primitive evangelist. I expected Wallace to be The Charismatic Leader, and I was prepared to resist with my head what I feared would be his influence on my nervous system.

No such thing. My overriding impression was that the occasion rose and flowered out of a terrible boredom. Both the band and the hillbilly ensemble produced a slick late-depression ballroom sound, with rhythms that belonged to no activity I could imagine—music straining to seem animated and up to the minute, but coming off more old-fashioned than Dixie. I had the weird feeling that I had somehow got tuned into a late-night radio program out of 1939. Wallace said most of the formula sentences that the newspapers have quoted again and again, and that he appeared to take no pleasure in repeating. And the crowd, though it was thoroughly bad-humored, and though it rose to instant fury every time Wallace punched in one of his familiar tag lines, never approached anything resembling political outrage or reaction. They were peeved, soured on themselves, bored to death; they were looking desperately for something big and clear that they could feel, and thus know beyond doubt, for a change, that they were alive.

The strangeness and fearsomeness of the gathering, for me, was that it was only unconsciously political, in about the same sense that a furious crowd at a high school ball game is unconsciously social. Though its effects will unavoidably be political, its intentions or motives were deeply personal and therefore, in the group, chaotic. There is no denying that it was a highly charged meeting. But the charge did not come from the contact between Wallace and his constituency. It came from the antagonism between the Wallace folks, for whom Wallace seemed more a symbol than a spokesman, and a group of bearded ones who had occupied several of the higher tiers of seats opposite the speaker's stand.

It was this confrontation that the occasion existed for. The bearded ones heckled Wallace; Wallace and his folks heckled the hecklers. It was as though the two groups had had a long evolutionary association, and had achieved perfect symbiosis. Wallace's speech presupposed the presence of the bearded ones, whose presence of course presupposed the speech. They were each other's other half. Hating each other, they needed each other, like partners in a thirty-year-old bad marriage. And between them they had developed a sort of super-rhetoric: the words were negligible, even unnecessary; the tune and the tone were everything. It was the language of a politics that is all effect, without content. It was the unknown tongue. In the seizures of glossolalia, which rose regularly like volcanoes above the wide lowland of boredom and peevishness, everybody was transfigured. There was a great pumping of adrenalin. The Wallace folks around me were all working their jaw muscles, mad out of their heads, ready to kill a hippie for Christ, ready to seize one of those stinking long-haired pseudo-intellectuals and eat him alive, and so strike a blow against cannibalism.

"Come up here," Wallace told the bearded ones, "and I'll autograph your sandals for you." And I gathered that he didn't mean it as a joke. He meant that if he, George Wallace, autographed their sandals he would use poison ink, and they would go around limping for the rest of their unwashed, anarchist lives. And the bearded ones chanted back: "Sieg! Heil! Sieg! Heil! Sieg! Heil!"

In the extreme rhetoric of their meeting they were each other's completion and fulfillment. It was like the desperate love embrace of the last two dinosaurs, hopeless of offspring, but threatening all the countryside around with an awful trampling and wallowing. They saw their fate in each other, and nobody liked what he saw. But there was a considerable difference in the reactions. Wallace and his people responded with a fury so humorless as to be drab. They couldn't stand it. It drove them to adrenalin the way in better times it might have driven them to whiskey. But the bearded ones, though they too hated what they saw, also saw an outrageous joke in it, and they played out their part with much gusto and style.

For that reason as much as any, I sided with them. But not much. No one could enter that contest without submitting to the burden of political irrelevance and unintelligibility. It was a mixed mob, incoherent and dangerous.

AFRICAN AUSTERITY

JOHN HATCH

Mr. Hatch is director of the Houston Inter-Universities African Studies Program. He is the author of Africa Today and Tomorrow, A History of Postwar Africa (both Praeger), and Africa, the Rebirth of Self-Rule (Oxford University Press).

In a hotel ballroom in Kitwe, Zambia's copper-belt gay spot, I met the local government party boss. He and his wife were the only Africans visible. The hotel is the weekend focus for the swinging set of the younger white miners, where Russian caviar is imported for the menu. The expatriate European miners—still essential to copper production—form a labor aristocracy, paid at rates that are probably higher in comparative terms than any other wages in the world. One of their sports is flying their private planes between the mining towns strung along the copper belt just south of the Congo border, or to the game parks in the west. Yet, just a few days previously, that same African leader had been demanding that his African fellow countrymen abjure the fleshpots, sacrifice normal celebrations, like honeymoons, and live austere, hard-working lives in order to contribute to the economic construction of their new nation.

In Nairobi, capital of Kenya, an official of the opposition Kenya People's Union told me that one of the major reasons for the quarrel between old stalwarts like Odinga, Kaggia and Oneko and President Kenyatta was the degree of luxury encouraged among the country's ministers and public men. They had objected to the buying of farms, large cars and business interests by the President himself and his colleagues at a time when the majority of Kenya's inhabitants are still eking out a bare existence on their small plots or vainly seeking work in the towns. Almost all the opposition candidates had just been disqualified from the local government elections on the ground of having incorrectly completed their nomination papers. No government candidate suffered the same fate.

In Tanzania, parliament was celebrating a victory over President Nyerere's government. Last year Nyerere and his Tanganyika African National Union—the governing and only party on the mainland (Zanzibar, the other half of Tanzania, has its own party)—called for austerity throughout the nation. It demanded that all party, government and other public leaders maintain themselves on their official salaries, discarding any incomes derived from property or business interests. This year the government pointed out that its ministers and chief officials do not qualify for pensions and therefore live in an atmosphere of insecurity. It proposed that this be assuaged by the granting of gratuities. Despite the fact that Tanzania is a single-party state, its parliament has demonstrated both its freedom to speak its mind and its ability to criticize effectively by rejecting the proposal on a private member's motion. The government immediately withdrew the project after it had been defeated in parliament.

The issue of austerity has become focal to the African political scene. It calls to mind the early days of the British Labour movement, which drew on strong nonconformist sources and bitterly criticized any leader who compromised with the fleshly temptations of the capitalist world. (Ramsay MacDonald's predilection for the company of duchesses and the argument as to whether or not Labour ministers should wear court dress were matters of national concern.) African states are now becoming divided into two categories: those which try to enforce austerity from the top, and those which believe that leaders have the right to enjoy the sweets of office, as their colonial masters did before them.

This has become much more serious than a social argument. In French-speaking Africa, governments have fallen, on the one hand when they have tried to enforce salary cuts on civil servants, on the other when the masses have become infuriated by the ostentation of their leaders. The collapse of civilian regimes in Ghana, Nigeria and Sierra Leone was closely connected with the riches displayed by ministers and public officials and with the inevitable corruption attendant on the search for such luxury. In Sierra Leone, too, a major accusation against the military regime which succeeded civilian government was that its members had become corrupt and were accumulating private fortunes. This suspicion then led to a second revolution, with the army being replaced by another set of civilian politicians.

Ghana has provided the clearest example of the political significance of ostentatious wealth rubbing elbows with poverty. The downfall there of President Kwame Nkrumah was not caused by inept policies, as had generally been assumed. On paper, his basic policies met squarely the needs of his country. The imaginative Volta River scheme, for example, could have provided the hydroelectric power on which an industrial revolution covering the whole of West Africa could have been based. The port and industrial new town of Tema is even now contributing a large proportion of the economic growth of Ghana. The tremendous expansion of education still provides the country with the ever-increasing number of trained young men and women on which the future of economic development depends. As in the rest of the continent, the absence of a serious indigenous entrepreneurial class made it imperative that such large-scale projects be undertaken by the government rather than left to private initiative.

But there were two flaws in Nkrumah's application of his policies. First, he could never resist spending large sums of public revenues on unproductive, prestige ventures like expensive embassies, huge public buildings and costly aircraft. In other words, his government did not practice austerity, or concentrate its resources on measures designed in the short or long term to raise the living standards of its people. Second, although Nkrumah himself was aware of the danger and frequently exhorted his colleagues to avoid it, he was never able to curb the ostentation of his public men, their accumulation of private fortunes, and all the corruption and inefficiency which inevitably accompanied this attitude. That he himself participated in this organized graft is yet to be proved, for it is unwise to accept at their face value the accusations of the military regime which overthrew him in 1966, and which obviously needed to discredit him. But that his chief colleagues did so was obvious during his period in office. He frequently upbraided them publicly for owning large houses and indulging in luxurious living; on occasion he even disciplined some of them. But he could never stamp out the habit, and in the end his regime was discredited among many of his people for the very evils he had so frequently denounced.

These lessons from both English-speaking and French-speaking West Africa have not been lost on the most intelligent of East and Central African leaders. It is true that Hastings Banda in Malawi risks suffering the same fate as Nkrumah by reckless public expenditure—as, for instance, the building of a new capital city at Lilongwe; that Jomo Kenyatta's indulgence in expensive tastes often seems taken straight from the book of European colonialists; that even young Milton Obote in Uganda allowed himself to be persuaded into spending a vast sum of public money on his wedding (he has learned better since). But increasingly over the past two years the younger leaders of East and Central Africa have recognized that it is in their interest to equate austerity with nation building and the drive toward social justice. The previous generation of leaders, men like Nkrumah, Kenyatta, Banda and Nkumbula (in Northern Rhodesia, now Zambia), taught their followers that colonial rule was the main barrier between them and the comfortable life they saw their colonial masters enjoying. This was part of the anti-colonial strategy. Inevitably, though, it raised high expectations of rapidly increased standards of life once independence was attained. The frustration of these expectations has caused more revolts in post-independence Africa than any other single issue.

The modern generation of African leaders—not all of whom have yet attained power—recognize that political independence is only a first stage toward full national sovereignty. They recognize that the vast majority of their people have not yet approached the fringe of 20th-century life; in Tanzania, for example, despite increases over the seven years of independence, the average annual per capita income is about $60. They have also discovered since they took responsibility for the economies of their countries that colonial rule did little to equip them for the development essential to attain modern goals. Almost invariably the European powers thought of their colonies as suppliers of raw materials and food, or as markets for their own exports, rather than as areas to be developed into modern economies. Communications led to the nearest ports and inter-African trade or internal domestic traffic was almost totally neglected. The British, French and Belgians all grafted their own institutions onto their dependencies, regardless of their relevance to local traditions. Education systems, civil services, legal procedures and language were all Europe-oriented; trading and defense patterns all geared to the Western bloc. Above all, of course, the very boundaries of the colonies were artificially drawn according to European rivalries during the period of imperial dissection of the African continent at the end of last century. No colony ever coincided with an indigenous national unit. Since independence, therefore, every leader of an African state has had first to find the means of cementing various, often fragmented, tribal communities into a nation.

With so many handicaps and such an abundance of centrifugal elements menacing national unity, the new generation of African leaders are increasingly concentrating on economic development as a unifying force. They realize that if their nations are to become free in any real sense they will have to control their own economies from bottom to top. They have therefore consigned to history the evils of colonial rule and are exhorting their peoples to apply themselves to the task of building nations free from foreign economic dependence and capable of providing their citizens with rising living standards. That this outlook serves both political and economic needs is a happy coincidence.

Since the downfall of Nkrumah, leadership in most inter-African affairs has passed from the west to the east of the continent. President Nyerere of Tanzania has most decisively stepped into Nkrumah's shoes, though the difference of temperament between the men has inevitably produced a change in the character of this leadership. Nkrumah displayed a form of arrogance in public that is quite foreign to Nyerere's modest personality. Even when Nkrumah was still in power Nyerere countered his Pan-African Union policy with a federal approach to African cooperation. Since then the Tanzanian President has led the attack on Britain's Rhodesia policy, has taken the lead in trying to end the Nigerian civil war and has desperately held together the Organization of African Unity despite the intense strains of the past two years. But most important, perhaps, Nyerere almost alone has firmly set an example in principles of economic development which have universal relevance throughout independent Africa. He has proclaimed that the objective of social equality is the central purpose of economic progress and has pointed out with unchallengeable logic that it can be achieved only by sharing poverty until greater national wealth accrues.

The bible of the austerity school is Rene Dumont's False Start in Africa. This book, in its English translation, has had more practical effect on recent African government policies than any other piece of literature. It became compulsory reading for every member of Tanzania's government; the same example was then followed in Zambia. The Arusha Declaration of 1967, which laid down a creed against which every action of party or government in Tanzania should be tested, clearly drew its root inspiration from Dumont. A great deal of President Kaunda's Mulungushi speech in April of this year, which charted the way ahead for Zambia, was drawn from the same source. Even where leaders and governments are not yet committed to the Dumont thesis, younger activists, either in government or in opposition, are inspired by its message; and every government has to answer its arguments.

The Dumont theme is simply that discipline and hard work are first essentials in the battle for greater wealth; that, since the vast majority of Africans live in the countryside, a rural renaissance must be accepted as the starting point of development, and industrial growth must be geared to locally produced materials. Austerity and discipline are essential for this effort, and the social evils of alcoholism, luxury and ostentation introduced by colonial influences must be exorcised.

The Arusha Declaration, accepted as the guideline to the future of Tanzania by government and party, is based on the destruction of exploitation, control of the means of production by the peasants and workers through their government and cooperatives, democratic election of the government, and the pursuit of Socialist principles in the life of every party member. National policy is to be based on self-reliance, on hard work rather than the accumulation or dispersal of money, on the efforts of the nation's citizens rather than on gifts or loans from abroad. Emphasis is to be diverted from building industries, which require foreign capital and technical knowledge, to developing agriculture in the rural areas for the production both of more food and of cash crops. The primary objective of industrial growth is to provide substitutes for imports and improve the balance of trade. The basic requirements of this policy are hard work and the use of intelligence. Where foreign capital is obtained, it must be used to further these central objectives of the nation and it must be secured from a variety of sources to avoid concentrated dependence which could influence policy toward one section of the international world. Thus an American loan of just over $11 million is welcomed to make the Great North Road from Zambia to Tanzania a highway of international standard and improve trading communications, while the Chinese prepare to build a railroad between the same two countries, and the Italians have just completed an oil pipe line. The majority of expatriate teachers and civil servants remain British.

Of course such a self-disciplined policy raises many problems. It will be a long time before party officials, on whom the major burden falls, can be expected to attain the required caliber; the cooperatives are often too big or ambitious and can be expected to suffer many setbacks before organization and performance are efficient; the urban, industrial workers, together with many civil servants, district and party officials will not readily surrender their privileged position in a country likely to remain very largely rural for many years; there will continue to be those who consider that the fruits of independence should rightly be theirs, that large salaries, profits, cars and houses are their legitimate reward.

But Tanzania has set its face toward social justice as a national objective. It is attempting the unique feat of leaping straight from communal subsistence into socialism without going through the phase of capitalism. Its government has taken control of banking, insurance, parts of the export-import business and certain aspects of industry. It has openly proclaimed that the interests of its massive peasant population have precedence over the privileged industrial and service workers. This presents a direct challenge to the development principles of the rest of the continent.

Currently it seems most probable that Zambia will be next to follow the Tanzanian line. President Kaunda has not yet accepted the premises of his friend Nyerere. In fact, in his Mulungushi speech he asserted that "To a humanist there is nothing wrong in owning some property." His main concern is to see that Zambian citizens join the property-owning class by insisting that Zambian businesses get first priority in contracts and facilities. As he has also announced that his government will take majority control in certain firms, he must intend, if he can, to prevent foreign industry and commerce from continuing to dominate his country (although he promises foreign capital further protection).

It is because of this desire to secure local economic control that I expect Kaunda eventually to be forced into following the Tanzanian example and taking much firmer direction of his economy. He has already warned against the dangers of creating a Zambian capitalism, has abhorred "the exploitation of human beings by other human beings," and has gone so far as to assert that "economic power can belong to the people only if we work the cooperative way in every field of economic endeavor." His development plans have shown the same concern for bridging the gap between urban and rural life that is found in Tanzania. It will certainly be much more difficult to practice austerity for social justice in Zambia than in Tanzania, for the contrasts are much greater in the former country and the riches a great deal more profuse. Yet the direction of policies in the two has begun to converge.

Meanwhile, the first serious stage of the war between white and black in southern Africa, which has been seen as inevitable for years, has physically started. The attacks of "freedom fighters" in Rhodesia began in August, 1967; they have continued ever since and are now combated not only by Rhodesian security forces but by South African units sent to aid the Rhodesians. Zambia is in the front line, for the guerrilla warriors usually pass through its territory to cross into Rhodesia. This inevitably drives Zambia economically closer to Tanzania, for the northern routes, now by road and pipe line, later by rail, are the only safe outlet for its copper and import route for coal and oil as an alternative to its traditional Rhodesian communications to the sea.

These trends all suggest that the friendship between Nyerere and Kaunda, together with the increased cooperation which has been growing since Rhodesia's Unilateral Declaration of Independence in 1965, will eventually culminate in a federation or union of the two countries.

In Uganda and Kenya the future is much more speculative. Uganda is trying at present to forge national unity out of traditionally rival kingdoms. Kenya is attempting to diffuse land ownership by resettling thousands of Africans on former white farms. A great deal of foreign capital is also entering the country, building proceeds apace, and Nairobi increasingly resembles a wealthy American tourist center. Meanwhile, the politicians are engaged in the dangerous game of jockeying for position in the Kenyatta succession sweepstakes. What happens when Kenyatta ceases to be President is anyone's guess.

Yet both Uganda and Kenya are now more intimately linked with Tanzania than is Zambia itself. From last December the three have been members of the East African Community, a common market with joint institutions. The object is to strengthen mutual interests and counter the economic rivalry which has become apparent among them since independence. With their varying outlooks and different problems they may well find themselves uneasy bedfellows. Yet it is in this crucible of experimentation, perhaps widened by the inclusion of Zambia, that the most significant developments for Africa of the 1970s will take place. Those who are eager to read the direction of African political, economic and social progress should watch carefully the fate of Presidents Nyerere, Obote and Kaunda, together with the maneuvers to secure a successor to President Kenyatta.

MICHIGAN WALK-IN

NEW POLITICS FOR DEMOCRATS

DOUGLAS CRASE

Mr. Crase, currently enrolled in the University of Michigan Law school, is a graduate of the Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton University. His thesis at the Woodrow Wilson School was The Politics of Frustration, a study of Michigan's political system.

Ann Arbor

There has been no McCarthy walkout from the Michigan Democratic Party since Chicago. Something more important has happened—a walk-in. At the call of the state McCarthy organization and the Michigan Conference of Concerned Democrats (MCCD), about 450 dissident Democrats convened in Detroit's Cobo Hall on September 28 to proclaim "The New Democratic Coalition of Michigan." While much of America's demoralized Left flirts with fourth parties or reads Che's diary, the "New Democrats" have embarked in Michigan on an experiment whose grand purpose is nothing less than the radical reconstruction of the Democratic Party.

The activists who met in Detroit to lay plans for this effort were, with few exceptions, middle-class white reformers from MCCD and McCarthy chapters throughout the urban areas of southern Michigan. Sporting the usual assortment of beards, buttons and sandals, they made it clear that new politics was in session, although one recalled seeing many of their faces at earlier meetings of the old politics of the Democratic Party.

After an often dramatic debate that stretched from mid-afternoon to early evening, the New Dems overwhelmingly refused to support Hubert Humphrey. But their presence and enthusiasm made clear their general conviction that the Democratic Party may still be shaped into an instrument for basic change in America. Much has happened since the first McCarthy-for-President Committee was formed here in November, 1967, to make that conviction plausible in the context of Michigan politics.

The groundswell of discontent with the Johnson Administration did not prevent 72½ of Michigan's 96 National Convention votes from going to Humphrey. The delegation to Chicago, however, was never within reach of new politics. It had been named at a state convention the character of which was determined, according to state law, by precinct elections held in 1966—two years before Chicago. Where the delegate game was concerned, the McCarthy and Kennedy forces couldn't even get into the ball park.

When new politics teams have been able to play, however, encouraging changes have taken place in the Michigan game. The most dramatic example was the recent state convention at which newly elected McCarthy-MCCD delegates combined with liberal regulars to adopt overwhelmingly a resolution supporting the minority, or peace plank, on Vietnam, which had just been defeated by Humphrey regulars in Chicago.

There are two reasons for the liberal shift in Michigan. Most important are the dissenters themselves who, for the last tormented year, have refused to give up the notion that they could effect radical changes from within the party. Now their hard political work, done at the prompting of Prof. Otto Feinstein of the McCarthy movement, Al Fishman of the MCCD, and the fiery former state chairman Zolton Ferency, is beginning to pay off.

Second, however, is the liberal nature of much of the Michigan party itself; it is not the private club of an intransigent Richard Daley. The Michigan delegation, while voting for Humphrey at Chicago, supported the minority resolution on Vietnam as well. Among the party leadership, U.S. Sen. Philip Hart and state chairman Sander Levin voted for McCarthy and McGovern respectively. Thus changes in response to new politics power are partly due to willing spirits already established within the party. The growing power of dissenters has both forced and enabled organization liberals to make accommodating responses. Those responses, in turn, have made easier the continuing task of dissent.

The most dramatic changes have come in response to the McCarthy-MCCD attack on the party's own organizational bedrock—the precinct delegate. The character of the party begins in the precincts, and the delegate elections of August 6 afforded the first test of that character since McCarthy's initial challenge to LBJ.

McCarthy and MCCD volunteers set to work, circulating petitions, running candidates in sparsely populated townships where the party had not elected delegates for years, and ranging its strongest candidates against the most objectionable of the old guard. In many counties, party regulars were either complacently unaware of what was happening, or too lazy to do anything about it. When the results came in it was clear that the McCarthy-MCCD forces had won a major victory, now controlling perhaps 35 to 40 per cent of the party's precinct delegates. Feinstein claimed nine of Michigan's nineteen Congressional districts.

The fall state convention, which met in Grand Rapids the day after Chicago, reflected proportionally the influx of new politics delegates at the party's base. Tired Humphrey delegates, who have never yet understood what happened to their party in Chicago, nor why the news media favored those bearded, beaded demonstrators, came home the next day to find their state convention swarming with what could only be—yes!—more hippies. And McCarthy supporters, who almost seemed disappointed not to find blue-helmeted police awaiting them, were spoiling for a fight. The threat of the insurgent delegate strength, however, enabled state chairman Levin to bring conservatives into an all-night leaders' caucus with McCarthy-MCCD chiefs where, finally, the aging New Deal confronted the reality of new politics.

The dramatic results of the caucus were visible later on the convention floor, where the Michigan party officially endorsed the minority report on Vietnam and condemned Mayor Daley for "the shocking display of brutality on the streets of Chicago." Out on the floor, young McCarthy delegates wearing black arm bands were fastening HHH buttons to their lapels. The party seemed to have compromised its differences.

"Only time will tell, however," warned a reflective Senator Hart, "whether they have been harmonized and buried or just papered over." Later that same day, Vice President Humphrey undid much of the work of the Michigan liberals with an insensitive statement supporting Daley's Gestapo tactics in Chicago. The HHH buttons so recently pinned to McCarthy lapels were quickly discarded.

Now the New Democrats have begun in Detroit what may be a protracted and impassioned debate: how do you reform a Democratic Party, part of which is willing, the rest of which will never yield? When most of the New Coalition leaders say "reform," they are clearly thinking of "control." "I think that we will later see ourselves as leaders of a majority," Feinstein told the crowd in Detroit.

Much time was consumed in the hallways, workshops and restaurants discussing whether new politics "credibility" would be enhanced more by merging into the regular party as a demonstration of good faith, or by maintaining a separate identity with which to vex the regulars. But if reform really means political control, the New Democrats should not fog the strategy debate with questions of credibility. If control is the aim, credibility is simply an ambiguous euphemism for political power. Power is what the New Coalition must be willing wholeheartedly to seek, and use, if it intends to change America.

For many new politics Democrats, unaccustomed to power and predisposed against it, the notion may come as a shock. But Feinstein and Fishman must make the reality of the power imperative clear to their troops. Zoltan Ferency began that education in Detroit. "Political parties are an avenue to power," he told the reverent faces. "Power makes change." When that basic fact is understood it is clear that the interests of the New Democrats can be served only by maintaining an identity separate from the regulars. "A minority is powerless while it conforms to the majority," warned Thoreau, "It is not even a minority then; but it is irresistible when it clogs by its own weight." Each time the party has responded it has responded because faced with identifiable power—nothing else.

The fundamental issue of long-range power strategy became hopelessly tangled, however, in arguments over the effect of endorsement or non-endorsement of Humphrey on the Coalition's "credibility," which in this context usually stood for "moral consistency." As a result, some New Dems seemed unable to separate the long-range goals of the Coalition from the immediate tactics of the Presidential election. They are in a moral quandary, where a vote for Humphrey is a cop-out because it destroys the credibility of the Coalition, but a protest vote is a cop-out if Nixon or Wallace destroys the climate for reform.

When the issue of long-term power strategy is separated from the tactical Presidential choice, however, there is no reason why support of Humphrey has to be inconsistent with the maintenance of an independent militant identity. The necessity of a separate identity does not require a separatist position on every issue, only a position separately arrived at. If New Democrats were to vote for Humphrey this fall, it is unlikely that the party would forget who its insurgents were by January.

Emotional appeals from both sides totally obscured the issue. Impassioned analogies to the Weimar Republic raised the specter of gas ovens in America. State Sen. Coleman Young, now the party's first black national committeeman, and the Rev. Channing Phillips, both urged support for Humphrey by hitting the New Dems in their white liberal guilt complexes. "We have to reform the Democratic Party, but we have no right to endanger the lives of black people," Phillips argued.

The whites listened respectfully, but they rose as a body to applaud when Mort Furay, president of the Hotel and Restaurant Workers, shouted into the mike that Humphrey's "commitments are to our enemies, and don't ever forget it. They are trying to ram a minority candidate down your throats!" When a McCarthyite stood to assert that it didn't matter which of the three was elected, they were all Fascists, the convention howled its approval.

In the confusion of this emotional climate, Feinstein, standing among his troops like a great swaying bear, recommended the adoption of a "no formal position" resolution in order to preserve unity among the New Coalition. For an organization that must maintain a separate power identity, it is ironical that unity could be maintained only by passing a resolution which allowed members to make up their minds "solely as a matter of personal conscience."

If control of the party is the goal, other tactical decisions must also be made with the power strategy unobscured. There was considerable confusion in Detroit, for example, over whether to support fourth-party candidates. But this is a tactical, not strategic decision and depends on the situation. If support of fourth-party candidates is an instrument of reform, as in Ann Arbor where it might defeat the redneck Democratic sheriff, then it is a legitimate power gambit. Whether it is "credible" in the eyes of local party hierarchies is irrelevant.

Finally, New Democratic leaders, especially Ferency and state Sen. Roger Craig, must remind their rank and file that the price of power in the party is unflagging involvement in its affairs and unceasing vigilance to protect each foot of territory gained. New Democrats must look forward to being burned, for the New Dealers have been around since the New Deal, and they have acquired a lot of political savvy with which to trip up the bearded upstart. But in an amateur, volunteer organization, if you can make yourself indispensable, you become the party.

There is no doubt that the New Coalition looks forward to another precinct delegate onslaught in 1970. It counts on the mounting frustration to add to the substantial delegate base it has already gained, and hopes that New Dealers are too tired and demoralized to mount a counter-revolution. If they are right, new politics will determine Michigan's choice for Democratic Presidential nominee in 1972.

NIXON'S NOSTRUMS

Tax Bait in the Ghetto

CHARLES RABB

Mr. Rabb is a reporter in the Washington bureau of the New York Daily News.

Richard Nixon favors tax incentives as a way to develop the ghetto. Says the candidate: "Free enterprise goes where the profits are. Tax incentives can place these profits where the people are, and where the need is." Vice President Humphrey favors, but with less emphasis, "tax and other incentives for the building of low- and middle-income housing."

Mr. Nixon points to the "economic crisis confronting America today," which he says rules out a massive infusion of additional federal funds to the nation's cities. He proposes instead "things which can be done now—which do not require the massive spending which can neither be realistically promised nor responsibly delivered"—such as tax credits, increased government loans to ghetto enterprises, loan guarantee programs and "active efforts to interest traditional lending institutions in ghetto development."

The argument for tax credits runs like this: Our urban ghettos need additional moderate- and low-income housing; the unskilled inhabitants of the ghettos need training and jobs. Private enterprise knows how to do the job, but won't be attracted to the area unless the return is sufficiently generous. And what better way to entice private enterprise than with a tax credit or some other sort of tax break?

Adherents of this approach point out that tax incentives work automatically and, because they are imbedded in the tax code and not subject to Congressional uncertainties, permit industry to make long-range plans. And, if the 7 per cent investment credit is any guideline, tax credits work. Furthermore, it is argued, in a time of resistance to spending for social purposes, tax credits may be all that Congress will accept.

While few question this political appeal, a study of tax incentives, prepared for the National Commission on Urban Problems, rates them as a device of dubious effectiveness in dealing with the problems of core cities. Richard E. Slitor, author of the report, is an economist or the Treasury Department's tax staff who undertook the study while on a year's leave of absence. Apart from his institutional bias against any attempts to weaken the tax base, Slitor feels that tax incentives have several inherent weaknesses.

Under such a scheme, ghetto investment would be largely confined to those large corporations best able to take advantage of the credit. Community organizations, labor unions and churches, which have no need for tax savings to offset other profitable enterprises, would be frozen out if subsidy were dropped in favor of tax write-offs.

Slitor notes also that in the complex area of social and economic improvement, it is unrealistic to expect tax credits to operate without selective guidelines. Instead of facilitating bureaucratic procedure, the approach would make the Internal Revenue Service responsible for judging the suitability of housing programs.

As for the better-than-nothing argument—that tax incentives may be the only way to get any further ghetto subsidy out of Congress—it probably is no longer valid. With the increasing demand for tax credits as the answer to a broad range of problems has come greater Congressional awareness that a dollar lost from revenue increases the budget deficit as much as a dollar spent.

Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D., Ark.) of the House Ways and Means Committee, Capitol Hill's most influential tax voice, said of tax credits in a House speech last December 13: "They are riding a rising crest of popularity as a means of providing a subsidy—or incentive as it is sometimes called—for programs we apparently do not quite want to face as direct expenditure programs."

Mills said one of his basic objections to what he calls "backdoor spending" is that most of the benefits go to firms or individuals who would have undertaken the investment in any case; the credit thus amounts to a "wind-fall." He continued: "The increase in expenditures for the particular purpose that results from a tax credit could be achieved at a much lower cost, in terms of impact on the budget deficit, if the additional investment were financed through direct expenditures. The expenditure could more readily be channeled only to those who would not otherwise undertake the activity."

Former Sen. Paul H. Douglas, chairman of the National Commission on Urban Problems, feels that many politicians would rather vote for tax credits than for straight subsidies because it enables them to evade the charge that they are spending the public's money. "But the public always pays," he adds.

Perhaps the most unfortunate effect of stressing tax incentives is that it encourages the impression that ghetto problems can be solved by big business, with little cost to the taxpayer. Private investment cannot replace the public effort in the ghetto. The private sector cannot build at a profit housing within reach of the poor. Construction in the core cities is not cheap. Land costs are high and rising. Real estate taxes are steep. Building codes are complex. Insurance comes at a premium. The ghetto, in short, is an unpromising investment.

Yet we cannot accept the alternative of permitting a steady deterioration of the urban slums. The price is too high, both in human misery and in the threat such conditions pose to the stability of the community at large.

Much of the present difficulty exists because the government has not brought its resources directly to bear on the problem. Urban renewal programs have been used to develop luxury or middle-income housing and commercial centers, often with the effect of further reducing the limited supply of dwellings available to the poor. [See "New Haven: Renewal and Riots" by Dane Archer, The Nation, June 3.] Tax laws frequently work to discourage a real estate investor from maintaining his property or holding onto it for an extended period.

The public housing program, systematically undernourished by Congressional hostility and now by war-imposed budget restrictions, has produced a woefully inadequate 650,000 units in thirty years. The Riot Commission proposed that 600,000 low- and moderate-income housing units be built in 1969 alone and 6 million units in the next five years.

Although the political winds may be blowing the other way, what this calls for is an increased government role in the ghetto—and greater federal spending.

To the extent that talk of tax credits and other incentives postpones or clouds public awareness of the problem, it is an impediment to the urban dialogue. This does not rule out a role for private development capital in the core cities. With resources far greater than the public sector can at present command, private capital must be actively and deeply involved in the ghetto. But its contribution must be viewed as a supplement, not a substitute, for the public sector.

Conviction Hoax

FRANK SERRI

Mr. Serri is a member of the New York bar and a former president of the Kings County Criminal Courts Bar Association.

Eugene McCarthy has said wittily of Richard Nixon's campaign methods: he "punts on the first down." This erratic and irresponsible attempt to get rid of problems is beautifully illustrated by the candidate's comment in the field of criminal law: "If the conviction rate was doubled in this country, it would do more to eliminate crime in the future than a quadrupling of the funds for any government war on poverty."

It would be difficult to pack into one sentence more irrelevancy and a more complete misunderstanding of the nature and magnitude of the crime problem. The exact opposite of what Nixon proposed would come much nearer the truth: "Quadruple the funds for government war on poverty, and the conviction rate will take care of itself."

Exhortations to double the conviction rate—without denying it—imply erroneously that the key to the solution is the courts. It seems to say that if the courts were not soft on criminals," the conviction rate would escalate and the citizenry would once more know tranquillity. It embodies the popular but incorrect notion that what happens in the courts makes the crime rate go up or down. It misconceives wholly the nature of the crime problem. It overlooks the central principle: the roots of crime are not in the courtroom but in the society.

The opposite line of argument—that court decisions do not increase or decrease the crime rate—is powerfully supported by Justice Fortas in re Gault 387 U.S. 1. He correctly pointed out that juvenile delinquency under the 14th Amendment, with no "handcuffs" on police, no warnings, no counsel, jumped enormously—by a far greater percentage than did the crime rates for adults. The basic statistics of the situation were succinctly stated by James Reston recently in The New York Times, though on this occasion Mr. Reston strangely failed to read the implications of his own research:

For this we get about what we pay for. That is to say, we get a system that leads to arrests in only about 25% of all serious crimes. We get convictions in only about 10% of those arrested, and in the end, those actually incarcerated amount to only about 2%.

The decisive figure there is "arrests in only 25% of all serious crimes." Out of 100 crimes reported, twenty-five are never solved, the perpetrators never arrested. And, of course, no one is brought to court. That is the great weak spot, the huge gap in our enforcement system. For 75 per cent of the wrongdoers, "conviction rate" is meaningless. Court decisions and practices can't be applied to persons never arrested.

If Nixon talked not of "doubling the conviction rate" but of "doubling the clearance rate"—clearing by arrests 50 per cent instead of 25 per cent of the reported crimes—he would be striking closer to the center of the target. Such a doubling of cases solved would be a big advance in law enforcement. But it cannot be achieved by any glib announcement of how "doubling the conviction rate" outweighs quadrupling the funds on war against poverty. It would require a major, a massive, outlay, increasing enormously the size and the effectiveness of every evidence-gathering and law-enforcement agency in the country.

There is a second, a lesser but nevertheless formidable gap in law enforcement. It occurs after arrest but before indictment. Arresting a suspect is not all there is to it. Sufficient evidence must be gathered to produce an indictment. If the law-enforcement agencies are unable to bring enough evidence before a grand jury to justify indictment, it is meaningless to talk of "a conviction rate after arrest."

The only conviction rate that means anything, that really tests the effectiveness of our court system, is the conviction rate after indictment. Forty per cent of those arrested are indicted: what happens to them? Between 85 per cent and 90 per cent plead guilty. Reston misses this controlling result. By erroneously lumping together the dismissals after arrest with the conviction rate after indictment, and by overlooking the enormous proportion of defendants who would rather plead guilty than stand trial, he arrives at the totally misleading figure of "10 per cent conviction rate after arrest."

Obviously, when you do not possess enough evidence to indict, it makes no sense to talk of a "conviction rate." Only when an indictment has been obtained do you enter the field of possible conviction. After indictment, the conviction rate tests the effectiveness of our court system. And the answer leaps from the record: 85 per cent to 90 per cent plead guilty! The report of the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice (1967) states: "Most defendants who are convicted—as many as 90 per cent in some jurisdictions—are not tried."

The significance of this startling percentage of guilty pleas has been overlooked by some able judges. Judge Holtzoff still repeats (New York Law Journal, January 24, 1966) that "the primary tool of the criminal law is the trial." The primary tool, rather, is the guilty plea. The court system works. It convicts: about 90 per cent by guilty pleas and probably more than half of the balance of 10 per cent after trial. In the Federal Court, Southern District, New York, the total has reached 97 per cent.

This makes irrelevant all talk about "doubling the conviction rate."

When about 90 per cent plead guilty, and more than half the remainder are convicted after trial, the crime problem moves out of the courtroom and back into society. It is there that this tremendous problem must be investigated, there that far greater efforts must be made to curb and reduce it. And, as the President's Commission on Law Enforcement said: "No single formula, no single theory, no single generalization can explain the vast range of behavior called crime."

ABYSS OF PROGRESS

E. J. MISHAN

Mr. Mishan is the author of The Costs of Economic Growth (Praeger). He is a reader in economics at The London School of Economics and Political Science.

In a previous article (The Nation, November 27, 1967) I elaborated on the simple proposition that an index which evaluated the annual growth of man-made goods while assiduously ignoring the annual growth of man-made "bads"—the noxious spillover from modern industry and its products—could not be relied upon to plot the course of "real" income over time. Moreover, if the condition of society is such that the annual increment of goods adds a measure of choice that is marginal to people's contentment, while the annual increment of "bads" deprives them of environmental choices that are vital to their sense of well-being, a decline in social welfare may accompany the observed growth of GNP.

In principle, at least, many of these vexatious spillover effects can be measured, though in practice they are only beginning to enter into the cost-benefit studies of a number of public investment projects. The public, however, is becoming increasingly aware of the more blatant spillovers—motorized din on the ground and in the air, pollution of air and water, fume, smog, stench, the destruction of natural beauty and the "slumification" of built-up areas. Its concern has begun to shift these effects gradually toward the center of political discussion. If, eventually, legislation against the more corrosive side effects begins to curb their incidence, the case for economic growth would become somewhat less vulnerable than it is at present.

That case would remain weak, however, so long as we remained alert to the influence of less tangible factors that bear strongly on human welfare. The precondition of sustained economic growth is sustained discontent. Indeed, the success of the advertising agency turns on its ability to implant dissatisfactions in the minds of men; to impel them to earn more and to spend more in the vain endeavor to catch up with a receding horizon of material fulfillment. Again, sustained economic growth entails sustained innovation which, in turn, implies continuous obsolescence, not only of technology itself but of the associated skills and expertise. Specialized knowledge, experience, dexterity, accumulated over the years, the products of hard study and apprenticeship, can become obsolete today in a matter of months. For the scores of thousands that pour annually from our institutions of higher learning there is no assurance about the future, no resting on laurels; they are destined to live on the brink of obsolescence. Inevitably, the initial exhilaration of the younger generation, at the prospect of living in a world of continuous technological change, transforms itself over the years into a state of perpetual anxiety. Finally, the more significant product innovations—the automobile, self-service, television—all act to reduce interdependence, to isolate people from direct communication and direct human experience.

Now intangible consequences of economic growth such as these may be conceded without allowing that they should be decisive. The case for growth could look for support in a number of other developments which, judged at least 20th-century standards, are socially desirable: the advance of medical knowledge, the conquest of poverty, the spread of education. I shall have nothing to say here of the first except that no previous generation has depended so heavily on drugs and medical treatment. Of the second, I confine myself to the cynical observation made by Arnold Toynbee that the wealthiest country, the United States, is the wealthiest country in the world in which to be poor. On the question of education, however, I cannot resist more expansive reflections.

In the late 18th century, even in the 19th century when enlightened opinion came down in favor of nurture rather than nature, and reformers believed in the infinite adaptability of man, the belief that greater leisure for masses would be used in self-improvement was not altogether implausible. Today it is. Though a smattering of "instant culture" is certainly one of the earmarks of professional and middle classes, there is no hard evidence to suggest that the mass of ordinary people are interested in culture for its own sake. If the culture pill can be sugared and passed off as entertainment on television screens, will doubtless be swallowed without a murmur. But fact remains that it is the sugar, not the culture, that is in demand.

It can be observed, on the other hand, that where the link between potential earnings and education is evidence, the interest in education of people, at all levels of society, distinctly quickens. Thus when economists apply themselves to measure the value of education—order, generally, to justify the expansion of higher education—it is to vocational education that they turn. But they justify economic growth by reference to the expansion of educational opportunities, which opportunities are valued in terms of their contribution to economic growth. It strikes one as being a remarkably circular procedure. It is much like affirming that a man should eat more as it enables him to work harder, so giving him an appetite to eat more.

And certainly the mass education toward which we are moving cannot easily be accepted as a civilizing influence in itself. The overextended mega-universities of the United States, having campuses of 30,000 students or more, are perhaps the only way of dealing with a domestic student population which is expected to pass the 10 million mark within the next five years. But in these vast automated teaching factories one must not look for the virtues associated with the university—an atmosphere conducive to reflection, discourse and tolerance, leisure to think, to immerse oneself for a while in the disinterested pursuit of learning. In these vast and highly organized teaching corporations, vocational learning (and not vocational learning alone) is increasingly assimilated via close circuit television and tape recorders. Discussion groups are being superseded by teaching machines. Contact with teachers is giving way to contact with computerized information centers.

do not argue that this application of technology to teaching methods is less efficient. If students could dehumanize themselves as readily as do the universities, they could well become more knowledgeable than students taught by more traditional methods. But if they cannot; if they resist the new technology, what then? Not surprisingly, there is a growing revolt against the Orwellian features of the new automated education. It is not altogether fantastic for a student to feel he is being machine-cut, pressed, folded and trimmed to fit into a complex industrial system that is geared to churn out endless streams of plastic and gadgetry for a mass-consumption society that has no parent interest in his latent idealism nor cares for his sentiments or anxieties—save as they reduce his productivity. Rightly, then, he does not feel proud or privileged. Rightly, then, he feels somehow cheated, and in his resentment or despair makes common cause with others.

If we turn, then, to the professional and academic groups, among which it might be reasonable to suppose that increased leisure would beget increased culture, we find little cause for comfort. Among the professional groups, among doctors, engineers, administrators, scientists, lawyers, accountants and a countless variety of parvenu experts, it is not impossible that official working hours will be reduced over time—though one feels certain that they work a good deal harder now than they ever did before the war. But this trend would provide no clue to the “free” time, the unpre-empted leisure, at the disposal of a member of this group. Since his earnings and, at least as important, his status depend upon his acknowledged proficiency, the painful choice, between using his leisure to add to his enjoyment or to maintain and add to his status and earnings, tends to be resolved in favor of the latter. Indeed, the current “exponential” growth in each branch of knowledge—and the consequent fear of finding himself a victim of the pace of progress, his hard-earned expertise become obsolete—is more likely to increase his anxiety and to reduce his free leisure over the foreseeable future.

A lot may be said about the practical difficulties of coordinating knowledge in the future. But confining ourselves here to the economic compulsion for men to learn more and more about less and less, it need hardly be observed that such learning is the antithesis of the learning of the educated man as traditionally understood—the “man of parts” who could converse and speculate intelligently over a wide range of subjects. Up to the turn of the 19th century it was still possible to be educated in this latter sense. The really tragic consequence of the seemingly irreversible trend toward a more intensive and systematic mining into the surface of knowledge—and this holds true even of the humanities—is the utter impossibility of men ever again being educated men.*

But if the educated man, as once conceived, is granted to be a creature of past civilizations, the faithful today seek consolation in the growth of scientific manpower. Applied on a massive scale, scientific research, it is believed, will ultimately unlock the secrets of the abundant life (though for the present it is largely engaged in providing solutions to the tangle of urgent problems brought about by the continued application of science to society). Of course, the possibility that it will do so can be entertained; but so also can the possibility that the excessive love of science is ultimately more subversive of the moral foundations of society than the excessive love of money.

As far back as the ancient civilizations men have recognized the corrupting influence of the single-minded pursuit of money. When this vice becomes an approved part of the ethos of Western society—as it gradually did between the 18th and 19th centuries, though perhaps more so in the United States than in any other country—its corrupting influence is revealed in the character and tastes of the public, as also in the style of living and the shape of towns and cities.

With the growth in popularity of the cinema, followed by the radio, and more recently television, we are becom-

* The growing sales of art reproductions, of popular histories, of classical records, provides no evidence to the contrary. The taste of the public is guided by “amateur experts,” themselves guided by more professional experts, and can be viewed as a response to fashion, or as a purchase of status goods. However “sincere” is their search for learning, such a public is the passive recipient of tidbits of “culture” passed on to them. It has no affinity with the educated elites of other ages.

ing conscious of the increased powers of these new media to mold for profit not only public opinion but the character, even the morality, of the young and impressionable. Yet there are some checks even today on the extent to which commerce and commercial entertainment are free to develop a taste for sadism, pornography and violence. There are none, apparently, on propaganda which inculcates an inordinate ambition in a man and encourages unrealistic expectations—obvious prerequisites for a life marred by discontent and frustration.

I do not for a moment underestimate the corruptive powers of commercial interests in molding the shoddy tastes, the shallow passions, and the mindless opportunism of millions the world over; but I fear far more the unchecked growth of technology and the petulant, parasitic mass society it cannot help producing. The worship of Mammon is damnable, but it is a common failing. The ruthless jostle for pecuniary gain is debasing, but it is still human. In consequence, a man may feel more comfortable in the market place, among the familiar follies and vices of humanity, than he does contemplating the blind devotions of the priesthood in the temple of science. His declarations to the contrary notwithstanding, the scientist is not at all interested in human welfare. Some may be interested in knowledge "for its own sake." Individually, each is to a greater or lesser extent interested in recognition, in the kudos of published scientific papers. As a fraternity, however, scientists are interested in the search for power—at whatever cost to humanity at large.

Furthermore, today's apotheosis of the intellect, of sheer brain power, has entailed a devaluation of all other qualities that once made up a man. The man of today, ideally, is one who by a new alchemy has transmuted the fullness of his emotional inheritance into a single flame of intellectual concentration. To this new being, to the scientist who is taking over the earth, nothing matters very much save the burning task of ripping out the secrets of the universe. For him, as for his ally, the technocrat, the world of human impulse is an irrelevance. Society is already moving from the traditional world of vice and virtue, comedy and tragedy, into a world where there is only sickness and health, efficiency and inefficiency. Anyone who sincerely believes that from giving the scientists and technocrats their head there will emerge a secure and serene future for the common man is no ordinary optimist.

Again, one asks, have we any choice? If we conclude that we cannot stop the juggernaut of science, let us not conceal our helplessness from ourselves, or take refuge in a bogus pride about the "unquenchable human spirit." Let us have the honesty to affirm that we are not free agents, and at least contemplate the possibility that, like Satan, humanity is predestined to soar onward "with compulsion and laborious flight" to a doom of its own making.

A world in which the great powers stand armed in mortal fear of one another is not one in which a call to halt the advance of technology is likely to make much impression. If we survive the next war, and there comes into being a single world government, it is not impossible that a more humane wisdom will prevail. The habit of empirical research has grown over the centuries, and it cannot be disowned overnight. But in a dispensation wiser than any we can readily visualize—one in which it was finally recognized that no matter how "exciting" or "efficient" was an innovation, its ultimate contribution to human happiness was likely to be slight, whereas the risk of its causing social disharmony or ecological disaster was large—we could, for a while, permit scientists to go on probing the universe if they wished, provided we took measures to insure that they did not change it. This new and wiser society will be wealthy enough, I assume, to finance the activity for some time, and to allay their craving for recognition by the provision of prizes and titles. All their contributions to knowledge would be faithfully recorded for the admiration of their colleagues and for the wonder of future generations. Applications of any of their discoveries would, however, be strictly forbidden. History would not therefore stop. The human drama would continue to unfold. Music, art, literature and politics would, hope, flourish. Only technological change would be the thing of the past.

Is it possible that, under more favorable circumstances in a world in which peace was assured, so exacting a world might prevail? If one is old-fashioned enough to believe in free will, the possibility cannot be ruled out. But the likelihood of its coming to pass is not high. The study of history does not abound with examples of ordinary people who are willing to renounce immediate and tangible gains for some ideal conception of the good life.

LETTERS (Continued from page 450)

appeared in magazines first, but when they were published in book form, Che selected them, placed them in the order he preferred and wrote a foreword.

Braverman denies (as if he were quoting me) that Monthly Review decided to "add" articles to this edition but that is not how I described what they had done. I wrote: "Monthly Review . . . has apparently taken over the Maspéro French edition without explaining why it is switching chapters around." Monthly Review could have blamed this on Maspéro; instead, in order to assure that they worked on the project a long time, Mr. Braverman avers, "we had collected the post-1963 articles we were able to produce a much more nearly complete volume." The fact is that not all the articles Monthly Review published were originally published after 1963. I said that in my review and cited four articles Che wrote in 1959 on the military history of the insurrection as an instance of their unorthodox editing, for two were used at the start of the book and two (with several paragraphs dropped at the end. With, of course, no explanation to the reader.) Is the fact that Che did not include them in the book which he wrote a foreword no sign of his intentions?

I don't object to the publication of as much of Che's writings as Mr. Braverman can find. I do object to the way they are presented—without explanation—in a manner which was not of Che's choosing. Meeting such a standard is elementary scholarship. . . . An editor taking public responsibility for what was done to Che's work would surely have made it impossible for me to make the mistake of my review: that Victoria Ortiz's translation, which is the smoothest available, was entirely from the French when, Mr. Braverman now informs us, only part of it was.

Jose Gyles

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Two Lives of Andre Malraux

ANTI-MEMOIRS. By André Malraux. Translated from the French by Terence Kilmartin. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 420 pp. $8.95.

PAUL ZWIG

Mr. Zwig teaches at Columbia University. He is the author of The Heresy of Self-Love: A Study of Subversive Individualism, just published by Basic Books.

"The elephant is wisest of all animals. He alone remembers his former lives; and he remains silent for a long time, meditating upon them."

With this epigraph, Malraux begins his Anti-Memoirs. After a silence of almost twenty-five years, half of which he has spent in a kind of life after death as Minister of Culture in the French Government, Malraux has decided to recall his former lives. Yet this first volume of Anti-Memoirs (there will be others, to be published posthumously) is not autobiography in any ordinary sense. "I have no interest in myself," Malraux notes, and one recalls the preface to The Days of Contempt, written thirty-five years ago, where he argued so vigorously against the modern literary psyche, with its passion for self-involvement.

In that "former life," André Malraux chose the battle for social justice and the comradeship of men who risked their bodies instead of their words, opposing his choice to the "subjectivism" of the surrealists, and the endless inward dialogues of Proust and Kafka. In Malraux's present life, that choice, perhaps, has been rescinded; but the distrust of "sincerity" remains. "Until I was thirty, I lived among men obsessed by sincerity," he writes; but "the proud shame of Rousseau," he adds of the Confessions, "cannot wipe out the pitiful shame of Jean-Jacques."

Malraux, instead, has chosen to confess nothing. Like Sartre in his autobiographical sketch, The Words, Malraux has sought a model for his style, not in the memorialist tradition established by Rousseau but in the novel. Sartre's model was undoubtedly Flaubert; Malraux looks closer to himself. He has become his own model. He notes how often it happened that his writing foreshadowed his life, as if the fiction were a source for the acts that would later claim him.

It is fitting, therefore, that the chapter headings of Anti-Memoirs should be the titles of his own novels and essays: The Walnut Trees of Altenburg, The Temptation of the West, The Royal Way, Man's Fate. Passages from his novels which are embedded in the text, are perfectly at home there. Indeed, the chapters taken from The Walnut Trees of Altenburg, which appear early in Anti-Memoirs, set a standard which Malraux will find it hard to maintain throughout. Another well-known episode, the magnificent escape flight from Germany in The Days of Contempt, is found here among the author's Arabian adventures. We discover that the flight had been a real one, over the Aures Mountains of Algeria in 1934, where for the first time, Malraux tells us, he encountered "the cosmos of The Iliad and the Ramayana":

I felt as if I had escaped the force of gravity, and were now suspended somewhere among the worlds, caught up in a primitive battle with the cloud, while under me the earth continued on its way, though I would never meet up with it again.*

At such moments, Malraux discovered a grandeur of experience which lay beyond the personal. Questioned by death, and the risk of death, the world gave answers, he felt, but in a language which only the adventurer could understand. The hero of Malraux's novels was an anti-Proust and an anti-Joyce. Not that he valued more than they did the careful civililities and the social ambition which had been a ground of spiritual encounter for 19th-century novelists. But the colloquy with self, the inward narrative which characterizes our modern literary sensibility, asked the wrong questions, Malraux felt. His novels asked another question, and the Anti-Memoirs ask it again, more elaborately: "In the writing of novels, in war, in museums both real and imaginary, in culture, in history perhaps, I have encountered a fundamental enigma. . . . The man you will find here is one attuned to the questions death asks the meaning of the world."

In The Royal Way, Perkin, dying, cried out: "There is no death; there is only me, dying." The problem in Anti-Memoirs has been turned around. Malraux now casts an impersonal light upon a world questioned by death, littered with shipwrecked idols of the human. He meditates on the frailty of "artistic" survival. He describes elegiacally the "metamorphosis" of the gods into art. As if the "fraternity" of men bound together by extreme danger, and by their common passion for an idea of social justice, had been replaced by a colder fraternity of broken images, of statues artfully restored in the museums of Cairo, Paris and Peking. Between the novelist and memorialist, another "former life" emerges to shape the Anti-Memoirs: that of the art historian, the memorialist of human forms, carrying on his meditation in the museums and monuments of Egypt, among the Mayan ruins of Mexico, in the sacred grottoes and temples of India. It is their memoirs that Malraux is writing here, as much, perhaps, as his own. Pieces of legend are caught up into the baroque prose, forming a succession of superb vignettes—like that of the Roman Commander Malraux evokes, who marched his legions into the inland sea of Arabia. They emerged, their casks filled with luminous sea shells, and marched over the sand to a rapid death by sunstroke.

*All quotations are in the reviewer's own translation from the French.

For two centuries, Arab travelers told about an army of breastplates and skeletons, buried to their chests in the sand as they had been in the sea; their fingers held up to the sun casks filled with sea shells. Because they could not have the sea, the setting sun gave the entire desert to these dead men, projecting far over the flat sands the legionary shadows, and those of several hands opened above the fallen casks—their fingers stretching out to infinity over the sand, like miser's fingers.

Against this background of exotic imagery, today's André Malraux appears transformed. He is still a traveler, and he travels to the same places: Arabia, Indo-China, China. The Anti-Memoirs begin—like The Conquerors and The Royal Way—in mid-ocean, as the author sails for Egypt and then the Far East. The flight to the Orient is still, for Malraux, a voyage through the gates of horn. This time, however, his credentials are somewhat more in order. He is Monsieur le Ministre, on his way to inspect the monuments of Egypt before they are drowned behind the Aswan Dam. He is the guest of Nehru and Mao Tse-tung, the friend and envoy of Charles de Gaulle. Malraux talks at length with these "men of history," and his conversations are an important part of Anti-Memoirs. Again Malraux's model is his own novels. We recall the passionate political arguments in Man's Hope, the magnificent colloquy in The Walnut Trees of Altenburg.

Yet these passages are somehow the most disappointing in the book. The official Malraux has become pompous and wooden. When he talks politics with de Gaulle or Mao, the arguments fall onto the page like tired newsprint. When he muses with Nehru about the loss of the sacred, or the eternal duplicity of political power, he is unconvincing. Such conversations are neither good journalism nor good fiction.

In a revealing passage, he writes, disappointingly: "To know a man today means above all to know what is irrational in him, what he is unable to control, what he would eliminate from the idea he has of himself. . . ." What fascinates him in the men he calls "hommes d'histoire" is the complete suppression of this dubious intimacy. Their contact with "history" has dissolved the small, private monologues; they have nothing to erase because "history" has elevated them into their images. He writes admiringly of de Gaulle: "To everyone, with the exception perhaps of his family, he seemed a courteous reflection of his legendary character." In his conversations with these men, Malraux is all too faithful to the "idea he has of himself" and to the idea they have of themselves. Questioned by "history," Malraux's world is unexpectedly empty. His "men of history" are pale successors to the obscure adventurers of the novels.

In this sense the gray eminence of Anti-Memoirs is General de Gaulle. He embodies "history" for Malraux, as the statues in the grottoes of Ellora embody "the sacred." More important, it is de Gaulle who made Malraux himself into a "man of history," and a faint warmth of gratitude enlivens those passages where Malraux describes his meetings with the General.

In this empyrean of historical titans, the raison d'état has gained a kind of metaphysical sanction. Malraux's discretion on Algeria, his complete silence on the moral dilemma presented by the torturing of Algerians by the French army, is understandable. He is not interested in those dubious secrets of history, which the "great man" would willingly have erased from his image. Malraux, in these portions of his book, has allowed "history" in the form of General de Gaulle, to become his unavowed censor.

Malraux's allegiance to de Gaulle, and through de Gaulle to France (he confides to Nehru: "j'ai épousé la France"), is nonetheless an uneasy union. It forces him into a curious confrontation with himself. As France's envoy to India and China, he feels that he is the bearer of a historical message. "For us," Nehru tells him, "France is the revolution." And Malraux adds: "In Africa, in Latin America, even when the materials of the revolution are Russian, its language remains French." Thus Malraux carries with him an echo of his "former lives." His passion for social justice survives, transformed into the rhetoric of his patriotism and national pride. As France's official representative, he can still be the voice of revolution; it is through him now that is heard "the exaltation of the combat for justice proclaimed from Saint-Just to Jaurès."

Yet France is not only the revolution, and Malraux seems to have missed the irony of Nehru's remark. For behind Malraux's government, and his "man of history," stands a family of historical portraits: Pétain, Louis-Philippe, Napoleon, Louis XIV. This is the other France of paternal authority, empire, and bureaucracy: the France which dismantled the revolution, drowned the commune in blood, and overwhelmed the revolutionary turmoil of 1945. This is the France Malraux in fact represents. There is a moment of irony which is surely not intended, when Malraux speaks admiringly to Mao of that other great military chief, Napoleon. To the leader of the greatest guerrilla army of all time, he cites Napoleon who set out in Spain to destroy the first of the guerrilla armies, with a brutality which Goya has not let us forget.

Like all interesting fiction Anti-Mem- oirs is sometimes truer than it means to be. At a time when the "subjectivist" traditions of the novel have begun to appear thin, it is stimulating to encounter a work so wholly devoted to reversing their values. Malraux's ambition to write the memoirs of the world he has lived, and not of the self he has been, gives impetus to the best passages in Anti-Memoirs and makes it, despite its many disappointments, an important book. In the end, Malraux has not been wholly absorbed into his official disguise. Behind the speeches and the patriotism remains a passion for adventure which moves brilliantly through the book. I am thinking, for example, of Malraux's meeting in Singapore with a shadow from his past. Clappique, the great "baron" of Man's Fate, slaps him on the back and drags him off to a café to reminisce about the old days in Shanghai; above all, to read him a movie script he has just written: the life of that half-legendary adventurer, the Count of Meyrena, who had been a model for Perkin in Malraux's The Royal Way. During the 19th century Meyrena had carved a fragile empire among the dissident tribes of Indo-China, and Malraux-Clappique now tells his story. It is a great novella, occupying almost 100 pages of the Anti-Memoirs, and it is Malraux at his best. Finally, one wonders where Malraux's surviving brilliance will lead him in his long enterprise of autobiography. Perhaps he will break through the official shell even more thoroughly in the posthumous volumes of Anti-Memoirs, and so end his literary career as monumentally as he began it forty years ago with the series of his great novels.

Our Elusive Upper Class

WHO RULES AMERICA? By G. William Domhoff. Prentice-Hall. 184 pp. $4.95. Paper $2.45.

VERNON K. DIBBLE

Mr. Dibble teaches sociology at Wesleyan University.

This book contends that there is a national upper class in the United States whose position in the federal government, in the economy, and in certain other institutions makes it a governing class. It defines a governing class as "a social upper class which owns a disproportionate amount of a country's wealth, receives a disproportionate amount of a country's yearly income, and contributes a disproportionate number of its members to the controlling institutions and key decision-making groups of the country."

Professor Domhoff handles a number of different questions. First, is there a national upper class and, if so, who is it? Second, does it control the corporate economy and if so, how? Third, what organs of government does it, and does it not, control? And how does it influence organs, such as municipal governments, that it does not control? Fourth, if there is a governing class, then what about all the evidence of pluralistic politics? What about splits within the governing class? How do we explain businessmen who inveigh against a government that they supposedly control? And what of the various restraints on the freedom of the governing class to do whatever it might want?

It is not possible in this review to summarize, much less to evaluate, the author's answers to all of these questions. We shall concentrate upon the first two (is there a national upper class and does it control the economy?), and on his concept of a "governing class."

Professor Domhoff uses a variety of quantitative information (e.g., more than 75 per cent of Lundberg's sixty families have easily traceable descendants in the Social Register) and a variety of anecdotes (e.g., a story in the San Francisco Chronicle about the wedding of an heiress) to conclude that there is "an American upper class of intermarrying families that is national in scope," and that this class is "an observable, differentiated, interacting social group with more or less definite boundaries."

Fairly "definite boundaries" are methodologically crucial. For if there is any stratification in a society at all, people who rank high with respect to one of the good things of life usually have disproportionate amounts of the other good things as well. And so long as you deal with arbitrarily defined strata (such as "low income," "middle income" and "high income"), you can often strengthen or weaken the statistical associations that show disproportionate advantages by juggling the boundaries in a way that tips the associations in the direction you desire. Hence, if Domhoff's "governing class" is to mean more than the familiar fact that different types of stratification tend to go along together, his "social upper class" must have rather definite, nonarbitrary boundaries.

But his findings on this score do not seem to be conclusive. He considers a person to be in the upper class if he qualifies by at least one of seven different criteria, including: a listing in the Social Register (except in the Washington, D.C. edition), membership in certain designated clubs, graduation from certain schools, marriage to a person who would otherwise qualify, and similar tests.

Domhoff admits that each of these criteria is inadequate. But he seems to argue, without making the point in precisely this way, that you can use a single criterion (such as membership in a certain club) without going too far off base, because the various criteria are highly associated statistically. One item can stand for the whole package, because the various items hang together. But you need a variety of criteria where no single criterion works across the board. (Some large cities do not have a Social Register, and some people are reticent about being listed.) But all of the various tests mean essentially the same thing.

The book includes no data on these issues. (For example, what percentage of the members of the designated clubs had graduated from the designated schools?) And I suspect that further refinements of this sort might show rather less definite boundaries than Domhoff expects to find. For, unlike Marxist or Weberian definitions of class positions, all his tests of membership in the "social upper class" are criteria that high-ranking people themselves create and sustain by their own conscious actions. And their consciousness is likely to be fuzzy around the edges.

For one thing, the ladies have a lot to do with maintaining some of the practices that are among the author's criteria.

Social Register society has grandes dames, but no grands hommes. And while the men are busy with the serious business of corporate investment or running foundations, in concert with other men whom the ladies never see, the ladies are free to define the tests of admission to balls and registers. They do so, in part, in terms of taste, style and mannerisms that allow for some degree of idiosyncratic variations.

This sort of thing is important. But it is important froth. If private schools, private clubs and the Social Register were abolished tomorrow, and nothing else were changed, there would still be

Photo by HILARY HIRSHMAN

With cold, beautiful anger

DANIEL STERN,

author of After the War, has invented a microcosm as absurd
as our times

THE SUICIDE ACADEMY

"In this cryptic, futuristic story, The Suicide Academy, 'a place where people come when they want out of everything for good,' Daniel Stern has made an anti-novel, which has the force of a poem." Book World

$5.95

bestsellers come from
McGraw-Hill

The Naked Ape/King, Queen, Knave/Soul on Ice

an upper class, though Domhoff's methods would not enable us to find it. For he looks at certain consequences of class positions (i.e., of positions in the institutions of property) for a person's wealth, style of life and cultural advantages, rather than at class positions themselves, and at the institutions of property that define them.

When Domhoff turns to the American economy, this approach leads him sometimes to write as if he were saying that a certain group of people control the economy because they are in the Social Register and all that, rather than the other way around. Part of his analysis of the position of the "social upper class" in the American economy has to do with the ownership of stock. He cites various studies of the distribution of ownership, and concludes that "the decline of family capitalism does not mean widespread stock ownership within the general population: it means dispersal within the upper class." He goes on to tell stories about various "interest groups" (the Mellons, for example), and cites studies by Sweezy, Perlo, Kolko and others, to conclude that "the biggest stockholders in the largest corporations are actively involved in determining the general policies and selecting the managers of these companies."

More important to his argument, however, are his own data on the boards of directors of "the top 15 banks, the top 15 insurance companies, and the top 20 industrials," as of 1963. He studied these fifty firms "on the assumption that these companies are the dominant elements in the American economy." He argues, first, that the American economy "is controlled by a very small number of very large corporations, banks, and insurance companies." In this context (as an accompanying footnote makes clear), "control" means economic concentration.

Domhoff must have something more in mind—for example, the ability of large corporations to invest in technology that changes the occupational structure, and their freedom to do so, without first checking with vocational high schools to see if they are ready to cope with the changes; or their freedom to negotiate wages, without first making sure that city governments are financially able to follow along, so they won't have strikes by teachers, firemen and garbage collectors. By control he must mean, or should mean, something more than sheer degree of concentration. By that definition, if 49 per cent of the artisans and peasants in a small-holder economy have 51 per cent of the wealth, then they control that economy.

Second, in large corporations the boards of directors are "decisive" because, while boards delegate "minor decisions and technical research," the directors make "major decisions, such as those of investment, and select the men who will carry out daily operations. In fact, their power to change management . . . is what we mean by 'control.'" In this context, "control" refers to organizational authority and legal prerogative.

Third, Domhoff reports that 53 per cent of the directors of the fifty banking, insurance and industrial firms he studied are members of the upper class. (The same percentage holds in transportation, but in utilities and in merchandising the percentages are smaller.) The directors of the fifty firms who are not upper class, apart from a few foreigners, are executives who have come through the ranks, corporation lawyers, wealthy Jews, former military men, presidents of colleges and of foundations, technical experts of various sorts, and a few small, local businessmen. In this context, "control" has still a third meaning. Domhoff writes that the presence of directors who are not in the upper class is no reason to doubt "that members of the upper class continue to control the corporate economy" because some types (e.g., executives) are trusted employees and other types (e.g., wealthy Jews and foreigners) are not numerous enough to matter. In this context, then, to "control" means to have a majority.

In short, the large corporations control the economy, the boards control the corporations, and the social upper class, as the author defines it, controls the boards. Therefore, the upper class controls the economy. The logic is fine, except for the different meanings of "control."

But even with no such problems, I am not sure what difference it makes to say that the "social upper class" does or does not control the economy, so long as we define "upper class" in Domhoff's way. Whether in the Social Register or not, whether graduates of Groton or of Cobleskill High School, directors of corporations will choose more profitable investments over less profitable ones (whatever the pursuit of the commonweal might require); will seek to maintain stable systems of authority within their organizations; will give something to charities and to education; and will desire manageable, nonrevolutionary political and social change at home and abroad.

Perhaps the existence of "an observable, differentiated, interacting social group with more or less definite boundaries," whose members have various prestigious credentials, makes little or no difference for the way a corporation is run, but does make a difference for the mesh between different institutions in American society. For example, perhaps a network of personal trust grows up in such a group, making capitalists more ready than they would otherwise be to accept reformist innovations in politics if some trustworthy men of their own kind give the word that a proposed reform is acceptable or necessary. But in any case, we want to know not simply what percentage of all corporate directors also enjoy private clubs, but what difference it makes that some do and some do not.

Domhoff uses the same technique that he applies to corporate directors to study foundations, the trustees of universities,

How Fast Can You Read?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, most people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More" mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 533-5IN, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

INTEGRATED HOUSING AS AN INVESTMENT

M-REIT  MUTUAL REAL ESTATE
INVESTMENT TRUST

Objective: to invest in income-producing real estate in good neighborhoods and offer housing to all.

Send for free prospectus.

Morris Milgram Dept. ND
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name

Address

Zip

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

Oxford

Democrat and Diplomat

THE LIFE OF
WILLIAM E. DODD

By ROBERT DALLEK. "A warm, careful, readable portrait of a fine historian and significant public figure."—FRANK FREIDEL, Harvard University. "I read Mr. Dallek's book with increasing interest and fascination. As biography, it is a work of art. As history, it is first-rate, particularly about his career as Ambassador to Germany."—ARTHUR S. LINK, Princeton University $8.50

Boss Cox's Cincinnati

URBAN POLITICS IN THE PROGRESSIVE ERA

By ZANE L. MILLER. "Zane Miller's study of Cincinnati is the clearest account we have of a revolution that transformed the nineteenth-century city into the twentieth-century urban center."—ROBERT WIEBE, Northwestern University. "An enlightening study of a city in transition and of its encounter with modern urban problems."—OSCAR HANDLIN, Harvard University. 8 maps. (Urban Life in America series.) $7.50

"The Best Men"

LIBERAL REFORMERS
IN THE GILDED AGE

By JOHN G. SPROAT. "Mr. Sproat's solid, literate analysis helps greatly at last to place into perspective that long-puzzling shift from Radical to Liberal Republicanism."—HAROLD HYMAN, Rice University. "His dissection of the so-called liberal mind of the late 19th century is the fullest and most insightful that I know. . . . It throws light not only on the period directly discussed, but also on the problems of our own day."—JOHN A. GARRATTY, Columbia University $7.50

At all good bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
200 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y. 10016

the mass media and various agencies of government. That is, he asks what percentage of any given body are, and are not, members of the upper class, by his criteria. He concludes, for example, that "members of the American upper class do not control [i.e., do not have a majority in] the Legislative branch" of the federal government; that they do control the Treasury and the Department of Defense, but not the Agriculture and Interior Departments; and that they do not control the majority of news outlets but do control "every major opinion-molding institution in the country." He also examines the CIA, the military, state and local governments and numerous other organizations.

This method leads Domhoff to make some rather curious statements. For example, after noting that former Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr. was "a Jewish member of the upper class who was a neighbor of President Roosevelt's in the New York countryside," he writes:

His replacement, Fred M. Vinson, was a Kentucky-born lawyer, politician, and judge who was moved to the Supreme Court within a year of his appointment. Following the Vinson interlude, control was returned to the bankers and financiers with the appointment of John Snyder, vice-president of the First National Bank of St. Louis, who had served in a variety of ways during the war.

If bankers and financiers really had control of the Treasury when (and because) Morgenthau was in charge, lost control when (and because) Vinson took over, and gained control once again under Snyder, then their control of this agency is very precarious indeed. It depends upon the social background of a single man in the key spot, and if Betty Furness were to become Secretary of the Treasury tomorrow, the bankers and financiers had better start trembling. And if such things really happen, then Domhoff must show that the Treasury under Vinson acted contrary to the interests of bankers and financiers, but never did so under Morgenthau and Snyder. If he cannot show that, then his data on the class backgrounds of various governmental officials and foundation presidents might simply show that thousands of members of the upper class are selflessly devoting themselves to the public good by taking jobs in public service that pay less money than the jobs they could have in business.

But, of course, the author does not really believe his statement about the Vinson interlude. He was led to this slip of the typewriter keys by his definition of a "governing class," as a social upper class which, among other things, "contributes a disproportionate number of its members to the controlling institutions and key-decision-making groups of the country." His use of this concept has led him to some valuable descriptive data on the extent of overlap between different kinds of hierarchies—social prestige, wealth, income and organizational authority. But it has not led him to an analysis of classes in an era of corporate capitalism, or to an examination of the structural links between economic and other institutions.

Following the lead of most American sociologists (the author is himself a psychologist), he fails to distinguish between the historically specific concept of "class" and other phenomena such as distributions of social prestige, or of income, that may be subsumed under the ahistorical concept of "stratification." More crucial, however, is his apparent assumption that you study power, and both the economic bases and the economic goals of political power, by finding out what sorts of people are in what sorts of political jobs.

If Socialists took over the Treasury tomorrow, the constraints upon their actions (e.g., flows of capital that are largely removed from political control, the ultimate possibility of investment strikes) would be the same as they are on the Treasury today, unless there were some general crisis in American capitalism. Nor is it by any means obvious that capitalists in the Treasury are more likely than professional politicians, say, to govern in the interests of large corporations. In fact, one might argue just the opposite.

The greater the isolation of capitalist business enterprises from politics, and the more politics is run by professional politicians, the more free businessmen are to maximize market rationality, unconstrained by purely political considerations and goals. When the English gentry had rural enterprises that produced for a market, but were also the bases of the gentry's political authority, they had to be "good to their tenants" in ways that could interfere with market rationality. But when business enterprises and politics are structurally isolated, businessmen can leave it to politicians to worry about stable authority in the society (stepping in occasionally when politicians fail, as with Urban Coalition), while they worry about profits; and they can limit, simply by their own freedom to operate in the market, the alternatives open to politicians (sometimes preventing the politicians from maintaining stable authority).

Domhoff wants to show that this description does not fit the United States today, that the "social upper class" is

IF I WERE CERTAIN

(Translated by Aijaz Ahmad and Carolyn Kizer)

*If I were certain, o my friend and lover,
If I were certain that your muffled pulse,*

*Grief in your eyes, heart in your breast afire
Could be revived by my devoted care*

*If sympathetic phrases were a cure
To lift the sterile shadows from your brain,*

*To wipe the stain of insult from your brow,
Could I restore your failing youth again!*

*If I were certain, o my friend and lover,
I would nurse you day and night without repose.*

*How I would croon you tender, moving songs,
Songs of cascades, of spring, and orchard blossoms.*

*Morning's commencement, the travelling moon and planets,
How I would spin you long, romantic tales!*

*Tales of proud girls whose stiff, unyielding bodies
Melt beneath the urgent warmth of hands,*

*How the features, learned by heart, of a single face,
Alter at once, and bloom before your very eyes,*

*How the marmoreal pallor of her skin
Warms, of a sudden, with a glow like wine.*

*And how the roses dip to touch your hand,
And how the imperial night bursts into fragrance.*

*Thus would I sing, sing endlessly for thee,
Weaving my songs, kneel endlessly beside thee.*

*No song of mine can be a panacea
For suffering, though it may soothe your grief.*

*My song is not a lancet but a salve
Touching the famous sorrows of your life.*

*Only a knife can end your agony.
Killing, redeeming, I cannot fulfill you,*

*Nor any breathing being on this earth
Except yourself, except yourself, except yourself.*

FAIZ AHMAD FAIZ

A WOMAN THERE WAS

(Translated by Aijaz Ahmad and Carolyn Kizer)

*If you were a child I could take you in my lap
And you would fling your arms about, and laugh
Seeming to quiver on the verge of speech.*

*Now, when you speak or smile, sometimes you fall
Across my breast, your voice a warbling wind*

*That penetrates the forest fastnesses,
Whispers its strange riddles to the heart;*

*Or a cool rivulet, tumbling and meandering
Its beauty frail, no force in its spangling drops,
Which may grow into a stream, a falls, an ocean!*

*I would float in my steerless craft, over the waves of you.
Move peacefully out to sea, and never return,*

Sunk in a fathomless tranquillity.

If I could be a child, I too would shout, Gesticulate, and wave my arms about

As if to quiver on the verge of speech. . . .

MEERAJI

OBSCURE VOCABULARY

(Translated by Aijaz Ahmad)

poetry: a day yet to come,
far ahead of today,
always.

poetry: someone's letter addressed to all;
greetings, mad as the wind that streams through a window half-open.

poetry: the lash of sun-dazzle on body and soul gone dark;
festivity of light.

poetry: for remembrance
a day of enunciations;
a tremor
to change the mind's directions.

poetry: that boundless sea of possibility,
sky into sky into sky.

poetry: ■ taste of dying.

M. SALIM-UR-REHMAN

also a "governing class" (even though it does not "control," by his criteria, the most powerful legislative body in the world). He clearly assumes that his conclusions have more radical political implications than the alternative lines of thought that are sketched out here. But radicals and Socialists can hold that assumption only if they allow centrist pluralists who glory in the absence of a monolithic ruling class to define the issues for them, and fail to analyze American society from their own more penetrating perspective.

A Child of Paradise

EXPENSIVE PEOPLE. By Joyce Carol Oates. Vanguard Press. 320 pp. $5.95.

LOUIS T. GRANT

Mr. Grant is a short story writer and freelance critic.

So much of serious contemporary American fiction is self-conscious and literary in the worst sense that it is truly a "literature of exhaustion." It is a literature written on the floating island Jonathan Swift called Laputa, whether we are reading the elegant parallelograms of Updike or Roth's grotesque rhomboids. As Swift put it, "although they are dexterous enough upon a piece of paper in the management of the rule, the pencil, and the divider, yet in the common actions and behavior of life I have not seen a more clumsy, awkward, and unhandy people."

On the other hand, an occasional writer comes along, such as Joyce Carol Oates, whose books display a vision of significant human experience. Her characters in By the North Gate, With Shuddering Fall, and A Garden of Earthly Delights, were simple, uneducated, often illiterate people, to whom the problems of the human heart in conflict with itself were more real than the refined anxieties of the sophisticated. The stark, regional stories of By the North Gate did not so much remind me of Flannery O'Connor's work as confirm what I had taken to be her failures as a writer. Flannery O'Connor tortured her characters, like some Luigi Galvani of fiction, in order to demonstrate her own deep pessimism about life. Whereas Flannery O'Connor's characters merely twitched, Joyce Carol Oates's suffered.

Joyce Carol Oates's new and finest, thoroughly modern novel proves that it is possible to be relevant without being a regionalist, as she appeared to be in her previous work, although it is largely due to her apprenticeship to a regional literature that she is now able to write of the contemporary world without herself assuming its self-conscious, affected, trivial and artificial attitudes.

The "given" world of Expensive People is the best—the model—little en-claves of wealthy suburbia, where the sons of local butchers, now vice presidents of prosperous chains of Colonial-style Fish, Fowl and Meat Shoppes, gambol in enormous kidney-shaped swimming pools. Such a man is the father of Expensive People's narrator, Richard Everett, a child murderer who has shot and killed his mother with a mail-order rifle. With an almost diabolical elegance, Joyce Carol Oates reveals the cruel story of Richard's childhood. Richard is the ignored quantity in one of those wealthy, unhappy marriages among the titleless aristocrats of our suburbs. His father is a busy, sentimental executive. His favorite phrase in moments of stress is, "Don't talk morbid." Richard's mother, Nastashya, is a minor novelist who enrolls her son in Johns Behemoth—a private school—with the following injunction: "Look reserved and a little abstracted. Look intelligent." At the school, which "seemed to me an elegant nightmare concoction made by adults for adults, to further the aims and fantasies of adults," Richard meets a boy of similar background, a 13-year-old alcoholic.

The creation of Nastashya, "this woman who was so simple in her way that all things ostentatious and expensive seemed emanations of a higher existence," is brilliant. The tortures she inflicts on her son in the name of civilization are as effective as the less refined ones inflicted out of pure brutality. One day she announces her disappointment in Richard's IQ score, 153, and coerces him into retaking the test. He surpasses himself out of love for his mother, scoring 161, fully aware that it is the score, not him, that matters. He is a self-declared "failure at eleven."

Evil has a logic; madness a structure few men discern. Slowly, with infinite grace, Joyce Carol Oates turns the conventions inside out and we see Nastashya Everett (nee, Nancy Rananow) creating in her son a monster in her own image and the image of the world she inhabits, as she stretches him upon the Danish-modern rack of her vapid ambitions, commanders his adoration, and then abandons him for empty adulteries between appointments at the Cedar Grove

Beauty Parlor. Not the cunning of reason, as Hegel said, but the cunning of madness disguised as convention rules this world. It takes its energy from the violation of human impulses and from the exploitation of natural means to achieve the unnatural ends of accumulation and regimentation.

Fernwood Village and Cedar Grove are the strongholds of this madness. The very existence of evil is unimaginable to their residents. And yet what Joyce Carol Oates accomplishes in Expensive People is the embodiment of the evil these people are without their ever knowing it:

It is a lovely long walk. These spring days in Fernwood! Everything, everything is lovely in Fernwood! To tell you all of the sloping lawns, evergreen screens (planted in full growth), green-gardens, courtyards, oval driveways, to tell you of all the luxurious pleasures of their box-shaped houses, their fishponds, the glimpses of their colored maids at windows, washing windows that are already clean—ah, to tell you of these things would be to write another Paradiso.

And out of this empty, diabolical paradise runs the child murderer, the "child of freedom" and of civilization, like an 11-year-old Joe Christmas in bifocals and a blue blazer, blasting away at his mother.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

Mr. Hamilton is music editor for W. W. Norton, and for some time has contributed regularly to High Fidelity. Benjamin Boretz is on leave for this season, but he will write occasionally in the next several months.

A recent Columbia Records advertisement—"Ives, Stockhausen, Boulez, Varèse, Messiaen, and other young electronic composers whose passion gig is the exploration of sound are bringing us the natural, limitless field of sound"—suggests both the categorical confusions and the factual inaccuracies that are being foisted on the record-consuming public by an industry that has discovered the contemporary "product." Although the tendency toward divergence between professional approval and mass enthusiasm has long been a characteristic of musical culture, the intervention of the economically influential recording industry now threatens more than ever the relative, if lopsided, stability whereby serious composition and performance have held their own against showmanship and simplistic exploitation. Those now gambling on the possibility of a gold mine if the "avant-garde" can be made palatable to a large public are pitching their wares toward the rock-psychedelic market and encouraging the more primitive current tendencies, the better to meet the far from intellectual demands of that public.

A sobering illustration of the possibilities inherent in this kind of exploitation came out of the International Music Congress held in New York early in September. Among the concerts presented for the delegates was an evening of music by Harry Partch, the venerable composer, advocate of microtonal music, and inventor of instruments for such music. Partch's work has been known to professionals for quite some time (recordings have been available for several years now), and has influenced younger composers. However, not until this particular evening, it seems, had his work caught the ear of a major record company executive—whereupon the entire equipe, unique instruments and all, was packed off to a studio and taped for future release.

No one would begrudge Partch this opportunity—but the resources that the record mogul disposes can (and have been) directed with equal ease in decidedly more dubious directions. Most subtly disturbing, of course, is the report that a man commanding such resources should at this late date have been still ignorant of Partch's activity.

It would be vain to expect that the exposure (at another concert during the Congress, on September 9) of a series of works composed for Tanglewood might similarly result in major-label recordings (it did, however, at least attract the attention of The New York Times, which consistently ignores comparable programs when they are presented by the Group for Contemporary Music at Columbia or by Composers' Showcase). Noteworthy in the program by Tanglewood-based ensembles under Gunther Schuller were a fluent new trio by Easley Blackwood and Henry Weinberg's 1966 Cantus Commemorabilis, in which his usually highly tensile structure is enhanced by increased concision (no doubt related, in turn, to the greater tension generated at the unusually colorful instrumental surface). Mario Davidovsky's Synchronisms No. 2 and Charles Wuorinen's Flute Concerto (both from 1964) were further presentations to the international audience of significant and fruitful aspects of American music that they could not otherwise encounter easily (only the spectacular live-and-tape Davidovsky work has been recorded: CRI 204).

The final concert presented during the New York segment of the IMC, by the Buffalo Philharmonic under Lukas Foss (September 11), raised another aspect of the difficulties faced by the serious composer: a press that is willing, perhaps eager, to condemn his work before it has been properly heard. In this case the victim was Milton Babbitt's Correspondences for string orchestra and tape. Despite a speech by the conductor clearly implying a less than satisfactory performance, despite the presence of an assistant conductor who signaled measure numbers to the orchestra, and despite the glaringly uncertain gestures of the players, none of the daily or weekly reviewers, to my knowledge, saw fit to consider the possibility that they were not hearing an even marginally adequate representation of Babbitt's conception. To be sure, anyone acquainted with the highly sophisticated sonic surface of Babbitt's previous works could have deduced this inadequacy from internal evidence alone; the only fair conclusion is that the work has yet to be heard.

More satisfactory performances were given at this concert to the slick and showy Capriccio for violin and orchestra by Penderecki (superbly played by Paul Zukofsky, who at the Tanglewood concert had already demonstrated his indisposability to the new music scene by performing in four works and conducting a fifth), a trivial march (Calcium Light Night) by Ives, and the conductor's own Baroque Variations. Foss's collage techniques, here performed upon works of Handel, Scarlatti and Bach, are not in themselves objectionable, but the resulting works show less concern with structure than with Schadenfreude: the "idea" of the piece is more important than the musical events. (The Penderecki and Foss works are recorded by the Buffalo orchestra on Nonesuch H-71201 and H-71202 respectively.)

The Buffalo concert opened with an orchestral work, Re-ak, by the Korean composer Isang Yun, whose earlier Garak for flute and piano was premiered at the uncommonly interesting recital (October 11 at Carnegie Recital Hall) by Sophie Sollberger, Robert Miller and the violist Jacob Glick. Yun, whose kidnapping from Berlin and continued detention on political charges by the South Korean Government has aroused protests from the musical community, is a composer of some resource: his delicate sense of instrumental color fills out rather static, spatially oriented conceptions to a level of real musical interest.

At the same Carnegie concert, Robert Miller presented the world premiere of four piano pieces by Arthur Berger, which further develop the brilliantly virtuosic keyboard style of his Three Pieces for Two Pianos (recorded on Columbia MS-6959). Berger's tactful and functional employment of "prepared" piano notes is an example of how a device originally introduced (by Cage) for coloristic purposes eventually becomes a significant resource to a composer of vastly different aims. Similarly, Harvey Sollberger's Composition in Nine Sections (1961) for viola and piano incorporates the glissando effects so beloved of sound-effects composers into a clearly pitch-defined role. Throughout the evening, which included Schubert's Trock'ne Blumen variations as well as works by Raoul Pleskow, Manuel Enriquez and Milhaud, the playing and musicianship were exemplary; all three performers stand at the forefront of their profession.

Despite the obtrusion of a tinkling chandelier and the intrusion of occasional climaxes from performances in the main hall next door, Carnegie Recital Hall is an exceptionally satisfactory room for chamber music—a fact that was underlined a few nights later by Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau's performance of Schubert's Die schöne Müllerin in the main auditorium (October 16). The economic reasons for such a grotesque disparity of scale between music and hall are probably irrefutable, but some way should be found to present this singer in a space reasonably proportionate to the Lied repertory. From many seats in Carnegie the listener must strain acutely to hear softer passages and details. For those within range, at any rate, Dieskau was in exceptional voice (after a rough start in Das Wandern), and his skillful dynamic control overcame the excessive contrast between loud and soft singing that has sometimes seemed an inevitable consequence of his vocal method. Indeed, from a sheerly vocal standpoint

The Best Way To Get

NATION

THE NATION 11-4-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

Schubert cycle has not been so well forth in years. I regret only that the jury impulse sometimes seemed more rational than musical, that Schubert's key positions were upset by irregular positions, and that Norman Shetland's "accompaniments" were rarely more than that term implies, however played.

He most superficially newsworthy subject of Luciano Berio's Sinfonia (commissioned by the New York Philharmonic, who performed it under the composer's direction at the concerts of October 10-14) was a movement comprising in greater part, the St. Antonius movement of Mahler's Second Symphony, adding extensive additional counterpoints, including vocal parts for the Swingle Singers. Since Berio's remarkably imaginative ear for sonorities and textures has always been the most obvious feature of his music, it was disappointing to find in this movement an opacity that impeded clear apprehension of just what he was up to. A great number of quotations from the literature is said to be embedded in the piece, but I could sort out relatively few at first hearing. I did note that a snatch of the Rosenkavalier waltzes struck me as being in "poor taste" (without being at all sure what that term can possibly mean in such a context), and that the castanet rhythm from Stravinsky's Agon was introduced—to provide a tie-up with the first work on the program? There was something ironic about the programing of Agon as a tribute to the City Center's anniversary, for it was the first time that Bernstein had conducted "late" Stravinsky with the Philharmonic. To hear more recent Stravinsky orchestral music in New York, you have to go to the ballet.

pathos lurks in The Birthday Party and even more penetratingly in The Caretaker, while in The Homecoming the Pinteresque controlled grin seems on the verge of bursting with anger. In Tea Party and The Basement Pinter appears rather more amused, never rising to anything beyond a dry scorn. The businessman of the former might be pitiful if he were more interesting, and the boys in the latter would be contemptible if they were not such voids. But Pinter, a keen showman, knows how to make much out of little.

The plays are so well directed by James Hammerstein that it seems as if he had made himself one with the author. The cast is admirably chosen, the acting very apt. David Ford in Tea Party adds sufficient inner torment to its central character to save it and the play from the suspicion of triviality. Valerie French as the inciting secretary mixes just the right degree of office etiquette with the cruelty of insidious allure. Two child players actually demonstrate witty "style."

Margo Ann Berdeshevsky in The Basement gives the impression of an Ivory soap sphinx: smooth, attractively recipient of and indifferently content with each and every male thrust. Ted van Griethuysen and James Ray create a kind of anonymity of person—which is perhaps precisely the author's intention—in this play of nonbeings.

Robert Hatch

Out in Brooklyn, the Becks have been employing ritual, yoga, the mass chanting of slogans and group therapy on the stage and in the house to purge the audience of its militarist and capitalist devils and restore it to communal grace. Now on Broadway (Ambassador Theatre) Joseph Heller in We Bombed in New Haven seeks much the same goal through wit, schmaltz, buffoonery, scenic legerdemain and a preoccupation with the ambiguities allegedly induced by the fact that actors are real people who impersonate fictions. Mr. Heller is much less experienced in the theatre than are the Becks—indeed, this is his debut—but I think he has a better grasp of its dimensions. He seems to understand that a playwright's most important creation is the audience, a fragile and ephemeral entity that takes shape in the house from the matrix of what takes place on the stage. "Audience involvement," that article of faith in the modern theatre, does not consist in roughing up the cash customers, a self-defeating form of aggres-

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

Harold Pinter's two new one-act plays Tea Party and The Basement at the Outside Playhouse (334 East 74 Street) are slight entertainments written with wit and the kind of economy and precision that produce suspense. Originally written for television, they provide evening of superior pastime.

They are by no means obscure, though the second of the two possesses a touch of that piquant ambiguity which makes any theatregoers ask, "What does it mean?"—to which the reply should be none spoken by the 9-year-old boy of the play, "What does 'meaning' mean?" Tea Party concerns an efficient and successful British businessman, a little of the Blimpish side. A widower with no children, he has married a handsome, upper, antiseptically cool woman. After a year of respectable home life he is strongly attracted to his artful tease of secretary. But being of "a certain class," he does not want to admit to himself a trouble that is apparent to everyone else. No one gives any outward sign of recognizing the situation, though in the way or another everyone seems to be looking for him. Finally the bedeviled creature becomes wholly catatonic, incapable of sight, speech or movement.

The Basement deals with two young men, Law and Stott, who were once close friends, but who have lost touch. One rainy evening Stott turns up at his former friend's cozy basement apartment and asks if he may spend the night (at the moment, he says, he is looking for a place to live). Law assures him that he can stay as long as he likes.

Stott then asks if he can bring in a girl friend who has been waiting outside in the rain. Law, only slightly puzzled, politely consents. The girl enters. Stott and the girl immediately undress, get into bed, and proceed to make love with no embarrassment at Law's presence.

The arrangement appears to develop into a permanent one, till the girl "seduces" Law; this irregular triangle in turn seems to become fixed, but then animosity between the men mounts to the point of violence. Law disappears and Stott occupies the basement. At the final curtain, we see Law return as Stott had previously done in a downpour, but with no girl, and ask to stay over.

There may be a homosexual inference in the plot but what is much more relevant to it is that the two fellows are more eager to enjoy the comforts of the basement apartment than of the girl.

Most of Pinter's work comes to this: bereft of all but a residual animal instinct and no firm moral or intellectual objectives, man loses his human identity. He can be or do anything without any clear consciousness of his behavior. It looks to many as if that is what we have come to.

There is in the telling of these two plays the same impassivity, the same provocative details and stimulating hints which, like a writer of clever detective fiction, Pinter always employs to arouse a steadily fascinated attention. His touch in this case is rather more playfully derisive than in his more important work. Though Pinter usually seeks to conceal his emotion by a noncommittal air, sion which only fragments the assemblage into individuals acutely aware that they have private dignities to protect. Involvement is achieved by giving the audience a line to follow, a form to perceive, so that for an hour or so the minds of a considerable group of people are aligned, their disparate experiences brought to bear on a coherent set of events. When this works, the audience is magnetized to a state of perception that may be considerably superior to its individual talents. It is nothing new in the theatre, Lord knows, but I suspect the sin of pride is involved in supposing that it is not enough—the playwright's sin of wanting to manipulate the audience, not by his art but in his own person.

Heller knows all this and gets off to a good start. We are somewhere with a bomber crew that is about to bomb Constantinople because the script says that is what comes next. The script also tells who will die and where, and the men jockey for fatter, "more secure" roles. Jason Robards is the operations captain, Diana Sands the coffee-and-doughnuts Red Cross girl (beautiful and bouncy in an ugly costume). They sleep together at night and, in this double-focus context, off-stage. On duty and in the play, they jibe at each other with the sharp humor of people not quite sure that they have committed themselves as far as their bodies have carried them. "I want you," he says. "For very long?," she asks.

Captain/stage manager Robards (Heller gives scrupulous credit to Thornton Wilder) employs the ingratiating informality of an insecure man to get the flight in the air and the show on the road, nervously conscious all the while of his major (William Roerick), the agent of delegated authority and keeper of the text. It is a fault, perhaps of Heller's stage inexperience, perhaps of John Hirsch's direction, that you know from the moment he walks on the set that Robards will leave anyone in any lurch. One of the real ambiguities of stage "reality" is that an actor is burdened with a foreknowledge that a man does not have to carry.

More generally, though, I am less seized than Heller by the fascinations of the play-within-life device. I have seen it tried fairly often, and it usually strikes me as being more a tangle than a mystery. On this occasion, too, faults in direction have caused the crewmen—who are "the people"—to cavort when out of character, so that they are less impressive as "themselves" than as "actors." Nevertheless, Heller has a use beyond intellectual decor for his bifocal approach. It creates a tension between men as citizens (actors), villains and victims of the state, and men as individuals, with pasts to complete and futures to anticipate. "They told me it would disrupt my life less if I got killed sooner," says a young replacement, and the audience applauds its recognition of the gap between official cant and private truth. The ambiguity between role and fate induces a parallel ambiguity between audience and public, so that the major who commands according to "their" script may be felt to be quoting from "our" script as well.

The problem is how to resolve a play so bifurcated, and in this Heller is so successful. As the evening works its second half, the split becomes increasingly overt, with actors refusing to go on in their parts, with Miss Sands seething Mr. Robards to get her out of the theatre, with everyone shouting at him, at last, has no intention of dying and with one recalcitrant actor he suddenly shot dead on-stage because will not pretend to die off-stage. But course he is not really killed, the aspects of the play do not really coalesce, the edges of the mirrors have become apparent and the audience starts squirm.

That squirming is the giveaway, always happens when the spectators begin to suspect that they are being tortured, that the play is no longer a thing, and they have become it. A theatre is not a pulpit; it is a place where you must show, not tell, what you believe. Like all serious playwrights, Heller has something he wants to show, and begins promisingly enough with metaphor and paradox, wit and romance, to create a body for his conviction. But I get the impression that he had a much clearer image of the moral than of the work so that in the end he loses control of play and falls back on exhortation. The characters become witnesses, the developments become predictable, the act loses plausibility, there is not enough incident left to reach to the final curtain. The play dies and the message survives.

It is disappointing, because although I doubt that Heller is up to writing Trojan Women, he knows war well enough to loathe it, and he knows theatre well enough to realize that he cannot make that loathing real by venting new epithets for Lyndon Johnson. For quite a space he maintains distance and expectancy that make play work, but he had not enough invention to get the job completed and ends up chanting with the Becks in Brooklyn. It is the more serious because his Catch 22, that spectacular mock-up of martial heroics, suffered a similar collapse into strident exhaustion in homestretch.

PUBLICATIONS

F.B.I. MISTAKE? Documentary: "The F.B.I. Security Affair", $6. T. Williams Company, 105 Elm, Ypsilanti, Michigan.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists under bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

"SELECTED POEMS" of GERRIE FLYNN (Visitors of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 13 Street, New York City 10011.

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOUNDS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Book, 48 West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique, Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Ave., N.Y.C. Bin Dir Woor calls on President Johnson to immortalize and transfigure his Administration by calling together a permanent WORLD CONGRESS, of the elected heads of all nations (for one purpose only), to seek to arbitrate or prevent all present and future wars. Readers contact President Johnson.

MALVINA REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

You will enjoy . . .
these books	Little Boxes and Other Handmade Songs	$2.50
	The Muse of Parker Street	$2.50
this LP	Malvina Reynolds Sings the Truth	$3.75
	(Columbia 2614 - Stereo 9414)
You and the kids will enjoy . . .
this book	Tweedles and Foodles for Young Noodles	$1.75
these 45 rpm's	You Can't Make a Turtle Come Out	$1.00
	Morningtown Ride	$1.00

(Postage paid; tax included)

Write: Schroder Music Company, 2027 Parker Street, Berkeley, Ca. 94704

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1270

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

and 7 down Certainly not drunk legally! (5,2,1,5)
 What they had to do with a pound too much? (9)
 Does it involve getting your own back? (9)
 What craft might make, if vigilant, (5)
 Standard early form to allow something to be played? (9)
 Swimming is supposed to be free with it. (5)
 Stunned, as one might not be in a friendly game. (10)
 Do women consider skin cream such a device? (4-6)
 Butterfly familiarly known as one? (5)
 Victoria might typify them. (9)
 Bad leads caused by what one does prior to the first bid. (5)
 Are prints so developed as it might happen? (9)
 Figuring things out is doing as bad! (9)
 Periods of time not restricted to social appointments. (5)

DOWN

Herb, when the loose type, might cause a clash. (6)
 An old dog might turn against one. (6)
 The roadhead might be complained about.

4 In their case, let the client be damned! (6,9)
 5 Well, aren't they out of character? (15)
 6 One sounds as though meals and such prepared this way. (8)
 7 See 1 across
 8 It seems a mere L.S.D. substitute stoness these! (8)
 14 Was capable of providing the answer? (8)
 15 According to the plans each mast is different. (8)
 16 A foolish couple in fanatic make-up? (8)
 18 The lady novelist never wrote, according to Kokko. (6)
 19 It goes to prove an unselfish person isn't one! (6)
 20 Quakers in the manner of writers? (6)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1269

ACROSS: 6 Clef; 10 Tenacity; 11 and 1 across Counterrevolution; 12 Outs; 13 Usquebaugh; 15 Abandon; 16 Element; 17 Nocking; 20 Theorem; 22 Mills bombs; 23 Comb; 25 Exploit; 26 Rossini; 27 Sard; 28 Scatter rug. DOWN: 1 Rational numbers; 2 Venetia; 3 Lobo; 4 Trypsin; 5 Occlude; 7 Lettuce; 8 For the time being; 9 Bumblebee; 14 Admission; 18 Caliper; 19 Gnostic; 20 Taboret; 21 Roomier; 24 Ash.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PERSONALS

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team!" For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

HANDCRAFTED MEDALLIONS—Peace, cross, six others. Stoneware disc on thong. Free Brochure. Peter Leach, Dept. N, 2295 Dodd Rd., St. Paul, Minn. 55118.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/510 and 1,000/575. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

INKYDINKS: Outrageous new rubber stamp. PEACE SYMBOL, CENSORED, DROP DEAD, others. $1 each. Free flyer: Mother Art Co., 290 Riverside Drive, New York City 10025.

TRAVEL

JET LOS ANGELES/TOKYO R.T. $389. Departing 6/23/69. 39 days. $95 confirms. Send your inquiries c/o AMERICAN ADVENTURE TOURS, 3765 E. Colorado, Pasadena, Calif. 91107. 213/794-8575.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE
by Meyer A. Zelig (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose
Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

11-4-68

The $5.95 Best-Seller of Political 1968

YOURS NOW FOR ONLY $2.95 with a new one-year subscription to NATION

The good fight is now in NATION

Join it now as the 91st Congress, the most problem-haunted in years, is chosen and convened.

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ I'll join you for one year (48 issues) at $10, and accept the $5.95, 473-page The Case Against Congress for only $2.95. I enclose $12.95.

N 114

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

With millions robbed of the Presidential choices they hoped for, Congress assumes unequalled importance now. How equal to the task is Congressional character?

Drew Pearson's and Jack Anderson's searching probe boldly reveals scores of Congress' members: habitual betrayers of the people's trust. No bigger more pervasive scandal has lasted so long or been persistently concealed.

"Stiff with names, dates and facts...an encyclopedia of the use of legislative power for private purposes," The Nation called The Case Against Congress in its September 23 review. Its 473 explosive pages are ammunition for the Good Fight for months ahead—an arsenal each week's issue of The Nation will keep refilling.

BURLINGAME
NOV 12 1968
LIBRARY

POLITICS OF VANDALISM STANLEY COHEN

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 11, 1968 35 cents

2-698 PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

RUSSIA AFTER FIFTY

'Moscow Is So Dull' DESMOND SMITH

Plain Talk With Vodka W. E. CHILTON III

Kremlin Seismograph SIDNEY I. PLOSS

WHAT DALEY NEEDS, DALEY GETS RALPH WHITEHEAD, Jr

MYTHS AND LIES

McNamara: Glacial Technocrat TOM J. FAREH

Our National-Security Managers RICHARD J. WALTON

Dahlberg: A Prophetic Wisdom RAYMOND ROSENTHAL

EDITORIALS

Better Late . . .

The script for this year's fantastic succession of political happenings called for the dramatic announcement of a bombing halt on the eve of the election, with the new phase of negotiations scheduled to begin on the morrow thereof. But however calculated, the bombing halt is good news. It is, as Senator McCarthy has said, not the trump card but a good opener. That it should have come much sooner is scarcely relevant at the moment. In any case we doubt that the halt was ordered now solely for political effect; if the main intention had been to help the Humphrey-Muskie ticket, it would have been imposed somewhat earlier in the campaign.

The fact is that when the President withdrew from the race on March 31, he was successful in his aim to "depoliticize" the Vietnamese issue. Thus, although the heated public debate that began in 1965 continued right through the Chicago convention, it has remained the major, but largely undiscussed, issue of the campaign. All the contenders have completed for the peace vote, urging "an early and honorable end" to the war, and it follows that none was in a position to make major political capital of the bombing halt.

Several dangers now loom large. One, of course, would arise from the failure of either Mr. Nixon or Mr. Humphrey to poll 270 votes in the electoral college; any uncertainty about the Presidential succession would obviously impede the Paris talks. On the other hand, if the negotiations get off to a promising new start, enough progress may be made by January 20 to set the course of policy firmly in the direction of a negotiated settlement. Both parties have an obvious stake in the success of the negotiations. A second danger is that demagogic, hawkish elements may demand extra measures if the negotiations remain deadlocked, or if it becomes clear, as may well happen, that we shall be forced to settle on terms that the American people have been lead to believe we would never accept. Beyond this danger is still another: assuming that a settlement is negotiated, events in Vietnam might create an opportunity for the idiot Right to start screaming "sell-out" and "betrayal." But most of the hawks now realize the folly of the war and, for all their grumbling, may show uncharacteristic restraint during the difficult time of bringing it to an end.

The possibility of unpleasant surprises should not, however, be discounted. It arises from the Administration's lack of candor and the failure of the candidates to debate the issues and alternatives in this year's wretched political campaign. The American people should know, they should be forewarned, they should be urged to realize and accept the fact that we have lost the war in terms of the various, often contradictory goals and purposes that have been cited to justify it. If the fact is accepted, the possibility of further trouble can be minimized. The tragedy of Vietnam was implicit in the bipartisan "anti-Communist" assumptions on which the cold war has been waged. If we want to avoid similar disasters in the future, we shall reject these assumptions and start basing policy on the new realities and our traditional political values.

Between the Tides

In the wake of the invasion of Czechoslovakia, The Economist (September 14) suggested that a second Russian revolution might be on its way. The argument was that the outbreak of liberalization in Czechoslovakia was viewed by the Soviet leaders as the paradigm for a similar development in the Soviet Union. Hence the decision to intervene militarily, at no matter what cost in world condemnation. In this view, the Soviet allegation that socialism was endangered was a transparent rationalization; what was really in danger was Russian censorship and control of expression.

Whereas socialism could remain substantially intact in the Soviet Union, a second revolution might democratize it—though not, surely, on the American model, which is now threatened from the Right as Soviet socialism is threatened from the Left. Democratic socialism is the last thing that right-wing elements of the capitalist democracies want in Eastern Europe or in Asia. When their hearts bleed for the oppressed, it is the overthrow of the Soviet system that they hope for, not its liberalization; a benevolent brand of socialism would deprive them of one of their most effective talking points. Russian repression finds a shield in this attitude abroad, which is an additional handicap for those gallant Soviet and satellite citizens who are standing up to their bureaucracies. They have other handicaps, but none is insuperable.

The Russian Revolution had two basic purposes—the world-wide overthrow of capitalism, and the modernization of the Russian economy, so that Russia might acquire industrial and military power commensurate with its potential. The first failed, the second succeeded. But to make this success possible, the Russian people had to be educated, and when people are educated some of them will begin to think. Then they will want to express their thoughts. So impelled, the Soviet scientists, engineers and technicians are inevitably going to demand more freedom. Since any modern power, Socialist or capitalist, must depend on what John Kenneth Galbraith calls the "techno-structure," in the end the top administrators will be forced to listen to them—not only about science and technology but about all the things that touch them closely as an intellectual elite. The same is proving to be true of artists, novelists, playwrights, movie producers and directors, poets, editors, and all the other occupations that make up a civilized society.

Another factor making for liberalization is that opinion is being expressed too freely in the international dialogue of the Socialist states for the leaders of the USSR to fancy that they can reimpose rigid thought-control techniques. The pressure for freedom is not confined to the Soviet intelligentsia. There is, for example, the brilliant Polish novelist Jerzy Andrzejewski. In addition to his widely read Ashes and Diamonds, which was also filmed, he has written other novels which should be better known in the Western world. Early in September, Andrzejewski wrote the president of the Czechoslovak writers' union from Warsaw to express the solidarity of Polish writers with their Czechoslovak colleagues. "I realize," Andrzejewski said, in reference to the Polish role in the invasion, "that my voice of political and moral protest does not and cannot counterbalance the discord with which Poland has been covered in the opinion of progressives in the entire world. . . ." Communist parties in other countries took the same stand.

Thus rebels like the Soviet physicists Pavel M. Litvinov, Dimitri Blokhintsev and Andrei D. Sakharov (whose remarkable essay, "Progress, Coexistence and Intellectual Freedom," was recently published here); Mrs. Larisa Daniel, wife of the imprisoned writer Uri Daniel; the novelist Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn; the poet Andrei Voznesensky; the editor Aleksandr Tvardovsky, and Maj. Gen. Pyotr G. Grigorenko have time their side.

This is the season of the year when the USSR celebrates its birth as a nation out of the chaos of World War I. Accordingly, The Nation devotes a large section of the current issue to articles on Russia's present temper and pre-occupations. The tone and content of these reports suggest that the USSR, like the United States, is a nation at slack tide, awaiting new currents from a direction not yet perceived. For both nations it is a time of immediate hazard and of ultimate promise. If their situations can be mutually recognized, forbearance will perhaps be mutually forthcoming.

Once Again the Polls

Each Presidential campaign starts the discussion anew; how good are the polls? The argument continues, actively and with mounting excitement, until the votes are counted. Then there is usually a brief autopsical discussion centering on how well or how badly the pollsters forecast the outcome, and the subject is dismissed until the next election.

But this time it may be different, for the reason that startling discrepancies have emerged between the Gallup and Harris surveys. Just before the Republican convention, a Gallup study purported to show that Mr. Nixon could defeat either Senator McCarthy or Vice President Humphrey, while Gov. Nelson Rockefeller was in a tight race with these two Democrats. A Harris study made six days after the Gallup announcement had Nixon running behind either McCarthy or Humphrey, while Rockefeller could easily beat these two. Thereupon Harris and Gallup issued a joint statement to the effect that both polls were correct but that in the brief interval between them Rockefeller had jumped into the lead. While Gallup and Harris may have been satisfied with this explanation, to many others it seemed contrived. In a speech delivered on October 18, Burns W. Roper, president of Roper Research Associates, criticized the joint Gallup-Harris statement as implausible.

After the conventions, Gallup found a twelve-point spread between Nixon and Humphrey, with the latter trailing. A Harris poll also showed Humphrey behind, but by only five points. The Gallup poll was taken between October 3 and October 12; the Harris dates were October 9 to 11. Louis H. Bean, the analyst who predicted the Tru-

IN THIS ISSUE

November 11, 1968

EDITORIALS

482

ARTICLES

486 What Daley Needs, Daley Gets

Ralph Whitehead, Jr.

Russia After 50

487 "Moscow Is So Dull"

Desmond Smith

492 Plain Talk With Vodka

W. E. Chilton III

494 Kremlin Seismograph

Sidney J. Ploss

497 Politics of Vandalism

Stanley Cohen

500 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

501 McNamara:

The Glacial Technocrat

Tom J. Farer

502 Getting the Picture (poem)

Nancy Price

504 Dahlberg:

A Prophetic Wisdom

Raymond Rosenthal

505 Our National-Security

Managers

Richard J. Walton

506 Books of Interest to

Nation Readers

507 I Heard the Head of Hunters (poem)

Michael Shorb

508 Films

Robert Hatch

508 Television

Leslie R. Colitt

510 Theatre

Harold Clurman

511 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

CLIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERRY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHEN; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 16

man victory in 1948, asked: "Why should two national pollsters be so far apart?"

Little attention need be paid to George Wallace's cries that the polls have been rigged against him: Wallace will say anything that he thinks will assist his noisome crusade. But the criticisms of other observers must be taken more seriously. Rep. John Moss of California and Rep. Lucien Nedzi of Michigan have suggested that a Congressional investigation may be in order, and there have been similar proposals in state legislatures. Richard Nixon called Harris a "Democratic pollster." Gallup himself was worried about the pollsters' collective reputation: "The image of the big polls will suffer if we're too far off in the Presidential race," he said.

The polls have become a form of public utility, clearly invested with a public interest. It follows that the public has a right to know more about their inner workings than it does now. The polling industry acknowledges as much. Last spring those pollsters that publish their results set up a "National Council on Published Polls" to establish standards, avoid possible conflicts of interest, and agree on a code of ethical procedures. A larger group, the American Association of Public Opinion Research, which includes the private pollsters, has been engaged in a similar project.

These efforts should be pressed, so that convincing progress can be made before the next election. One symptom of public distrust is that an increasing number of people who are asked for their views on elections are refusing to cooperate. Since those who are approached are supposed to constitute a representative sample, a large percentage of refusals and substitutions may result in distorted statistics.

Part of the industry's difficulty lies in the fact that pollsters deal with elections and other matters of public interest, and as market researchers also contribute to the great selling effort that permeates American life. Roper alluded to this duality when he conceded that while much of the blame for abuses lies within the industry, customers or clients must share some of it. Politicians and sales managers alike are prone to suppress or distort results that run contrary to their interests. This is the more reason for the pollsters to avoid any taint of partisanship in their political assessments. Few industries succeed in self-regulation. The pollsters may be an exception, but the aftermath of this election may be their last chance to prove it.

'Adios' to the Olympics

Ancient Greece was never a conspicuously peaceful land, but when games were held a truce was imposed, so that runners and wrestlers, poets and orators, might journey safely to the meeting place and demonstrate their excellence. Ours is not a conspicuously peaceful world, but the Olympic Games just completed at Mexico City were perhaps the most brilliant of the modern era, and the forecasts of serious embarrassments, if not disaster, proved groundless.

The auspices were indeed unfavorable. Mexico had been brutally suppressing the indignation of its youth, and as the teams gathered the authorities put on a display of unseemly (and as it proved, foolishly excessive) military control. South Africa was not acceptable in an assembly dedicated to sportsmanship. There was bitterness in the prospect of Czechoslovak and Russian champions contending for laurels. The many blacks on the American squad were participating in a mood of mixed pride and anger. The altitude of the site was thought to make shocking physical distress inevitable.

But though some athletes obviously suffered (particularly those called upon for extended outlays of power), records fell in dazzling numbers in the thin air of Mexico City. And though there were frictions, ineptitudes, displays of authoritarianism and painful rumors, the young athletes of the world tested one another, displayed their strength and beauty and courage, and parted to return home in peace.

That is what the Olympics are intended to do: to show that valor is a personal virtue and that superlative achievement knows no color or flag. That is why a race to the tape is a symbol of greater human promise than a race to the moon. The circumstances could have been better; there was no wisdom in banishing the two young American Negroes for their gestures of protest, and there was no honesty in the reason given for doing so. It is simply not believable that the International Olympic Committee would have banished the entire American team over an internal matter that in no way impeded the order of the occasion. And the as-yet-unsubstantiated rumors of money improperly distributed to allegedly amateur contestants, in themselves disagreeable, emphasize once again the hypocrisy of the Olympic rules. All athletes of Olympic caliber are subsidized in one way or another; the standards which must be met in modern world competition are so high that no one can train for them in after hours. The antiquated notion of amateurism should be scrapped, and a superb performer should be acknowledged worthy of his hire.

The Olympic Games and the Catholic Church are similarly ancient institutions that have become encrusted with lore and ritual. They are both governed by old men who set the rules for the young men who do the jobs. With arrogance dominating the high ranks and zeal motivating the low, friction is inevitable. Change is also inevitable. It will become evident in the Munich Olympic Games of 1972, as it is evident today in the winds of protest ventilating the doctrines of Catholicism. All institutions resist change, but those which call upon their participants to excel in body or spirit are the least justified in their intransigence.

How Free Is Information?

Hosannas went up when President Johnson signed the freedom of information law on July 4, 1967. As often before and since, Mr. Johnson was his own cheerleader. "Freedom of information," he declared, "is so vital that only the national security, not the desire of public officials or private citizens, should determine when it must be restricted." This was all very well as sloganeering, but a governmental practice information remains as needlessly restricted as ever. Many officials act as if they had never heard of the law or as if they had the right to veto at will.

A current illustration is Robert F. Kennedy's personal account of the 1962 missile crisis. This 21,000-word memoir, sold for more than $1 million, gives a comprehensive idea of the feelings of the inner power circle as the United States drew close to a nuclear conflict with the Soviet Union. It tells what was said and who said it. Yet so far it has proved impossible to shake loose the report of the four-man committee (Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor, chairman; Allen W. Dulles, director of the CIA; Robert F. Kennedy, Attorney General; Admiral Arleigh Burke, chief of naval operations) appointed by President Kennedy to survey the whole Bay of Pigs fiasco, to find out what went wrong and what might be done to prevent a recurrence. The Taylor report would reveal how good the military advice of the Joint Chiefs of Staff actually was, and likewise the perspicacity or lack of it displayed by the CIA in the intelligence field. Nothing could be more important, but six years after the event the public is still denied this vital information.

One difficulty is that no appeals procedure is established under the law. Such a procedure could presumably be established by Executive action. All it requires are the appointment of an official in the Executive office to whom appeals could be addressed, and the publication of regulations setting forth the procedure for doing so. The publicity attendant on such protocols would in itself have a salutary effect.

As it is, individuals and corporations must resort to the slow, cumbersome and expensive procedure of suing the government to force the release of documents or data which they wish to use. Thirty such cases are pending. Almost all of them involve material economically valuable for private use. An important exception is the suit brought in July, 1968, by Consumers Union for the purpose of gaining public access to evaluations in federal agency files as to the quality of consumer goods and services (information derived from government research at the taxpayers' expense). The specific complaint in the Consumers Union suit is directed against the Veterans Administration, which has refused to reveal the results of tests done for it on various brands and models of hearing aids.

It would be a great help in the current situation if reporters and other media personnel would make maximum use of the law as it stands, demanding the rights it provides, harassing the delinquent government agencies until they were persuaded that revelation is preferable to the angry buzz of frustration. When the media are refused information, they should at least publicize the fact. In some cases, this in itself will produce a more liberal response from government bodies, and the attitude may spread from one agency to another, somewhat improving the overall situation.

Apparently all three Presidential candidates have given approval in principle to appointment of an appeals official of the type suggested. The winner should not be allowed to forget this commitment.

The Late Late Show

Reruns of old movies on TV have nothing on the perennial crusade of the AFL-CIO against Communist trade unions abroad—or any trade unions that are not patterned on Samuel Gompers' adage of trade unionism "pure and simple." The activities of Jay Lovestone and his corps of Red-hunters in Europe, Latin America and the Far East have been chronicled in Nation articles by Henry Berger, Sidney Lens and others; now the same old melodramas, re-edited for local conditions but still supported by the State Department and using the same CIA techniques, are beginning to show up in Africa. As elsewhere, African labor will thereby get the impression that the entire U.S. labor movement is reactionary. Lovestone is not welcomed as an ideological mentor by more progressive African labor elements, who prefer to be aligned with neither side in the cold war.

Recent developments in the Lovestone safari are recounted by Stanley Meisler from Nairobi, Kenya, in the October 10 Los Angeles Times. At first Lovestone and his staff relied on the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), which had achieved notable success after World War II in suppressing Communist unions in West Germany and creating rival, anti-Communist unions in France and Italy. As in Europe, the operations in Africa were carried on under the supervision of Irving Brown, Lovestone's long-time coadjutor. But when ICFTU proved ineffective there, George Meany directed Lovestone to supplement it with the African-American Labor Center (AALC), with Brown still in charge.

The U.S. Agency for International Development supplies the bulk of AALC funds, but in contrast to most of its operations gives it a free rein. Meisler points out that AID follows the same policy with the Planned Parenthood Association. Sensitive issues are involved in both operations, and AID prefers not to be too closely identified with their goals.

In 1967, AALC received $1,537,000 from the U.S. Government and $482,000 from AFL-CIO unions and private contributors. AID reports that federal money for AALC has currently increased to $2,411,390. (This is not necessarily the actual total, since U.S. ambassadors in African countries are also supplied with special funds for "impact" projects; AALC may be getting another million through these channels.)

Whereas in Kenya, owing to local opposition, AALC has been relatively cautious, Meisler reports that elsewhere it "has fulfilled the traditional AFL-CIO role of helping non-Communist unions fight Communist unions." This is a sure recipe for setting elements in the indigenous labor movement at one another's throats. Meisler cites several instances which resulted in embarrassment for the United States.

Is it too much to expect that the new administration taking over in January will, as part of a general overhaul of the State Department, re-examine the role of AFL-CIO in relation to American policy—or, to put it more directly, the role of Jay Lovestone? If the State Department feels that it should be actively concerned with trade union activities overseas (a debatable proposition), then it should formulate its own programs and see that they are carried out. The notion that AFL-CIO should be used as an instrument of American policy serves the best interests of neither American labor nor the State Department. The record of Lovestone's labor diplomacy throughout the cold-war years forces the conclusion that his influence should be severed now, before his mischievous intrigue involve American policy for Africa in the same difficulties that have attended his earlier efforts in Europe, Asia and Latin America.

WHAT DALEY NEEDS, DALEY GETS

RALPH WHITEHEAD, Jr.

Mr. Whitehead, a Chicago newspaper man, is completing a book on the politics of law and order.

Chicago

About 250 delegates and visitors to the Democratic National Convention met at a Chicago hotel late on the night of August 28. A few hours earlier, Mayor Richard Daley's police force had clubbed apart a protest outside the Conrad Hilton. The meeting watched on TV as Hubert Humphrey got the nomination Daley wanted him to have. A news report said Edmund Muskie would run with Humphrey because Daley wanted the national ticket to help the four Polish members of the Mayor's Congressional delegation. A lot of the meeting's talk was about the Mayor: Daley and his cops, Daley and LBJ, Daley and George Meany. Everyone agreed that Daley's notion of how to run a convention would kill the ticket and injure the Mayor's power. So the meeting broke up, and the group packed its bags and returned home to New York City, Los Angeles, Washington, D.C. And, after two months, the election is here, and the boss of Chicago will come out of it as powerful as ever.

The Democratic organization of Cook County needs three offices to hold its base of power, and it should be able to keep them all:

Secretary of State Paul Powell must win again because his post controls 20,000 patronage jobs. Some of these are lucrative per diem jobs. They attract professionals and help to organize affluent areas. Powell has long been powerful downstate, where he should cut into the GOP majority, and Cook County's Democratic edge should then bring him in safely. Powell might be the only Democrat to win on the state-wide ticket.

Edward Hanrahan must become State's attorney for Cook County, the chief prosecutor and key to controlling the county's justice. The last Republican to hold the job served for four years ending in 1960. He was lazy and didn't organize the office well, but he almost ruined Daley by dragging out scandals on fixed traffic tickets, corrupt bail-bond practices, and a police burglary ring. This prosecutor later tried to run for mayor, but his political career was wiped out by a scandal of his own—a scandal played up by a Democratic State's attorney.

A Republican State's attorney might also move against the Democratic organization's control of the city and county election machinery. The Chicago machine has survived by understanding what reforms matter in Cook County: civil rights, good schools, clean water, etc., and visible issues that worry, and often excite the voters. So the organization must address itself to such issues. But election laws, vital to the self-perpetuation of the Democratic organization, don't arouse most voters. Daley can have his way with them because his opponents can't stir enough opinion to force election reform by the city council or county board. But a GOP or independent State's attorney could act through the courts to end criminal voting abuses. Daley wouldn't care to have that happen—and probably won't, since Hanrahan, a safe organization man, is given a nice lead by the polls.

Finally, Matthew Danaher must stay on as clerk of the county court. This job backstops the control of the State attorney over county justice, because the clerk makes case assignments to circuit court judges. "If the organization ever wanted a major court fix, the assignment power would be useful," explains Leon Despres, an independent alderman. The clerk also controls 1,400 patronage jobs, most of which are now held by party workers of advanced age and retarded skills, poorly qualified for ordinary employment. Since their years of party service entitle them other patronage jobs if the clerk's office is lost, a ban showing by Danaher would cause confusion and anxiety inside the organization.

There are also three offices the Democratic organization doesn't need, and one of them it doesn't even want. That is Everett Dirksen's Senate seat, now sought for the Democrats by Illinois Atty. Gen. William Clark. The Democratic precinct captains aren't pushing Clark because he's openly hostile to Daley. Clark has run hard as a Vietnam dove, and some Illinois liberals have thought organizing around him to fight the Mayor. But Clark lacks a solid political base, and will soon be out of work, when he'll be forced to ask Daley to make a separate peace.

The governorship is also expendable. Samuel Shapiro holds the office for the Democrats, and it controls 12,000 jobs. His opponent is Richard Ogilvie, president of the Cook County Board. If Ogilvie is elected, his current job would be filled by a vote of the Democratic majority on the board, and the organization could eventually milk the president's office for about 15,000 patronage jobs. The party would also be enriched by the 2 per cent bounty patronage salaries. And Ogilvie's election would get him out of Cook County, where he threatens the machine. It has already put strong GOP organizations into seven West Side wards, where the Republican committeemen have traditionally been on the Democratic payroll. This does mean that the Democrats are knifing Shapiro as they are Clark. The executive director of the Independent Voters of Illinois, John Kearney, points out: "The precinct workers are pushing Sam because they like him, not because the organization has to have him."

The Presidency of the United States is also expendable. Labor needs Humphrey, but local trade union officials say Illinois' twenty-six electoral votes have been conceded to Richard Nixon. The Chicago Federation of Labor and Industrial Union Council wants Humphrey but is putting the bulk of its money into its precinct network on the northeast and southwest sides of the city, giving priority support to three labor Congressmen running against backlash Republicans. The Democratic organization's own campaign workers are pushing Humphrey variously according to their ward, precinct, block or even building. Some Polish areas boost Muskie and don't mention Humphrey. Elsewhere the word is out to go easy on Wallace voters who back the county ticket. The organization has been unable to lay down a blanket policy of straight ticket voting for all precinct workers inside the city. This lets the troops use their own judgment to drop the weak men on the ticket, and consequently Humphrey suffers.

The black wards are an exception, something of a surprise after the April riots and Daley's shoot-to-kill order. Yet Negro support for Humphrey probably shows the shrewdness of the Mayor's convention security. A trade union staff man, Paul Booth, explains why the Chicago polls show a 95 per cent black vote for Humphrey: "The cops didn't let Dick Gregory take his marchers south of 18th Street on the night Humphrey made his acceptance speech. If the march had gone into the South Side, Gregory would carry the ghetto himself."

A President would be nice to have, but Daley doesn't really need one. He won't be able to reach Nixon's Cabinet members on the phone, and he'll lose some federal patronage. Yet he won't lose much by a decline in his Washington influence. During the past eight years, the Mayor has increasingly used his power at the White House to veto any federal disruptions of Chicago's status quo. Usually this has meant that Daley would block any use of Washington funds to punish Chicago's bigotry, or to reward racial progress made by anyone outside the Cook County organization. Nixon has already promised not to use federal funds for such ends.

At the state party convention held during September, a few days after the national Democrats had left town, several thousand local party workers crowded into an old meeting hall and seated themselves according to their ward and township organizations. Daley introduced the state ticket, and then announced the top man on the county ticket, Ed Hanrahan. As Hanrahan approached the microphone, a half-dozen girls, wearing "Hanrahan!" straw hats and sashes, cakewalked around the podium and sang an off-key campaign melody to the accompaniment of a band of tired old men stashed in a balcony above the stage. After the song, Hanrahan stepped to the microphone to bellow: "Now there's my kind of new politics!" And the crowd stood and cheered for nearly fifteen minutes. Daley has no reason to be dissatisfied with his Chicago.

RUSSIA AFTER 50

'Moscow Is So Dull'

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is on the staff of C.B.S. News. Last summer's visit to the Soviet Union was the third he has spent in that country.

When the whisky had run dry we switched to Soviet champagne—a very bad mixture, but it is not every year that you get to celebrate the 14th of July with the French in Moscow. Tricolor bunting that had not seen service since last Bastille Day was draped over tables everywhere. The bar, a boozy sea of drinkers, was awash with red, white and blue crepe paper. In the next room 500 writhing, shaking, wriggling bodies were spastically jerking to a hundred decibels of pure electronic howl. It was the Air France party at the Metropole Hotel and it was a gas. Dick Reston, of the Los Angeles Times, and I were talking to a couple of French girls, Claudine Canetti, who writes for Agence France-Presse, and a friend of hers, Sylvie Kahn, a Sorbonne student. "A month ago," yelled Sylvie over the din, "I was an ambulance attendant in Montparnasse.

Very bad. Very good. It was our student struggle in Paris . . . it was our revolution. Quelle joie! Moscow is so dull!" I asked what she had been doing in Moscow. Sylvie wrinkled her face in disgust. "We talk. When we stop talking they take us on tours. Last night we went to a factory for an evening of friendship. Some of the workers entertained us with folk dances! I mean, can you imagine that? Folk dances!" The din was murderous. "Well," shouted Reston, "that's Moscow 1968 for you!"

Nowadays, Moscow is the most conservative city in the world, not even excluding Wichita, Kan. By 11 P.M. Red Square looks like a drained sink. The Metro, Moscow's incomparably efficient subway system, is the drain that nightly sucks the city of its humanity. Inside, the turnstiles are clogged with the homeward bound. The attendant, a stout woman in her middle 40s, stands on a rubber mat, keeping up a steady flow of patter:

"Move along there, comrade. . . ."

"Let's get going, fellow countryman. . . ."

"Don't dally, citizen. . . ."

Below, trains thunder down the gleaming marble tubes, en route to the outer ring of cement apartment houses that girdle Moscow's bulging perimeter. Walking by night about the silent yellow streets, a visitor is struck by the local primness. Everything is tidy and orderly. You can, literally, walk for hours without encountering a single policeman. Between midnight and dawn, Gorky Street—Moscow's main stem—is a sanitation worker's delight. Six and a half million Muscovites are snugly abed. The loudest sound you hear is the Kremlin bells, chiming the hours.

On Dzhherzhinsky Square the Detsky Mir, Children's World Department Store, is dark. Across from windows filled with bright matryoshki wooden dolls and rubber spacemen is the Lubyanka prison. A water truck goes by. The wet and glistening street reflects the few lights that still burn in Lubyanka. Before the Revolution this granite pile housed Russia's largest insurance company. Now it looks like an orphanage with its neat, starched white, curtained windows, green-shaded lamps and combed grass lawn.

The day afterward I kept thinking about Sylvie's remark. In one sense she is absolutely correct. A country without free political discussion is, inevitably, a dull place. And, as everyone knows, there has not been—since Trotsky's ouster—any left- or right-wing faction in the Communist Party's Central Committee. "Democratic Centralism" is the sole order of business. Yet this is only the top of the picture. Hardly a day passes but some poet, scientist or factory manager attacks the status quo. The issue is not between party members and nonparty members but between the alert and forward-looking and those who obstinately cling to the past. The Soviet Union might be exotic in some respects, but in others it is exactly like every place else. Mr. Suslov and his ideologues in Kom-somol Square are saying: "Comrades, Lenin has secured our Revolution. We do not intend to have another, so let us now get along with the job of building communism." Given this ukase, it is apparent why the Central Committee's powerful Ideological Commission is ill at ease with the present generation of artists and writers.

During July the Soviet press, led by Pravda, went on a Mayakovsky binge. The 75th anniversary of the Soviet poet's birth was marked by fulsome praise for his achievements. Party hacks who had publicly rebuked him in his lifetime now sang his praises in marshmallow reminiscences. Here was a poet of world stature who, for more than a decade, poured out his prodigious heart in praise of Soviet achievement. The awkward fact that Mayakovsky, attacked from all sides, ended his life with a bullet through his heart is now the subject for some judicious rewriting of history. In his last unfinished poem he wrote feelingly of his struggles with the authorities:

*Agitprop sticks in my teeth too and I'd rather compose romance for you more profit in it and more charm
But I subdued myself setting my heel
on the throat of my own song.*

But Pravda was not thinking of Mayakovsky's last poem.

It praised instead the poet who wrote, "I from poetry's skies,/plunge into communism,/because without it/I feel no love." Who, among contemporary poets, sings so sweetly of present-day Soviet triumphs? And why do they not? One answer might be that what Yevtushenko calls "one-sided certainties" no longer seem valid to this generation.

Tatiana met me outside the Hotel National. It had been a hot Saturday and now thick cumulous clouds were piling up threateningly over beyond the Moscow river. "It must be raining already in Peredelkino," said Tatiana. We were going to the writers' village where Andrei Voznesensky and other friends of Tatiana's were waiting for us.

My companion had brought a large wicker basket filled with food and neatly covered with a folded copy of the day's Izvestia. As we skirted Manege Square, Tatiana asked the taxi driver to stop on Gorky Street at one of the food stores. She had forgotten to buy wine. It is about 20 miles from Moscow to Peredelkino. We headed out along the Minsk road, the taxi, an old Volga, bouncing along like a young colt that had finally been given the reins. The driver, a happy enough man, kept muttering aloud, "Kak shacka, kak shacka" (how hot, how hot); it was difficult to know if he meant the engine or the weather. Just past the Minsk turnoff, we passed a glass-boothed police observation post. Other than that there was nothing worth a long look. On a Russian highway there are no advertising billboards, no roadside diners, no used-car lots, no electric signs, and almost no directions.

The entrance to Peredelkino passes the graveyard where Boris Pasternak is buried. A river runs alongside and green parasol pines stand in silent clusters, like mourners at an Irish wake. It is very lovely. Here the countryside is gentle, with open fields and stands of white birches. We drove down lanes that wound in and out of a great pine forest. The Russian love of privacy is well known; at Peredelkino not only are streets unmarked, very few of the dachas or country homes have name plates. Presently we found the old Samarin estate, where the Writers' Union has some twenty small cottages in an old park. Tatiana left the car to go find Voznesensky. We were to travel on to another dacha.

After about ten minutes, the poet appeared with his wife Zoya, an attractive blonde in her early 30s. Voznesensky owns his own car, a gray Volga which had cost him nearly 4,000 rubles (about $4,400), and Zoya—who is learning to drive—followed us cautiously to our destination. It was the summer cottage of a well-known translator, a man whom I shall call Boris. As I turned from the taxi I saw that Voznesensky was taking the windshield wipers off his car. He smiled and said, "I can't afford to lose my eyes!" It appears that car wipers are stolen regularly from parked cars and are terribly difficult to replace. So most people are careful to remove the blades whenever they park. The dacha was hidden in a grove of birches, well back from the road. The afternoon thundershower had spread a cobweb of raindrops over a clump of elderberry bushes by the steps that led to the house. It was all immensely idyllic—the absolutely wholesome, sweet life, a hour's drive from Moscow. We stood silently for a minute until the door opened and Boris, a middle-aged man wearing a flannel sports shirt and baggy blue pants, bustled out. "Greetings, greetings!" he cried. "Come along in and excuse the mess."

We found ourselves in a narrow corridor, with a number of doors leading off it. "Down this way to the right." We entered a large, sparsely furnished room with white walls, a small bed, a table and several chairs. The windows were uncurtained. Our hostess came in, dark-haired and smiling, and gravely shook hands all around. A small boy, presumably Boris' son, entered the room and placed a large ashtray, in the shape of a lobster, on the table. Voznesensky pulled out a pack of Bulgarian cigarettes and offered them around. As we talked, Boris asked if I had tried to buy a copy of Voznesensky's poems in Moscow. I said I had but with no success. Unspoken was my thought that the reason for this was Voznesensky's well-known troubles with the Ideological Commission. As if reading my mind, Boris exclaimed, "We love poetry in Russia, everyone knows that! Even so, among our poets Andrei is a phenomenon. They publish an edition of 40,000 and it's sold out the next day. They double the next edition and the same thing happens! His last book of poems—An Achilles Heart—was published in the fantastic edition of half a million copies and there is not one copy left in the whole of Moscow!"

Boris leaned forward and poured everyone a glass of Georgian wine; then he continued talking. "In our country poetry is the pulpit. It is entertainment, it is philosophy, it is life. Everything else is dead—or was dead until very, very recently. Poetry has been a way of saying things that could not otherwise be said (for the first time Voznesensky quietly nodded his head in agreement). But it is most interesting that, in recent years, there has been a small but obvious decline in the popularity of poetry. Why? Because other channels have been opened. Nowadays our films are more frank. Then, too, you can find more open discussion in our books and our magazines." I asked Boris what was the nearest parallel to the young Soviet poets in Western society. "I suppose if I were to try to find a comparison," said Boris, "I'd have to say our poets are like the French boulevard singers or your Pop groups."

The sky was turning dark; the tall uncut grass outside the windows cast a green glow over everyone in the shadowy room. Voznesensky was wearing a heavy blue Italian sweater, and over his shoulders a dark blue nylon windjammer—a slight, dark-haired young man with merry quizzical eyes, a bobbed nose in a long face, and a shy, reserved manner. I do not recall Voznesensky moving at all during the long evening. He sat, hunched forward, his eyes darting toward all speakers as they talked. After dinner the talk turned to Mayakovsky. Voznesensky is a great admirer of "the poet of the Revolution." I asked him about the line in his poem "Oza" (a play on the name of his wife Zoya) about the bullet flying from Mayakovsky's heart back into the gun. He explained that he tried very hard to find out everything he could about Mayakovsky's death. "But a strange thing," explained Voznesensky, "Mayakovsky owned two pistols, but it was a third one—a German Luger—which killed him, and that has completely vanished."

Andrei Voznesensky: A Self-Portrait

Boris spoke next. "People will be arguing about Mayakovsky's death for the next century. There will always be those who have doubts. It is like the Kennedy assassinations. People love facts and they need a conspiracy to make them palatable. It is an open question. There were so many open questions in 1930," said Boris, with a wave of his hand toward the dark window. "It was a time of great confusion in the arts. The young Soviet state hardly had time for art or to worry about its role in the Revolution. There were, in those years, no hard and fast positions. These were to come later with Stalin—paradoxically, a more settled period. So Mayakovsky danced between the proletkult and the bourgeois concepts of culture, supported by Lenin and championed by Lunacharsky. He went from one group to another, in vain. The wave of arrests began in 1929. For Mayakovsky that was the beginning of the end. When he sought a passport to visit Paris and it was refused, he touched bottom. The literary establishment gave him the cold shoulder. His plays flopped, he lost his glamour, his fame and his luck in love. Women, you know, are like rats: Mayakovsky's women more so than most. For them the word loyalty did not exist, they were mere vamps. He had no one to turn to. It was the end."

All this was said so forcefully that I felt a bit presumptuous even to ask Voznesensky for his view. But wanting to hear it, I asked him just the same. "Mayakovsky had a tragic quality about his whole life," said Voznesensky; "I especially admire the contrasts between the challenge in his poetry and, on the other hand, the extreme sensitivity and fearfulness." Voznesensky leaned forward, his slight shoulders hunched over the table. "He was an artist who loved life yet finally strangled it in himself. Paradox upon paradox." He repeated the words: "paradox upon paradox." An expression of haunting sadness dropped like a curtain across his long thin face.

Later, back at the hotel and before turning out the light, I read some lines from Voznesensky's first book, Mosaic:

*An artist firstborn
Is always a tribune.
In him the spirit of overturning,
And rebellion—eternal.*

From the distance, beyond the lace curtains, came the Kremlin chimes.

As in the West, a dominant topic of Moscow conversation these days is talk, talk, talk about what lies ahead for the young people. The movie makers have hold of this theme and, as a consequence, the movie theatre is a good place to go for an insight into contemporary Soviet life. Unfortunately such films as Three Poplars on Plisetskaya Street, One Hundred Ways of Love, I Am Twenty and July Rain are not likely to be seen in the West for some time to come. When I asked a Soviet official why this was so, he parried the question: "When you can tell me when your government will sell us the distribution rights to Raisin in the Sun, Blackboard Jungle and The Manchurian Candidate, I can answer when the Soviet Union will export our controversial films." I very much wanted to meet Marlen Khutsiev while I was in Moscow, but was told that he was hard at work on a new film about Pushkin and not available. Khutsiev, now in his early 30s, is perhaps the most talked about of the Soviet's "new wave" film directors. Five years ago his film The Ilyich Gate—subsequently retitled I Am Twenty—ran into the formidable opposition of Nikita Khrushchev. Viktor Nekrasov, the Kiev writer, compared Khutsiev's film with Paddy Chayefsky's Marty:

Marty owns a butcher shop in New York: Khutsiev's youngsters are all workers. They are all about 20, not much more than that. And of course they are all in love, each in his own way, and all have moments of melancholy. . . . Questions arise, as indeed they must: Where is the future? What is the right thing to do? How can one avoid mistakes? In general how one ought to live. I am eternally grateful to Khutsiev and Gennady Shpalikov (the script writer) for not dragging in an old worker with graying mustaches who understands all and has a precise and clear answer for everything.

Khrushchev had the film screened and got so boiling mad about it that he singled it out for his spitting scorn, in a speech to writers and artists at the Kremlin Hall of Congress:

"Even the most positive characters in this film, three workers," shouted Khrushchev, "are shown not knowing how they should live and what they should strive for. And this in our time of full-scale construction of communism, illuminated by the ideas of the Program of the Communist Party! . . . In the Soviet Socialist society there are no contradictions between generations." I had heard that Khutsiev's most recent film July Rain was playing in Moscow, but inquiries at the Intourist office failed to reveal where. There are hundreds of movie houses in Moscow but no one paper lists their programs. Indeed the morning papers carry no movie or theatre advertising at all, and Evening Moscow—the city's most popular paper—carries listings only for central Moscow.

However, a movie critic, knowing of my interest, called me up one day. She had heard that July Rain was playing at a small suburban cinema. The next evening we took a taxi to the outskirts of the city. In contrast to the marble and glass midtown movie houses, this cinema was part of a recreation hall. We went upstairs to a long narrow room with straight-backed wooden seats. As with I Am Twenty, July Rain tells of young people, a group of friends—writers, editors and engineers—who live and work in Moscow. Khutsiev has filmed it in the familiar nouvelle vague manner, and he moves his group-as-anti-heroes through half a dozen different Moscow locations. A newspaper office, the new Kalinin Avenue, a picnic scene in the Moscow suburbs, the ordinary Moscow squares—all these come wonderfully alive in the wide-screen black-and-white camera work of Margarita Pilikhina. It is a totally plotless film, but Khutsiev achieves great lyrical power through a skillful mixing of acting, music scoring and sensitive photography. But what was really fascinating was the audience reaction. Could Khrushchev have been right? In the flickering half-light I glanced around; the audience was made up mostly of blue-collar workers. The film seemed to irritate them enormously. By about the fourth reel there was a good deal of coughing and muttering as if to say: "Why don't they do something, instead of just talking all the time?" A few days later someone showed me a review of the film. Once again, Khutsiev was nailed for having made a "pessimistic" film. He was criticized for showing the emptiness of "some people's lives" without showing the positive side. "As with I Am Twenty," wrote the critic, "this is another Khutsiev film in which mutual relations are characterized by intellectual poverty." The critic concluded by suggesting a change of title to I Am Thirty.

A couple of nights later, I was having a drink in the Labyrinth, one of the new cocktail bars that have popped up in the Kosygin era. My friend, Yablomov, was sitting at the bar with me (in the Soviet Union it is not polite to stand at a bar). I wanted to get his opinion of July Rain. Yablomov, in his early 30s, is a bachelor about town. A translator, he earns good money working for a foreign organization, and is, I would judge, more sophisticated than most Muscovites. To my surprise he had nothing but scorn for Khutsiev's films.

"What's so good about feeling bad?" he asked, recalling a movie title I had seen somewhere. "People go to the movies to be entertained," Yablomov continued. "They've had a hard day at the office or in the factory. They have probably attended a Komsomol meeting or a Sports Club 'compulsory-voluntary' session after work. When they have free time they want to enjoy themselves." He swung the chrome stool around on its pivot and ordered two more champagne cobbles from the bar attendant. "There should be more comedies—something to make people laugh. Who needs problems?"

Walking home alone along the glittering new Kalinin Avenue I found myself wondering what was happening in Russia. Depending upon whose company I happened to be sharing in Moscow, there seemed to be two distinct viewpoints. Among Moscow intellectuals I can fairly quickly tick off some of their hopes. They want an end to the more stifling excesses of bureaucracy and the downgrading of personality (a favorite word of opprobrium here is "cosmopolitan," meaning anyone who tends to a world view rather than the strict party line). They yearn for privacy, and above all desire to travel abroad—simply, to own a passport. Among ordinary people, on the other hand, the mood recalls the Eisenhower years in America. First, there is a sense of never having had it so good. The streets are crowded, the shops and restaurants are full. Most people now work a five-day week, get thirty days' paid vacation a year; social security system covers sickness, old age, maternity, unemployment, occupational hazards and family bonuses. Housing is improving rapidly and direct income tax is hardly noticeable. Second, most citizens have a deep-rooted desire not to rock the boat. Last year's great fiftieth anniversary blowout simply reinforced their faith in their Socialist society, and this faith, sustained by an ever-improving economic security, is confirmed by what their mass media tell them is happening in the corrupt old capitalist empire. Third, they betray a distinctly hostile attitude toward literary radicals. An undercurrent of anger at "double-dealers" who allow their works to be published in the West is best expressed in the Russian proverb that "no family is without its monster." A highly respected American observer told me he was absolutely convinced that the verdict in the Daniel-Sinyavsky trial was warmly applauded by most ordinary Soviet citizens.

Kalinin Avenue provided little sense of relief from the curious sense of melancholy I encountered from my conversations with Soviet friends. At nine in the evening the broad street was crowded with people looking in shop windows, queuing up to enter the October movie palace, or stopping to buy flowers from the sidewalk vendors.

There is every indication of Socialist affluence, even an air of Socialist superiority in the red and white banners strung across the eight-lane street. "Glory to the Communist Party of the CCCP." And yet the porridgelike conformity of the scene was depressing.

Edmund Stevens came to the Soviet Union in the early thirties. Like Henry Shapiro, the veteran UPI bureau chief in Moscow, he married a Russian girl and settled down to report the Soviet scene for the American press. Over the years, Stevens has worked for almost every American newspaper or magazine of note, from The Christian Science Monitor to Time. Currently, he writes for the London Sunday Times and for Newsday specials syndicate. He won the Pulitzer Prize in 1951.

Mr. and Mrs. Stevens live at 11 Ryleeva Street, not far from the Kremlin. There is nothing remarkable about the street—a very ordinary Moscow thoroughfare. In the windows of the wooden house on the corner I could see faces staring out at the limousines arriving at the Stevens home. Everyone in Moscow knows the couple and they must know literally everyone in the Soviet Establishment. Ed, a cheery red-faced fellow in shirt sleeves, was working on the Czech crisis story as I entered. The door of his study was open and I could see him waving a sheaf of Tass copy in one hand; the other hand held the telephone into which he was shouting in Russian. I waved hello as I passed through. Nina Stevens, a high-strung, handsome woman, who gives the appearance of being constantly in motion (even when sitting perfectly still), dashed down the hallway shouting instructions in Russian to a kitchen full of perspiring help. Beyond—the loud confused concatenation of cocktail chatter.

"Pajalsta!" "Please!"

The cook projects her great bulk through the crowd by the garden doors. She is carrying shashlik on metal skewers to a blazing outdoor barbecue.

"You know our ambassador, of course?" says Mrs. Stevens. I look across to Ambassador Thompson who is talking to "Chip" Bohlen who, in turn, is talking to the well-known Soviet stage and film director, Gerasimov.

I nod. Nina propelled her way out of the crowd toward her other guests grouped like statuary around the flowering garden, leaving me to help myself to a passing tray of vodka. From the schoolyard next door came the sound of a football game.

Someone introduced me to Julian Semenov, a young writer sporting a Papa Hemingway beard.

"How do you like Moscow?" Semenov asked.

"A bit dull."

"Can't say I disagree. Just got back from Vietnam myself—South Vietnam. . ."

My ears tuned in to that bit of information.

"Really? Where were you?"

"In the Central Highlands with the front forces," he said.

"Do a lot of walking?"

Semenov got my point right away. He smiled.

"I won't say how. I won't say where we came from. I can assure you, however, that we did not have the luxury of a helicopter."

Semenov's intelligent face grew thoughtful. You got the impression that he thought it fine to be home again. But somehow, after guerrilla warfare in the rice paddies, after the Hemingway life with the NLF, there was something a little drab about Moscow. For who, after all, is a greater romantic than a Russian? That is why he makes a first-class revolutionary. I was just about to learn more of Semenov's Vietnamese travels when Nina returned.

"I'm very sorry," she said, "but I've got to introduce a film director you haven't met."

She led me away and presented a severe-looking bald-headed man who was munching a canapé; Mrs. Stevens nodded absently as she left.

"I want to ask you a serious question," he began. "I don't suppose Hollywood would make a film about the life of Tolstoy?"

I waited.

"I mean the real life of Tolstoy. No sex. No violence. I reached for another passing vodka. "Why not?"

"I don't think Hollywood could do it. You see Tolstoy was a pure and noble man." "On the contrary," I responded, "it sounds very much like a Hollywood project. You'd be surprised how much our two countries have in common these days." I was warming to the theme.

"Really?"

"Walt Disney, for example, specialized in pure and noble themes. And then too, consider The Sound of Music."

"Did that film make money?"

"About $40 million at the box office!"

There was a long silence.

"Aahhh . . ." sighed the director, "if only your circles would end this war in Vietnam. Why, we would have so much in common!"

It was shortly after that remark that I noticed Dick Reston had arrived at the party. I excused myself and joined him by the bar.

"Let me get you a drink," I said. In some odd way was suddenly reminded of Sylvie Kahn's remarks at the Bastille Day party we had both attended. That was a month ago.

"What shall we drink to?" asked Dick.

I thought for a moment.

"How about to Moscow, 1968?"

You can believe the future belongs to Yablomov if you want to, but I believe Sylvie Kahn had it right. There's a sense of longing and loss about this smart new Russian Voznesensky, a patriot, says it all somewhere:

In finding truths lives vary in daring:

Worms come through holes and bold men on parabolas.

Plain Talk With Vodka

W. E. CHILTON III

Mr. Chilton is publisher of the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette.

I fancy a number of people all over the Western world still think of themselves as liberals but are in essence no such thing. In their hearts they believe that their society won't and shouldn't change much, that communism is the enemy absolute and that the only tasks open to men of good will are to fight in the cold war with one hand and perform minor benevolent activities with the other. This is a tenable attitude but it's one of people who have given up the intellectual struggle.

Sir Charles P. Snow

From June 24 to July 10, I traveled with a twenty-two-member American Study Mission the length of the Soviet Union. We entered by boat at Tallinn and departed by boat from Nakhodka, a recently developed port near Vladivostok. In between, we visited Moscow, Samarkand, Tashkent, Alma-Ata, Irkutsk, Bratsk and Khabarovsk.

My first inkling that the Soviet Union was bullying Czechoslovakia more than usual came moments before we docked at Yokohama on the way home. A dour Czechoslovak approached me on deck and proudly inquired what I thought about the Soviet troops leaving his homeland—which intelligence, he had somehow learned, constituted the afternoon headline in Tokyo newspapers. The truth was I hadn't known Russian soldiers in any abnormal quantity were in Czechoslovakia, as news throughout our travels had been largely gleaned out of stray copies of the London Worker, no fountain of information.

Yet until it happened, I was convinced that the USSR intended to leave its satellite alone, and most of our party shared this opinion. Nothing in our travels prepared us for the mid-August invasion. To the contrary, all our contacts and associations, with both dedicated party representatives and ordinary citizens, had persuaded us that the boot-heeled approach was a discredited, discarded tactic of Soviet statesmanship.

On the ship to Japan most of the group had convened late one morning to submit for general analysis individual impressions of the tour. Almost without exception the consensus was that the Soviet Union was entering a period of stability and growth.

Behrendt, Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)
"Down with the Establishment!"

To counter the oppressive influence of the Communist Party and its tired elite there was emerging a constituency of technicians who, though apolitical, had to be placated. The mass of Russians, it was felt, now had a stake in the development of their country. Consumer shortages and universal deprivation were no longer acute problems. Although nationalism (Russians are even more chauvinistic than Americans) played too coercive a role in Soviet affairs, the country and the people were sincerely interested in establishing cordial relations with the United States and in promoting an indigenous prosperity.

For those who have returned recently from the USSR the incursion against Czechoslovakia leaves a very acrid taste in the mouth. Were the thousands of miles we traveled a waste of time and money? Were all those splendid frank and private chats with Russians so much verbal flak? Are the Strom Thurmonds of the world right that Communists always lie, that pretext and deceit exemplify the hammer and sickle?

The answer is no, but the Kremlin sure makes the Thurmonds look right, just as President Johnson has brilliantly managed over the past four years to validate the Goldwater response to Vietnam.

I spent two evenings drinking vodka and brandy with Albert Kaar of Tallinn, interpreter and foreign affairs analyst for Estonia's state-operated broadcasting complex. Kaar is a trusted Communist Party member—later in the summer he was to spend a month in England with an Estonian trade exhibit—and a former World War II Red Army officer. I know no Russian, but English is one of six foreign languages Kaar speaks perfectly. Our discussions were frank and far-ranging, and Kaar's knowledge of the world and particularly of the United States impressed me.

There will be, he told me, no unification of Germany until Russians are convinced that Germans have become peace-loving neighbors. His views on the war in Vietnam were more flexible. He admitted that his country was supporting North Vietnam and agreed that Johnson's ordered halt to the bombing of Hanoi was de-escalation, but to my counter suggestion that the North Vietnamese stop rocketing Saigon, he replied he doubted Ho Chi Minh would compress the struggle, because Ho thought he could win. Nothing consequential, Kaar predicted, will happen with respect to the war before November's elections.

Nixon will win the election, said Kaar. He based his forecast on a meeting with an assistant from Sen. Mike Mansfield's office, who had visited Tallinn while touring through the Soviet Union.

Which nation, the Soviet Union or China, I asked, has more influence over Ho?

"That's very difficult to say. Ho used to be dominated by [I missed the name, but it was obvious the person mentioned favored China]. Of late, he's in disfavor. But our influence is minimal at best."

Kaar was especially gloomy about China. I declared that our two nations must bring China into the community of nations. Kaar scornfully asked me how. William F. Buckley, Jr., could not have been more disdainful. Kaar contended China will have a missile delivery capability within five years, perhaps sooner.

Kaar approved of consular treaties with the United States and the mutual opening of airports, but saw no early end to the cold war. Nevertheless, military expenditures disturb him. "A single American fighter plane costs your taxpayers $4 million," he observed. "Development of Russian aircraft comes out of my pocket, too."

He was convinced that the United States is under the dominance of different moneyed power groups and warned that if the Texas-Hunt clique ever came to direct America's destiny, the results would be "calamitous" for the whole world. As a solution to any problem, war is out, insisted Kaar, and nuclear war is unthinkable. "If it comes," he said, "I hope I'm at the epicenter."

In Moscow our group met with a dozen members of the Union of Soviet Journalists. The official meeting, at which were served soft drinks, coffee and strawberries in a huge glass bowl with refined sugar on the side, soon deteriorated into a heated controversy regarding the functions of the press. We stressed freedom; the Russians emphasized responsibility.

Respecting the latter, the Soviet chairman spoke of the flood of hate literature constantly circulating through the

Behrendt, Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)
Talks on Vietnam

United States. He mentioned a Walter Lippmann column which had suggested that the inordinate violence prevalent in the United States might be partially attributed to such volatile rubbish. Would those Americans present, he asked, regard the muzzling of irresponsible and incendiary printed material an imposition upon press freedom?

After the formal meeting I conversed with Serguei N. Vichnevski, a Pravda correspondent just back from six years in Washington. The business card he handed me listed his Connecticut Avenue address and phone number. Vichnevski has the easy, confident manner of an All-American fullback who subsequently won a Rhodes Scholarship.

He readily admitted that the Soviet press doesn't criticize the Soviet system, but suggested, in turn, that American newspapers rarely assault the basic premises of free enterprise. Aspects of the system may be condemned, but never the system itself.

I asked Vichnevski if he knew Art Buchwald. The name drew a smile. He said he and Buchwald exchanged messages written in red ink. I inquired if he'd read a column of Buchwald's which described the CIA and the KVG as living one off the other, and which suggested that if either went out of business, the other would soon go.

He laughed, saying he'd missed that one. Buchwald, he added, was extremely popular in the USSR, and his columns were frequently reprinted. I asked whether that column could be. "No," he replied, "we can criticize the system in conversation but not in print."

Did he think, I inquired, that the Russian press would be criticizing the system twenty years hence? He avoided a direct answer, saying he had after a long absence from his country noticed a marked change in conditions. The private citizen, he stated, was much freer and felt much freer: People no longer worried that the secret police might be standing behind them, listening to everything said. Then he changed the subject, remarking that the Soviet Union had no Art Buchwald, and what a shame it was because someone with his incisive humor was greatly needed.

Speaking as a private citizen and echoing no official policy, Vichnevski said he was extremely pessimistic about the Vietnamese War. He foresaw no termination date. Ho Chi Minh, he thought, believes he can win. On the other hand the United States can't possibly emerge as victor without committing enough troops to occupy South Vietnam. Vichnevski admitted he knew of no practical step the United States could take to disengage, to win, or to dissuade Ho from his present policy.

After another formal session—this one with employees of the Novosti Press Agency, a state-owned, glorified public relations service—I talked briefly with another Russian. What was the likelihood, I asked, that a responsible political opposition will arise in the Soviet Union? By way of illustration, I referred to Czechoslovakia.

My informant gently reminded me that the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia and their peoples have entirely different backgrounds and institutions. Nevertheless, he added, in its own fashion—the quote is almost direct—a development in the Soviet Union not unlike that which has occurred in Czechoslovakia will happen. "It must happen," he said.

Most surprising to our group was the lack of criticism we encountered on the issue of Vietnam. We were rarely challenged about the war. When we were, and our questioners were asked how the United States might best extricate itself, the responses were inevitably a dispirited "I don't know" or a despairing shrug of the shoulders.

In Irkutsk one night following dinner, three of us were joined by a Soviet naval officer. Because of the language obstacle the traffic in toasts was considerably heavier than the exchange of ideas, but the word "Vietnam" was dropped. The officer promptly grabbed every American hand in sight, placed one atop the other, covered the lot of them with his own hands, shook the pile, and in boozy tones made it evident that he approved wholeheartedly of what the United States was doing there.

Maybe Buchwald ought to write another column about symbiosis, dealing this time with the Soviet and U.S. military.

Kremlin Seismograph

SIDNEY I. PLOSS

Mr. Ploss, an associate research professor of international affairs at George Washington University, is the author of Conflict and Decision-Making in Soviet Russia (Princeton University Press).

The brief revival of free speech in Czechoslovakia during 1968 gave to that country's intellectuals a chance to speak out frankly about the politics of totalitarianism. It could be said publicly that under Communist Party rule the process of choosing between different methods of solving national problems takes the devious form of "lobby conspiracies" and "palace revolutions." Vaclav Havel, a Czech writer and playwright, who argued for the creation of free political institutions, further pointed to the element of surprise which is built into the Communist mechanism of secretive politics. "The competition for power," observed Havel, "which disappeared as an open phenomenon some time ago, suddenly reappears and strikes in every direction, all the more cunningly and dangerously because it is hidden."

This generalization certainly applied to the political situation in the USSR after the death of Stalin. A series of dramatic shifts at the highest level of government resulted from fierce struggles over power and policy which until the last moment were concealed from the general public. Today a seeming calm hangs over the surface of political life in Moscow. The former subordinates of Nikita S. Khrushchev wield his former vast power on a more or less equal basis and maintain an appearance of unity. There have been no big shake-ups in the Kremlin's latest version of "collective leadership."

But does this outward serenity betoken a change of the inner climate of rivalry and intrigue in which Soviet chiefs have always moved? Or are powerful tensions rising once more behind a false front of oligarchic solidarity? The questions are worth exploring because struggles for power in Moscow are invariably fought out on grounds of policy, and in the past this has made Soviet official conduct notably unpredictable.

Actually, not a few policy surprises have originated from behind the Kremlin wall during recent months. A careful reading of the Soviet press suggests that the four-year collective leadership is deeply divided on a number of key issues. Sharply contradictory utterances give reason to believe that debates are occurring over such questions as whether to concentrate investment resources on heavy industrial or consumer goods; the relationship of party organizers to state administrators in the management of economic affairs; the position to be taken in evaluating the historical role of Stalin, whose name is a blazing symbol of centralized authority and social discipline, and of course of anti-Americanism; and the prospects for reaching arms limitation settlements with the United States.

All major governments have to make difficult decisions on budget outlays in order to meet their responsibilities for promoting social welfare and national security. The long-standing policy in the Soviet system of planned economy has been to place great emphasis on basic and military goods. The share of the gross national product devoted to spending on heavy and defense industry has indeed been so large as to depress the level of individual consumption to less than half that in Western Europe and to about one-quarter of what it is in America. The plight of the ordinary consumer has been a little eased in recent years, but the regional and rural markets still lack the simplest household goods. An official decree authorizing emergency measures in 1966 grossly understated the case when it noted that "the working people are not always able to buy in shops the necessary clothing, footwear, building materials, utensils, furniture, refrigerators and certain other commodities."

An unorthodox decision was finally taken in October, 1967, to manufacture consumer goods at a higher rate than producer goods for no more than one year. The word was that increases in wages and salaries had put into the hands of citizens more money than they could spend; a temporary increase of everyday necessities would check inflationary pressures.

This new attention to consumer goods appealed to members of the bureaucratic elite who were professionally concerned about the grave economic imbalances arising from decades of military industrialization. Only a few weeks after the announcement the magazine of the State Planning Committee featured an article which tacitly advised the continued emphasis on light industrial development beyond 1968. It affirmed that skillful management would enable the Soviet "to develop the output of consumer goods at the very same rates as the output of capital goods, or even at higher rates, for not only one year but for a longer period as well."

Accumulating evidence indicates that Premier Alexei N. Kosygin, the Politburo's overlord of the economy, shares this heretical solicitude for the consumer. Addressing a gathering of local government officials in the Kremlin on December 25, 1967, Kosygin called for "special" attention to an upswing of the light and food industries and "satisfaction of the population's demand for goods of various assortment." He further associated himself with the consumer goods position when he addressed a party rally in Minsk last February. Looking forward to the drafting of the next Five Year Plan, the Premier hailed "new tendencies" in economic life, chiefly the closing of the huge gap which separated the growth rates of light and heavy industry. "We must fully solve the problem of uninterrupted supply of the population with varied foodstuffs, clothing and other consumer goods." Similar words were once uttered by Kosygin's fallen predecessors, Malenkov and Khrushchev.

Amplifiers of the Kremlin Voice

Ed Keiss

In line with these reformist pronouncements, the journal of the State Planning Committee published in March a favorable review of a book written under the supervision of one of its editors, A. N. Yefimov, which polemicized that "neither in the theory nor practice of long-term planning can we deny the possibility of equal rates of development of heavy and light industry, or even the predominant growth of light industry for certain periods." This refreshing viewpoint was supported at an All-Union economics conference held in May, where, according to Izvestia, the participants were sure that "the branches of our industry which manufacture consumer goods have attained a solid foundation for rapid development."

This flirting by Kosygin and his fellow technicians in the state bureaucracy with a Western type of economy has drawn markedly hostile reactions from others in the power structure. Leonid I. Brezhnev, General Secretary of the Communist Party, has openly aligned himself with those who hold to the belief that the regime's survival depends on a further build-up of military-industrial potential.

Only a few weeks after the decision was made to accelerate light industry, threatening lessons were preached by party "historians" at work in the ideological branches of Brezhnev's General Secretariat. They recalled Malenkov's unavailing effort in 1953-54 to equalize for some time the growth rates of heavy and light industry, and pointedly added that this error was remembered at the Central Committee meeting of June, 1957, which expelled Malenkov from the party's ruling councils.

In striking contrast to Kosygin's moderate remarks of February, Brezhnev that same month toughly came out for "preserving the accelerated development of heavy industry as the basis of our industrial might." He advised that the Soviet Union had to increase its steel production by another 22 million tons within three years, bringing to mind Khrushchev's abuse of "some comrades" who had "developed an appetite for giving the country as much metal as possible," even if the consumer had to go begging. Deploring Kosygin's prescription of consumer stimulants to labor productivity, the party leader asserted on March 29 that "it would be wrong to reduce everything to material incentives; this would impoverish the inner world of Soviet man."

After Brezhnev's defense-minded rhetoric, the cause of heavy industry was taken up by the press organs nearest to central party headquarters. The editors of the party magazine, Kommunist, for example, ran an attack by the orthodox economist Anatoly I. Pashkov on "certain economists" who challenged the thesis of absolute primacy for heavy industry. The same periodical has carried a directive article for social scientists by Pyotr N. Demichev, a central party secretary whose fortunes have fared well under Brezhnev. "We must," instructed Demichev, "give thought to the matter of keeping our economy, particularly heavy industry, constantly on the level of present-day demands, so that it will insure a reliable base for further development of productive life and defense" (italics added). Party historians, again demonstrating their taste for political parallels, reminisced about how the main architect of Stalin's first Five Year Plan virtuously battled for "the rapid growth of heavy industry" against state experts who mistakenly advocated "cotton-dress industrialization."

The views of army leaders on the allocations dispute are also expressed in tones that suggest nostalgia for the iron rule of Stalin. The military newspaper Red Star has warned that any who would cast doubt upon the wisdom of conserving the time-honored investment pattern threaten to undermine the foundations of national power.

Brezhnev and Kosygin have not escaped personal involvement in the conflict between party and state officials which has always plagued the Soviet system of government. The interest of party organizers lies in their control of economic decision making and bureaucratic appointments, regardless of efficiency. The state technical experts strive for the right independently to manage the economy, and to select personnel without reference to dogmatic political criteria.

In January, Kosygin made an inspection trip to Tyumen Province, where his ministerial subordinates were defying Brezhnev's party controllers. A subsequent report in the party daily Pravda upheld the local party secretary by giving wide publicity to his complaint that state technicians "do not consult with us about the recruiting and placing of cadres and are therefore making gross mistakes." In March, Brezhnev himself questioned the integrity of Kosygin's apparatus during a speech to the Moscow party conference, in which he emphasized the dominant role of the party machine. The same gathering was notified that leaders of the Ministry of the Radio Industry did not always heed the opinion of party bodies when promoting and assigning personnel. This frank talk may be taken to reflect the increased vitality and self-assurance of modernizing social groups on the Soviet scene, as well as the ferocity of the party Establishment's defense of its traditional prerogatives.

The Stalin question became an outstanding issue of public life early in 1968. A group of intellectuals in Moscow then circulated an appeal calling for preventive measures against "the impending danger of new Stalins." The authors of this remarkable letter deplored as cynical lawlessness the recent trials of independently minded young people on charges of subverting the regime. The revival of honor to Stalin's name in official media was deplored, as was the ban on literary works which turn attention to the crimes of the Stalin era. "What is most humiliating," said the protesters, "regular surveillance in all its forms has become a part of daily life for quite a few Soviet people."

This forced a wide recognition of the fact that there were groups in the country who applauded the gradual restoration of Stalinism. The reactionaries included officials alarmed by the loosening of disciplinary bonds ("people with an obsequious yen for a strong man"). A second group reportedly consisted of the late dictator's henchmen, "who have sought vindication of what was their own conduct in the not so distant past." The petition's allusion to "people with remnants of perverted nationalist sentiments" indicated that anti-Semites in the bureaucracy also hankered for bygone times.

There is every reason to believe that hounding of loyal citizens who speak out for what they see as historical truth and social justice has been instigated by special policy factions organized around party chief Brezhnev. The propaganda machinery at the disposal of the General Secretariat has been increasingly used to inflame latent pro-Stalinist feeling in the ranks of officialdom. A second clique that has pressed for the rehabilitation of Stalin is made up of army leaders. Responsible for morale of the military, the generals are disturbed by the spread of pacifist sentiment among younger citizens. The brass frowns also upon the mood of political skepticism that took root after Khrushchev's sensational exposés of high-level criminality during the reign of Stalin.

The alliance of party and military die-hards on the Stalin question is particularly evident in the newspaper Soviet Russia. This organ of Brezhnev's party headquarters recently featured a significant review of the wartime memoirs of Army Gen. Sergei M. Shtemenko. An alleged target of the spurious Jewish "Doctors' Plot," which Stalin fabricated early in 1953 as a pretext for purging oppositionists, Shtemenko was demoted after the death of Stalin and vanished from public view for three years. He re-emerged on the eve of the radical decision to crush the Hungarian revolution in 1956, and was later named to secondary posts. (Shtemenko was appointed chief of staff of the Warsaw Treaty Organization a few weeks before the invasion of Czechoslovakia last August, which once more pointed up the connection of organizational and policy questions.) Now the party apparatus warmly endorses Shtemenko's book for its account of Stalin's allegedly courageous and confident direction of military operations.

Liberalizing critics of Stalinism were reproached by Soviet Russia in an ensuing survey of war fiction. The review dissociated Stalin's purge of talented Red Army commanders in 1937 from Soviet military defeats in the first year of the Russo-German war. It heaped scorn upon freedom writers who depict brutal agents of the Generalissimo's military police, and generously forgave Soviet soldiers who allowed themselves to fall into German captivity. "Such actions," declared the party newspaper, "make it difficult to instill patriotic feelings in Soviet people during the present tense international situation, when we must keep our powder dry."

On the other hand, lavish praise of Stalin is seldom seen in the governmental newspaper Izvestia. Managing news in tune with the wishes of Kossygin, Izvestia a short time ago even commemorated the birthday of the Jewish Communist Solomon A. Lozovsky, whom the secret police arrested on trumped-up charges and put to death in 1952.

The Brezhnev-Kossygin disagreement over economics was certain to spill over into foreign policy. The Kremlin habitually justifies its allocation of huge amounts of goods and services to defense on the ground of meeting the threat of "American imperialism." Any leader who wishes to reorder economic priorities along genuinely peaceful lines would have to demonstrate to his colleagues that agreement is possible between Moscow and Washington on vital matters of common interest.

The U.S.-Soviet accord to sign a treaty halting the spread of nuclear weapons, reached in July, gave Kossygin an opening to test American intentions. The Politburo was evidently of one mind about the desirability of the nuclear treaty, insofar as it would help to keep super-weapons beyond the reach of West Germany. But divergent estimates of the importance of the nonproliferation treaty soon broke through to the surface. Brezhnev referred guardedly to "a document of peace which is aimed at reducing the danger of nuclear war." Kossygin more confidently declared that the compact "is aimed at reducing, and unquestionably will reduce, the danger of nuclear war" (italics added). Brezhnev's cautious evaluation of the latest step to improve relations with the West was in effect a vote to "keep our powder dry," and maintain a high level of defense spending. The brighter world outlook of Kossygin left room for maneuver in the area of investment strategy.

Information now at hand suggests that the coalition of diverse personalities which was put together in October, 1964, for the sake of driving out Khrushchev is probably breaking down. Premier Kossygin, who grapples daily with the realities of a top-heavy economy, has moved to bring into symmetry the competing interests of production and consumption. The Premier and his reformist followers have also found it expedient to downgrade the merits of Stalin, and search for ways to reduce global tensions. The managerial class for which Kossygin speaks is, of course, Communist in the sense that its members are dedicated to the principles of planned economy and single-party rule. But the managers' immersion in practical affairs inclines them toward less doctrinaire solutions to problems of government than is the case with the watchdogs and theorists of the Communist Party apparatus. The party staff, led by Brezhnev, has vigorously responded to the technocratic challenge. It has brandished the outmoded slogans of "discipline" and "vigilance," and boasts of past factional triumphs over forward-looking rivals. The great diversity of political conceptions in this struggle makes it likely that the next Kremlin power play will be even more consequential than Khrushchev's removal just four years ago.

POLITICS OF VANDALISM

STANLEY COHEN

Mr. Cohen, lecturer in sociology at the University of Durham, England, has been working for the past four years in the area of social reaction to various forms of deviant behavior.

All disciplines tend to have an underground of theory which challenges the traditional ways of studying their subject matter, the ways ensconced in undergraduate courses, textbooks and professional journals. This underground—like similar movements in the arts—in time becomes fashionable, goes through a period of vulgarization and is eventually absorbed into the traditions of the discipline. Such a process can be observed in the fields of criminology and the sociology of deviance, with the gradual emergence from the underground of what has been called "transactional" or "labeling" theory.

This approach, which owes much to the work of Edwin Lemert and Howard Becker, assumes that deviant behavior is a transactional process between the deviant and the community. Deviant behavior is not a static category: an act must be so labeled by others. This means that the sociologist should be on guard when society (or powerful groups in society) designates certain behavior problematic or deviant. In regard to some forms of mental illness, for example, R. D. Laing has suggested that the labeling can be seen to involve a political decision: somebody (who has power, influence or status) acts in such a way that somebody else is defined as mad. In discussing vandalism, I want to use this term "political" in the very broad sense that Laing adopts. In a narrower sense, it is apparent that the label one attaches to certain forms of behavior is affected by one's political position: to some, members of an African nationalist group who sabotage a power station in Rhodesia are "freedom fighters"; to others, they are "terrorists."

The first point, then, to make about vandalism is that it is an emotive label, attached to certain forms of behavior only under certain conditions. The term has its origin in the practices of the Vandals, an East Germanic tribe that invaded Western Europe in the fourth and fifth centuries, and eventually sacked Rome in 455. They were regarded as the great destroyers of Roman art, civilization and literature and the term "vandal" was broadened in the 17th century to refer to anyone who recklessly destroyed property, particularly works of art. Vandalism is currently defined by dictionaries as "ruthless destruction or spoiling of anything beautiful or venerable." The vandalism that criminologists study (for example, a group of youths smashing the furniture of a classroom) or the vandalism defined more as "political" than "criminal" and which conveys evident ideological overtones (for example, burning shop interiors during racial disturbances, or stoning embassy windows during a demonstration) seems far removed from the etymological origins of the term. Nevertheless, these origins continue to make an effect: the adjectives which the behavior of the original Vandals conjure up—barbarous, willful, ignorant, cruel—remain part of the stereotype of contemporary vandalism. They are used in a political context in order to justify action against the deviant.

In many cases, of course, the deviant does not accept this description. To him, his acts are not reckless and witless but eminently sensible. As with the Luddites of the early 18th century, property destruction (in their case, machine breaking) may be a deliberate act of protest. Economic historians have done much to dispel the stereotype of Luddism as being "pointless" and "frenzied" or a mere "overflow of high spirits."

Eric Hobsbawm's distinction between two types of machine breaking—"collective bargaining by riot," which under some conditions was a normal way of putting pressure on employers, and the destruction which expressed working-class anger against the new machines of the Industrial Revolution—has more relevance to contemporary forms of vandalism than at first appears. Newspaper accounts and reports by the two commissions on racial disturbances in American cities over the past few years seem to make it evident that most of the property destruction was patterned and, in a sense, "rational." The targets chosen were not arbitrary. For instance, the 1968 Report of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders states: "In at least nine of the cities studied, the damage seems to have been, at least in part, the result of deliberate attacks on white-owned businesses, characterized in the Negro community as unfair or disrespectful toward Negroes." Even if the targets were arbitrary, there is no denying that, in a society dominated by consumption, those who are denied access to the "goodies" operate by a kind of logic when they destroy whatever they can get their hands on. As one analysis of the 1965 Watts riots expressed it: "The man who destroys commodities shows his human superiority over commodities." One does not have to accept this statement, with its somewhat dangerous implications, to make the simple point that to characterize property destruction—whether it is pulling up the paving stones of Paris, breaking embassy windows in Jakarta, or wrecking a slum-area store in Los Angeles—with a phrase like "reckless, ignorant vandalism" is a political judgment. It means that one denies the legitimacy of the motives behind the behavior, and it also justifies punitive measures, which themselves might be "reckless" and "ignorant."

Vandalism raises very starkly the problem of problems: what we call a social problem has objective elements (people are killed, property is damaged, the air is contaminated, the streets are congested, children die of malnutrition), but also a subjective element: the perception and assertion by certain people that "something should be done." Many forms of illegal property destruction are not so judged. Only a few weeks ago, students at Keble College, Oxford, taking part in a traditional celebration after boat races, caused about £1,000 damage. A boat worth £600 was burned, and the blaze was supplemented by property such as chairs, tables and books, including some looted from the rooms of students opposed to the whole ritual. None of this was reported in the mass media. Tolerance for such behavior is highly arbitrary and again illustrates a political process: painting "Beat Fink College" on a wall is not vandalism, painting "Stop Making Bombs" is. Many forms of vandalism never become defined as problematic, because they are invisible: they might occur within the confines of an institution such as a factory, hospital or school. Other forms are similarly overlooked because they occur with a certain regularity and individually are quite trivial. An example would be the defacement of walls of public toilets with various forms of graffiti: in England at least, one would be extremely surprised to find bare walls in the toilets of, say, a public bar. These forms of vandalism get defined as problematic only when somebody says "Look, it's getting beyond a joke" or "Things are going too far."

Turning back to the more conventional forms of vandalism—to destruction "pure and simple"—it is important to note that the behavior is labeled, by social scientists and the public alike, by terms that from the start obscure any attempts to understand the phenomenon. The most commonly used labels are "wanton," "aimless," "pointless," "senseless," "malicious" or "meaningless." These adjectives, in turn, serve to justify particular forms of social control. Society says, in effect, "if you do such meaningless things, don't ask us to be meaningful in what we say or do about you." But is conventional vandalism so meaningless?

Studying juvenile vandalism some years ago, John Martin distinguished three types of vandalism: predatory, vindictive and wanton. The first type refers to crimes such as stealing lead and tin from roofs, smashing and looting parking meters, slot machines and telephone coin boxes.

This should perhaps not even be classified as vandalism, since the damage is incidental to the end of theft. But the wreckage is disproportionate to the possible gain, and the public confuses the issue by habitually referring to such delinquency as "damage for its own sake."

The same confusion between instrumental and expressive activity may be seen in regard to vindictive vandalism. Here, the main motive is to express antagonism and hatred toward particular individuals or groups. Property might be damaged to settle a particular grievance; for example,

The overt characteristics of vandalism—for example, the targets that are chosen—may give a misleading impression of what the act means. In his study of gangs in Midcity, Walter Miller has shown that much gang vandalism, instead of being a random outpouring of accumulated aggression, is often very specific. On the other hand, one should be wary of reading into certain types of vandalism, which look to be obviously ideological, motives that don't exist. Studies of the 1960 swastika daubings in America show that a fair proportion of the offenders were not particularly anti-Semitic and were carried away by the wave of publicity and hysteria which surrounded the incidents. Incidents of vandalism occurring at the same time but totally unrelated are sometimes given a degree of organization and a centralized planning that never existed.

Politicians are particularly given to advancing conspiratorial theories for such incidents: this leads to scapegoating, victimization and other such maneuvers. Vandalism is often erroneously attributed to mental disturbance, particularly when the form of damage appears to be somewhat bizarre or the target is particularly emotive. Writing or chipping names on the walls of public buildings is a practice that dates back for centuries: it is recorded that on the walls of Pompeii slogans were written, such as "Good Luck to Comrade Proculus" and "Vibius Restitus Slept Here." When, however, in 1965 the names "Andy" and "Dell" were scratched on the Kennedy Memorial at Runnymede, there was a vast public outcry, in which the offenders were thought to be part of some obscure political plot, or else simply "mad."

the premises of a youth club might be smashed up by a gang excluded by the club leader. A school may be broken into by its own pupils as an act of revenge or protest. Recent research in a British school revealed an interesting side light to such incidents: when the pupils broke in, they smashed up their own desks. The damage might also be related to minority-group conflict: for example, symbolically important property such as a synagogue or cemetery is defaced, or the windows are broken in the house of a Negro moving into a white neighborhood. Again, the grievances behind these acts—whether or not they are legitimate—are obscured by using the phrase "damage for its own sake."

Martin's third category, wanton vandalism, includes all those acts which do not fit into the other categories, but even these acts may not be as wanton as the label implies. For one thing, the ownership and identity of the property is not irrelevant: most targets of vandalism tend to be public property. It might also be property, which in certain neighborhoods is regarded as fair game, for example, derelict houses or houses under construction. Damage of this sort is admittedly often carried out purely for excitement; this may or may not seem to be an acceptable motive, but a motive it is. Minor acts of vandalism, particularly by small children, are often committed as part of a game; such acts are easily rationalized by their authors because no one is hurt and no property stolen. The self-image of such offenders is unlikely to correspond to the public definitions of them.

When society defines certain people as outsiders, it needs to emphasize the ways in which such people are different from the insiders, who are normal. Thus criminals are not just people who have broken the law; they are also generally dangerous and not to be trusted. Narcotics addicts don't just take drugs; they are "dope fiends," vicious, degenerate and dirty. To stress the discontinuity between deviance and normality gives a feeling of security; the difference becomes clear-cut between good and bad (or, to be more up to date, between "healthy" and "sick"). It is more disturbing to entertain such a view as that advanced by David Matza that much adolescent behavior—and vandalism would seem a good example—is a caricature rather than an inversion or repudiation of middle-class conformist culture. There is an interchange between the conventional and deviant traditions of society as shown, for example, in the ambivalence of most adults (in private) to many forms of youthful misconduct. It needs no subtle Freudian interpretation to suggest that much adult denunciation of teen-age sexual permissiveness is accompanied by a degree of envy.

Similarly, the values associated with juvenile vandalism and thought to be peculiar to delinquents, such as the search for excitement and kicks, the high regard for toughness and aggression, might reflect values running through the whole society. The adolescent is easily stigmatized as a violent hoodlum or an irresponsible hedonist and, as Edgar Friedenberg has pointed out, many adults use the terms "adolescent" and "delinquent" almost interchangeably. But there is, after all, nothing peculiarly adolescent in the violence and vandalism of James Bond movies, or for that matter, of real life.

I have not tried here to explain vandalism. This does not mean that I consider attempts at such explanations irrelevant: rather that one must first be sure of what one is explaining. The usual terms used to describe various forms of vandalism obscure and discredit what may be the real explanations: if a boy breaks into his school and smashes up the classrooms because he has a grievance against the teachers, it is no help to call his behavior "wanton" and "pointless." The only end such labels serve is the teacher's need to hold himself blameless. Most research into school vandalism indicates, in fact, that there is something wrong with the school that is damaged. The highest rates of school vandalism tend to occur in schools with obsolete facilities and equipment, low staff morale and high dissatisfaction and boredom among the pupils.

The final point I'd make is that, by using the labeling perspective, I do not imply that vandalism exists only "in the mind of the beholder." That would be patently ridiculous, especially to anyone given the available figures for the cost of damage from conventional vandalism in its many forms: street lamps broken, windows smashed, public buildings defaced, fixtures on trains and buses broken, and so on. Such damage not only entails a financial loss but is a symbolic threat to a society which places high value on property. Particular forms of vandalism also threaten accepted values about the resolution of political, racial and religious conflict. Yet other forms of vandalism may lead to loss of life as well as property: trains have been derailed by obstacles placed on the railway lines, often by very young children; calls for medical help have been delayed because public phone boxes have been damaged.

One must guard against the vulgarization referred to earlier that leads people to assert, for example, that nobody is really mentally ill; they are just passive victims of conspiracies organized by their families and abetted by wicked psychiatrists. The view I have illustrated—somewhat unsystematically—in regard to vandalism simply supports the point that Lemert makes: while traditional sociology rests on the idea that deviance leads to social control, the reverse idea—that social control leads to deviance—"is equally tenable and the potentially richer premise for studying deviance in modern society." One must aim at a truly transactional view of deviance and social problems, so that the political processes whereby certain forms of behavior and certain people become defined as deviant can be considered along with the ways in which persons respond to these labels and social problems are shaped because of them.

HARRY GOLDEN

Rolling Wood is a predominantly white residential neighborhood in Raleigh, the capital of North Carolina. It was a peaceful enclave until Mr. and Mrs. Caple and their two children moved in at 2517 Remington Road, and then the trouble began.

The Caples are Negroes. Mr. Caple came to Raleigh to teach drama at Shaw University, a Negro school, where Mrs. Caple, too, is a teacher. They have been harassed and threatened since they moved in with a nine-months' lease.

First their garbage was dumped on their lawn, then came the speeding cars whose white occupants shouted obscenities and "Nigger go home." This was followed by the burning of Horace Caple in effigy. The couple's two children are bewildered. The little boy of 4 does not understand, but the 12-year-old girl understands well enough; she often goes into fits of crying.

When it was learned that Mrs. Pat Juby, the white real estate lady who had rented the house to the Caples, had been threatened, Mrs. Caple broke down completely and Mr. Caple decided to arm himself.

The pattern of life is changing for the Caples. They live in constant fear and always go out together. The police are keeping vigil at the Caple residence but the Caples feel that they must move and the officials at Shaw University are looking around for another house for them. The police, too, have suggested that the Caples move out.

That is the picture of "open housing" in North Carolina. A letter was sent to all white residents of Rolling Wood, expressing "sorrow for the misfortune of the invasion of our neighborhood."

"The Negro block busters are wards of the federal government," said the letter, adding: "The niggers are protected by the government and the open housing law." A poster distributed to the white residents warned, "We have to watch for any more contamination of our neighborhood."

Governor Wallace has encouraged these white people with his statement against open housing, and so has Mr. Nixon with his lukewarm references to the housing law. Both candidates for governor of North Carolina, James Gardner, the Republican, and Bob Scott, the Democrat, have stated that they will not support "open housing." All this despite the reasonable editorials by Jonathan Daniels in his liberal paper, the Raleigh News and Observer.

Meanwhile, the speeding cars circle the Caple home and Mr. Caple says, "I didn't realize how much hatred exists in this world."

BOOKS & THE ARTS

McNamara: The Glacial Technocrat

THE ESSENCE OF SECURITY. By Robert S. McNamara. Harper & Row. 176 pp. $4.95.

TOM J. FARER

Mr. Farer is an assistant professor of law at Columbia University and was formerly special assistant to the general counsel, United States Department of Defense.

Early in his extraordinary study of Luther, Erik Erikson reminds us that

In the evaluation of the dominant moods of any historical period it is important to hold fast to the fact that there are always islands of self-sufficiency order—on farms and in castles, in homes, studies, and cloisters—where sensible people manage to live relatively lusty and decent lives: as moral as they must be, as free as they may be, and as masterly as they can be. If we only knew it, this elusive arrangement is happiness.

When I worked there during the Kennedy era, the office of the Secretary of Defense seemed just such an island. We were zestful, moved by a controlled excitement, occasionally even euphoric, not with any crass sense of power but with vistas of the elimination of nuclear terror by means of the systematic application of human reason. We were true believers, and McNamara was our prophet.

It was difficult for those who were not in government at the time to perceive, through the curtain of martial statistics, McNamara's consuming dedication to reducing the threat of nuclear war and, beyond that, to altering the tone and terms of our acerbic dialogue with the principal centers of Communist power. Although there is substantial evidence of this dedication in The Essence of Security, the balance of both its form and substance can only strengthen the conception of McNamara as a glacial technocrat ultimately deficient in intellectual vision and moral passion. Unduly influenced, perhaps, by the residue of true belief, I found the book obscuring its author. It does, however, reflect with disturbing clarity the fundamental presuppositions of American foreign policy since the inauguration of John F. Kennedy.

As McNamara notes, the administration began with "a general reassessment of our military forces in relation to our national security policies and objectives."

There is here no suggestion that "our national security policies and objectives" also were reassessed. There were ample deterrents to a fresh view, personified by the eminences grises of foreign policy—Acheson, Lovett and McCloy—who provided continuity with the earliest days of the cold war. Although holding no official position, their opinions were periodically received and, I think one can assume, with some deference. And when these paladins of Eastern respectability were not available in person, that Southern beneficiary of Establishment patronage, the Secretary of State, was likely to express comparable views in the detached incisive style which has fueled his career.

To be fair, even in retrospect it is hard to make any case for the proposition that a difference in influential personnel could or should have modified national objectives in Europe or the commitment to an invulnerable, second-strike nuclear capability. It was with respect to our policies in the Third World that the continuity of assumption proved disastrous.

With a relish and capacity which dwarfed mere competence, the Secretary of Defense began to reshape the military instruments which were to serve the President's policies. Although the missile gap from which the President had fashioned a campaign shillelagh was revealed as the fevered distortion of certain intelligence estimates, Kennedy and McNamara, in order to hedge against the possible future build-up of the Soviet missile force, initiated an enormous missile production program. "Despite the retirement of all the Atlases and Titan I's, the number of land-based ICBMs increased from 28 at mid-1961 to 1,054 by mid-1967." The administration also added most of the forty-one Polaris submarines carrying 656 missile launchers which now are part of our nuclear arsenal.

No one in the administration regarded this build-up as provocative to the Russians, because the quantitative changes were accompanied by qualitative ones—the deployment of solid-fuel missiles underground and underwater, and improvements in the mechanisms of command and control—which provided us with a second-strike capability under any then (or now) foreseeable circumstances. It was clear to the administration that that capability would eliminate a dangerous temptation for a pre-emptive strike in a moment of crisis and the President and his advisers apparently assumed that the virtues of this arrangement would be equally clear to the Soviet Union.

While the elimination of one first-strike incentive may have been reassuring to the Kremlin (a rather speculative matter particularly in light of the comparatively low order of nuclear sophistication then evidenced by Soviet writing), the coincident enhancement of our assured destruction capability in the event of a decision to strike first was bound to be traumatic for Soviet military planners who doubtless were at least as concerned about the security of their own retaliatory second-strike forces as they were about any United States temptations generated by the possible insecurity of its forces.

As early as 1963, "using the realistic measurement of the number of warheads available . . . which could be delivered with accuracy and effectiveness on appropriate targets in the United States or the Soviet Union," the United States possessed a superiority over the Soviet Union of at least 3 or 4 to 1. Soviet fears may have been aggravated by the Secretary's reference in one or two speeches to the possible merits of a counterforce strategy, that is, a conscious policy of targeting weapons rather than population centers. Although the suggestion was not specifically keyed to a first-strike option—indeed was probably motivated by concern over the potential consequences of an inadvertent nuclear exchange—it may have had that connotation for the Russians, since it would be folly for the smaller nuclear power to initiate a counterforce exchange with the larger on a 1-for-1 basis.

One of McNamara's most attractive qualities, his natural candor, is here in evidence when he concedes that our current numerical superiority over the Soviet Union in reliable, accurate and effective warheads is both greater than we had originally planned and more than we require. In the larger equation of security our superiority is of limited significance, for even with our current superiority, or indeed with any numerical superiority realistically attainable, the blunt, inescapable fact remains that the Soviet Union, with its present forces, could still effectively destroy the United States, even after absorbing the full weight of an Amer-

GETTING THE PICTURE

Holding her naked child, she squats beyond words. Columns of newsprint break ranks at her, go around.

She is young as old donnas, foreign like them, but her skin is bone-tight, her bare feet wrung tight to the tramped-down dirt she seems to be trying to get into. She cries something we can't hear; her eyes glitter and her baby dangles until her howl, life-size, is a black hole eating outward like napalm, until, too close, she draws past, blows up. Words are huge on the page, but machines have arranged ink dots in a cloud where a woman was.

NANCY PRICE

ican first strike. . . . [For this reason] a substantial numerical superiority of weapons today does not effectively translate into political control or diplomatic leverage.

This was the first lesson he attempted to communicate to a recalcitrant Congress. The second proposition the Secretary sought to convert into an accepted maxim on Capitol Hill was the apparent truism that "the Soviet Union and the United States mutually influence one another's strategic plans." Essentially as a corollary to these propositions McNamara held that it was not ipso facto necessary for the United States to acquire every weapon which turned up in the Soviet arsenal. Before selecting any weapons system, he warned, we must ask whether it is required to maintain our assured second-strike capability and must evaluate the expected Soviet reaction to acquisition. In this connection McNamara builds a devastating case against a Soviet-oriented anti-ballistic missile system, while reserving for an Appendix his notably halfhearted defense of the light, allegedly anti-Chinese, system for which funds have already been appropriated.

In his writing, as in office, the Secretary displays an impressive grasp of our nuclear problems. The complexities of deterrence and the limitations of nuclear power are presented in prose admirable for its brevity, clarity and force. There is, however, one slightly disconcerting omission. While frankly conceding "that if we had had more accurate information about planned Soviet strategic forces, we simply would not have needed to build as large a nuclear arsenal as we have today," McNamara does not indicate why we completed the build-up after we had acquired a far more accurate assessment of the Soviet weapons program. I suspect that at least part of the problem is the cost associated with the reduction of a planned production run. Perhaps the long-range programing which McNamara introduced at the Pentagon (and which he regards with unabashed pride) rigidified the weapons-production process. One can only regret Secretary McNamara's failure to discuss this phenomenon with all its disturbing implications for the dynamics of the arms race.

A depressing thing happens on McNamara's way to the Third World. Muddled assertion replaces analysis as a tool of persuasion. Ideas bubble off the page only to pop at the first touch of critical thought. The parade of wooden platitudes would do justice to Secretary Rusk. The thread of his argument, such as it is, begins with a deceptively impeccable statement of our national objectives:

. . . to create . . . a world in which even the smallest state [can] look forward to an independent existence, free to develop in its own way, unmolested by its neighbors, and free of fear of armed attack or political domination by the more powerful nations.

A decade ago it would have passed unnoticed, merely a decorous banality. Now it presents itself as provocative hypocrisy or unseemly naïveté. As a minor matter, it ignores the shift in world values which has made it a right, even an obligation, to "molest" certain states—South Africa being the classic case in point. Gone is the traditional right of each equal sovereign to be monstrous to his subjects.

The bland implication that small, less-developed states associated with the United States, as opposed to the Soviet Union, can "look forward to an independent existence . . . free of fear of political domination" might charitably be ascribed to a covert sense of irony, if only one could find some verbal scrap that would bear such an interpretation. It does seem a little cavalier to create, by means of a significant silence, the status of a non-person for Señor Arbenz, the former President of Guatemala. The Bay of Pigs and the Lebanon also find no home in these "Reflections in Office," while the Dominican Republic is touched gingerly in one sentence where it is laid alongside Vietnam and the Pakistan-India conflicts as examples of "first attempts to substitute multinational for unilateral policing of violence." The legal mind boggles at this whimsical hodgepodge of "precedent."

Bolts of candor do break through occasionally, as where after announcing sternly that "certainly we have no charter to rescue floundering regimes which have brought violence on themselves by deliberately refusing to meet the legitimate expectations of their citizenry," he adds:

Further, throughout the next decade advancing technology will reduce the requirement for bases and staging rights at particular locations abroad, and the whole pattern of forward deployment will gradually change.

In other words, the strategic justifications for gross interference in the processes of less-developed countries will diminish.

Such moments are warming, but one is quickly chilled again by new clichés and non sequiturs. "It is clearly understood," we are assured, "that certain Communist nations are capable of subverting, manipulating and finally directing for their own ends the wholly legitimate grievances of a developing society." Which nations? When? How? What is the evidence of success? There are no answers. Nor is there any indication of how a citizenry whose "legitimate" expectations have been frustrated can acquire the weapons required to remove "floundering" but well-armed regimes. There is no suggestion that the United States should provide them, and there is ample indication that the United States will regard any reliance on the wily Communist powers as compelling evidence that a rebellion is not genuinely indigenous.

Related in a deplorably unsystematic way to Secretary McNamara's alertness to the threat of subversion in the "traditionally listless areas of the world," which the "sweeping surge of development [has turned] into seething caldrons of change," is his concern with stability. It is announced in the Preface and proceeds thereafter on its murky way through the entire book. "Whether Communists are involved or not," we are crisply informed, "violence anywhere in a taut world threatens the security and stability of nations half a globe away."

I do not know why Secretary McNamara regards this as a self-evident proposition, as opposed to self-fulfilling prophecy. Just how is the security of the United States threatened by violence on the streets of Ouagadougou? Because "there are those who . . . would . . . undermine us slowly with subversion and limited war"? And suppose those incubuses (whose names suddenly are coyly withheld) become, through coup or civil war, as influential in Upper Volta as the United States is in literally dozens of less-developed countries from the Dominican Republic to Thailand. What is the actual relationship between this contingency and our security?

I will say this: if Secretary McNamara is correct in his assertion that peace and tranquility are indivisible (why won't Wilsonians just fade away?), our national prospects appear, on his own evidence, rather bleak. We are warned of "a hemisphere of youth where mounting frustrations are likely to fester into eruptions of violence and extremism." We are assured that if present growth trends persist, by the end of the century the average per capita income for the less-developed countries will be barely $170, while that of the United States will be $4,500. And finally we are pressed against the wall of despair by the revelation that order and stability are impossible without a reasonable standard of living which is not an objective level of existence but a subjective sense of relative well-being.

What are we to do? The nostrums have a familiar ring. Economic aid and military assistance to provide the "shield behind which development, the central fact of security, can be achieved," but only for those states which "are willing and able to help themselves." Yet how can we afford to ignore any state if violence anywhere is a threat to our security?

Privately, many of the most convinced supporters of our present policy concede the dominating role of the United States in many states, and the extensive degree to which we have exploited that role by influencing decisively the policies and personnel of client governments. They also concede that we have from time to time aided inept, corrupt and viciously authoritarian regimes wholly unable or unwilling to promote development and distributive justice. Until this concession is made publicly, debate is degraded to a dialogue of the deaf.

Arguably, it was necessary for the Secretary of Defense to participate occasionally in the ritual of support and justification for the President's policies. That would be a generous explanation for the quality of several of the "policy" statements which were stitched together to create this book. But it obviously does not cover a retrospective confirmation of the official pieties by a man who has moved to more neutral ground.

There is, here, the adumbration of tragedy. Through all his years in office, McNamara's dominating concern was to halt the arms race by convincing the American public, and more particularly its Congressional representatives and the Soviet leadership, that the multiplication of weaponry would concurrently multiply insecurity. There is evidence that he has succeeded in communicating this position to the Russians. There is more compelling evidence that with respect to the Congress of the United States he has failed. Under any circumstances the obstacles would have been great. In the combustible environment which is a product of the war in Vietnam, they appear to have proved insuperable. Thus the whole problem of American policy in the Third World which for McNamara was, I believe, of only secondary concern has come to dominate the ramparts of foreign and defense policy, and finally has driven from the office of the Secretary of Defense easily the most admirable figure ever to have occupied it, his hopes subverted in part by the arrogant assumption that any policy could be made to work by a man who was sufficiently determined, sufficiently able, and sufficiently willing to pay the price.

He has, I suspect, paid a greater price than he had ever imagined would be required, and though we have paid it too, is it possible not to regret his passing from the seat of power in the Pentagon? There is no longer a clear voice there responding to the belligerent trumpets on Capitol Hill and on the hustings as well. Weapons yet unseen move their slow thighs in anticipation of birth. I fear the day is not distant when I and many others will ask plaintively: "Where have you gone, Robert McNamara?"

Scenes from America's past

THE HAWKS OF WORLD WAR II

Mark Chadwin. Here is the story of the "Warhawks" — some of them very prominent Americans — who risked public condemnation as they struggled with isolationist and pacifist groups such as the America Firsters. Especially absorbing is the history of their relations with the FDR administration and their efforts to encourage formal American belligerency. $7.95

POVERTY & POLITICS

The Rise and Decline of the Farm Security Administration. Sidney Baldwin. A backward glance at chronic poverty, the story of the FSA and its efforts to alleviate the causes of poverty — first under FDR and then under Truman. Mr. Baldwin's book illuminates the interplay of forces which control attempts by men and governments to cope with human predicaments. Illustrated. $10.00

TO PRINT THE NEWS & RAISE HELL

A Biography of Wilbur F. Storey. Justin E. Walsh. The colorful life of one of America's most flamboyant newspapermen. Storey built and ran the Chicago Times and set the style of journalism later developed by Pulitzer, Hearst and MacFadden. The book won the American Association for State and Local History Manuscript Award for 1967. Illustrated. $7.50

WHITE OVER BLACK

American Attitudes Toward the Negro, 1550-1812. Winthrop D. Jordan. "Monumental . . . brilliant!" says Publishers' Weekly. The author has tackled "one of the most . . . important problems in American history," comments C. Vann Woodward in The New York Times Book Review, and the result is "a massive and learned work that stands as the most informed and impressive pronouncement on the subject yet made." Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture. $12.50 at your bookstore or from

THE UNIVERSITY OF
UNC PRESS NORTH CAROLINA PRESS
Chapel Hill, N. C. 27514

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Dahlberg: A Prophetic Wisdom

EDWARD DAHLBERG: American Ishmael of Letters. Edited and with an introduction by Harold Billings. Roger Beacham. 175 pp. $8.95.

THE CARNAL MYTH. By Edward Dahlberg. Weybright and Talley. 121 pp. $6.50.

RAYMOND ROSENTHAL

Mr. Rosenthal is the editor of a recently published anthology, McLuhan: Pro & Con (Funk & Wagnalls).

That Edward Dahlberg is one of contemporary America's most important writers is becoming clearer with every book he publishes. Recently his most eloquent and esoteric work, The Carnal Myth, has been issued, almost simultaneously with an anthology of criticism on him, edited by Harold Billings, in which critics as well known and authoritative as Allen Tate, Herbert Read and Alfred Kazin rub elbows with a number of younger men who have espoused Dahlberg's cause.

But what is his cause? It is interesting to note that the critics, although almost uniformly laudatory, are not quite sure of its limits and lineaments. Allen Tate, for example, locates Dahlberg's mystique in his opposition to the state, and connects him with that line of American loners that runs from Thoreau to Randolph Bourne; he is "the poet as the perpetual dissenter and outcast. Dante was exiled from his City, with a price on his head; but what had brought this upon him he accepted in principle since he could not have entertained a theory which would justify resistance as such to the City." On the other hand, Herbert Read hails him as "our twentieth century Thoreau, seeking an understanding of the past which will be the understanding of our land and ourselves. . . . His career demonstrates that there is no tradition for American writers: 'We are the eternal infant aboriginals,' as he has said, and each artist must take the journey into the backwoods alone if he is to reach the plateau of achievement where Edward Dahlberg stands."

I have read The Carnal Myth six times and I now feel confident that I understand its main outlines sufficiently well to write a review of the book. Dahlberg's cause, his importance, lie in his ingrained suspicion of the rationalistic, scientific heritage which has imprisoned intellect in our time. He knows, instinctively—and this is the virtue and defect of his auto-didactic limitations—that above reason and the soul or spirit stands what Dante called "il bene dell' intelletto," that is, the good of the intellect, the light of wisdom which is a perpetual source of interpretation and transformation. Dahlberg intuitively knows that the method of this form of intellect is the explanation of myths, the presentation of symbols, the search for ancient wisdom. And this is precisely the form taken by The Carnal Myth, which one of the contributors to Mr. Billings' interesting volume, Joseph Evans Slate, describes as a "bestiary . . . or moral book of erotic beasts . . . (whose) scope is encyclopedic and its retrospective movement embraces the entire history of living matter."

Dahlberg is famous, or infamous—depending on the degree of the critic's tolerance for heretical opinion—for his attacks on modern literature. Yet his new book, The Carnal Myth, is a magnificent example of the montage method used with a brilliance that the self-proclaimed modernists might reflect on with advantage. It is precisely the tension between his love and veneration for the wisdom of the past and his battered, reluctant immersion in the present that imparts a note of conflict and longing to these queer, astoundingly evocative mosaics of quotation, garnered and set out on the page with an originality that pedestrian scholarship could never achieve. In this sense, he is a true modernist, like Eliot, Valéry and Joyce: he cannot settle down comfortably in an uncomfortable epoch. Tradition is not a lifeless institution for him but rather the reminder of tragedy that goads him to feats of incomparable juxtaposition and analogy.

Self-revelation is a heavy Petrine doubt hanging about my neck. That is what writing is. I fume away my gloom and imagine I am gaining a knowledge of my nature, and that is sufficient to make a Goya cower. . . .

Only a writer steeped in the classical awareness of human limitation could make the illuminating parallel between the terrible trials and hardships of the Spanish conquistadors in America and the sexual gluttony described and excoriated by the classics. "Who can muse," he says in his preface, "upon the disasters of Panphilo de Narváez or the pilgrimage of Cabeza de Vaca, who walked naked from the Atlantic to the Rio de las Palmas (the Rio Grande), without understanding that suffering is the Buddha of all flesh?" And his musings have given us perhaps the most profound scrutiny of America's rapacious beginnings—its indigenous identity—to be found in our literature. Acknowledging his debt to that other, first explorer of the American past, William Carlos Williams, "the only poet with the historian's faculty of the American earth," Dahlberg plunges deeper and further by linking all these frightful assaults on the virgin wilderness with an ancient warning that was being flouted and ignored.

The Quiché Maya papyri are jaguar psalms. Aztec hieroglyphs are water demons and the human skulls sacrificed in the oratories. Thoreau is a wild quaggy testament; the strongest books of the American smell of the slime, the horny spicules of sponges, and the spermacti of leviathan.

Dahlberg's true rebelliousness can be traced directly to his fierce reverence for the past. "The writer's occupation," he proclaims, "according to Ben Jonson, is a 'sacrament of misery.' To be truthful is to dwell in a tomb described as society."

The difficulty of interpreting Dahlberg can be located in the fact that he is a religious writer without a religion, or rather in search of one. Myth, as used by many of the contributors to Mr. Billings' volume, would seem to be an empty literary exercise, an ornamentation. Dahlberg is after much greater game. He is doing what D. H. Lawrence said American writers must do if our unfledged continent is ever to find its soul: he is ransacking our primeval past to find the roots of a new religion. He himself is not sure, like all true prophets.

Living in the age of separation, I had a clandestine wish I could not repress: not having written this work to instruct others, I hoped it would be a remedy of sorts for those who are broken, my sole kin, wherever they are. . . . I made apothegms, never failing to be concerned with style first and last, but prayed after they were framed they might be a scanty value to those remote hermits, dying in the Arctic Circle of the literati. Had I the dung of the musk ox as fuel in the frozen regions to warm them?

But anyone who reads The Carnal Myth with my warning in mind will come away marvously refreshed and reawakened. The Indians on our continent lived in mythical symbiosis with that "spirit of place" which, as Lawrence declared and as Dahlberg intimates, must be experienced, lived through, struggled against and, finally, reconciled if a land or a country is to grow and flourish. The ghosts that haunt the American land are ancient ghosts that have been transplanted by the spirit and need human and mythical recognition before they can be understood and, perhaps, banished.

The western people have sepulchred away the sun and the moon; and the American is far from the Indian god rivers, bays, rain and maize that give him images, without which he is sourceless. Until he is connected with the fens, the ravines, the stars, he is more solitary than any beast. Man is a god, and kin to men, when he is a river, a mountain, a horse, a moon. . . . Hindu writing is meditative, and the domestic heifer is sacred and near the Buddha. The American legend is the mesa and the bison; it is the myth of a tragic terrain stalked by banished men.

Dahlberg's prose is eminently quotable; he is perhaps our most consummate rhetorician, but he also has a great deal to say. His books are worth the trouble of meditation, of rereading, of pondering over again and again. I myself wonder whether he knows fully and intimately the profundity of his own wisdom. He is indeed like a seer whose vision sometimes escapes himself; the delight of the imaginative transport blurs the clarity of perception. At times one has the feeling that he believes America can be saved only by an ancient past, that the Indians and their ceremonies and rituals are meaningless to us, that spirituality can only come from elsewhere. He is an aesthete in religion too, and perhaps that is why he mistakes his own wisdom for a lesser thing than it is. The truth is in his rhythms, his eloquence, not in his explanations.

But once it has been said, even in this confused clairvoyant manner, it is quite clear to all. It is true that America has never been redeemed by the spirit, by the bene delfi intelletto. Dahlberg is important because he points a new way: "Ragged earth seldom produces mild men; the rivers of the New Continent are choleric, and the reason that the rapacious Scamander, with whom Achilles fought, appears to be small and of little importance is that Homer has tamed this stream."

Dahlberg is a lone searcher for the true myths of human destiny in our violent, barren, raddled land. He says: "Man is the animal who thinks, but he cannot employ his intellect without losing his reason, which is why Cristóbal Colón saw mermaids in the waters near the Antilles, or how Plato conceived the Timaeus." From such statements, American criticism, if it were really mythical in orientation, could evolve a new corpus of thought and revelation to counter the materialism and sensationalism growing on all sides.

Our National-Security Managers

INTERVENTION AND REVOLUTION. By Richard J. Barnett. AN NAL Book. World Publishing Co. 302 pp. $6.95.

RICHARD J. WALTON

Mr. Walton is the author of The Remnants of Power: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson, just published by Coward-McCann.

This splendid and melancholy book has laid to their final rest any lingering doubts about the nature of America in world affairs. America, born in revolution, the ultimate inspirer of almost all the revolutions that have followed, has become the fist of counterrevolution. Richard J. Barnett, a founder and co-director of the Institute for Policy Studies, has written a calm, dispassionate book, perceptive and truthful, that quietly demolishes the basis of most American foreign policy since the war. The basic assumption, of course, one accepted by Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson, is that expansive communism seeks to conquer the world and that America, in self-defense, must strike down this hydra-headed monster wherever it can, near or far. This hypothesis was accepted a priori or perhaps on the basis of what might be called proof by reassertion. Thus in Greece and Iran, Guatemala and Cuba, the Dominican Republic and Vietnam and elsewhere, the United States has carried on its crusade to prevent the latter-day Munichs that it claims would mean the eventual battling of the Communists on American shores.

In his first sentence Barnett states simply the paradox in American foreign policy. "The Cold War arose over the fate of Central Europe, but it has been fought almost everywhere else." The containment policy was established, not without some justification, to block any further Russian expansion beyond what became almost immediately its satellite states. However, and the reasons are still not quite clear, the United States was not content to contain Russia along the line of original tension but, by the time Dulles was through, had relentlessly established an armed ring around the entire Communist world. And paradoxically while the original area of confrontation was quiet—although often tense—the United States engaged itself, sometimes covertly, sometimes openly, in putting down revolutions in the ruins of the old

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

Vol. XII, No. 4 FALL 1968

JAMES GINDIN

Society and Compassion in the Novels of D. H. Lawrence

EUGENE GOODHEART

On Judicial Criticism:
A Confrontation Between Modern and Victorian Views

DAVID L. NORTON

Philosophy and Imagination

JAMES L. HILL

Tennyson's "The Lady of Shalott":
The Ambiguity of Commitment

RANNEY STANFORD

The Romantic Hero
and That Fatal Selfhood

DAVID M. FAHEY

R. H. Tawney
and the Sense of Community

Subscription Rates:

$1.00 for single copies

$3.00 a year (4 issues)

$5.00 for two years

Available at bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall

Michigan State University

East Lansing, Michigan 48824

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
Independent, lively, and original.
Canada's leading forum for radical
thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION

P.O. Box 1413

Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

M-REIT

Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust

HOW TO INVEST IN OPEN HOUSING

M-REIT buys income producing apartment houses in good neighborhoods and offers housing to all.

$20 per share

with a minimum purchase of 10 shares
10% down. Balance in 45 days.

SEND FOR FREE PROSPECTUS

Morris Milgram, Dept. WM
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

social and political order caused by the upheavals of war.

Before going any further, it should be made plain that Barnett is no starry-eyed romantic about revolutions:

But the moral depravity of the colonialist does not mean that the revolution is pure heroism or that its leaders are saints. Revolution is ugly and violent. It devours its children and innocent people along with it. The revolutionary always starts from a position of weakness, and he resorts to terrorism, the weapon of the weak—the derailed train, the bomb in the officers' club, or the cut throat of the colonialist collaborator (real or suspected). The revolutionary, even when he is fired by a righteous cause, often marks his success by reverting to the political type he supplants.

Yet while he realizes that revolutions may be betrayed by the very men who made them, he points out what successive administrations have not been able to grasp, that "Revolutionary movements"—as opposed to the coups d'état the United States is usually able to accept—"grow in the soil of exploitation and injustice," and result only when this status quo has successfully resisted all other attempts at change.

Our National-Security Managers (Barnett's term), those intelligent, often brilliant, well-mannered, well-dressed, well-educated, awesomely well-informed and quietly arrogant men who have led us into one moral, political or military disaster after another, would explain with the long-suffering patience they display to those of us who just don't know the score, that they are hardly counterrevolutionaries. The United States, as we should know, has a long tradition of anti-colonialism, and besides, everyone knows that the United States is different; we don't do the things other paramount nations have done. We intervene in revolutions only when they have been taken over by outside forces, only when the Communists subvert them, and such intervention is clearly in the interest of the people involved, for the good of the entire "free world" and essential to American security.

Here's the difficulty and here's where Barnett is so splendid. He establishes that successive administrations have defined as Communist virtually every revolution that intended profound economic and social change, whether or not Communists were present. And if Communists were involved in any way—even as remote inspiration or minor suppliers of material aid—or if any domestic Communists participated in the revolutionary movement, this was taken as proof positive that the revolution was directed from Moscow or Peking. This despite the fact that there is absolutely no evidence that Moscow or Peking has organized and dominated even a single "war of national liberation." Indeed, while both have been free with advice and rhetoric, they have been stingy with material aid except, as Barnett points out, in response to a major American commitment such as in Vietnam. Further, there is ample evidence that such revolutionary leaders as Castro and Ho Chi Minh are fiercely protective of their independence. Further still, it is a documented fact that Russia, particularly, has often denied aid to avowedly Communist rebels and continues to discourage revolutions in areas where, if it followed Communist dogma, it should encourage them.

In short, as Barnett superbly documents, these revolutions are nationalistic and, regardless of the rhetoric, not part of a Communist wave that threatens to engulf us. Thus the Munich analogy so beloved of Secretary Rusk is simply false. These revolutionaries are not part of one army which, if defeated in one place, will be unable to fight us in another. Each country, however similar the circumstances, is a separate problem, and a successful counterinsurgency in one country does not prevent a revolution in another. And Barnett consigns to where it belongs, fantasy land, the prevailing notion that successful revolutions threaten American security. "... the notion that the Castros of the future will muster an army of millions, transport them by sampan and burro, and loose them on our cities is nothing less than a psychotic fantasy, so absurd in fact that it is never explicitly stated, only hinted at in vague anxiety-producing historical analogies." These revolutions threaten our national security only (as has been proved in Vietnam) if we insist in trying to put them down.

Barnett not only discusses revolutions in general, he gives excellent concise accounts of American interventions in, among other places, Iran, Guatemala, Lebanon, the Dominican Republic and, of course, Vietnam. What interested me most however was his discussion of the Greek civil war and the Truman Doctrine. Most of us who were young then and busy defending Truman against the McCarthyites accepted as an article of faith that the Truman Doctrine alone would have been enough to establish him as a great President. Yet we have come to learn that it was not that simple, that the Communist rebels had been refused aid by Stalin as a result of a deal with Churchill, that the government rescued and then supported by Britain and the United States was corrupt and repressive and, if possible, even more brutal than the Greek Communists. Now it seems clear that this fateful step that changed the course of American and world history was based, perhaps even deliberately, on the false premise that Greece was intended to be an extension of the Russian Communist empire. The ultimate irony, of course, is what happened to Greece twenty years later.

The question now is—what happens next? Here Barnett's superb book is of no help if it's not read by those who most need to read it. Have we finally learned from Vietnam? Or, perhaps more pertinent, has the new President and the men who'll surround him?

Books of Interest to Nation Readers

FRONTIERS OF CIVIL LIBERTIES. By Norman Dorsen. With a preface by Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. Pantheon Books. 420 pp. $8.95.

A panoramic view of contemporary issues in civil liberties describing the advances and retreats in a constant struggle of negotiation, victory and defeat.

THE OTHER GERMANY. By John Dornberg. Doubleday & Co. 370 pp. $6.95.

A view of East Germany which depicts it risen from the rubble of a decimated Europe to a position of the world's seventh largest industrial power. Its citizens are shown enjoying a measure of consumer affluence and personal independence. By a Nation contributor.

CRISIS IN CAR INSURANCE. Edited by Robert E. Keeton, Jeffrey O'Connell and John H. McCord. University of Illinois Press. 279 pp. $6.95.

A collection of papers by representatives of the insurance industry, plaintiffs and defendants' counsel, federal and state government, universities, and consumer groups debating the pros and cons of methods for handling automobile claims, and evaluation of much needed proposals for change. It includes a chapter by Nation contributors Robert Keeton and Jeffrey O'Connell on "Basic Protection: Automobile Insurance."

I HEARD THE TREAD OF HUNTERS

*I heard the tread of hunters,
Snapping forge in broken trail
Across the shell-backed, pheasant-
Fathered leaves along
The tracing snowglobe*

waters of October.

*I heard the tread of hunters,
Thrashing past the mossy roots of Thorn and pacing
Pair by peer beneath the furry
Harvest of the walnut trees.*

*I heard the tread of hunters
Signal terror to the deer
Who wandered at the grassline of
The clover-breaded pool and Watched them twitch their Hate for death and fly
Fleet on ragged wings of Blood and cinder fading
Small as owls away,
Their*

Mandarin-delicate flanks

Leaping in the gloom.

MICHAEL SHORB

impressions of the Red Guards in action and of the hypnotic effect of Mao. A chapter of this work appeared in The Nation.

REGIS DEBRAY AND THE LATIN AMERICAN REVOLUTION. Edited by Leo Huberman and Paul M. Sweezy. Monthly Review Press. 138 pp. $5.

A symposium on Régis Debray's Revolution in the Revolution? which includes essays by Juan Bosch, Robin Blackburn, André Gunder Frank, Gordon Lewis and William A. Williams, among other writers. The essay by Egbal Ahmad appeared in somewhat different form in The Nation.

THE TRIAL OF ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN BY THE AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION. Edited, with an introduction by Corliss Lamont. Horizon Press. 222 pp. $5.95.

Mr. Lamont was a member of the ACLU Board of Directors and present at the 1940 meeting at which Miss Flynn, a leading woman labor and radical leader, was expelled on the ground that she was a member of the Communist Party. A full stenographic transcript of the hearing is included in this fascinating account of a turning point in the alliance between liberals and radicals.

FREEDOM OF CHOICE AFFIRMED. By Corliss Lamont. Horizon Press. 214 pp. $5.95.

A product of four decades of thought and discussion, this history of philosophy is an overall case for existence of free will from the humanist and naturalist viewpoint. Mr. Lamont derides those schools of history, philosophy and psychoanalysis that see man as a puppet or automaton entirely subject to forces within or without himself.

SUPERNATION AT PEACE AND WAR. By Dan Wakefield. Atlantic-Little, Brown. 252 pp. $5.95.

BETWEEN THE LINES. By Dan Wakefield. Atlantic-Little, Brown. 274 pp. Paper $2.45.

Both books are colorful, personalized accounts of a reporter's journey through public and private events. The first describes a trip across the country in the early months of 1968. The second is a reprint of a collection of essays originally published in 1966, almost half of

THE RICH: Are They Different? By George G. Kirstein. Houghton Mifflin Co. 266 pp. $5.95.

Mr. Kirstein defines who is rich and who only affluent and discusses the differences between the hereditary rich and the self-enriched. He writes of the education of the rich, their guilts, fears and isolation, their philanthropy, their fun, their power, and the special problems of rich women. Finally he answers the two questions: are the rich happy and are they different? A condensed version of one of the chapters appeared in The Nation.

THE PEOPLE AND THE POLICE. By Algernon D. Black. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 246 pp. $6.95.

Mr. Black, former chairman of the 1966 Civilian Complaint Review Board of the Police Department of the City of New York, voices the hope that there is still time for the people and the police to come to understand one another's needs, problems and points of view.

THE RED BOOK AND THE GREAT WALL. By Alberto Moravia. Translated by Ronald Stom. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 170 pp. $4.95.

A novelist's highly personalized account of a recent visit to China, including his

THE NATION/November 11, 1968

What do you know about corrupt universities?

Well, if you went to

Columbia
Harvard
Yale

University of California
University of Texas
Cornell
M.I.T.
University of Michigan

Duke
University of Pennsylvania
L.I.U.
University of Chicago
Michigan State University
Stanford
Princeton and most of the other big ones

you've seen it first hand

"A powerful indictment, bristling with names and facts. This book may well become a handbook for student protesters."

—H. L. NIEBURG, N.Y. Times Book Review

THE CLOSED CORPORATION

American Universities in Crisis by JAMES RIDGEWAY

$5.95, now at your bookstore. RANDOM HOUSE which were written on special assignment for The Nation.

THE ATLANTIC SALMON: A Vanishing Species? By Anthony Netboy. Houghton Mifflin Co. 457 pp. $6.95.

A fully documented and delightfully well-written book showing how the Atlantic salmon has become the world's most harried, as well as most valuable, freshwater fish. Mr. Netboy describes the evolution of the species, its life cycle and migrations, and the history of salmon fisheries from earliest recorded times to the present. A condensed version of one of the chapters appeared in The Nation.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

As a writer, Norman Mailer is utterly professional; he commands a powerful language and designs his work to produce the effect he foresees and desires. As a film maker, however, Mailer is persuaded that a deliberate amateurism will better serve his ends. He brings together a small group of friends, assigns them roles that rather well suit their physical appearances, tells them the general idea of the topic he has in mind and sets the project in motion, confident that several hours of vigorous larking can be edited to a feature-length picture of admirable spontaneity. That it won't work should be, but evidently is not, obvious to the professional Mailer.

In Beyond the Law he stipulates that the police misuse the suspects brought by them into the precinct station during the night-hour scourings of the city streets, that police work either attracts the corrupt or corrupts those it attracts, and that everyone involved, quarry and hunters, is thus beyond the law. Since the thesis is not strikingly novel, the picture's success would depend on how it was developed. But Mailer, having no script, develops nothing; he merely iterates. A group of alleged malefactors, ranging from a gambler, through a subway deviate, a self-declared wife killer and a pair of spitting, long-haired motorcycle boys, to a girl who hires out as a sex whipper, are repetitiously threatened, abused and deprived of their rights by a handful of sardonic detectives. Mailer, in the role of Lieutenant Pope, a 1930s tough cop with an Irish propensity for folk wisdom, shoulders his way through the night, orchestrating and controlling the hatred, fraud and violence to which he has dedicated his life.

The film is not oriented; you never know how you got where you are. The individual scenes cannot be assimilated because the cameras work so close as to destroy spatial relationships. And the dialogue is "legible" only in fragments, partly because untrained performers do not speak well, partly because Mailer feels that speech (particularly his own speech) is more important as "make-up" than as communication. The cumulative effect of all this improvisation is to produce in the viewer a sensation of partial anesthesia, as though he had deadened his responses with whisky.

It may be evident at this point why Mailer has abandoned professionalism in his work for the screen. He may well believe that the predictable inadequacies of "spontaneous" creation will simulate the sudden opacities of contemporary society. One cannot hold a reader by mumbling in print (though there was a period when Mailer appeared to be trying it), but an audience is more captive, and can perhaps be persuaded to accept stultification as its dessert.

In addition, Mailer is aware of the underground cinema and must know himself more talented and vigorous than the bulk of that feckless brotherhood. If they can produce a cult out of ineptitude, he should be able to turn it into art. It doesn't work. Beyond the Law is less irritating than dull. The theory that an audience will participate in disavowal is fallacious; it will rather withdraw into its own reveries. An innocent man might suppose that, without talent or training, he could step before a camera and ad-lib a morality play for his contemporaries. But Mailer is not innocent, and it is hard to forgive him for assuming that a competence he has worked so honorably to master in his own art can be had without charge in some other man's art.

Negatives, by a young director, Peter Medak, is as bouncy as a tennis ball, and as hollow. It presumes a psychopathology so elaborate that the picture requires more to be diagnosed than reviewed, but as an entertainment it is enervated by the fact that its characters are presented only in the dimension of their aberrations. Despite the work of three vivid performers, Peter McEnery, Diane Cilento and Glenda Jackson, the effect is bleak, like one of those psychiatric case histories that begins, "C—a male upholsterer, aged 37...."

McEnery and Glenda Jackson get their kicks by pretending that he is Dr. Crippen and she his paramour; they make love only in Victorian drag. Along comes Miss Cilento, a German photographer of dubious gender, who persuades McEnery that he is not Crippen but Baron von Richthofen, ace of the World War I flying circus. The advantage of this new masquerade, from her point of view, is that the baron was a notorious loner and Miss Jackson becomes available.

All this is very slickly photographed in a chichi style, and admirably paced; but the ingredient of plausibility, never great, steadily decreases as the action proceeds. Characters bearing a taint of nuttiness can make wonderfully enticing theatre, but pure nuts are fit only for Madame Tussaud's (where one scene of the picture is incautiously staged, to suggest the comparison).

TELEVISION

LESLIE R. COLITT

Mr. Colitt is Berlin correspondent for the Westinghouse Broadcasting Co. and The Observer (London). His The Other Germany, a study of East Germany, has been published in West Germany.

West Berlin

A week after the invasion of Czechoslovakia, East German television still was unable to show a suitable news clip from its occupied neighbor. As far as its viewers were concerned, it did not have to: 80 per cent of all East Germans followed the Czechoslovak crisis on West German television. Evening after evening, East German TV's star commentator, Karl-Eduard von Schnitzler, appeared before the cameras and spoke of scenes in Prague that his audience had just seen on the West German channel.

The incident illustrated the nature of

The Best Way
To Get

THE
NATION

THE NATION 11-11-68
221 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

his most unusual competition between two television networks. Through West German TV, the people of East Germany are still able to follow developments in the West almost as closely as if they lived there. Apart from a small area east of Dresden, West Germany's Channel 1 can be received throughout East Germany.

It appears odd that with the exception of occasional campaigns to tear down Western-oriented antennae, the East German authorities have never tried to halt this viewing of the Western program. Yet the same regulation applies here as with radio: tuning in the West is not in itself punishable, but telling one's neighbor about the program is very much so. Visiting an apartment house in any East German city, one can hear the West German program reverberating through the prefabricated walls.

East and West German television are similar in their program make-up: politics, sports, culture, light entertainment and children's programs, occupying roughly the same amount of time in each. For the most part, though, that is where similarities end. With its persistent didacticism, East German television resembles its model, Moscow television, on a somewhat more sophisticated level. West Germany's public corporation television is closest to the B.B.C., on which it was patterned. Only the first of the three West German channels can be received in East Germany, but fortunately for the Easterners, it is the best balanced.

A typical day in the battle of the air waves starts at 10 A.M. on the East and West networks. Both open with attractive young women who read the schedule of the day's programs. Time is squandered liberally on both networks. A clock, for example, is flashed on the screen until the sweep hand moves to the full minute when the news begins. In the early 1950s, when East German TV was in its infancy, its newscasters appeared in fatigues. Now, they wear the same overpadded business suits favored in West Germany. North Germans, having approximately neutral accents, are chosen to read the news in both Germanys.

Before noon, the East German station often reruns programs from the previous evening, for the benefit of night-shift workers. One such special, a serialized film about East German peasants during the postwar land reform and subsequent collectivization, was recently awarded a national prize by President Walter Ulbricht, who called it "a genuine experience for millions of viewers." A random sampling of ten East Berliners the next day revealed that not one of them had seen any of the installments.

While this program ran in the East,

West Germany's Channel 1 brought a half-hour of advice for young people on future occupations; the job for that day was flower arranger. The East closed its morning program with a film report from North Vietnam. In the late afternoon, the East resumed transmission with a report on the East Berlin scene, and the West with the news, followed by instruction in Chinese cooking. A program of greetings from children of all the Warsaw Pact countries, with the exception of Czechoslovakia, followed on Eastern TV, the West countering with a half-hour of interior decoration hints—"out with overstuffed furniture." In the East, an august group of professors then assembled for an hour of bandying questions for which the answers were immediately implicit.

Early each evening, East and West German TV roll out the heavy guns, in the form of the "sandman" children's programs. A flurry of channel switching occurs as children watch first the East's "sandman" and then the West's. The unanimous nonpolitical opinion of children in both East and West is that the East's "sandman" is better—perhaps because the Western puppets act out a sugar-coated fairy tale, while the Eastern puppets confront children with more realistic situations from everyday life.

A hush falls over living rooms in both parts of Germany when the commercials come on in the evening. They consist of two twenty-minute blocks of subdued advertising on the two main West German channels. Although the East also has its harmless commercials, it is the rare Easterner who cannot repeat the latest Western cigarette jingle. One Western producer of TV commercials has pointed to the irony that the most intensive viewing of Western commercials is in the East, where people cannot buy the products.

Both networks are very serious in tone, although compared with the pedantry of the East, the West German programs are almost witty. Humor on West German TV is mainly confined to the biting presentations of leading political and literary cabarets; in the East, the rare humor that does slip through is wholly unintentional.

Although East German TV introduced the semi-documentary to Germany, this genre has been developed to perfection in the West. One such re-enactment of recent history this autumn dealt with the flight of the Jews from Denmark to Sweden in 1943. This superb program is typical of the emphasis West German TV puts on dealing with all aspects of the Nazi era. East Germany, too, has its share of anti-Nazi programs, one East German having said wryly that you may think, from the way they recall history, that East Germany must have been the original member of the anti-Hitler coalition.

West German TV has gained a repu-

"THERE'S PURE GOLD IN 'FINIAN'S RAINBOW'! THRILLING SINGING! DELIGHTFUL ACTING! A FILM YOU'LL WANT TO SEE!"
L.L. Press

Finian's Rainbow

TECHNICOLOR® PANAVISION®
WARNER BROS.-SEVEN ARTS
PENTHOUSE
S&S OFFICE OPENS DAILY 10 A.M.-9 P.M. SUNDAY 12 NOON-9 P.M.

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" —LIFE

PARAMOUNT PICTURES presents
A FILM BY
FRANCO ZEFFIRELLI
Produced by
ROMEO & JULIET
No ordinary love story...

THE PARV

5th Avenue & 58th Street - MU 8-2013

TECHNICOLOR® A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

SITUATION WANTED

M.A. RUSSIAN. Male, 26 years old, seeks teaching position on a college level (Sept. 1969). Seweryn Grzeskow, 447 Livingston Ave., Albany, N.Y. 12201.

PERSONALS

SHOW THE WORLD

- You're for peace
and love
- the NOW symbol on a leather thong with beads
 - suits you and your loving friends...
 - pewter or gold finish
 - swift delivery, guaranteed groovy!

$2.00 postpaid
Three for $5.00

PAX, Box 3255
San Francisco, 94119

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/510 and 1,000/575. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94102.

HANDCRAFTED MEDALLIONS—Peace, cross, six others. Stoneware disc on a thong. Free Brochure. Peter Leach, Dept. N, 2295 Dodd Rd., St. Paul, Minn. 55118.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 41 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

WANTED: AUDIENCE OF 100 FOR COFFEE, COGNAC AND CHAMBER MUSIC

Join some of New York's top musicians and artists in an informal setting of mixed media. Three evenings $15.

For information mail to:

LARK QUINTET

160 West 73rd St., N.Y., N.Y. 10023

Name _____

Address _____

City & State _____ Zip _____

tion for "hard-hitting" documentaries, such as "police state visit" which lampooned the Shah of Iran's visit to West Germany (it has been shown on National Educational Television in the United States). Most of the documentaries are decidedly anti-official in content. In capsule form, this in-depth treatment is also given to the weekly "reports" which critically dissect political life in Germany.

In the face of the superiorities of West German TV and the persistent viewing habits of East Germans, television in the East has virtually given up direct competition. East German producers are now reduced to creating programs for their most appreciative viewers—the party elite and themselves.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

As done by the APA at the Lyceum Theatre, Molière's The Misanthrope would make a first-rate radio show. Richard Wilbur's admirably ingenious translation (less sprightly than the original French, which is mostly a matter of the difference in languages) is well spoken by the entire company. It is all quite sensible and easy to take.

But I did not see on the stage any characterization, movement, setting, costume that added anything to the text. In my view, this is hardly theatre at all but recitation, good recitation if you like, but still mainly a kind of reading. And of all Molière's plays The Misanthrope most decidedly needs something more.

One might call this a traditional performance, so frequently hailed with exclamations of gratification in reaction to what may be the excessive liberties sometimes taken by autointoxicated directors to break loose from convention or to display their originality. But it is just such traditionalism that turned Shakespeare moldy in former years (during the la days of the Old Vic, for example) and from which the Comédie Française has only partially rid itself in the playing of Molière. It is essentially illustration, not creation. A text is only the beginning of the theatrical event; it should serve to inspire a new artistic work with its own unique spirit, its own fresh blood, bon and sinew.

Still the APA Misanthrope is no worse than several performances of it I have seen in Paris. But a distinction should be made. Many years ago I saw Lucie Guity (Sacha's father) play Alceste. He was all "wrong": he played the part a a near-tragic figure, ill with resentment at the frivolity and cynicism of the court's upper crust. The critics protested that The Misanthrope is a comedy, intended to provoke laughter. "Laugh, you like," Guity stormed in an interview. "This is how I see Alceste."

I recall the incident now because although I agreed with the critical objections to Guity's performance, I never forgot that Alceste as a portrait and as interpretation, while I have no memory of any other "traditional" one, Guity had converted the play into something of a black comedy with a substance all its own. All the others had been chaff and dress parade.

The DMZ. New York's only political café, moved downtown this fall from the Columbia University neighborhood, to the Village Vanguard in Greenwich Village. It got off there to a shaky start, but has now settled down with its strongest company to date—a white man, a black man, a pretty girl with a dissatisfied mouth and a tousle-haired pianist, who looks as though he had come straight from the demonstration. The old material has been rigorously combed, new turns are added every week or so, the level of projection is now the highest it has been in the thin-ice life of this tenacious venture. R.H.

PUBLICATIONS AND RECORDS

MALVINA REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

You will enjoy . . .
these books	Little Boxes and Other Handmade Songs	$2.50
	The Muse of Parker Street	$2.50
this LP	Malvina Reynolds Sings the Truth	$3.75
	(Columbia 2614 - Stereo 9414)
You and the kids will enjoy . . .
this book	Tweedles and Foodles for Young Noodles	$1.75
these 45 rpm's	You Can't Make a Turtle Come Out	$1.00
	Morningtown Ride	$1.00

(Postage paid; tax included)

Write: Schroder Music Company, 207 Parker Street, Berkeley, Ca. 94704

Crossword Puzzle No. 1271

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 In this puzzle underline the address of a minister here. (7,6)
- 9 But it doesn't offer only cruises for the privileged class. (1-4)
- 10 Stress something other than a superior stock of merchandise? (9)
- 11 The tactic of one who manages to avoid coming to terms? (7)
- 12 Such a law test might be a hanging matter, or else mixed up with a fence. (7)
- 13 Feel happy about what used to be last month? (5)
- 14 Dick's job? (9)
- 16 Choose the part of the book that might be made of leather or hide? (4,5)
- 18 Where one might see the skill of those who can punch? (5)
- 19 Flat-changer, perhaps, though one doesn't pretend to be. (7)
- 21 In a human, a clear method of restraint. (7)
- 22 Our Man in a different environment than Havana might be! (That's one way of putting it!) (9)
- 23 Stress either the literal or physical type. (5)
- 24 Is the red change best for a different spot of Nazidom? (13)

DOWN

- 1 Would it be equivalent to "Hear! Hear!" in the Paris discussions? (6,8)

- 2 A log under the wheels to prevent movement of the little beast? (9)
- 3 Church music might mark the end of contrition, in a way. (7)
- 4 The noise of an animal, or a fish? (5)
- 5 The seacoast? We trade it for the equivalent. (9)
- 6 Not fixed, of course! (7)
- 7 Shaft next to the drawer? (5)
- 8 One doesn't talk to just anybody this way! (6-2-6)
- 14 A ray of evil? (9)
- 15 One might find it candied, hashed, or just pointed. (9)
- 17 The equivalent might sound like a private ear. (7)
- 18 Paradoxically, what Americans might call standing for election in England. (7)
- 20 If the possibility of a hitch occurs, one might find it conveniently on hand. (5)
- 21 Hawthorne's was evidently mossy. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1270

ACROSS: 1 and 7 down Sober as a judge; 4 Devaluate; 9 Retrieval; 10 Awake; 11 Flageolet; 12 Scuba; 13 Sandbagged; 17 Face-saving; 21 Opera; 22 Carriages; 23 Deals; 24 Transpire; 25 Diagnosis; 26 Dates. DOWN: 1 Strife; 2 Betray; 3 Railed; 4 Devil's advocates; 5 Valetudinarians; 6 Leadsman; 8 Emeralds; 14 Afforded; 15 Schemata; 16 Assassin; 18 Missed; 19 Egoist; 20 Aspens.

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1.54. Send for free catalog. Frybate Lecture Notes, Dept. N, 2440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

EXPERIMENTAL COLLEGE attached to major university in New York City, granting B.A., seeks additional faculty starting summer 1968. Demands high level of commitment, energy, and creativity in living-learning situation. Write to Bensalem College, 558 East 191st Street, Bronx, N.Y. 10458.

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, nonviolence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

ART

NOUS SOMMES

TOUS INDESIRABLES

Remember Paris Last May?

Six super reprints of Student Posters —23" x 29". Post paid and insured to you from Mur Graphique, 275 Bleeker Street, N.Y., N.Y. 10014. $11 does it.

XMAS CARDS AND DIARIES

To Help Achieve Peace . . .

12 cards, beautiful designs by Refriger . . . $2.50
Daily App't. Diary—With Anti-War
Paintings by—Klee, Rouault, Daumier,
Rembrandt, Goya. . . 132 pp., $2.50
Ideal Gifts—(5 for $12)—Check/M.O.
SANE, 381 Park Ave., So., N.Y. 10016

WORKER WANTED

EDITOR WANTED by national liberal organization for new 20-page monthly tabloid on political and social issues. Nationally known contributing editors. Editorial office Washington, DC. Age, sex not important. Copy-editing, lay-out and make-up experience required. Write Box #617, c/o The Nation, stating qualifications and salary requirement.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of GEORGE FLYNN (Villiers of London—$2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." —James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at: 145 West 12 Street, New York City 10011.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$.742 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ Count me in the good fight for a new one-year (48 issues) subscription at $10, and send me also the new $2.95, 400-page The People's President for only $1 more. I enclose $11.
- ☐ I'll subscribe for one year (48 issues) plus four free bonus issues. I enclose $10.
- ☐ I'll subscribe for six months. Here's $6. N 11-11

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Subscribe to THE NATION now, and get THE PEOPLE'S PRESIDENT
for only $1 more.

Estes Kefauver said it in 1961: "Every four years the Electoral College is a game of Russian roulette. Once its antiquated procedures trigger a loaded cylinder, it may be too late." Again and again, The Nation has warned of the ancient system's dire dangers.

Can this 18th century antique be "modernized"? Or shouldn't it be junked for direct voting by the people? Neal R. Peirce, of the Congressional Quarterly, covers a hundred such questions in lively detail in his milestone new book, The People's President.

Want to rescue the White House from the System and give it to the people? Join the Good Fight now with a one-year new subscription to The Nation, and get this not-to-be-missed book for only $1 more.

UNSAFE IN ANY ELECTION YEAR!

Why after '68 we can't risk the 1787-model Electoral College design for disaster.

Now yours for
only $1.00
with a new one-year subscription to
NATION

a Citizen Book

The People's President

The Electoral College in American history and the direct-vote alternative
Neal R. Peirce
foreword by Tom Wicker

BURLINGAME
NOV 16 1968
THE
LIBRARY

OCEAN HILL-BROWNSVILLE KENNETH G. GROSS

NATION

NOVEMBER 18, 1968 35 Cents

BURLINGAME
NOV 16 1968
LIBRARY

ELECTION MOSAIC

Reports from the Great Centers

JOHN T. DEMPSEY

PHIL KERBY

GENE I. MAEROFF

SYLVAN MEYER

JEROME L. WILSON

Highway Program

PORK in BIG BARRELS

A. Q. MOWBRAY

ROBERT SKLAR on Richard Hofstadter

MAX BYRD on Evergreen Review Reader

Old Age Homes MURRAY POLNER

5-69R PL-5337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LETTERS

haves or dawks?

Northridge, Calif.

DEAR SIR: How can we continue to cling to faith in the democratic political process when men like Sen. Edward Kennedy, Michael Harrington and the UAW's Paul Schrade support Humphrey knowing that in September of this year both Humphrey and Nixon supported the largest armament budget in history . . . when Lippmann and Lindsay (co-chairman of the Urban Coalition) support Nixon; when the only discernible purpose and result of the recent New Coalition Conference in Minneapolis was castration of any effective political opposition to the warfare state in this election.

Are these hawk-supporting doves free and responsible men? Are they brave once again that liberals are incapable of creating a politics of truth, peace and sanity?

Nicholas V. Seidita

roots of racism

New York City

DEAR SIR: I do not think that B. J. Widick quite got to the heart of the Wallace wave among industrial workers ("Why They Like Wallace," The Nation, Oct. 14). It is not racism "pure and simple" that is involved but racism within a specific historic context which is not simple.

During the New York school integration crisis of 1964, I was startled to hear more than one liberal middle-class parent, engaged in battle against integration plans pressed by militant blacks, give passionate expression to an intent to support Barry Goldwater. Two decades earlier, when the Communists attempted to preserve some war-created jobs for Negroes by introducing the concept of super-seniority, even "Left" unions were torn by hysterical dis-sension and the concept quickly died.

The point is that the pervasive historic deprivation—economic, social, cultural and psychological—of 20 million blacks cannot be redeemed in today's highly organized and relatively inflexible order without large-scale sacrifices by the entrenched white majority, and no entrenched group ever makes such sacrifices voluntarily. . . .

If organized industrial workers feel themselves most threatened, it is probably because they have "made it" relatively recently. They see the disorders, riots, threats of revolution as directed against their new found status and economic equality, won largely through the unions. The struggle of the Negro for economic equality brings him into conflict with the job security features which are the most precious attainment of American unionism, but which now serve as an obstacle to the resolution of black oppression.

The current New York school crisis is a complex reflection of this national conflict. It is a matter of massive record that the ghetto schools have not been educating the children. It is irrelevant that white, middle-class teachers have been personally blameless. . . . What is relevant is that in the name of job security, academic freedom and justice for teachers, the union is blocking possible approaches for improving the situation through control by the black communities of the education of their own children. I do not know how many teachers will turn to Wallace, but I have observed emotions which seemed very close to those of white liberal parents who vowed to back Goldwater.

The tragedy is that in the spiraling intensification of the conflict between the entrenched white workers and the aroused, oppressed blacks, both are threatened with engulfment by a reactionary wave which can swell to fascism.

Max Gordon

EDITORIALS

Campaign '68

If there is to be any dancing in the streets, it will be because this wretched campaign is finally behind us; no one has had a kind word to say for it. As a British journalist put it, the people were offered the choice between a clown with a tragic face, a marionette and a Southern primitive out of the pages of William Faulkner. Not one memorable speech was made; the talk, of remarkably low quality, centered on "dead visions, dead purposes and dead politics." Yet this latest Presidential election, like so many in the past, produced an interest disproportionate to its personnel and content. The American people have a remarkable capacity to minimize political disaster. With the miserable hand they were dealt in this campaign, they did surprisingly well.

Campaign '68 may not have yielded a single noble speech, but it did produce a hero. Senator Eugene McCarthy's decision to offer a challenge to President Johnson within the Democratic Party changed the landscape of the campaign. Once he had provided a point of resistance, voters in the key primary elections proceeded to demonstrate that—as everyone but the "old pros" of both parties had known for some time—there was a large and growing opposition to the war and a sharp rejection of the President's leadership. The chorus of opposition which Senator McCarthy evoked, more than any single factor, prompted the President to withdraw and seek a negotiated settlement. Historians of Campaign '68 will certainly record McCarthy's candidacy as one of the most extraordinary demonstrations in our political experience of what can be accomplished despite the limitations of the old politics by even a casual candidate with a largely amateur following, if he has possession of a great issue.

But there is more to Campaign '68 than the McCarthy rebellion. The pundits are now telling us that a "swing to the Right" has taken place in American politics. It may be so, but the returns do not show it. The primary elections dramatized the magnitude and intensity of popular opposition to the war. Offered a "choice" of Nixon, Humphrey and Wallace, despite a clearly indicated preference for other candidates, a minority of the electorate concluded that the best way to effect a change was to vote for Nixon. A large part—perhaps the largest part—of Nixon's vote was a vote against Johnson. If the Nixon vote had been restricted to his personal following, he would have been soundly defeated.

Actually the situation was "structured" for the Republicans to take the Congress as well as the Presidency. If Rockefeller had been nominated, the Republicans would have made a sweep of it. But, as the returns show, Nixon had no coattails. What he did was to minimize opposition to the Johnson Administration. Among the active Democratic contenders, only Humphrey could have lost to Nixon, just as only Nixon, among the Republicans, could have failed to lead a landslide. True, if one adds the Wallace vote to the Nixon vote it is possible to hypothesize some swing to the Right; but a large part of the Wallace vote was itself a protest, nor would all of it have gone to Nixon if Wallace had not been a candidate. The main point, in any case, is that it is unreasonable to assume a swing to the Right in an election in which there was no Left. The public was given a "choice" of candidates all of whom were essentially conservative in terms of today's needs and problems. Mr. Humphrey offered no brave new programs. He did not seriously address himself to the new issues; what he offered were, at best, warmed-over New Deal and Great Society measures, with only a hint or two of some possible modification of cold-war policies.

To confront voters with the worst political choice of the century and then interpret the results as a swing to the Right is to overlook the fact that the Congressional and Senatorial returns cannot be read in that way. If President Johnson had been renominated, it is fair to assume that he would have pulled many Democratic nominees down to defeat. As it was, some Democratic nominees—Senators Church and McGovern to name two—won in large part because they were known to have opposed the President on the war.

Senator Nelson, a dove, won re-election from Wisconsin—which went for Nixon and re-elected a Republican governor. Governor Hughes was elected to the Senate from Iowa, which voted for Nixon. Arkansas went for Wallace but re-elected Senator Fulbright and Gov. Winthrop Rockefeller. And so it went.

Senator Gruening lost not because of his stand on Vietnam but because (unfairly but understandably) of his age—81. Senator Clark lost in Pennsylvania not because his general record was rejected but because he had, inadvertently or perhaps indiscreetly, offended Italian-Americans and had been an advocate of strong gun-control legislation. If Senator Morse loses, it will not be because of his stand on issues but for other reasons (see The Nation, May 27, p. 687). Senator Monroney has been a better-than-average Senator, but he is certainly no dove.

Nelson, Fulbright, Church, McGovern and Ribicoff came through in fine style and so did Birch Bayh—in a state that went for Nixon. In California, Alan Cranston defeated Max Rafferty; in Maryland, Charles McC. Mathias, a Republican dove, defeated Senator Brewster; Thomas F. Eagleton won in Missouri; and, as expected, Senator Javits registered another personal triumph. Both Gilligan, in Ohio, and Clark, in Illinois, ran remarkably strong races.

That the Democrats did as well as they did in the House indicates that voters were not seeking an opening to the Right. And the election of such candidates in New York as Mrs. Shirley Chisholm, the first Negro woman to serve in the House, Allard Lowenstein, who had much to do with the original "Dump Johnson" movement, and Edward Koch points to the same conclusion.

The fact is that Nixon—always the "loser" even when he wins—lost votes steadily from about the middle of September down to the moment the polls closed. The size of the Humphrey vote reflects not so much a preference for the "lesser evil" as a strong protest against the greater. The more "exposure" Nixon obtained, the more votes he lost. Something about this strange man conveys an im-

IN THIS ISSUE

November 18, 1968

EDITORIALS

514

ARTICLES

Election Mosaic:

518 New York City

519 Los Angeles

519 Gainesville, Ga.

520 Dearborn, Mich.

521 Cleveland

522 Ocean Hill-Brownsville:

Bad Show for Reporters

525 Israel: The Stagnation of War

529 Highway Program:
Pork in Big Barrels

Jerome L. Wilson

Phil Kerby

Sylvan Meyer

John T. Dempsey

Gene I. Maeroff

Kenneth G. Gross

C. W. Gonick

A. Q. Mowbray

BOOKS & THE ARTS

533 Historians:

Simple-Minded and Complex

534 Civilized Excursions

535 Here Is Grove's Plenty

536 Passage (poem)

537 The Passionate Eighties

538 Elizabeth Bowen Country

538 Good Money After

Bad (poem)

539 Nation Book Marks

540 Art

541 Music

543 Crossword Puzzle

Robert Sklar

Alan Trachtenberg

Max Byrd

Robert Dana

Murray Polner

Robert K. Morris

William Heyen

Sara Blackburn

Lawrence Alloway

David Hamilton

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor

CAROL McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Associate Publisher

GUYARD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor

HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHKE; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8480. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90048. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information in Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 17

pression of almost total insincerity and bottomless personal insecurity. Vice President Humphrey tried hard (one must admire his spunk, verve and high spirits) to make the fitness of Nixon—and Agnew—the dominant issue. The size of his vote demonstrates that he was succeeding, but he ran out of time. More important, perhaps, the “anti-Johnson” feeling was too strong and too pervasive.

The question now is: what approach will Nixon take to the difficult political problems he will face on assuming office? He could, of course, attempt to reconstitute the old Dixiecrat-Republican coalition, but this is not a promising course of action, except perhaps on selected issues. Sen. Strom Thurmond is not a great figure among the Dixiecrats. Most of the Southern Democrats have an acute sense of political realities; they know that they must yield to Negro demands without appearing to, and as slowly as possible. Texas, with a splendid accumulation of Johnson-bestowed defense goodies and federal projects, has shown a firm if quiet determination not to permit the Wallace movement to jeopardize these benefits. Other Southern states are beginning to exhibit a similar political sophistication. Nor are the Dixiecrats willing to forfeit their seniority by following Thurmond into the Republican Party.

A more likely strategy for Nixon would be to work through the liberal Republicans in the House and Senate, knowing that the liberal Democrats will support them on a great many issues. In general, that is what President Eisenhower did; it is the best course for a Republican President who must live with a Democratic Congress, and who must look ahead, first to the 1970 Congressional election and beyond that to Campaign '72. Nixon is astute enough to realize that his best hope is to tap the resources of talent and leadership, of political and financial support, to be found in the liberal-moderate wing of the GOP, particularly if he plans, as he must, to make a better showing next time in the big industrial states of the East. Governor Reagan, who tried the opposite approach of cultivating the party's right wing, is now confronted with the prospect of decapitation by Jesse Unruh in 1970.

With his own political survival at stake, Nixon will be forced to pay close attention to the demands of urban Negroes who, in this election, demonstrated once again their power in the big cities in the key states. The President-elect can read the Wall Street returns on peace and Vietnam easily, and as accurately, as the next man; he knows that “the Street” wants the war terminated, now. He knows that there is little enthusiasm in that quarter for further “limited” wars. Also, the circumstances confronting the country dictate a somewhat more cautious, less aggressive foreign policy, with some curtailment of overseas bases and commitments and less emphasis on counterrevolutionary capers. The real danger with Nixon arises, first, from the fact that he will be a noisy advocate of bigger arms spending—for which, unfortunately, there is support in “the Street”—and, second, because he will not push for disarmament or arms control.

On balance, it was better that Nixon should win than that the election should have been thrown into the House. If that had happened, it might have gravely complicated the Paris negotiations. He will be forced to deal with a Democratic Congress that has lost little strength and has an experienced leadership. This leadership, notably in the Senate, has begun to recapture some of the legislators' prerogatives in the field of foreign policy. From this Congress it is doubtful that Mr. Nixon will get many “joint resolutions,” Gulf of Tonkin style. He enters the White House bearing a credibility gap as great as that which President Johnson fashioned for himself over the years in office. From the day he takes office, Mr. Nixon will be looking over his shoulder at Sen. Edward Kennedy and forward to 1972.

The new President will be warily watched by a press which knows him well and with which his relations have never been cordial. There is something to be said also for the view that it is time the American people outgrew their enthusiasm for messianic leadership in the White House. While some Presidents are greater leaders than others, they are all human beings and should be regarded as such; we can dispense with “father images” and glamorous young charismatic types. This time there will be no initial illusions; we shall be spared the honeymoon. If Mr. Nixon becomes acceptable to the public at large, it will be after he demonstrates that he is worthy of the trust that a minority has placed in him. Today, he is widely known and widely distrusted. In effect he is another “accidental” President. The people should realize that this time they have been put on notice in advance; it is their responsibility to watch this man. On his record, Mr. Nixon is entitled only to the support he earns; he takes office with no reserves of confidence.

In the meantime, prospects for renovation and renewal in the Democratic Party should show improvement. A good start was made in the rule changes adopted in Chicago. New Politics elements have strengthened their position within the party in Wisconsin, Michigan, California, New York, Illinois, Ohio, Colorado, Texas and other states. Negroes today constitute perhaps the largest single element within the party and are gaining additional leverage through the rise of “new” Democratic parties in Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi.

In the big urban centers, the power of the city bosses has been undercut. The combined specters of Nixon and Wallace forced certain elements to coalesce behind the old machines in this election, so that they appear to be as sturdy as ever. But that is a surface illusion. As expected, Daley was able to get what the machine needed in Cook County, but his hold on the party in Illinois has been weakened. In Philadelphia, ward leaders were reduced to such stratagems as applying pressure on those for whom traffic tickets had been fixed to get them to the polls. Meany's dominance of the AFL-CIO is weakening, and now that the election is over Reuther can step up the competition for leadership.

In an odd way, Nixon's election may help the new Democratic leaders. It will give them a mandate to renew and revitalize the Democratic Party. Of course a harsh struggle will take place for party control, but on balance circumstances favor the ultimate success of those who are out to refashion the Democratic Party. The old coalitions are breaking up, new coalitions and alignments are reforming, and above all, new issues are emerging.

Message to the Intelligentsia

In the 1964 election, Lyndon B. Johnson received the overwhelming support of intellectuals. While he was hardly their beau ideal, he was running against Barry Goldwater. When the Vietnamese War took a course that owed they could hardly have done worse with Goldwater, the intellectuals defected, at first in a stream and then in a flood. Some of those who departed had been key figures in the Kennedy administration; personally, Mr. Johnson was no doubt glad to see them go. But he was not oblivious to the fact that widespread antagonism among thoughtful citizens can be unhealthy for any President, however secure at the outset his reputation may appear.

A particular problem arose in connection with the White House overseer of intellectuals, Dr. Eric Goldman. Even if he had been in wholehearted support of the war, Goldman could not have withstood the opposition to it on college campuses and in the liberal press. Mr. Johnson, however, did not make allowances. In an effort to narrow the breach and improve Dr. Goldman's performance, Mr. Johnson appointed three assistant intellectuals, but to no avail. Then the President, with the aid of Mrs. Johnson, resorted to the White House Festival of the American Arts, where unfortunately the spotlight was seized by certain invited intellectuals who used the occasion to speak it against the war. Shortly thereafter, in August, 1965, Goldman resigned, blaming both the President and the intellectuals for what he termed "a tragic estrangement." He was rewarded with a White House statement that he had never worked anything like a full-time schedule.

At this juncture, Vice President Humphrey induced the President to appoint as Goldman's successor John P. Roche, chairman of the department of politics at Brandeis University and former chairman of ADA. Instead of trying a soft sell, Roche proceeded to berate the customers. "Who are these alienated intellectuals?" he asked. "Mainly the New York artsy-craftsy set. . . . A small body of people who live in affluent alienation on Cape Cod and are off salvos against the vulgarity of the masses. . . ." In March, 1968, conducting a press conference at the UN "at the suggestion of Washington," Roche compared Johnson's critics with the intelligentsia of 19th-century Russia—"a self-defined, self-anointed, self-appointed cultural elite which has taken unto itself the job of protecting the society from various and sundry problems. . . ." This approach was even less successful than the White House strategy during Goldman's ill-starred period of service.

At one time the President tried inviting a group of government-employed intellectuals to lunch, but instead of listening for their views he spent most of the time hectoring them, with predictably dismal effects. Later, however, it seemed that a successful formula had at last been worked out. Eric Sevareid turned up an anti-intellectual intellectual who greatly admired Mr. Johnson and might perhaps be able to make the pro-intellectual intellectuals see the light. The new paragon was Eric Hoffer, the ex-New Yorker who had made a career out of cultivating middle-brow distaste for the intellectual community. Johnson and Hoffer hit it off perfectly. The White House press aide conceded that Mr. Johnson had not read any of Hoffer's books, but it turned out that Roche had long admired both the author and his works. It helped, also, that Hoffer regarded John F. Kennedy as having been essentially a European. "All you have to do," he told Mr. Johnson, "is tabulate how many times Kennedy crossed the Atlantic and how many times he crossed the Appalachians, and you know where he belonged."

Eventually Roche left the White House service and wrote an article for The New Leader (October 21) entitled "Can a Free Society Fight a Limited War?" The text leaves one in doubt as to whether Roche is more sorry for himself or for Mr. Johnson. "I have watched," he writes, "impotent and heartsick, while the War has eroded the position of the Johnson Administration." He describes himself as "an old-fashioned liberal cold warrior"; with others who share his views he stands appalled "by the fact that a great President, Lyndon Johnson, has gone into political limbo because of his indomitable commitment to a sound but unpopular policy, flexible response and limited war." The alternatives, as Roche views the future, are isolationism and "its identical twin, nuclear deterrence."

It is a safe prediction that, back on the Brandeis campus and writing for King Features Syndicate, Roche will have no more success in healing the breach between Johnson and the intellectual community than he had during his term as the White House intellectual-in-residence. And soon it will not matter.

Carolina Law 'n' Order

A few days after the assassination of Martin Luther King, five Negro boys, aged 16 to 20, set fire to a Ku Klux Klan hut in Benson, N.C. They were caught and pleaded guilty to arson. The only witness for the state, a police agent, testified that the damage to the building was not great. The attorney for the boys pleaded for leniency, on the ground that they were emotionally upset at the time. But Superior Court Judge William Y. Bickett declared that "the courts must stop people from damaging other people's property" and sentenced each of the five to twelve years at hard labor.

In North Carolina the Klan is legally chartered by the Secretary of State.

'WHERE'S MY NATION?'

During October, the mail distribution of The Nation was most unsatisfactory, and the publisher apologizes for the irritation caused by the delays. The trouble occurred because our mailing house was bought, oddly enough, by American Can (see "Conglomerates," The Nation, October 28), and announced between one issue and the next that it would no longer handle our work. In this emergency, we had to make overnight arrangements in the neighborhood of Milford, Conn., where the magazine is printed, and the firm available at the moment proved inadequate. We have now made other arrangements and believe the emergency is over.

The Publisher

ELECTION MOSAIC

Reports from the Great Centers

JEROME L. WILSON

New York City

Mr. Wilson covers Albany as a legislative correspondent for WCBS-TV.

NEW JERSEY. Sixteen months ago twenty persons were killed in the Newark riots. The black Central Ward was the setting, and quite literally the white North Ward had the front-row seats. In this election these two bordering wards in Newark were figuratively miles apart.

In many ways New Jersey really told the national election story in the tri-state area that pivots on New York City. Even though George Wallace got a low 9 per cent of the Jersey vote, it was enough to swing the state to Richard Nixon, a pattern followed in other industrial states in the nation. And it wasn't the chicken farmers of downstate Jersey who supplied that Wallace vote. It came from traditionally Democratic Hudson County. It came from the North Ward of Newark.

In addition to reflecting the impact of Wallace, New Jersey showed graphically the electoral division between black and white. In key districts, selected by WCBS-TV News, a backlash vote surfaced in Newark's North Ward. The ward is mostly Italian American and usually votes overwhelmingly Democratic; but this time George Wallace took 18 per cent of the vote, Nixon 35 per cent. And only a few blocks away, sample precincts in the black Central Ward reported 87 per cent for Humphrey, 12 per cent for Nixon, nothing for Wallace.

NEW YORK. Humphrey needed the state if he was to make ■ real run for the Presidency, and the fact that it voted so strongly Democratic is a credit to the "forgive and forget" attitude of those peace Democrats who won the state's June primary. There were a couple of other Democratic dove victories in New York, although the big one, the Senate candidacy of Paul O'Dwyer, went down. The peace triumphs were Allard Lowenstein's exciting race for Congress in Nassau County, and to ■ lesser degree Edward Koch's Congressional victory in Manhattan. Lowenstein, who has a demonstrated gift for organizing dissenting forces in the country, could play a major role in restructuring the Democratic Party during its years out of power.

New York also saw the erosion of moderate Republicanism in this election despite the re-election of Jacob Javits. Conservative Senate candidate James Buckley tallied more than 1 million votes. If the Democrats offer ■ strong candidate for governor in 1970, as they are expected to do for ■ change, the GOP will be tempted to turn to the Conservatives for a co-endorsement. The Conservatives will demand in exchange that the state Republican Party should return to conservative principles and nominate conservative Republican candidates. Nelson Rockefeller's idealism and his bankroll have kept the Republican Party relatively pure until now. But if Rockefeller goes to Washington, or retires, the Conservatism will begin to tell Republicans how to be Republicans.

The Democratic loss of the state Assembly in Albany is a story touched with irony. For years, the Republicans controlled the state legislature by means of a constitutional gerrymander that favored upstate rural districts. The Democrats protested and protested through the late years, until finally the courts threw out the unfair apportionment formula, and with the aid of the Johnson landslide the Democrats took control of both Houses in 1964. They soon lost the Senate, but kept the lower House. Now they have lost that too, and have no one to blame but themselves and the electorate.

The new Republican-controlled Assembly will probably choose Suffolk lobster wholesaler Perry Duryea to be the next Speaker. Duryea made a crusade out of cutting back the Governor's Medicaid program at the last session and because of the conservative character of the legislature won more extensive cuts than even the Governor was prepared for. As for former Speaker Anthony Travia, he made it just in time to the federal court bench. His district in the Assembly was carried by Vito Battista, formerly of the United Taxpayers Party, who ran as a Republican. Rosemary Gunning, founding member of the anti-school-busing PAT, also won election to the Assembly.

CONNECTICUT. The smallest of the three states in a metropolitan area is by tradition part of New England but it proved that it is now in the Democratic Pantheon. George Wallace got a puny 6 per cent of the vote, and Humphrey totals and the Ribicoff re-election reflected the state's preponderant Democratic registration.

All three states—New York, New Jersey and Connecticut—returned Democratic Congressional delegations. Congress, which is a tribute to the late surge of Hubert H. Humphrey and to the firm positions many of these Democratic incumbents have gained for themselves in heavily Republican districts.

Whether in Newark, Harlem—or for that matter, Atlanta, Ga.—the black communities supported Mr. Humphrey. To a far lesser extent, if Wallace did forge a national movement, and that is debatable, his vote came from low- to middle-income whites. By and large, the peace vote came out for Humphrey, both in the East and across the nation.

The most disturbing factor is the suggestion that votes are separated by race, rather than by economics or, indeed, ideology. It is one thing when pressures in an electorate are formed by economic jealousies or aspirations; it is another when they derive from prejudice.

In this campaign the President-elect and his running mate saw fit to avoid personal campaigning in the New York districts of the area. Not that they lacked a genuine for the Negro vote, or for future black cooperation with their government. Still, one must assume that the strategists around Nixon judged that a campaign in Harlem would lose him votes in other parts of the country, even in the white communities next door. In this respect, the Nixon campaign hardly contributed to its stated objective of unifying the nation.

HIL KERBY

Los Angeles

Democratic leaders in California consoled themselves Wednesday with the thought that the party's defeat could have been much worse. At the same time, they expressed amazement that Richard Nixon did not win nationally by a far larger margin. They are convinced that Rockefeller could have beaten Humphrey easily. One said, "only Nixon had a chance to lose to Humphrey."

They give Nixon credit for helping to unify the Democratic Party—to the extent that it was unified in the last weeks of the election. But even those who most strenuously opposed Humphrey's nomination grant that he conducted a formidable campaign. One said, "Humphrey took Johnson's defeat by proxy."

In California, the Republicans took over the state legislature for the first time in a decade, but by the narrowness of margins. But they lost Senator Kuchel's seat to Bill Cranston, who beat Max Rafferty by a comfortable 10,000 votes. Unruh is now out as Speaker, but may become a leader in realigning party factions. The Democrats will probably keep their 21-to-17 edge in the California delegation to the House of Representatives. George Wallace got only 7 per cent of the vote, and on the Left, the Peace and Freedom Party was a nullity.

It was the war and its train of domestic ills that fought Humphrey-Johnson down. Political leaders here expressed astonishment that Humphrey came as close as he did after the debacle of the Chicago convention, which reverberated in the minds of millions all that was wrong in the country.

"I can't explain what they will be, but I have a gut feeling that big changes are coming in politics," former Gov. Earl Warren said. Masses of people are alienated. They want the political parties to respond more quickly to their problems. Brown suggested that McCarthy or Ted Kennedy may become the leaders of the New Politics.

Whatever form the New Politics will take, Democratic leaders here believe the changes will be largely inside the Democratic Party. They don't see a new party arising on the Left, and they think Wallace will be confined to the Deep South, although they don't discount his future influence elsewhere.

Democrats here think the war is nearing an end. They are resigned to Nixon's election before he was elected. At the next day they wondered: can he reconcile the peoples? One highly placed Democrat said, "The tragedy of this election is that the blacks, the people who had the biggest stake in a Humphrey victory, lost." They have bet the rich win again.

An aide to Alan Cranston said: "Maybe TV is the most revolutionary factor in politics now. TV is forcing a confrontation between hostile groups. Whites can no longer escape merely by moving to the suburbs. That black man on the screen is talking to you, man. The war is going on right in your living room."

One Republican said Nixon will be the last of the old-style politicians to be elected President. "The people are bored with the politics of evasion. Students on the campus are in deadly earnest. They are going to demand something better."

SYLVAN MEYER

Gainesville, Ga.

Mr. Meyer is editor of The Daily Times, Gainesville, Ga.

Richard Nixon played the South more cannily than either his supporters or opponents elsewhere figured he would—what with that Greek feller and refusing to debate and all. Since Mr. Nixon and staff can analyze election returns as well as the next politician, they must have relaxed when key border states—Kentucky, Virginia, Tennessee, Florida and North Carolina—failed to go for George Wallace. It mattered not to Mr. Nixon whether Wallace or Hubert Humphrey carried these states; if he didn't get them, he could not swing a majority of electoral votes. With them, he could afford to lose two out of three of the races in Texas, Illinois and California, and still struggle over the 270 mark.

Wetzel

Indeed, Tennessee and the Carolinas were bonuses for him. Florida and Virginia, if they had fallen, would have represented the intolerable degree of Wallace invasion into Nixon territory.

Wallace made his big splash where he always splashes big, in the Deep South: Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia. The ripples diminished as they moved outward, but it would be a mistake to assume that what Wallace represented to the voter was similarly confined. Lumping together the Wallace and Nixon vote gives a better definition of voter attitudes, and outside of Texas, which Humphrey carried narrowly, the combination in the South runs from 2 to 1 up to 4 to 1 against Humphrey, the Johnson Administration, the unrelenting pressure for social change, the fumbling around in Vietnam, and softness on the Pueblo incident.

The decisive issues were the national ones; local Democrats generally won. LeRoy Collins' defeat in Florida and the failure of two liberal Georgia Congressmen, Charles Weltner and James Mackay, to unseat GOP opponents, were among the exceptions, but in these instances the losers suffered from identification with liberal causes, with "all them programs." Wallace is considered a sort of Democrat, anyway, in the Deep South. In the border areas, Nixon attracted support from him because voters "didn't want to throw their vote away," but still wanted to protest.

Mr. Nixon's campaign sustained for him a favorable mixture of anti-Humphrey ballots, but his administration can hardly escape the same activities that got the Democrats into trouble down South. The whole area knows there is no going backward, but it is eager for a recess. It objects to overcompensatory federal treatment of Negroes. Although it is the major beneficiary of federal largess through such new programs as economic development, Appalachia, educational-facilities grants and the rest, the South is weary of these complex, fearsomely bureaucratic ventures, fraught with civil rights pledges, bribe money and tedious regulations. It wants to say, "Just send the money, friend, and leave us be."

Mr. Nixon promised that school aid will not be tied to Health, Education and Welfare guidelines, but he must confront the national social revolution with just about the same tactics as the Democrats used. Did not Eisenhower send troops to Little Rock? Nixon may alter the methods, but any administration ignores poverty, ghettos and stagnant economic areas at its peril. By avoiding debate, Mr. Nixon avoided affronting the South on these sensitive issues, but they remain and will grow.

What Ralph McGill calls "lawn order" mightily affected the vote. The street disorders have been elsewhere but they scare Southerners. Much of the progress toward racial readjustments in the South has come because people here preferred to yield rather than suffer chaos in their communities. With the potential for violence in the South, which every Southerner senses in his viscera, the yearning for order is strong enough to outweigh other impulses, even those for the regional ideology. The more a Nixon administration tries to ease the leverage for genuine integration, the more it risks activist aggression in the street. There is no way it can satisfy the South. In the Congress Mr. Nixon may be able to patch together a shadow of the old Republican-conservative Southerner coalition. It faces immediate abrasions, however. Sen. Richard Russell of Georgia will be chairman of Appropriations, and President pro tem of the Senate. The House may have a new Speaker and a new Majority Leader, and Southerners a likely prospects for both posts. Party solidarity will become more critical to their purposes than a scotch-tap alliance with a President who, when you get right down to it, doesn't owe them a thing. Indeed, Southern Congressmen may win more points through tough-minded opposition than through acquiescence with the administration.

And Mr. Wallace will be around for a while, well-financed, eager to harangue, and to point to his 9 million votes. Perhaps he is not destined for national office; nevertheless, he is the central national rallying point for the radical Right, he is the irascible challenger of the Establishment. He will continue to draw funds and support, and to be a giant nuisance to a President hungry for unanimity but with no currency to buy any. Of course, a lot of sub issues were at play in the election. And of course the South had come a long way only to confront Mr. Humphrey at a bad time for him, on the heels of that disastrous and insulting convention. Still and all, Mr. Nixon may secretly wish, before the next four years are over, that Virginia and Florida had gone the other way.

JOHN T. DEMPSEY

Mr. Dempsey is professor of political science at the University of Michigan (Dearborn), and co-chairman of the state Civil Rights Commission.

Dearborn, Mich.

The big story in the Michigan election was the strong resurgence of the Democratic Party within the state. Democrats swept all state-wide offices which were at stake, captured control of the state House of Representatives, fought off the challenge of George Wallace, and gave lie to the oft-repeated charges that they are a "divided and demoralized" party. All signs indicate that the Republican Party is in trouble, and that its trouble will increase.

Michigan was never thought to be Nixon country; five years ago Johnson swept the state by more than a million votes; eight years ago Kennedy took it by about 65,000 over Nixon. At Miami, most of Michigan's Republican delegates stayed with George Romney as their favorite, although the majority would have supported Nelson Rockefeller if Romney had released them. State Republicans realized that Nixon would not carry the state, a few anticipated just how depressing an effect his narrow win would have on the slate as a whole. Put simply, Nixon was a minor disaster for the Michigan GOP. Democrats now control the state supreme court and one house of the legislature, and are in a strong position for the gubernatorial and Senatorial elections of 1970.

George Romney worked hard for the Nixon ticket. In past elections, when the Governor was himself running or office, he has had modest success in carrying other Republicans into office with him. His efforts in 1968 were of no avail. It is generally felt here that Romney has bought his last campaign. The odds are that he will be offered a place in the Nixon administration, and that he will accept. This will remove the best vote getter that Republicans in Michigan have had for many years. Romney's successor, if he does leave, will be the present Lt. Gov. William Milliken, from Traverse City. Milliken is young (45) and attractive, but his vote-getting capacity is untested. He is in the liberal Republican wing, and was Rockefeller's Michigan campaign chairman last summer.

Jones, Toronto Telegram (Canada)

The Wallace vote in Michigan fell short of expectations. His people had hoped for 20 per cent, had expected 15; the actual vote was about 10 per cent. Even in Dearborn, proclaimed by its flamboyant, segregationist Mayor Orville Hubbard to be "Wallace Country," only about one voter in ten went for Wallace. A quarter of the Wallace vote came from Wayne County (Detroit and suburbs), the rest was widely scattered throughout the state. It would seem that Wallace drew more heavily from Nixon than from Humphrey, but not enough to affect the outcome. The black voters of Michigan, some 300,000, supported Humphrey overwhelmingly (about 90 per cent). Eldridge Cleaver pulled only about 4,000 votes.

A few weeks ago it had been expected that Wallace would attract a significant union vote. One local in Flint went even so far as to endorse the Alabama Governor. But then organized labor turned on the heat. For the past month the union leadership has used every conceivable means to combat the appeal of the gentleman from Dixie. Evidently the effort was successful, and in the process labor proved that its effectiveness in elections is still strong. Much of the credit for the Democratic victory must go to the unions. The result can only be to increase labor's influence in the Democratic Party of Michigan—and in the past twenty years it has been the strongest single force within that party.

The divided control of Michigan government can be expected to produce some donnybrooks in the two years ahead. The executive office is firmly in Republican hands, Democrats have a four vote margin in the House, while Republicans control the Senate narrowly (20 to 18). Both parties will be jockeying for position while getting ready for 1970, which in Michigan will be more important than the elections just held. The state will be choosing a governor for a four-year term, a United States Senator (Philip Hart, the two-term incumbent, is expected to run), nineteen Congressmen, both houses of the state legislature, and many other state-wide officials. Michigan's Democratic Party demonstrated this year that it could bounce back strongly from the bitter defeat of two years ago, when it lost a U.S. Senate seat and five Congressional seats. The question now is whether the Republicans can similarly recover. The answer will probably depend on William Milliken, who seems to be looking forward to the challenge.

GENE I. MAEROFF

Cleveland

Mr. Maeroff is an editorial writer on the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

He spoke with an unfamiliar drawl, and his traveling entourage featured country music cacophonous to Northern ears, self-proclaimed rednecks and a bulletproof lectern, over which he would peer with those beady eyes fixed on us and condemn newspaper editors and bearded intellectuals. Not the stuff of which successful campaigns are built in the big states of the industrial Midwest—Ohio, Michigan and Illinois. But it was Campaign '68, George Wallace style, and it sent Richard Nixon to the White House.

The votes that would have made the difference for Hubert Humphrey in Ohio and Illinois ended up in the Wallace column, giving Nixon the 53 electoral votes of the two big states. A heavy portion of the Wallace vote was cast by labor—the Steelworkers, Printers, Plasterers, Rubber workers, Department Store workers and others who traditionally have been counted on by the Midwest Democrats. But this was the year of law and order, and Wallace told them what they wanted to hear.

Of the three states, only Michigan with its 21 electoral votes went to Humphrey. He owes that to Walter Reuther and his United Auto Workers. When it became clear during the campaign that defections were mounting and that the Democrats were in danger, the UAW swung into action, recapturing many of the blue-collar workers who were flirting with Wallace.

But in Ohio there was no Walter Reuther to twist the arms of the 1,148,000 unionists. In Ohio, with its huge Chevrolet, Goodyear, Republican Steel and Procter & Gamble plants, Wallace ran stronger than in either Michigan or Illinois. Buttressed by labor support, he grabbed almost 12 per cent of Ohio's Presidential vote. In Cleveland alone, the Alabamian won more than 70,000 votes, while Nixon captured the state by fewer than 100,000.

This is not to say that all of those traditionally Democratic votes would necessarily have gone to Humphrey this year if they had not been seduced by Wallace. But the point is that they were votes that the Democrats had garnered in the past, and party leaders knew they had to hold them to gain victory. George Wallace's presence in the race determined otherwise.

Even Mayor Richard Daley could not hold Illinois for Humphrey. The sizable margins that Daley had been able to provide for Lyndon Johnson and John Kennedy were not produced, and the downstate vote saved Nixon. Actually the tale of defeat in Illinois began last February when Daley blocked the bid of State Treasurer Adlai Stevenson III for the U.S. Senate nomination to run against Everett Dirksen. Daley's recalcitrance kept off the ticket the powerful Stevenson name that might have provided a fillip to defeat Dirksen, to hold the governor's seat for Samuel Shapiro and to win Illinois for Humphrey, denying Nixon his electoral victory. As it turned out, Daley's hand-picked U.S. Senate candidate, Illinois Attorney General William Clark, turned dovish during the campaign and Daley went cold on him, as he had on Stevenson for the same reason.

The black voters remained faithful to the Democrats of the industrial Midwest—at least the blacks who voted. To begin with, registration was not up to expected levels in Cleveland, Chicago and Detroit, all with tremendous inner-city Negro populations, and in the more heavily Republican outlying parts of each of the states registrations were at all-time highs [See "The Black Vote," The Nation, October 21].

The Presidential race did not generate enthusiasm in the ghettos. There was talk in Cleveland's Glenville and in Detroit's 12th Street of a "blackout" at the polls, with Negroes simply not showing up. But finally most of them—though not in numbers as large as Democratic chieftains had hoped—made the scene, and when they balloted they supported Humphrey to a greater degree than any other ethnic group.

Humphrey's final weekend surge in Michigan raised the possibility that the bombing halt may have given him a boost there. At least it became an eleventh-hour issue in a campaign in which the greatest excitement had seen to center on neither major candidate but on Detroit baseball star Al Kaline, who took to the hustings for Nixon. The Administration was quickly condemned by George Romney for calling the halt. He said it was a "brainwasher"—a subject on which he should be an expert by now. Michigan's dovish Democratic Sen. Philip Hart immediately rapped Romney for questioning the President's integrity.

Even the moment of glory that the Democrats enjoyed in Ohio when Charles Vanik unseated U.S. Rep. Frank Bolton, the conservative Republican in the 22nd Congressional District, was tainted. The victory was brought about not so much by enchantment with the Democratic Party as by the voters' reluctance to continue with a Representative of Mrs. Bolton's age, which is 83.

Ohio's 22nd, which includes prestigious Shaker Heights, has a heavy Jewish population, and that also helped Vanik over the top. He jumped into the race against fourteen-term Congresswoman when redistricting made his old 21st District 65 per cent Negro. His success there, Louis Stokes, profiting from the name that his brother Carl had made famous, fashioned a 2-to-1 victory over a nice-guy Republican, also Negro. Stokes, Ohio's first black Congressman, will bring to Washington a keen legal mind and a voice that will be raised whenever necessary in behalf of racial justice.

Ohio's Democratic nominee for the U.S. Senate, Joyce Gilligan, the one-term former Congressman who had whipped U.S. Sen. Frank Lausche in last spring's primary [see "Ohio: Politics After Johnson," The Nation, April 27], was unable to overcome the downstate Republican votes, even with the generous edge furnished him by the voters of Cuyahoga County. He was downed by William Saxbe, Ohio's lackluster Attorney General, who with the enthusiastic backing of Gov. James Rhodes.

So although Hubert Humphrey failed to convert nightmare of Chicago into the realization of an impossible dream, the real story of the election is that deep into the night he was able to dare contemplate the prospect.

OCEAN HILL-BROWNSVILLE

BAD SHOW FOR REPORTERS

KENNETH G. GROSS

Mr. Gross has covered the New York City school strike for the New York Post since last May. He is the author, with Bernard Lefkowitz, of The Victims, to be published next spring by Putnam's.

It was always the same. Always the cameras and microphones and pencils poised over Ocean Hill-Brownsville to record that the school decentralization struggle remained blind and deaf and still, until a dashiki appeared. The plementes sprang to life for the Afro-clad militants, never noticed the fire in the eyes of the man with clerical collar—until it was too late.

Rev. C. Herbert Oliver spoke softly and with polished and bearded Sonny Carson made a better picture on six o'clock news, with his Afro shirt, Afro haircut, defiant bucks in the background. When anyone bothered to listen to the Reverend Oliver, he quietly said again gain that the stand for school autonomy would be made here in Brooklyn, at Junior High 271, and that the locally elected governing board, of which he was the president, could never budge from that position. He said it in the morning; he said it in the summer; he said it as the leaves turned in the fall. But he did not say it loud enough or distort his face enough or seem mad enough for anyone to take him seriously.

And so Ocean Hill drifted into a disaster, and all the while we were looking—we ladies and gentlemen of the press—in some other direction than into the flaming eyes of the Reverend Oliver.

The events at Ocean Hill had become theatre, and the stage belonged to those who performed best. Indeed, after press conferences, parties on both sides would discuss the "performance," judging such things as delivery and style, and often not even mentioning content. The leading performers were not always the most serious men; sometimes merely the loudest or most apparent.

In the beginning Ocean Hill appeared to be available to journalism, but as the story grew, as the attention focused with more intensity, we became locked in. Eventually, physically locked in. The police would daily erect long lines of triple barricades against some imagined charge. Within the outer ring, the police built a smaller ring. It was a U-shaped pen, situated across from the entrance of HS 271, extending halfway into the street. Here, reporters and cameramen were expected to cover the daily confrontation. And so we became physically locked in. Eventually, we had become so long ago. Without undue protest, the reporters accepted the police definitions of their assignment. We were not permitted to wander freely or speak freely; the police had decided how this story was going to be covered. Deputy Police Commissioner Jacques Nevard, a former New York Times reporter dubbed "Jacques Naive" by some police reporters and "Jack-the-Flak" by others) would shrug and be unable to answer when asked who had given the orders to pen up the reporters.

The only effective voice raised against the pen came from a New York Times reporter who defied the police to arrest him. But he was black and the cops realized that it was far too chancy to arrest a black reporter under such circumstances. A white reporter, I was assured, would not have lasted a minute.

The coverage at Ocean Hill thus became infused with racism. It was not a one-way street. Many things were kept into the coverage. Television reporters whose children were inactivated by the teachers' strike would ask coercive questions. "The trouble with this story," one TV reporter finally came to understand, "is that we cover it by sticking a microphone in someone's face and asking him, 'What's new?' This is exactly the wrong kind of story or that. People do not tell the truth. They tell what will suit them."

Television was almost impossible. The program editors in Manhattan cling to the bromide that if you see something, it must be true. However, when the cameras remain still until a militant appears, and when the news program shows only the militant, that alters the truth. The truth was much quieter. The children were far more polite—until the cameras were turned on them and they recognized the unspoken signal to perform. They knew what was expected of them.

What also happened was that we were trifled with. The clan of news photographers—who form the most right-wing element in journalism—would form small knots inside the barricades, sipping at their steamy coffee containers, exchanging flashes of anger with blacks who sensed that it was their blood the photographers had come to film. We would remain in the press pen, sometimes moving through the cordon of plain-clothes men, to use a telephone or grab a spokesman in the charade of coverage, but there was very little contact with the neighborhood. It was possible to listen to the foxhole chatter of the combatants at the barricades, but most of the white reporters were afraid to roam widely, and the black reporters were contemptuous of that fear. If you were white, the plain-clothes cops would be too friendly within earshot of someone eavesdropping for you to betray something. If you were white and walked with a black reporter, it was always the uniformed cop on the corner who asked you for information—as if he didn't trust what the black guy would say.

We all had our humiliations. Black reporters, even the most famous of black reporters, were made every time to show their credentials at the barricades. And the white reporters got their bruises at the office of the local governing board. Most of the black staff would snub a white reporter in reprisal for all the snubs black people resent. The resentment could rise to stupidity. I recall once needing a document and a friend on the staff asked one of the girls to make a few copies. The girl kept running off dozens of copies until the black staff member returned and said that that was enough.

The plain-clothes men presented a problem. They were salted in with every group of reporters and soon we had all lost our ability to go unchallenged. The cops were on one side and since they stood with us, it was superficially concluded, we must be on that side, too. There were too many reinforcing factors for anyone to suppose otherwise. Reporters stood behind the police lines during any confrontation. Reporters chatted with cops. It was inviting abuse to try talking to anyone else, most reporters came to believe, and they quit trying.

Reporters who managed to establish a rapport with the governing board or the community also faced a test. They were not able to perform as journalists, but were expected to become agents. It was natural. The United Federation of Teachers behaved in exactly the same way, but the intimidation at Ocean Hill was thought to be greater. A group of white reporters were sitting in the office of the unit administrator, Rhody McCoy, when a group of black toughs appeared. They studied everyone's press card and jotted down our names and affiliations. "We're going to be watching what you write," one of the kids said. "You better not come back here if we don't like it."

The truth is that the kids were playing with us, but so many of the white reporters took them seriously that it had an impact on the reporting. Thus when a white TV reporter got flattened by one man, the long history of playful threats took on a much more menacing aspect, although the two events were probably unrelated.

"Tell Paul Parker that his days are getting short," one huge black man shouted to me one day in a parking lot. The story got back to Paul Parker, a radio reporter, and was circulated widely. I knew that the guy who made the threat did not mean anything serious by it, but in the retelling, it became sinister.

It was possible to distort such things. I recall being at a meeting of school supervisors, who were supporting the third teachers' strike. I was manhandled by a school principal, who was complaining that I was "insensitive to the question of violence" in the schools. The attack on me was not reported, it being felt that such comment would unfairly characterize the meeting. True enough. But no such sympathy was shown to Ocean Hill people.

A black C.B.S. reporter complained in a lengthy memo that Ocean Hill was becoming impossible to cover since his technicians were refused access to a particular night meeting. He had also been threatened. There arose a great issue in that newsroom. "What's going on out there?" demanded the news director.

Another reporter, white, explained that he had never had any trouble covering the story. Technique, he said, was important. Reporters covering this affair had to suppress their natural overblown arrogance. A tactical withdrawal was often smarter than a face-off. Once, a radio reporter thrust a microphone in Rhody McCoy's face. One of McCoy's supporters told the radio guy to remove the microphone or he would get hurt. "You want me to call a cop?" the radio man asked. Such belligerence, which recurred, did not help dispel the notion that we were aligned with the police. The people in Brownsville did not have time to distinguish between friends and enemies. We were white and therefore had to prove ourselves.

I witnessed a morning of classes at one school, coming away with an upbeat feeling about the teaching. As I stood talking with the principal, I noticed a roach crawling up his shoe. It would have been a good dramatic touch to add to the story, yet I considered the effect of the detail on my own future in Ocean Hill.

One black reporter became furious over a story that reflected badly on the schools. It was not a question of the truth of the statement, simply the reporting of it. Professional discipline, which many of us felt certain that we possessed, began to crumble. One writer, married to a teacher, said he returned home every night to answer for every syllable he wrote. Lajer, his wife's friends would call, going over every aspect of the coverage. Still, he felt, his impartiality had not been compromised.

The citing of facts became a torture. Albert Shanker, United Federation of Teachers president, referred in a speech to the new teachers in Ocean Hill, "many of whom are out there simply for draft deferments." When the teachers were told by the reporters that this was tantamount to calling the new teachers draft dodgers, they were incredulous.

"But that's not the way I get it at all," one teacher told a reporter. "But he said it in that context, using a loaded phrase, while he is backed by many, many teachers who receive draft deferments, is that not true?" they were asked. They had never thought of it that way.

We were in Madison Square Garden, surrounded by 4,500 teachers, at a union delegate meeting. They were chanting, "Murray Kempton, tell the truth." A group of about twenty-five teachers stood arguing, cursing or glaring at the New York Post columnist. The speech by Shanker began.

"Write it down, Murray," the teachers chanted.

The union people could not understand that anyone might be neutral. They screamed for "due process," the shrieked that teachers should be free to do their jobs without fear of intimidation, and a few tried to intimidate reporters into telling it their way. They could not believe that reporters were unable to see how clear it was, and the frustration drove them to near violence—something very much like the violence of frustration out there in Ocean Hill.

It was neater to cover the UFT. The teachers might say something nasty, but there was a fundamental sympathy between the press and the UFT. It was not a sympathy of ideology or position. It was something I detected when a white teacher confided that she really never expected anything better from "them," and I was supposed to understand who "them" was. Some felt betrayed by what was written, but all "knew" that sooner or later the press would return to the fold.

I was later forced to conclude that many teachers objected to a Jewish, white reporter being on some side other than their own. There were obvious anti-Semitic overtones to many of the statements made in Ocean Hill and that they believed, should have driven a Jew into their corner. However, it was not the anti-Semitism (it was present, although not nearly so virulent as some might suggest) but the white racism that struck me during the months when I spent every day in Ocean Hill. An almost detectable smile of satisfaction spread on the faces of the police who observed the birth of an ally. Each day the police grew chummier and chummier with the teachers, who now "know what we're up against." And yet it's not something that one could document—except with the hate sheets that circulated on both sides.

In apartment 1-B of the cooperative apartment, puffing quietly on his pipe, Rhody McCoy remained intact behind his hooded eyes. Late in the afternoons, when all the other reporters had gone home, he would come out of his inner office, his tie pulled down, his glasses perched on his forehead, and seeing me sitting in that soft old leather couch he would just laugh and I would laugh back. Perhaps we both knew how ridiculous it all was, or perhaps it was just weariness, or finding that we were both still in the case.

The black reporters would absorb the taunts of the militants. "Tom," they were called. Finally, one day was too much and one reporter exploded back. "I can take the crap from the cops and from you," he said through clenched teeth.

I remember feeling that same kind of pressure when white New York University professor told me I couldn't go into a "liberated" building during the recent fuss over John Hatchett. I wanted to take out all the frustrations on that poor, safe target because I couldn't go after the cops and all the others who took liberties with me in Ocean Hill. In all honesty, one cannot absorb so much abuse and so much personal thrust without some response.

The job of the journalist is to make allowance for the response, to be disciplined enough to step back from it and not use inaccurate verbs. The job at Ocean Hill was almost impossible from every standpoint. The actors would not say what was new, even if they knew. They would say what was beneficial to their side, or what they thought the reporter wanted to hear, in order to get column space or air time. But almost never would anyone say what was new. Not the UFT. Not the governing board. Not the teachers. Not the cops.

And the coverage was technically difficult. One could not devote the space to the nuances. Some could not detect the nuance. The guys who came in on a hit-and-run basis seldom had time to feel the mood shifts. The crisis coverage led to staring headlines and little else. Large shifts were seen and reported, but the minor movement of the iceberg went unreported. Sometimes that was the most important part.

Israel: The Stagnation of War

C. W. GONICK

Mr. Gonick is editor of Canadian Dimension and assistant professor of economics at the University of Manitoba, Winnipeg. He was in Israel this past summer.

A year and a half after a brilliant military victory, Israel remains a land obsessed by physical survival. Its citizens are supremely confident of their own military prowess and utterly contemptuous of the military and general capabilities of their Arab neighbors. Yet they are nervous. Border skirmishes and border casualties are a daily affair; the possibilities of heavily damaging sabotage are only too well known (in urban centers, all persons entering public buildings are routinely inspected). Israel occupies vast new territories of land where dwell 1.25 million hostile Arabs—and there is no consensus as to what to do with that land or its inhabitants. Indeed the disposition of the occupied territories defines the content of much of Israel's politics today.

The one other public issue of consequence is the future political leadership of the country. Israel's parties, like most of its other public institutions, are still controlled by first-generation East European Jews, now in their 70s. At issue is not simply the age of these leaders but their system of political patronage that penetrates all aspects of public life. Since its inception, and indeed for years before, public life in Israel has been dominated by a small clique of old-time Russian-born social democrats. Their rule has always

In the name of being objective, reporters had to hide from the apparent truths of the hate sheets on both sides. In order to appear unbiased, the obvious biases went unreported. Whispered hate is not always reportable. An editor might reasonably ask if repeating something so hateful could escalate the argument and stir dormant passions. When does that become censorship?

I began to get an inkling of how poorly we were performing when I spoke to some of my colleagues in Manhattan. Most had gotten the impression that Ocean Hill was a wasteland, filled with angry warriors waiting for the signal to attack. Most believed that the schools were populated by angry children, defiant and ready to slit the throat of the nearest white man. Somehow, despite the repetition of the fact that 80 per cent of the new teachers were white, most civilians and reporters not on the story came to believe that the only people hired were black.

And yet I explained that most of the kids appeared well-mannered and well-dressed. There were, if anything, fewer hippies than one might expect in Queens. It seemed, on the days when the massive press presence was not there, tranquil. One of the controversial white teachers, accused of being a racist, who had the best television manner of them all, did slip when the cameras were not there and shout rudely at one black boy. But there was no one on hand to record it except a single pencil reporter.

been based on control over the three institutions that are central to the Israeli power structure: the major political party, MAPAI (Israel Workers' Party), the giant trade union organization, the Histadrut, and the ubiquitous Jewish Agency, originally set up by the British in the mandate period to represent Jewish interests in Palestine. (Israel does not yet have an important business community; the mix of early Socialist idealism and an uneconomic and unattractive commercial environment has never nurtured a national bourgeoisie.) This ruling clique has used its power unashamedly to distribute political, civil service and Histadrut posts to political allies—and, it is widely rumored, to raise campaign funds from Histadrut enterprises and welfare services. For years they have manipulated these organizations to eliminate young, ambitious and talented rivals.

Such obvious abuse of power has not only sabotaged efficiency in the public services and Histadrut enterprises; it has created a widespread cynicism toward politics in general. Unfortunately, the politics of patronage and incompetence is now linked in the public mind with the politics of socialism. The universal desire to smash the old politics is easily manipulated into an attack on ideology in the name of efficiency and modernization.

Israeli politics obviously needs a massive shaking-up. It is monopolized by men who are veterans in the ways of old-fashioned East European politics of patronage, barter and authority, but unattuned to the requirements of an open politics and unacquainted with the techniques required to operate an efficient industrial system. Whether that shake-up will occur in the forthcoming general election is debatable. The central figure in opposition to the old politics is Moshe Dayan. Unfortunately, he also represents the technocratic, anti-ideological, chauvinistic and right-wing tendencies in Israeli politics. The Establishment is sponsoring another Sabra (native-born Israeli) general, Ygal Allon, who, like Dayan, is widely respected. He is a man of the Left but he also has a reputation for being highly chauvinistic, and whether he could ever divest himself of the party machine is a moot point. They will probably oppose each other in the race to succeed Levi Eshkol as leader of MAPAI. It is increasingly shaping up as a choice of the lesser evil.

The Left in Israel is desperate. Historically centered in MAPAM (United Workers' Party), it also has grown old with its leaders. But again, the disintegration of MAPAM is not simply a matter of age; its hard-line Marxist leaders have for so long identified this party with the Soviet Union that no amount of backtracking can now alter its image. The youth in the party, in particular, having seen Soviet officers commanding Egyptian and Syrian forces in the Six Day War (it is widely believed in Israel that some of these Soviet officers were taken prisoner, but quickly and quietly released), are completely disenchanted with the leadership. Cut off from its own youth and, since the Six Day War, from the "International Left," MAPAM is isolated both from within and without. Its traditionally dovish position on the Arab question has become an even greater political liability.

It has been evident for some time that the pre-eminent position of national security in Israeli politics has worked against a Left-Right cleavage and systematically screens out all substantive issues. A permanent state of national emergency necessarily favors the government in power and neutralizes the opposition; strengthens the hawks and weakens the doves. MAPAM has all but admitted that it is a spent political force by applying for a position in the MAPAI alliance in the forthcoming general election. Whether it is accepted or not, MAPAM will probably lose a significant number of members, and an Israeli New Left, already visible, will have to take shape.

Every society has its own peculiar mixture of social institutions—publicly and privately owned; market-controlled and state-administered; planned and unplanned; democratic and autocratic; centralized and decentralized. There is no simple formula which makes one combination "socialism" and another "capitalism." More important than formal institutional structures, moreover, is actual human relations and motivations. And what may be more indicative than the existing situation is the direction of change.

Two factors combined to give a Socialist basis to the founding of Israel. One was the humanitarian Socialist zeal of the original East European immigrants who had come to Palestine to build "the good society." The other was the reluctance of capitalists abroad to invest their profits in a backward, resource-poor country. Communal rather than private initiative was supported, then, both by sentiment and necessity. Even today the state owns 90 per cent of the land, all sources of energy and most of the natural resources. The Histadrut, to which 70 per cent of the labor force belongs, owns one-quarter of all industry, most of the public transport and the major construction enterprises; it operates an admirable medical mutual insurance system for its members and their families. The style of Israel's army is also indicative; it is as close to a true people's army as exists anywhere. There are almost no visible or material distinctions between officers and regulars. There are no army careers: officers must resign after a relatively short period.

Yedioth Ahronoth (Israel)
Border Inspection

And Israel alone, of all the so-called "Socialist" countries, possesses real Communist communities, where the classic principle "from each according to his ability, to each according to his needs" is fully operative. More than 100,000 Israelis live in kibbutzim. The kibbutz is the only large-scale example of direct democracy (participatory democracy) the modern world has known. Kibbutzim contain only 5 per cent of the population, but they produce 35 per cent of Israel's agricultural output and 10 per cent of its industrial output. Moreover, their importance in politics, in the army and other public agencies is vastly disproportionate to their number. Kibbutzim are increasingly expanding into industrial lines and are beginning to consider new possibilities such as the establishment of urban communes and a kibbutz university.

While steeped in Socialist traditions and institutions, however, Israel is a highly commercialized society, and this seems to be the stronger tendency today: nobody in the Histadrut hierarchy is even considering experiments in worker control; the government and Histadrut have resigned themselves to the sectors they now control; new industries such as electronics and chemicals are left to private enterprises, and since the Six Day War there has been a major effort to attract foreign business capital. The MAPAI-led government may be fairly described as a bourgeois government seeking to develop a bourgeois class.

Israel's income distribution, once the most equal in the world, is now not much different from that in North America. High school education is still not universally available; in fact, tuition fees are steep. No government spokesman defends this regressive system, but the plea of financial stringency is becoming less and less convincing. University fees are high and this is one institution that very much belongs to the privileged few. Scholarships are available to students in both high schools and universities but they are limited. Universal accessibility to lower education no doubt upgrades the living standards of Arabs and Oriental Jews, but there is little evidence to show that Israel has used its educational system to the full as an agency for social and economic equality.

The Oriental Jews who came to Israel in the 1950s and now account for the largest proportion of the country's population certainly form an underclass of impoverished people, unemployed or more typically underemployed, unskilled and illiterate. Measures to integrate them into the stream of Israeli life exist and have been successful to a point. In any case, skipping over 500 years of history in little more than a decade would have been impossible, whatever the extent of government effect. Nevertheless, the government has been justly criticized for not giving greater priority to the problems of Oriental Jews, for not having discriminated sufficiently in their favor. The same kind of criticisms have been leveled at government policy toward the indigenous Arab population. The curfews and controls intermittently thrown up against the Arab communities and widespread charges of discrimination against them are evidence that Arab Israelis have hardly been accepted as full citizens.

Though market forces are still blunted by an elaborate welfare system and a maze of subsidies and acts of various kinds, there has never been any comprehensive planning in Israel. Even conventional Keynesian policies are discarded during election years, lest they interfere with the vast giveaway programs that are a standard electioneering practice. The group of economists who advise the cabinet and man the senior civil service posts have been persistently attempting to steer Israel toward a more laissez-faire approach: to free the market mechanism by eliminating government and Histadrut regulations, and to follow standard Keynesian fiscal measures. That they have been only partly successful is evident enough, but their monopoly of access to government decision makers assures them of ultimate success. It is interesting that this clique of economist-technocrats has been trained by Don Patinkin, graduate of the notoriously conservative "Chicago School." (Patinkin is head of the Economics Department of the Hebrew University.)

Anti-Israel ideologues have argued that Israel's growing capitalist tendencies result from its dependence on the West, from American tourism, gifts by American Jews and loans by the American Government. But stating this thesis does not prove it and it can be countered by certain facts: U.S. Government loans have not been an important source of capital; American share in Israeli trade has not grown (36 per cent of imports, 17 per cent of exports), while trade with the Afro-Asian countries has risen considerably (18 per cent of exports and 7 per cent of imports). And nobody has yet produced evidence that the American Jewish community has tried to swing Israel over to U.S. positions in world affairs. Socialism has stagnated in Israel because politics have been distorted and sidetracked by the Arab-Israeli wars. National emergency requires consensus and consensus has weakened the Socialist opposition forces. At the same time, it has reintroduced into Israeli politics the old right-wing terrorist leaders from the days of the independence wars. These forces, banned from active politics for twenty years, have now found a new respectability. American ties and the absence of counter ties with the Soviet Union or the Chinese only reinforce these developments.

It is safe to say that the consensus that supports the government's immediate policies vis-à-vis Arab-Israeli relations is complete. Division occurs only with respect to more distant issues. All political parties and groups except the tiny Arab Communist party, Rakah (there is also a non-Arab Communist party), agree that Israel cannot give up any of the occupied territories until a permanent peace settlement has been secured. "It would only encourage them to think that they can start new wars and, if defeated, succeed in erasing the consequences of defeat." Beyond this point, however, there is no unanimity. On one extreme are the annexationists or "poet-conquerors" as they are called by their opponents. In the most chauvinistic terms they insist that Israel must retain permanent possession of the new areas and thereby return to its "historical boundaries"—the boundaries of the Bible. On the other extreme is a much weaker group, led by liberals and Left-Socialists, that calls on the government to return all the six-day conquered territories—once a permanent peace is established. In the middle ground, where the bulk of public opinion probably lies, is the view that most of the occupied territories can eventually be returned, but that certain strategic areas must be retained for defensive reasons. The so-called Allen plan embodies this notion.

The annexationists are supported by the two largest daily newspapers, the extreme right-wing party (HERUT), the religious parties and several key individuals in the MAPAI alliance, including (although this is not certain) Moshe Dayan. They have formed an organization called Movement for a Greater Israel. Among other projects, this outfit has promoted a few moves to establish civilian settlements deep in the conquered areas. To its credit, the Israeli military command has discouraged these efforts and has returned all such civilian settlers. But the latest reports indicate that a substantial Jewish settlement now exists in Hebron. Composed largely of religious families, they are gradually being housed in newly constructed government facilities. This may well signal an important change in government policy toward the occupied territory and one that cannot be welcomed by those who are hoping for some kind of peace settlement.

Reacting to the growth of the annexationist movement, activists on the other side have been working to build a countermovement: Peace and Security Yes—Annexation No. To date it is largely university-based and spans the entire spectrum of anti-annexationists, including those who favor the retention of strategic strips of conquered lands such as the Golan Heights in Syria.

The government itself has taken no definite position on the matter. Eshkol and Eban are the moderates, backed by some elements in the MAPAI as well as the MAPAM; Dayan and Peres are the militants backed by elements in the MAPAI as well as many of the other parties. It is not at all certain which tendency is stronger at the moment. What is certain is that time favors the extreme annexationists. Their strength grows as a peace settlement fails to materialize and as guerrilla activities increase in tempo and intensity.

There is another area of broad consensus, and a more surprising one. Almost everyone praises the excellent record of the military command in the occupied territories. Moshe Dayan is given much of the credit and in this regard is acclaimed even by his most vehement enemies.

Most of the 1.25 million Arabs in the occupied zones are concentrated in old Jerusalem (70,000), the West Bank of Jordan (600,000) and the Gaza Strip (350,000). The Sinai is nearly bare—the one formerly populated area, El Arish, was almost totally deserted—and the Golan Heights lost its 70,000 population when they retreated with the Syrian army. Some 75,000 Arabs are estimated to have left the Gaza and the West Bank since the end of the war; together with the 200,000 to 300,000 that fled the West Bank during the war, they comprise a major source of potential recruits to the Palestinian guerrilla forces. The Israeli army is of the opinion that terrorist organizations have yet to establish a base in the occupied area, that they maintain their centers largely in Jordan and Syria, and from there send their infiltrators and shells across the cease-fire lines.

Dayan's policy in the occupied areas is to treat terrorism swiftly, brutally and relentlessly. He goes so far as to bomb the homes of civilians who are suspected of housing and abetting terrorists. Strikes, demonstrations and political meetings are banned; "troublemakers" are expelled to Jordan. On the other hand, his policy toward civil, social and economic activities is strictly laissez faire. Arabs run their own schools, municipalities and businesses. The idea is to restore social services and economic activity at least to their former levels, and to minimize interference in civilian affairs. A staff of 200 Israeli officials is engaged in civilian activities and a major effort has been made to set up experimental stations, field demonstrations and short courses for Arab farmers. The only other positive activities of the Israelis, aside from removing oil from the Egyptian wells, seem to be reforestation projects and the widening and construction of roads. Urban unemployment has increased a great deal in the Gaza and the West Bank. The idea behind these Israeli-sponsored public works is to absorb the newly unemployed in order to restore the prewar situation.

The authorities have permitted open commerce between the West Bank and Amman. This policy allows West Bank farmers to sell surplus produce which otherwise would find no market. And by retaining links with the Arab world, it gives the West Bank population hope that Israel does not intend to occupy the West Bank forever. For similar reasons, West Bank inhabitants are permitted to visit Jordan and from there, other Arab countries. This is not to suggest that Israel's occupation policy is above criticism. The blowing up of civilian houses is excessive and probably defeats its purpose; earlier in the occupation, attempts were made to control school curricula (in addition to removal of anti-Jewish textbooks); the unilateral annexation of Jerusalem itself kills any chance for serious negotiations; Israel's reluctance to permit the return of refugees only creates a larger reservoir for terrorist organizations. These are anything but trivial matters; they cause needless dislocation and suffering and, in the long run, can work only against Israel's interests.

Any number of solutions are being bandied on what to do with the Palestine Arabs, and there have been both private and government discussions with Palestinian leaders. But the answer, whether it be a plebiscite among the Palestinians (which would probably return them to Jordanian rule); an independent Palestine state (with or without Jordan); or a bi-national federation with Israel, seems very remote.

A much more plausible prognosis is that Israel is in the twentieth year of what may be a hundred years' war. Its presence in the Middle East is not accepted by Palestinian Arabs or by the Arab world. It is as simple as that. A liberal policy in the occupied zone may make the occupation more tolerable—and for that reason is fully justified—but it does not lessen the inbred hostility, fear and resentment that most Arabs feel toward Israel.

This hatred and frustration have not yet been mobilized into a large-scale indigenous guerrilla movement among the Palestinians. And what exists is of a low level of political consciousness, still indulging in an exaggerated verbalism and boastful comparisons with the Vietcong and the Algerian FLN. Arab terrorists still believe that the Jews, like the French in Algeria, can be driven away. Despite the wars of the past twenty years, they have not realized that for the Israelis there is no other homeland; that Israel is a nation and will resist to the end. Moreover, the Arab forces are still beset by petty jealousies and enjoy little broad identification. Captured fighters are said to break down very quickly, denouncing and accusing one another and giving away valuable information.

Nevertheless, terrorism is growing and the guerrilla forces are increasing in strength and sophistication. The more damage they do, the more savage Israeli retaliation will be, and the more difficult to carry on a liberal policy in the occupied area. Should the Arab terrorists be successful in carrying out a mass killing of Israeli civilians (a likely possibility since button bombs and other explosives are commonly placed in schoolyards and hotels where they have only to be picked up to go off), a counter-slaughter will be hard to suppress. In the meantime, the guerrilla activities severely limit the willingness of both Palestinian and Israeli leaders to explore peaceful solutions.

There will be more killing and a great deal more suffering. Moreover, the continued state of war acts as a substitute for social revolution in the Arab countries. And while it stifles their revolution, it also halts social progress in Israel. The only interests served by this conflict are those of the right wing—whatever its guise. By the same token, peace is a prerequisite to progress. If only the Left would understand.

PORK IN BIG BARRELS

A. Q. MOWBRAY

Mr. Mowbray is the author of The Thumb on the Scale or the Supermarket Shell Game (J. B. Lippincott). The following is a chapter in his new book Highways or People, which will be published by Lippincott next year.

In 1909, total sales of passenger cars in the United States were just under 125,000. Seven years later, annual sales of passenger cars exceeded 1.5 million—and the demand to build more roads was in full voice. It was in this year, 1916, that President Wilson signed the first Federal Aid Road Act, putting the federal government into the road-building business in a big way. This act provided that half the funds used for road building in the states would be supplied by the federal government, on the understanding that the states would bear the cost of maintenance once the road was built. The act also stipulated that the federal contribution was not to exceed $10,000 per mile (typical cost of a modern urban expressway is easily a thousand times as much).

Injection of federal money was a marvelous tonic for the road builders. In 1916, the expenditure for construction of state-administered highways was about $50 million. Only four years later, this figure had zoomed to nearly a quarter of a billion dollars. But the real magic formula for building roads was discovered in 1956, and since then, construction has come in at about $5 billion each year. Best of all, the secret hit upon in 1956 guarantees that the money will continue to pour out every year; in fact, the more roads we build, the more money becomes available for building still more.

The magic formula is known as the Highway Trust Fund. It was invented when the nation entered on a highway-building program that has justifiably been called "the greatest public works program in history." The National System of Interstate and Defense Highways will be a 41,000-mile system of superroads, connecting 90 per cent of the nation's cities with populations greater than 50,000. This program, 90 per cent of whose costs are to be paid out of federal funds, is superimposed on the continuing federal-aid highway programs, which have built 1 million miles of roads on a 50-50 state and federal basis.

The Bunyanesque new measure, passed by a voice vote in the House and an 89-to-1 roll call in the Senate, projected a total cost for the system of about $40 billion, to be spent over a period of years. (The estimated cost has since increased to $55 billion or $60 billion, and the completion date has crept by stages from the original target of 1972 to 1975 or 1976.) The sum was large, even for legislators accustomed to pork in big barrels, and there was much wrangling as to where the money was to be found. Eventually a scheme was devised that not only assures a steady flow of funds but also renders the flow all but immune from the year-to-year whimsies of a fickle Congress. This is the Highway Trust Fund, into which pours an unceasing stream of tax money from the sale of gasoline and other motorists' necessities such as spare parts and tires. At the outset, 1c of the federal tax on every gallon of gasoline fed the Trust Fund; this has now risen to 4c.

Like all magic structures, this fund simply grows—independent of any new authorization by Congress (and like all magic structures it is not easy to restrain). Each year the Administration doles out the bounty to the states as their highway departments come up with plans that seem reasonable to the Federal Bureau of Public Roads. Thus the road mileage increases, more cars take to them and drive more miles, burning more gallons of gasoline, wearing out more tires, and feeding more money into the Trust Fund. It is the ultimate cornucopia, and calculated to keep smiles on the faces of the highway builders.

In the decade following enactment of the Interstate Highway Act, all went smoothly. Engineers across the land drew lines on maps, and the bulldozers followed, in increasing numbers. While each year Washington budget makers strained to find money for a thousand critical needs, the Highway Trust Fund poured out its gold. "We want more roads," the nation had said, and more roads it was getting. The check had been signed in advance; it remained only to dole out the largess year by year.

But after ten years, a major land war in Asia and the threat of runaway inflation cast the first shadow of doubt over the operation. In the fall of 1966—with war costs mounting, spending levels rocketing above $100 billion, and heavy federal borrowing pressing prices upward—President Johnson looked about for ways to reduce federal spending without curtailing vital programs. His eye fell on the highway program.

Federal grants to the states for highway building had been running along at about $4 billion per year, and highway builders anticipated an allocation of $4.4 billion for fiscal 1967. On the day before Thanksgiving, however, the Administration announced that the states would receive only $3.3 billion. This was not a cut in allocations—no one would take such liberties with the magic Trust—it was merely a “freeze” of money already allocated, a delay in handing it to the states for use.

The announcement had been capably timed. Election Day was safely past, and the long Thanksgiving weekend might provide a cooling-off period for any Congressional or gubernatorial hotheads. But the President had underestimated the power of the highway lobby. No sooner had the freeze been announced than White House wires began to heat up with messages from the state capitals expressing the displeasure of the various highway departments and governors; letters and telegrams from road contractors rained down upon Congressmen, and they, in turn, rose upon the floor to denounce the President.

“Illegal” and “unwarranted” were some of the terms used to describe the freeze. The chairmen of the Public Works Committees of the House and Senate announced angrily that they would hold joint hearings to investigate the cutback in highway funds. Rep. George H. Fallon, chairman of the House Committee on Public Works, said “the cutback and freeze makes it impossible to maintain an orderly highway construction program. The failure to do so is not only economically shortsighted but puts us in the highly questionable position of acceding to an action that must spell death and injury to the thousands of people who will be involved in accident.”

Engineering News Record, the authoritative weekly construction magazine, echoed the life-and-limb argument: “Delayed completion of new highways claims a high price in lives and property lost in traffic accidents, as well as in the economic losses caused by traffic congestion. Individuals and groups concerned with highway construction should do their best to make [their wishes known] to the Administration, and to Congress.”

The individuals and groups concerned needed no prodding. Their wishes were flowing to Washington in abundance. Robert S. Holmes, president of the politically potent American Road Builders Association, worked into the night preparing testimony for the joint Congressional hearings. As general manager of highway construction for U.S. Steel Corp., Mr. Holmes was quick to announce that the freeze would eliminate a half-million tons of steel from highway construction.

Massachusetts Gov. John Volpe, himself a one-time road contractor, charged that the President had designs on the frozen highway funds, that he intended to use them for other purposes. This, said Volpe, would be a “misuse of gas tax money” and a “direct violation of the intent of Congress.” The full $1.1 billion in frozen funds, he said, should be restored at once.

On February 13, in a move to take some sting out of the rising storm, Secretary of Transportation Alan Boyd announced that the frozen funds would be released just as soon as economic conditions permitted. But Representative Fallon and Sen. Jennings Randolph went busily ahead with plans for their joint hearings. The Building Trades Department of the AFL-CIO adopted a resolution demanding restoration of the frozen funds, warning that a slowdown in construction would seriously jeopardize the industry and cause substantial increases in unemployment.

On February 27, Secretary Boyd was up on Capitol Hill testifying at the joint Public Works hearings. He had brought with him a large concession: the Administration had decided to release $175 million of the frozen $1.1 billion immediately, and promised $225 million more before the end of June, which was the end of the fiscal year. Further, he promised that the Administration would release to the states the full $4.4 billion authorized by Congress for the coming fiscal year, starting July 1. As though unwilling to let his Transportation Secretary get all the credit, Mr. Johnson, back in the White House, made the same announcement, at almost the same moment.

The President said the partial release of funds was prompted by an easing of the inflation threat, but many in Washington saw it as a bending to the will of an irresistible political force. Even so, the builders were unappeased. Senator Randolph said the hearings would continue. Rep. William C. Cramer, ranking Republican on the House Roads subcommittee, demanded that the President release the entire $1.1 billion. “This is nothing more than a token gesture,” he said. “The Administration has converted the federal-aid highway program from a stable program, for which advance planning could be undertaken with the assurance of orderly construction, financed by an inviolate trust fund, to an ‘iffy’ program which goes up and down like a Yo-Yo, depending upon the policies and economic theories of the Administration.”

On February 28, President Johnson sent his Budget director, Charles L. Schultz, down to the joint Congressional hearings to capitulate. In his testimony, Mr. Schultz hinted very broadly that substantial sums of money would be restored to the highway program within a few weeks. When Representative Fallon asked how good a bet this was, Mr. Schultz smiled and replied that, although he was not a betting man, he would be willing to put a substantial stake on the probability. This satisfied the Congressmen. Although several days of hearings still were scheduled, they were abruptly ended.

On March 17, Mr. Johnson made good his promise: he released an additional $350 million. Three months later he released the remainder of the $1.1 billion. Said the President, “inflationary pressures have subsided.” Engineering News Record believed there might be another reason. “Administration officials soon realized they had a tiger by the tail,” said the construction weekly. And they loosed their hold on the highway funds “before the aroused beast mauled them severely. . . .” This, the magazine said, should be a lesson to the President and also to his new Secretary of Transportation: “Never underestimate the raw power of the federal-aid highway program. Politically, it contains something of benefit to every member of Congress, something he can show the home folks that he has got for them. Practically, the vested interests with a major stake in the program are strong, vocal and well organized; they pack tremendous clout.”

The great highway battle of 1967 ended with a clean victory for the forces of highway construction. By spring, it was apparent that, even with the very temporary setback occasioned by the President's imprudent shenanigans, 1967 would be the biggest year the road builders had ever had. The states planned to spend more than $5.2 billion, an estimate that would rise to record-breaking proportions when the unfrozen funds swelled the flood. And 1968 promised to be even better; the President had already stated his intention to release $4.4 billion to the states.

For several months, during the summer and early fall of 1967, all was serene on the highway front. The battle had been won and, seemingly, the principle of the untouchableness of the Highway Trust Fund established. But inflation, despite the President's pronouncement, had not subsided; war costs continued to mount; budget deficits continued to widen. In belated response to these pressures, Mr. Johnson finally went to Congress with a request for a 10 per cent tax surcharge. But Congress was adamant; no tax increase until the President cut spending.

The resulting protracted pull and haul between the President and Congress was not one of the more heroic chapters in American political annals. Frustrated in his attempts to get a tax increase, furious at what he felt to be irresponsible yammering from Congress about spending cuts, Johnson countered with a right cross to the body, a blow that the men on Capitol Hill felt below the belt. They wanted spending cuts? All right, he would give them spending cuts. He proceeded to freeze funds for certain low-priority military construction projects and for the time-honored "pork barrel" construction involving rivers and harbors and flood control. Further, he instructed Transportation Secretary Boyd to send a telegram to each of the fifty Governors warning that massive cuts might be necessary in federal aid for highway construction. The telegram asked the Governors to give their estimate of the economic effects on their states of a freeze in highway funds amounting to as much as $2.2 billion, or half the program for the year. The telegram went out on October 9.

The reaction was swift and intense. Within two days, replies were in from sixteen outraged Governors. Typical was that from Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, who fumed that a cutback in highway money would be a "dishonest and grave mistake on the part of the Administration, since under federal law, highways are built with gasoline tax funds placed in trust for highway purposes. They cannot legally be diverted or used as a tool for fiscal gimmicks." This response ignored the fact that Boyd's proposal had been merely to "freeze" the money. When the economic storm had passed, the funds would be there in the Trust Fund, waiting to lay asphalt.

The telegram, said Engineering News Record, was "intended to give Congress a taste of what it means to demand that the Administration make sweeping reductions in the federal budget as the price of a tax increase." Most other observers agreed that the move was an attempt to put pressure on Congress rather than a serious effort to cut spending. In Congress, it rinkled. "It looks to me," said Rep. Charles S. Gubser (R., Calif.), "as if the President were trying to use these popular programs to put the screws on Congress." Other Congressmen accused the President of trying to "badger" them. Said Rep. William C. Cramer (D., Fla.), Johnson's move was "an obvious sledge-hammer tactic to bludgeon the Congress into passing the tax surcharge . . . instead of reducing unnecessary federal expenditures." Rep. Fletcher Thompson (R., Ga.) accused Mr. Johnson of "trickery," "chicanery" and "blackmail."

Grumbling in the Senate was more discreet. Sen. Jennings Randolph, chairman of the Senate Public Works Committee, said that "nearly every Senator" had complained to him about the proposed highway fund cutback. He noted that, interestingly enough, the complaints about cutbacks in other construction projects had been very light by comparison. "A dam that helps prevent a flood can be vital," he said, "but there's a detachment about that kind of project that you don't get with money for highways or schools. Those things are more personal to people than regular public works."

A few days later, Congress responded. On October 18, the House whooped through a bill, by a vote of 238 to 164, demanding that President Johnson cut nonmilitary spending by a minimum of $5 billion. The bill specifically exempted a number of activities from budget cuts, to wit: Social Security, old-age assistance, veterans' pensions, the Post Office, Internal Revenue Department, Medicare, payments on the national debt, all military and related operations and, last but not least, highway construction. Debate on the bill was often raucous, undisciplined, irrelevant, and even downright ludicrous. At the end of it all, the oldest member of the House, 85-year-old Barrett O'Hara (D., Ill.), was heard to say, "For the first time in all the years I've been here, I'm ashamed of this House."

Such was the immunity of highway spending that it ranked with Social Security and payments on the national debt. Some other less essential programs were chopped. A record $1 billion was lopped from foreign aid, poverty funds were slashed by $300 million, model cities by $350 million. The rent supplements program was cut from $40 million to $10 million, which left it just barely breathing. All these cuts the members of Congress seemed to bear with equanimity but, said Rep. George H. Fallon, "any cutback in the federal-aid highway program would amount to breaking faith with the states, and with the motorists who are paying the bill."

One week after the controversial Boyd telegram, the 53rd annual convention of the American Association of State Highway Officials (AASHO) opened in Salt Lake City. One of the politically most potent organizations in the nation, AASHO includes in its membership the top officials from state Highway Departments as well as the top Highway people from the federal government. At the Salt Lake City convention, meeting rooms and lobbies buzzed with the voices of incensed highway engineers speculating on the outcome of the Boyd message. The highway officials adopted a resolution warning that any cutback in federal highway funds would have "great adverse effect upon the program and would not be in the public interest." The AASHO resolution demanded an end to "the atmosphere of uncertainty that has engulfed the federal-aid highway program" and assurance that the program continues "at the maximum level possible."

By now the outcry in the construction industry had reached such proportions that even Engineering News Record felt constrained to question the sacrosanct position of highway building in the economy. "In a time of national economic strife, with defense expenditures soaring and the possibility of runaway inflation threatening the economy, should any federal spending program be sacrosanct?" asked the editor. "Should the highway program be spared? Are expenditures for roads more important than those for flood control, urban renewal, airports or conservation? Or, for that matter, for education, public health, the war on poverty, or any one of a host of other programs? . . . Can we really expect to build federal-aid roads at a normal rate when other worth-while programs are being delayed, crippled, even canceled? Are roads that important?"

Apparently the readers of Engineering News Record thought they were. In a later issue, the magazine published letters from several irate readers. Typical was one from J. Anton Hagios, of the National Good Roads Association: "Your editorial prompts me to say to you, 'Et tu, Brute.' The editorial concludes with the question, 'Are roads that important?' Let me state here, categorically, emphatically and unequivocally: They Are!" Highways, said Mr. Hagios, represent a "current, continuing and universal need, affecting and benefiting virtually all people, from cradle to grave." And if the worst were to happen, he pointed out, and World War III were to break out, look at the mess we would be in with only a half-finished highway system on our hands.

But the suggestion that road funds might be cut still remained only a threat. At the beginning of January, 1968, three months after the Boyd telegram, the Department of Transportation notified the states that they would receive $1.1 billion for highways for the first quarter, which was exactly one-fourth of the promised $4.4 billion for the year. The Administration had not followed through yet on its threatened cut. And, commented the UPI, "any such move would certainly encounter strong opposition in Congress. Several legislators threatened to introduce bills to prohibit Boyd from trimming the program."

By now the controversy was becoming partisan. In a 13-page report issued January 7, the Republican Coordinating Committee charged that the Administration was using highway funds "as a tool for playing budget politics with the Congress, by repeatedly withholding and threatening to withhold construction funds from the states." The President, said the Republicans, should "stop using interstate highway funds for political purposes."

Finally, two weeks later, the second shoe dropped. Secretary Boyd announced that $600 million in federal highway funds would be held back for 1968, as a "modest but essential move to combat general inflationary tendencies in the economy." This was a far smaller cut than the $2.2 billion he had hinted at in his telegram to the Governors more than three months earlier, but still it was a substantial sum of money.

The outraged response from the states echoed the reaction of the year before. In Pennsylvania, Secretary of Highways Robert G. Bartlett said, "This is a black day for highway construction in Pennsylvania." With the announcement of the cut had come rumors that the Administration had nefarious plans to use the fund money for other purposes. This would be illegal, said Bartlett. "Congress set up inviolate—and I underscore inviolate—rights where monies that go into the Highway Trust Fund must be used only for highways."

Pennsylvania's Governor Raymond Shafer, charging that the cutbacks made a "complete farce" of highway planning, sent telegrams to the entire Congressional delegation of his state, two Senators and twenty-seven Representatives, urging them to "join with me in a direct appeal to the President that the cuts be restored." Further, asked Shafer, each legislator should support the bills which would restrict the President's freedom of action to "manipulate" the Highway Trust Fund.

In the midst of their travail, the highway builders could take comfort from the knowledge that the freeze was, after all, only a temporary measure to take some of the steam out of a dangerously overheated war economy; it was not prompted by an aversion to building highways. The four pennies from the sale of every gallon of gasoline would continue to pile up in the trust fund and, once the economy cooled, it would be there, waiting to buy more bulldozers and pay engineers to draw more lines on maps.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Historians: Simple-Minded and Complex

THE PROGRESSIVE HISTORIANS: Turner, Beard, Parrington. By Richard Hofstadter. Alfred A. Knopf. 506 pp. $8.95.

ROBERT SKLAR

Mr. Sklar is the author of F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocoön (Oxford). He teaches at the University of Michigan.

The crisis of the generations affects us in curious ways. It is surely one of the reasons why the distinguished American historian Richard Hofstadter, under attack himself from younger scholars, has reopened his old quarrel with his own intellectual fathers in an immense new book. The Progressive Historians is rich and allusive, overtly autobiographical in part, and in even larger measure histoire à clef, like a complex sermon by a Puritan divine, who charges every obscure Biblical reference with the passion of contemporary conflict. The Columbia crisis and the New Left, though nowhere mentioned, rise to stalk the reader from the dust of distant university and political struggles. The Progressive Historians is at once the most engaging and most dissatisfying of Hofstadter's books.

The heart of The Progressive Historians is taken up by lengthy intellectual biographies of Frederick Jackson Turner, Charles A. Beard and V. L. Parrington. These three writers, more than any others, formed the American historical consciousness in the first half of this century, and Hofstadter has re-created the triumphs and dilemmas of their intellectual careers in an impressively humane and perceptive way. It is as if the current difficulties of Hofstadter's generation of historians have revealed the older scholars in a new and more compassionate light. Among the many other sketches of American heroes in Hofstadter's works there are none so understanding, so committed, so intensely readable.

Yet for all their insight and warmth, Hofstadter's detailed portraits of the Progressive historians seem bland and slightly pointless. Turner's The Significance of the Frontier in American History, Beard's An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution, and Parrington's Main Currents of American Thought made an enormous impact on the American mind over several decades, and no one will now dispute Hofstadter's basic conclusion that their influence was greater than their intellectual substance, indeed that their viewpoints toward the American past were supported neither by their evidence nor by the rigor of their logic. Hofstadter began to make these criticisms as a young scholar nearly thirty years ago, and the professional journals have sustained themselves on such fare for years.

Once Hofstadter has completed his catalogue of their errors one wants to ask a disturbing question: Why did works so badly flawed, so fundamentally unsound, dominate the historical profession and the American historical consciousness for so many years? The question poses most serious problems for the historical profession to consider. Though Turner, Beard and Parrington were powerful in their own time, their heritage seems useless now, and they left behind no lasting intellectual contributions as did contemporary social thinkers like Thorstein Veblen and Jane Addams. Since their time, history has become less and less central to the major creative insights into present-day society. Perhaps this has come about not from lack of interest in the past but from the way we—both professionals and laymen—think about history.

Hofstadter seems indifferent to questions of this sort. He compares his historical subjects neither to their contemporary European historians nor to their American colleagues in such fields as sociology, psychology and anthropology. Indeed, he saves his interpretative framework for a brief final chapter, "Conflict and Consensus in American History," in which the contemporary message of his book becomes unmistakably clear—he is preaching a gentle jeremiad against the simple-minded history of his Progressive predecessors and of his New Left heirs.

The argument of Hofstadter's final chapter may be summarized like this: The historians of the 1950s, in their reaction against the mistakes of the Progressive historians, obviously carried the theme of consensus in American history too far. Who would still argue that Americans basically agree on their political views and that sweet agreement has dominated our political life—when foreign war and domestic conflict threaten to tear the nation apart? Of course you young historians are right to stress conflict, only recognize what the consensus school achieved—a new sophistication about complexity of motive, interest and behavior. I have written this immense book to show you the dangers of simple-minded history. By all means write about conflict, but do so with a sense of complexity. Thereby may history contribute to holding our endangered republic together.

This is a very fine sermon, but it does not precisely reflect the actual issues of disagreement. The issues are more political than historical, and in ways that Hofstadter does not choose to stress. He does remind us that Turner, Beard and Parrington, despite their emphasis on fundamental conflict in American history, were rather more conservative than their disciples. He suggests that the idea of consensus in the American past is intrinsically neither conservative nor radical. He implores us, most of all, to remember the importance of comity in social life—humanity, civility, community, regard for the rights and values of others. But he leaves unstated the actual political views, implied and expressed, of his own works and the works of other historians identified with the consensus school.

In his earlier books Hofstadter has always had a keener eye for the excesses of radical political movements than he had for the essence of the cause; this same perspective appears here in his implied rebuke to the young radical historians. "I suppose we may expect that the very idea of complexity will itself come under fire once again," he writes in reference to the younger generation, "and that it will become important for a whole generation to argue that most things in life and in history are not complex but really quite simple." How sad, the mindlessness of those who follow after. The young have not yet learned Hofstadter's technique of cloaking his slashing political attacks in the mantle of disinterested intellectual endeavor—wishing, as he has put it, merely to stimulate thought.

The fact of the matter is that young scholars have attacked Hofstadter's view of history not because he is in some way identified with a consensus school of history but because of the overt political views he has expressed in his historical works. Hofstadter has been a leading exponent not of a consensus view of history but of an elitist view of history. His influential historical works have concentrated on finding fault with the motives, style and perspective of political movements for social change and social justice, stressing such factors as anti-intellectualism, status-consciousness, and anti-Semitism to the neglect of specific political proposals and concrete social circumstances.

The sources of Hofstadter's historical elitism may lie in his generation's mistaken identification of McCarthyism with the earlier Midwestern Populist-Progressive reform movements, and his own rejection of the Turner-Beard-Parrington glorification of the rural small farmer as democracy's nobleman. In any case, it seems clear that his effort in The Progressive Historians to treat Turner, Beard and Parrington more kindly stems neither from a revised view of earlier protest movements nor from a receptive attitude toward present-day radicals. One doesn't know whether to be glad or sad that Hofstadter treats the past more gently, now that he is even more fearful for the present.

especially of common life: tobacco, music, good books, dreams, womanly women, fortunetellers, "first snow," the moors, eccentric characters.

He is at his best unembattled, not striking out against modern idiocy but demonstrating its opposite in his civilized (and admittedly tame) pleasure excursions. Priestley so obviously enjoys these pleasant engagements, so obviously enjoys his own words, that his artifice is often irresistible. His best pieces resist the critical faculty. They are inducements to partake, rarely invitations to dialogue. Priestley's best essays are consummate performances, neat little asides that add up to a single prolonged performance, center stage. "I am in the dream business," he writes in an essay against British participation in the Common Market (more business, competition, practicality), "and in this region I am a realist."

The two phrases come together as an apt account of the ambience his style creates. As a realist in the realm of dream and fantasy, Priestley has developed an adroit verbal presence, a way of speaking directly to an audience of "common readers" about the "magic" in common experience. He seems never to doubt the existence of such a readership and his style completes itself satisfactorily only if you place yourself for the moment among an audience of relaxed, receptive, innocently appreciative readers, who enjoy a well-turned phrase but would resent as snobishness too much elegance of vocabulary and syntax.

Priestley is not exactly an introspective writer, but his essays often turn upon his own inner life, rendered public without sacrifice of either lucidity (one of his highest values) or authenticity. He himself stands at the center of his essays, not a deep man but not superficial either: self-deprecatory occasionally (especially in the more conventionally detached and bemused Edwardian exercises early in his career), but often truculently assertive. "Nobody has asked me yet if I want to go into the Common Market, just as nobody asked me if I wanted to be defended by the Bomb." This is the voice of a man

Civilized Excursions

ESSAYS OF FIVE DECADES. By J. B. Priestley. Edited and with a Preface by Susan Cooper. Atlantic-Little, Brown. 311 pp. $8.95.

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

Mr. Trachtenberg teaches English at Pennsylvania State University and is currently a fellow of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences.

Selecting about "the secret dream" in a museum from a book of musings called Delight (1949), J. B. Priestley writes: "All my adult life I have been more or less a Socialist Intellectual. I have tried to make myself—and other people—aware of the harsh economic and industrial realities of our time." A notable feature of Susan Cooper's splendid collection of essays covering five decades is that the reader with no prior knowledge of Priestley will be taken by surprise by this confession of a commitment sufficiently strong to deserve the insignia of capitalization: Socialist Intellectual. Priestley's credentials for the title are authentic enough in a way; from the beginning of his literary career in the 1920s he has been a complete professional, addressing an unusually wide audience in essay, fiction, drama and radio, and dedicated to responsible public performance. His career was nurtured by a sense of the value of "popularity" which has almost disappeared among writers (Mailer's hunger for a public relevance, often settling for publicity in default of more substantial fare, makes a revealing contrast). For an intransigent Yorkshireman in this period, deeply troubled by economic misery, "the deep cancer of injustice," and more recently the threat of nuclear warfare (Priestley was one of the originators of the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, CND), socialism, or the Labour Party version, was an inescapable commitment.

But in another sense, Priestley's self-proclaimed title needs considerable correction. If we expect the essays of a Socialist Intellectual to include some abstract thinking about society, let alone about socialism and its varieties, or "position papers" on burning issues, then Priestley will disappoint us. The term "socialism" points to one flank of the world of this remarkably versatile man of letters—the flank which regards rationality, organized politics, machinery, efficiency, cities, as at best necessary evils. After spelling out his acceptance of socialism as a way of rearranging social life on more equitable terms, Priestley continues in Delight to say, "But there was never anything here for my own secret delight. Nothing for the hunger of the heart." The inner life, which yearned for "a place with the dignity and style of a city, but reasonably small and clean, with genuine country only half an hour's walk from its centre," protested against the drabness and conformity of increasingly organized modern life, including the beneficent bureaucracies of socialism.

These simultaneous wishes, for social order and for personal anarchy, are the coordinates of Priestley's world, and their interplay might very well lay him down as a sentimentalist (a frequent accusation), or a bit of an old-fashioned grouch. One most definitely feels after a reading of this volume that to distill the ideas from the style—itsself always charming and urbane, and a distinct "value" which needs to be addressed on its own—is to expose rather flimsy thinking about the world's problems.

But if Priestley does not recommend himself to us as a thinker, as a theorist, or indeed as a major literary talent with powers of synthesis (like Joyce), or passion (like Lawrence), his own special grounds of appeal are true and genuine enough. They rest almost entirely on the man's style. If his ideology is to be militantly his own man, his manner of writing conveys his message as it were atmospherically. "The whole modern way of life is idiotic," he writes, "because it denounces all forms of enjoyment." In these essays Priestley shows himself precisely as an enjoyer, an appreciator,

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

jealous of his privacy, skeptical if not downright contemptuous of power, a voice which implies reserves of secret life. It is precisely the articulation of that secret life to a friendly audience which Priestley conceives as the task of his essays.

"I would not describe myself as a born rebel, for I have no fanaticism, but there is in me a streak of the jeering anarchist, who parts company even with his friends when they have succeeded to power." "Jeering anarchist" is a deliberate, even droll, exaggeration, but the sentence, like dozens more in this collection, clarifies the sort of energy at the heart of these essays. Priestley's idea of himself as a kind of entertainer ("the dream business") and gadfly points to a serious motive—to perform a pastoral function, to instigate visions of sheer play and timelessness, to cultivate an inner sense of strangeness and exile from modern life. His pastoral vision is essentially comic and comes through in his lively appreciations of "the English comic characters." Micawber, for example, "does not really live in this world at all: he lives in a world of his own. . . . What does it matter what facts have to be faced if they are first sent to the carnival of the romantic imagination and so always return the strangest and most fascinating company, still moving to music in their tragic and comic masks?" Or Falstaff, "all in the service not of power and glory but of delight," created by "one side of Shakespeare, the inner and hidden side," as a "retort," a "huge protest" to the other, outward side, "the careful and practical man of the Theatre . . . the smiling and prosperous playwright, already with an eye on some sound property and a possible coat-of-arms." Falstaff "is almost an archetype, a symbol of the self raised to its highest power of wit and humour, ease and enjoyment; he belongs to some haunting dream, perhaps as old as drink and firelight, of a gigantic wonderful night out, a hell of a party." Imagine him at the United Nations—"worth all the billions we spend on arms."

Priestley's relations to the modern world might be described as flippant scorn or outright rejection or ambivalence, but it seems more accurate to say that he wishes to preserve a retreat—to keep open an intercourse between dream and fact. One might argue, well and good, but the invoked pastoral often comes to us in the accents of whimsy, of crotchety annoyance with history, and that such pastorals have no serious value in generating alternative options and genuine utopias. Moreover, a besetting danger of opposing dream to fact (the influence of Jung is clear and acknowledged) is that it tempts the writer to a certain posturing, a self-dramatization as a proud crank, a stubborn persistence in woolly headedness. Both arguments have some point and require attention in any final accounting of Priestley's importance. These essays are not the match of Montaigne's but they do hold out for the rights of personality, for liberality and good nature and a sense of magic—values that demand a share in any pastoral we wish to entertain.

Here Is Grove's Plenty

EVERGREEN REVIEW READER.
Edited by Barney Rosset. Grove Press.
790 pp. $20.

MAX BYRD

Mr. Byrd teaches English at Harvard. He is a former editor of The Harvard Crimson.

Every underground river surfaces sometime. This handsome, heavy (about 10 pounds), expensive, very slick and very glossy Reader seems to signal the formal incorporation of The Evergreen Review into the national literary scene. Still naughty, still bad-tempered and provoking, the magazine nonetheless now boasts credentials as respectable as a college yearbook or the Time-Life library. It may not actually have sat down yet in the family circle, but room has clearly been made.

The occasion for the anthology is the magazine's tenth anniversary of publication. But it is decidedly out of character for a "little magazine" to be casting a backward eye, and to some this nostalgic gesture may suggest a certain slowing down. To the philosophic its hefty presentability may serve as a reminder that every avant-garde, no matter how good, is eventually overtaken.

To anyone at all the anthology is a staggeringly impressive collection of talents, a browser's delight (and, incidentally, the first trade wind of the Christmas season). The Evergreen Review has never avowed any special literary policy or manifesto, and even now with his achievement assembled before him, editor Barney Rosset waives a general introduction. The reader steps straight away into a book diverse enough to hold both Jean Genet and Susan Sontag, and marvels at all the fine writers that Evergreen has befriended in the last ten years. But it is, after all, the last of the great publishing-house magazines, the unlikely descendant of the old Scrib-

Photo by Judith

"Daniel Berrigan, is the sort of priest who causes the lights of the Vatican to burn through the night."

"This urgent, passionate book is an outgrowth of Berrigan's 'war diary,' along with eleven poems which erupted from the experience they commemorate and transmute.

"The bare events of such journeys are familiar enough. What makes this war diary so compelling is Berrigan himself, his heart and sensibility, mind and nerve ends registering the profound anguish of being 'there' as an American, a priest, a man, an antiwar activist.

"It is impossible to read Berrigan's 'war diary' and not be moved."

—NEWSWEEK

$4.95

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY
Riverside, New Jersey 08075

Please send me _____ copy(ies) of Night Flight to Hanoi by Daniel Berrigan. I enclose a check or money-order for $4.95 per copy plus 35¢ handling charges for each copy.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

*N.Y. and N.J. residents please add sales tax. U.S.A. only

PASSAGE
(for Kim Merker)

*Pigs blister the hillside.
And it is doubtless in the sky's color to burn incredibly.
Morning may strike us anywhere.*

*So that passing these woods, seeing orders nailed to fenceposts,
to ruined trees.
we may feel ourselves made strangers,
willing to stop.*

*We may feel ourselves in suit, dress shoes, and hat getting out of the car, taking a walk
where we have no business at all.*

We may even recall passing earlier a farm-wife in slacks and a dead sweater dragging behind her the body of her dog.

Or the two roans and a grey grazing an open slough.

*Overhead an unseen bomber unzips the blue bag of the sky.
In offices,
in the kitchens of farmhouses,
the torn edge of the day curls.*

And only the scattered remains of calendars will be believed.

ROBERT DANA

ner's and Lippincott's magazines of the twenties and thirties, and it draws from an extensive stable of young authors. As one skims through names like Pauline Réage, William Burroughs, John Rechy, Chester Himes, in fact, it is tempting to exclaim with Dryden, "Here indeed is Grove's plenty!" For most of the book does consist of excerpts from the now familiar and distinctively mad world of Grove Press, a world of endless fantasies and monologues, a world awash in its own subconscious, a secret world hawked in corner drugstores.

There is, of course, much other forbidden fruit besides Grove's hard core. One finds poetry by Lawrence Ferlinghetti, Kenneth Rexroth, Charles Olson, and even the complete text of Howl (with an astonishing photograph of a clean-shaven Ginsberg). Fiction naturally hogs most of the anthology, but interspersed is a surprising range of both genre and geography. Drama is represented by Ionesco, Arrabal, Gregory Corso and Brendan Behan, with critical essays by Harold Pinter and Jan Kott.

Memoirs, biography, philosophy, reverie, all find spokesmen of the order of Camus or LeRoi Jones. The great "pataphysical" put-on reappears here, and a few classic reviews of films and jazz. This editorial cosmopolitanism by no means confines itself to European and American writing. Evergreen has introduced us to Latin Americans like Octavio Paz and Carlos Fuentes, to Middle Easterners, to numerous Orientals from Li Yü to the President-poet Ho Chi Minh.

Nor in fact has the magazine confined itself to literature. The Reader reprints several memorable photo-essays ("Poverty, U.S.A." by George De Vincent, and "Harlem, Summer 1964" by James Mitchell and Don Charles), plus a striking series of drawings by George Grosz and a set of Russian revolutionary posters.

In all this excellence there seems to be only one disappointing omission. One regrets that the book doesn't make space for any of those fascinating letters to the editor—angry, confessional, threatening, doting—from the beleaguered years of the magazine, particularly after the notorious issue Number 32. Ironically, just those kinds of letters now run regularly in the columns of Evergreen's bourgeois copycat, Playboy. Indeed, much more than was once the special flavor of The Evergreen Review can now be found, homogenized but unmistakable, in Playboy. That strain of defensiveness, for example, which led Evergreen to publish frequent derisive reports from various obscenity trials, is now voluminously duplicated in the "Playboy Forum." Playboy too has a Reader full of celebrated authors, and Playboy too has been seized and banned (in Chicago) for its pictures of Jayne Mansfield. No doubt it is a far, far better thing to be seized, as Number 32 was, on account of Emil Cadoo's beautiful photographs. But a bust is a bust. And even "Little Annie Fanny," though wretchedly inferior, bears undeniable family likeness to "Phoebe Zeit-Geist."

It is not unreasonable to say, then, that like a third party in politics, Evergreen has seen its cause absorbed and espoused by the shameless middle class. Its literary outcasts and garret geniuses, nurtured apart for so long, are famous now, fixtures in Esquire or The New York Review. The magazine set out ten years ago to outrage and educate us by casting light in the dark places of contemporary literature. Paradoxically, it may have done its work too well. For with a decade of writers now firmly anthologized and canonized, can the editors discover such another generation? And what could be stranger than a permanently established provocateur?

To me, at least, recent issues of the magazine suggest a falling off, if not an absolute decline. Its former wild, exciting sexuality now often sticks at the level of washroom humor, something abundantly available elsewhere. Where once Evergreen's writers were cultural subversives in the best sense, like Henry Miller, lately they incline simply toward political shrillness: and on that front they can match neither the tastelessness of The Realist nor the Realpolitik of the liberal journals. In the past the magazine's strength has lain in its ability to shock us, to call out the beasts, its instinct for grinding up hypocrisy, and for liberating violent and erotic truths. But the English historian, Christopher Hill, has remarked that "all established truths, just because they are established, tend to become lies." Or if not lies, dull familiars. As the Evergreen Review Reader heads toward innumerable coffee tables across the land, it somehow seems less likely to continue its creative affronting of the settled order, sexual or political. Yet it may only be that the last few years in this country have eclipsed any mere magazine's capacity to outrage us.

The Passionate Eighties

WHERE THEY GO TO DIE: The Tragedy of America's Aged. By Richard M. Garvin and Robert E. Burger. Delacorte Press. 224 pp. $4.50.

MURRAY POLNER

Mr. Polner teaches history at Suffolk County Community College.

This book's major premise is that homes for the aged are rotten places in which to dump your old parents and grandparents. Whether they are called restoriums, sanitoriums or nursing homes, they share the same faults: they overcharge, they cut costs by reducing individual care, they strip away the dignity of the old. With the coming of Medicare, they have become a booming growth industry. The authors, both advertising men on the West Coast, also imply that a Pulitzer Prize awaits the intrepid reporter who will visit nursing homes—preferably at off hours—and “tell it like it is.”

The book goes on to charge that patients are often given tranquilizers for the sole purpose of keeping them quiet. It also suggests that many patients are sexually and physically abused by nurses and attendants. Proof? The authors don't offer any. No one has ever sued. Senility and fear keep many patients from complaining. One man I knew insisted that his father looked as if he had been beaten each time he visited; the home assured him the old man had merely fallen. Who knows?

Certainly the medical profession is no help. The biggest unkept secret is the fact that large numbers of doctors like to invest in nursing homes. “All you have to do to keep a nursing home profitably full is to cut in a physician or two on the profits,” the authors quote one unnamed administrator. And so far as tranquilizers are concerned, trade journals such as Geriatric Nursing for example, are filled with full-page ads promoting these pills. There are some disastrous side effects for the aged in their use, but the pharmaceutical houses push them, the journals advertise them, and it is reasonable to believe the nursing homes use them, with or without a doctor's prescription.

We have become a neo-patricidal culture, as this angry and peppery little book maintains. “The nursing home,” the authors conclude, “holds a terror for the aged that Bedlam once held for the insane, that chain gangs held for the convicts, and that sweatshops held for children.” The reasons are numerous.

People today live longer but suffer from more chronic diseases. The traditional concept of family responsibility for the aged has dissolved. Significantly, too, there's a lot of money to be made in this business.

For the poor, nursing homes are a disaster. Admittedly, the $10 daily or so paid to them by the government does not bring much of a return on investment. As a result, most of them are snake pits. The better homes will charge patients from $150 weekly and up. That's only for room and board. The extras, such as clean sheets for incontinent patients, medicines, laundry charges, etc., may run higher than $100 additional per week. But if nursing homes didn't pay, they wouldn't continue to multiply. Recently, the Public Health Service reported that nursing homes increased from 6,539 in 1954 to 11,981 in 1965. New homes have mushroomed everywhere since then. Expenditures are way up. Since 1950 PHS reports public spending up seventeen times, from $30 million to $510 million. These figures are all pre-Medicare. What has happened since is that a humanitarian scheme to help the aged has become instead a subsidy for the benefit of private businessmen. Everyone makes out, except the old people. With plenty of homes in which to get dumped, they are left with nothing to do but wait for the grave in “indignation, terror and helplessness.”

“Age puzzles me,” wrote an 85-year-old woman not long ago. “My seventies were interesting, I thought it was a quiet time. But my eighties are passionate. I grow more intense as I age.” Who would want to segregate that woman? And do we really have to put them into nursing homes? The authors point out that more than nine out of ten Britons over 65 live at home. They quote a British official who told a conference on aging:

Our philosophy is that old people want to remain at home, in their houses, surrounded by their own possessions, their own memories. We don't mind whether it is a good home, a bad home, a tiny home. That's where we believe they should be, where they feel secure.

Why indeed pay tax moneys to build so many nursing homes to house old people who are quite capable of functioning in the outer world?

Several years ago Midge Dexter wrote in Commentary one of the best things ever done on the aged. Cutting through Should Churches Be Taxed?

By D. B. Robertson

Should the vast, tax-free assets of the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish religious establishments be tapped to relieve our growing public needs? This book — the most extensive study ever made on the subject — surveys the entire history of church tax exemption in America. And it sets forth impartially all the arguments on both sides of this explosive controversy.

$6.50, now at your bookstore
THE WESTMINSTER PRESS®
Witherspoon Bldg.,
Philadelphia, Pa. 19107

the pap and the euphemisms about "golden age," she stressed that old age was a bad time. Alone, and isolated, the aged sense finally that they have been "bad." All their lives they had worked, loved, and obeyed all the rules "only to find that the spirit is a substance which turns rancid in storage." I would go a bit further. Without the security of family life, they had discovered, too late, an America that was indifferent, insolent and ruthless.

Elizabeth Bowen Country

EVA TROUT: Or Changing Scenes. By Elizabeth Bowen. Alfred A. Knopf, 302 pp. $5.95.

ROBERT K. MORRIS

Mr. Morris, assistant professor of English at CCNY, has written a critical study of Anthony Powell (University of Pittsburgh Press), and is working at present on a collection of essays on the contemporary British novel, to be published by Southern Illinois University Press.

Enter onto an English scene on a fading winter's afternoon. An abandoned castle stands immaterial against a sunless sky; swans drift absently, barely disturbing a lake glassy in smoothness. Angular, natural but awkward, a young woman is leading an outing, in some way symbolic we suspect, though we must wait 300 pages to discover why. This is Elizabeth Bowen country, a world of neutral tones, where the landscape will eventually mirror the half-life of a cold, remote, maddeningly tranquil heroine who lives on the margin of fantasy and reality.

One setting of Miss Bowen's, one heroine, suggests others, and it is no secret that she has written much the same sort of thing for more than thirty years: the so-called novel of sensibility which moves at a leisurely pace, is convoluted in emotions and involuted in thought, and is incredibly shy on plot. Here the reader may find a good deal of italicized dialogue, long walks outdoors or through vast rooms of stately homes, broodings over the "right thing," quests after the ineffable, struggles and failures to connect, and thwarted ends posited on unhappy means.

Invariably the gap between the novelists of sensibility and contemporary writers of soft-shell or hard-core porno, freewheeling humor (black, ethnic or otherwise), revamped confessionals and up-tempo regionalism has never seemed greater. An age turned on by happenings and wracked by disintegration has scant patience for the intangible qualities of ultra-sensitive or super-sophisticated minds. To cavil, however, at the relevance of this kind of writing is one thing; to bring it off quite another. And Miss Bowen, endowed with the finesse and precision of a classicist, has seldom failed to bring it off.

Eva Trout: Or Changing Scenes bears her unmistakable imprint, though according to the author it differs from earlier novels by "[following] the fortunes of one character along whose line of fate the events are strung." The contrast would appear to be with books like The Death of the Heart and The House in Paris, which worked a single theme around the shifting viewpoints of several characters. But in fact, the distinction is even more important. Miss Bowen remains in the van of those who believe that character is action, yet until now she has rarely tried to raise either above the somewhat outmoded levels of psychological realism. To my mind Eva Trout is her first full attempt to discover in the very private and insulated world of sensibility a mythic center that will enlarge the dimensions and permanence of her themes. And by myth I do not mean the creaky furniture of analogies but a universal mode of expression and identification.

Eva is, from the first, writ larger than life: exceptionally tall, immensely (and mysteriously) wealthy, rootless and restless. Her "genesis"—Miss Bowen's own subtitle—begins in the manner of a sentimental education, but circumstances and irony turn her into an exile, seeking in change some solace for the fall from innocence. Childhood for Eva—as for so many of Miss Bowen's heroines—is a time of pain, an atonement of sorts for being a child in an adult environment. Left motherless, she is displaced in her father's affections by his lover, Constantine Ormeau, an effete, intelligent homosexual who later becomes her guardian and entrusts her teen-age upbringing to Iselt Arble (Eva's English teacher) and her husband, Eric. More from misguided motives than maliciousness, and through an overwhelming inadequacy that is part and parcel of their own civilized but passionless marriage, the Arbles further shatter Eva's already faltering sense of reality.

Her flight from them seems initially a step toward independence, but it becomes a destructive plunge into loneliness and futility. Now begins an eight-year wandering through England, France and the American Midwest; in tow her deaf-mute son, not fathered by Eric as everyone had believed but a dud bought on the baby market. Motherhood becomes one more perversion of the imagination; and more terrible still is Eva's realization that she may die having never known love. At the limits of her fantasy she stages a mock honeymoon departure with Henry Dancy (her intended) for all those who have in some way touched or impinged upon her life. And in a London station is played out the final grim charade and the inevitable denouement.

Ingenuously, but in a way that might bear some critical scrutiny, Miss Bowen calls Eva Trout a "tragi-comedy." Whatever the current fad for measuring either, both modes are really but different faces of the same human condition and, if not interchangeable, omni-operative. Tragi-comedy, perhaps more successfully than its separate components, deals with the ambivalence of experiences as they pertain generally to life and not to art. Eva's peculiar relationship with the Arbles, her warped mastery over her son, Jeremy, her antagonism to Constantine, and her hopeless future for herself and Henry are the particular ways in which she answers two of the profoundest questions a novelist can ask: how can one live and how much space and time are allotted for living?

For in the last analysis Miss Bowen's novels speak most eloquently of identity and time: identity lost, not found; time that not only contains passing life but renders life emptier and emptier as it passes. It is in some ways a ruthless book; happiness is taken out of the world and nothing replaces it, unless it be silence. Indeed, happiness no longer even seems a commodity worth the search. What one goes after is existence; on any terms possible one must know one is alive. And everything pales beside the solipsistic certainty that Eva grasps for one perfect moment as she is traveling with her son:

They were their own. Wasted, civilization extended round them as might acres of cannibalised cars. Only they

GOOD MONEY AFTER BAD

Their profiles fit for medallions, their faces burnished to bronze,

American dreams that tarnish like old silver or gold, or vanish.

In time of war, young men are the coin of the realm.

WILLIAM HEYEN

moved. They were within a story to which they imparted the only sense. The one wonder, to them, of the exterior world was that anything should be exterior to themselves—and could anything be so and yet exist?

I doubt very much that Miss Bowen is here being ironic. To have such a vision only briefly might be worth everything else life has to offer. Eva Trout is indeed a "tragi-comedy," but it is something of a problem novel as well. It is a fairy tale, a winter's tale, but no heroine steps down from her pedestal to be forgiven and loved; the ugly duckling remains ugly; the poor rich girl does not find her prince. There is beauty, but no heat; and the illumination lights up equally the disasters of living in a world created for us, or of creating a world of our own. This is the real problem of "genesis." Miss Bowen's garden of innocence is only a stone's throw from the desert of experience, but the settings remain identical. "No pathos invested the scene. There was no afterglow—there had been no sun. And the swans were gone."

Daniel Berrigan. The Macmillan Co. 140 pp. $4.95.

Father Berrigan, the Jesuit poet, is one of "the Baltimore nine" convicted recently of burning Selective Service records in Maryland with homemade napalm. Most of his book consists of the diary he kept when he and Howard Zinn traveled to Hanoi last winter to receive three released American pilots in the name of the American peace movement [see "The Petty Route Home" by Howard Zinn in The Nation, April 1]. The author does not dwell on the fact that the mission was betrayed in the end, but with the possible exception of Norman Fruchter's report of his journey in The Village Voice, this account is perhaps the most shattering one yet published by those Americans who have visited the people against whom our country is waging war. Although the events of his trip are fascinating, it is Father Berrigan's responses, as painstakingly recorded here, that are remarkable; not a glimmer of rhetoric or self-righteousness is in evidence, and the work vibrates with a love of human life and a profound feeling for community that are contagious in their strength and clarity.

Nation Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

SHIP ISLAND AND OTHER STORIES.
By Elizabeth Spencer. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 175 pp. $5.95.

Most of these stories are about people who are consciously but helplessly trapped and ruined by their environments or, conversely, about those who are able to lift the spell by walking away from it. Instead of describing what is happening to her characters, Miss Spencer, almost by signals, makes the reader not only know what is happening but also become the character's ghostly accomplice—or the other way around. Her methods are magical rather than psychological, and, along the way, she isolates and illuminates particular facets of Southern white culture with a dreamlike intensity which is startling in its power. This collection is that rare volume that truly deserves to be called distinguished, extraordinary.

NIGHT FLIGHT TO HANOI. By

THE HEART-KEEPER. By Françoise Sagan. Translated from the French by Definitive political studies from Praeger

A DISSENTER'S GUIDE TO FOREIGN POLICY

Edited by IRVING HOWE. Foreword by LEWIS COSER

An exciting collection of essays by noted scholars and journalists who vigorously reassess the main themes in U.S. foreign policy. The book provides clear evidence of the vitality of the democratic Left's attempt to achieve a "new dissenting orientation" in foreign affairs today. Among the contributors are Gunnar Myrdal, Michael Harrington, Robert L. Heilbroner, and George Lichtheim.

358 pp. $6.95

VIETNAM: A POLITICAL HISTORY

JOSEPH BUTTINGER

This long-needed, inexpensive one-volume history of Vietnam from earliest times to the present is a brilliant condensation of Mr. Buttinger's highly acclaimed The Smaller Dragon and his definitive two-volume Vietnam: A Dragon Embattled. An incisive new chapter analyzes "The Americanization of Vietnam" from the fall of Diem to the brink of the war's possible settlement in 1968.

576 pp. $10.00

CAN WE WIN IN VIETNAM?

FRANK E. ARMBRUSTER, RAYMOND D. GASTIL,

HERMAN KAHN, WILLIAM PFAFF, and EDMUND STILLMAN

Herman Kahn, author of On Thermonuclear War and On Escalation, and four of his colleagues at the Hudson Institute ask and answer the component parts of this highly complex question. The authors, all experienced analysts of political and military affairs, represent points of view ranging from hawk to dove; the result of their dialogue is a unique and tough-minded report on the most crucial question of 1968. "One of the most important books yet published on the Vietnam dilemma." — N. Y. Times.

442 pp. $7.95

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publishers 111 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10003

Robert Westhoff, E. P. Dutton & Co.
128 pp. $3.95.

In this wicked, funny, and very well-translated seventh novel, Mlle. Sagan presents Dorothy Seymour, a middle-aged, single, cynical and very likable Hollywood writer. When Dorothy takes a weird but pleasant young man in to live with her and begins to panic about their satisfying, nonsexual relationship after a systematic series of murders occurs, it all seems perfectly reasonable—even without the LSD which Sagan has him taking in her misguided effort to convince us that he's really weird. There's a diabolical ending and, although it's all a little flashy and super-Hollywood, readers who still think Mlle. Sagan is for the ladies' magazines will find that she has been badly underrated.

A CEREMONY OF INNOCENCE. By Robert Wool. The World Publishing Co. 308 pp. $5.95.

Mr. Wool's hero—wise, handsome, witty, New England-bred—is a Galbraithian U.S. ambassador to a fictional Latin American country trapped between the beneficence of the United States and the Soviet Union. The characters are wonderfully drawn and the political manipulations are described with skill and humor. Given the ambassador's sophistication, however, it's hard to applaud him for his final enlightenment about the true motives of his country, which dawn upon him after a CIA coup almost destroys the relationships he has worked so hard to solidify. The situation of the novel is one which surely takes place with almost humdrum regularity in American foreign policy; but this is a novel which should have begun at the point where Mr. Wool has been content to end it.

... AND OTHER DIRTY STORIES. By Larry L. King. The World Publishing Company. An NAL Book. 263 pp. $5.50.

"More and more one worries less and less about his Nobel competition and more about what they are paying for 3,000 words these days over at Sadistic Detective." Mr. King, novelist, journalist and native Texan, is a very witty man. Although this volume of what he might call his Collected Shorter Works suffers from the chronic collection syndrome—some not very good pieces are stuck in to make it book length—there are a number of fine pieces (about Texas, the daily insanities of what passes as the American political scene, and autobiographical reflections on the rough life of the working writer) which make it a delight. I laughed out loud at least once every 30 pages, a record that other readers might easily break.

ART/Lawrence Alloway

American painting achieved international status in the 1950s, as a result of work begun in the late forties. American art done earlier in the century, aside from a contribution to Dadaism, was generally regarded as provincial. There were two ways of being provincial: one was to use strongly American subject matter, and the other was to use European styles as a model. You were damned if you did or didn't. However, the dominance of American art in the sixties has increased native confidence to the point at which the disreputable early phases are being revived respectfully. The thirties are in process of rehabilitation and one sign of this is the exhibition at the Whitney Museum of American Art called "the 1930s: Painting and Sculpture in America."

The catalogue of this interesting show is not yet ready—an unusual delay for the Whitney which has always managed to coordinate publications and vernissages, unlike the Museum of Modern Art where shows have been known to close before the catalogue was available. William Agee, the curator at the Whitney who arranged the 1930s show, has left to go to the Modern where, presumably, we can look forward with interest to more late catalogues. The choice of works makes an excellent show and, lacking the catalogue, I will have to guess at Mr. Agee's purpose.

The exhibition turns out to be not the survey that the title suggested but something narrower. Mr. Agee has sought out, good-looking easel paintings, by the American artists who were adapting European forms of modernism to the New York scene. This enterprise has some real rewards, expanding our knowledge of a part of the recent past that is still dim and schematic. Certainly it disposes of the idea that New York art before the "Abstract Expressionist" generation was merely a deprived echo of European canons.

Stuart Davis has long been regarded as a brilliant individualist, an isolated big-city Cubist; in fact, it is clear from this show that a jaunty Cubism flourished in the United States. Painterly versions of Cubism by Arthur B. Carles, John Graham, Hans Hofmann, Carl Holty, Karl Knaths and George L. K. Morris provide a stylistic context for Davis' cheerful Cubism. Hofmann's radiant vertigo around a center-leg Cubist table or Morris' sensualizing of Juan Gris's sober color in his "Stockbridge Church" are typical—and impressive. One can see similar transformations of Mondrian's grid and primary colors by Burgoyne Diller, and a sweet, strong play with the whitened pinks and blues of Purism by Patrick Henry Bruce (a neglected, good artist). There is no need to extend the list, because there can no longer be any doubt that, in terms of logical extension and personal usage, American painters in the thirties had mastered their originals.

If I am right and Agee's intention was to demonstrate the Americanization of European style, he has succeeded handsomely. What is shown is convincing; my only doubt is that Mr. Agee has settled on the most interesting aspect of the thirties. In the last few years, the thirties have been condensing as a visible period style. To take a couple of examples: Jim Dine used archaic neckties in early paintings and has attached a square armchair to a canvas; more recently, Roy Lichtenstein has used the ornament of the thirties as a source of forms in his so-called "Modern Paintings." His subject, here, is a style, the look of a period that has been revived—in part, as Lichtenstein has pointed out, by old movies on television.

Agee, on the other hand, is looking at the thirties in an anti-period way. He searched for, and found, the works closest to a currently reputable image of modernism. By the exercise of good taste, he has isolated the moderately conceived and traditionally well-painted works, passing over the extravagant manifestations of "Style 1935" or "Art Deco," or whatever it will be called finally.

M-REIT

Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust

HOW TO INVEST IN OPEN HOUSING

M-REIT buys income producing apartment houses in good neighborhoods and offers housing to all.

$20 per share
with a minimum purchase of 10 shares
10% down. Balance in 45 days.

SEND FOR FREE PROSPECTUS

Morris Milgram
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Dept. ND

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

Agee's kind of connoisseurship reduces the art of the thirties by highly sensitive discrimination, to a canon of aesthetic excellence, to a main line of development among all that was going on. This approach reduces the period to an anthology of sensuous and moderate works of art. This may sound like a very happy result, but another approach to the recent past is to hunt, among the paintings of the artists under consideration, for the highly developed works of a period. It is a choice between the modulated and the maximal. Each approach delivers different rewards, but Agee has rejected entirely the maximal work and concentrated on well-painted pictures, poised between the School of Paris and New York of the fifties.

The rewards are nevertheless considerable. For example, a characteristic of the thirties in Paris, which turned out to be fruitful in New York, is a mingling of Cubism and biomorphism; or, it could be called the sexualizing of Cubism. Starting with some Picassos of the twenties via Braque's rare but influential figure paintings, strong erotic and humanizing details (hair, breasts and apertures mostly) grew within the geometries of Arshile Gorky, John Graham and David Smith. They produced a kind of marriage of form and Freud, of pure structure and girls, which is continued in the early works of both Pollock and de Kooning, despite their immense personal differences. The nature-romanticism, familiar from the work of William Bazotes and Theodoros Stamos in the forties, is well shown in works by Arthur Dove and Georgia O'Keeffe. Geometric abstraction, especially in its more garrulous forms, is very well displayed.

Agee has reduced the painters of the American scene to an elegant minority, which is misleading: he should either have left them out entirely or given them a representative showing. As it is, Thomas Hart Benton, a Midwest Jacopo Bassano—not Tintoretto, as has been suggested—is perfunctorily shown by one tight little painting, and John Stuart Curry's violence (hogs fighting a snake, a tornado) is missing, and missed, from his slack, fat "Wisconsin Landscape." Grant Wood's "Daughters of the Revolution" was not only painted outside the decade, in 1942, it is not one of the artist's livelier pieces. This quiet caricature, one of Ben Shahn's Sacco and Vanzetti paintings and Louis Gugieli's "Izaak Walton in Brooklyn" (a man fishing in a gutter) are overmild samples of the social art of the period.

Protest art in New York in the sixties is becoming a matter of intention; an artist does his thing, and makes a statement or shows it in a context that confers militancy as his standard product. In the thirties, iconography carried the message, but such imagery is missing from this review of the aesthetic thirties. The public imagery of the WPA is dropped, and so, except for one Pollock ("Birth"), is the Mexican influence. It may be that Agee did not have space for wall-sized paintings, but the iconography of the murals recurs in easel painting. (There are, also, non-WPA murals, with interesting themes, such as Paul Feeley's, which could have been represented by studies and oil sketches.)

MUSIC/David Hamilton

Mr. Hamilton is music editor for W. W. Norton, and for some time he has contributed regularly to High Fidelity. Benjamin Boretz is on leave for this season, but he will write occasionally in the next several months.

For those who have long since abandoned the Metropolitan Opera as anything more than a museum operation, the musical-theatre season's most disappointing event to date was not the choice of Cileà's tedious Adriana Lecouvreur as the museum's first showing; this merely confirmed a suspicion that the curators are wanting in taste (or perhaps in integrity—for it is widely believed that this particular opera is staged here only at the insistence of its leading lady). It was, rather, the choice of Gounod's Faust to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the New York City Opera, which evoked an unwelcome suggestion that Lincoln Center's smaller company is now placing more emphasis on the "museum repertory" than on its past reputation for broadening (even if sometimes erratically) the musico-theatrical experiences of New York audiences. In particular, the comparison between the "gala" treatment accorded Gounod's opera (October 17) and the left-handed introduction of Hugo Weisgall's Nine Rivers from Jordan on a subscription evening (October 9) was an unsettling omen of the way the wind may be blowing at the City Opera.

It is possible that the cash outlay for the new opera (settings, production and rehearsals) exceeded that for the old one, but it was insufficient in terms of the only standard that matters—doing justice to the requirements of librettist and composer. That the musical performance came anywhere near to giving satisfaction was due to the Herculean efforts of the enormously capable and professional conductor, Gustav Meier, who was making his debut with the company. He seemed able to cue virtually everything that happened (as well as a few things that failed to happen on schedule), without ever losing a sense of impetus and a control of the music's progression. On the other hand, the basic-set production rarely clarified the action and often—as unit sets are apt to do unless planned with great skill—succeeded in obfuscating plot matters not excessively clear to begin with. Similarly, the management of stage action in the crucial second act was imprecise and unilluminating.

The theme of Denis Johnston's libretto (drawn from his novel of the same title)—the responsibility of an individual in the face of Nazism's atrocities—was adorned with, but not integrated into several layers of symbolic reference that failed to become dramatically operative; and Weisgall's music, for all its probity of craftsmanship and impressive continuity of texture, progressively lost musical impulse as the theatrical abstraction increased (the hour-long first act maintained strikingly greater consistent interest than its briefer successors). Even if all the singers had projected the text as successfully as did Joshua Hecht, if the climaxes of the second act had achieved a real weight of sound (a notable lapse by the designer was the failure to provide risers for the chorus at this point), and if the staging and lighting had articula-

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

11-18-68

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $1 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

ted the dramatic levels more clearly, the opera's basic problems would have remained. Nevertheless, such a serious new work deserves better treatment than this one received.

Whether Nine Rivers from Jordan could have stood all the detailed care with which Faust was invested by Frank Corsaro's staging is a question. Doubtless many members of the opera public are delighted by new visual counterpoints to the music they know by heart, and less knowledgeable viewers surely relish the redundant pantomiming of details already explicit in the texts they cannot understand: but the more perceptive in both categories are bound to be confused by those passages where Corsaro's genuinely inventive flair for clarifying action and defining character relationships carries him beyond the limits laid down by the music. As at the end of Act I in Corsaro's version of La Traviata, where the return of Alfredo and his acceptance by Violetta are specifically ruled out by Verdi's ingenious and dramatically functional treatment of a musically traditional repetition, so the de-supernaturalization of Mephistopheles and the non-apotheosis of Marguerite in this production fail to carry out direct implications of the score and its style.

The best reasons for attending this revival are two exceptional performances that do complete justice to Gounod's elegant music as well as to the dramatic design: the Marguerite of Beverly Sills, whose spontaneous musicianship and impeccable vocal technique equal the combined resources of most of her Metropolitan opposite numbers rolled together, and the Mephisto of Norman Treigle.

Other forms of theatre with music have been visible in New York recently, under less probable auspices. The opening concert in Hunter College's "New Image of Sound" series, performed by members of the Buffalo Center for the Creative and Performing Arts (October 31), was "structured almost as a progression from straight concert performance to theatre," according to the program notes. In this particular case, the decline in musical interest and craftsmanship at each step along the "progression" was quite striking and disturbing, although I know of no reason why this should be a necessary consequence of the introduction of verbal and visual elements. Following Ives's little Hallowe'en (performed straight), György Ligeti's Nouvelles Aventures provided a further instance of the "musical Gresham's law" that Benjamin Boretz warned of in connection with this series last season

(The Nation, April 15), for the Pop-art oriented audience took audible delight in the visual aspects and thereby managed to drown out many of the subtle coloristic puns that form one of the work's genuinely humorous aspects (it is recorded on Wergo 60022, an import available at some record specialty shops).

Later in the evening, this sort of response proved rather less problematic, for subtle effects were hardly to be found in, say, Lejaren Hiller's Avalanche for Pitchman, Prima Donna, Player Piano, Percussionist, and Pre-recorded Playback. During the greater part of Hiller's work, all the performers spewed forth at top volume a steam of sound undifferentiated in totality and undistinguishable in detail—the pitchman speechifying from an elaborate podium, the prima donna singing and frantically changing costumes (the virtuosity of the costume designer here was the sole element of genuine wit), the player piano pounding, away at "ninety themes from the standard literature 'composed' on an IBM-7094" (for all that could be heard it might as well have been an old Ampico roll of Paderewski playing Rustle of Spring), and so on. Neither here nor in Larry Austin's more soporific The Magicians (a bevy of children monotonously pantomiming, squealing and counting in the shadow of a "psychedelic" mobile, to the accompaniment of occasional film projections and dismally unarticulated electronic "junk sound"—for some forty minutes) could I detect any evidence of willingness to face the genuine and serious problems involved in achieving a significant relationship between music and theatre.

Such a willingness was amply evident in Charles Wuorinen's "masque," The Politics of Harmony, performed at the first concert of the Columbia Group for Contemporary Music (October 28); although not a stage work, this was a dramatic one, in which a genuine progression of musical development could be perceived to parallel the libretto, a highly structured succession of "narrations," "symphonies," "dialogues," "arias" and instrumental episodes. Over the total length of the piece, I found the limited and very special sonorities (from an ensemble comprising two each of flutes, tubas, violins, contrabasses and harps, plus percussion and piano) passed from a strength to a weakness, and there seemed to be some problems of pacing—but also, by contrast with the goings-on at Hunter, ample evidence that a secure musical technique is a useful prerequisite for dramatic composition. It would be regrettable if the immense effort involved in preparing Wuorinen's work (which he conducted himself) were limited to this one performance.

TRAVEL

JET LOS ANGELES/TOKYO R.T. $389. Departing 6:23-69. 39 days. $95 confirms. Send your inquiries c/o AMERICAN ADVENTURE TOURS, 3765 E. Colorado, Pasadena, Calif. 91107. 213/794-8575.

PUBLICATIONS

Read MY TIME IN THE ARMY, the diary of a World War Two soldier. What a draftee experienced, endured, enjoyed, and thought—in 3½ years of army time. $2.95 in paperback; $3.95 in hard covers. Postpaid. Send to: Walter Gustafson, Glen Flora, Wisconsin 54926.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

Advertise Your Needs in The NATION

MALVINA REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

You will enjoy . . .
these books	Little Boxes and Other Handmade Songs	$2.50
	The Muse of Parker Street	$2.50
this LP	Malvina Reynolds Sings the Truth	$3.75
	(Columbia 2614 - Stereo 9414)
You and the kids will enjoy . . .
this book	Tweedles and Foodies for Young Noodles	$1.75
these 45 rpm's	You Can't Make a Turtle Come Out	$1.00
	Morningtown Ride	$1.00

(Postage paid; tax included)

Write: Schröder Music Company, 2027 Parker Street, Berkeley, Ca. 94704

ART

XMAS CARDS AND DIARIES
To Help Achieve Peace . . .
12 cards, beautiful designs by . . . Refrigerator $2.50
Daily App't. Diary—With Anti-War Paintings by—Klee, Rouault, Daumier, Rembrandt, Goya . . . 132 pp., $2.50
Ideal Gifts—(5 for $12)—Check/M.O.
SANE, 331 Park Ave., So., N.Y., 10016

NOUS SOMMES TOUS INDESIRABLES Remember Paris Last May?

Six super reprints of Student Posters —23" x 29". Post paid and insured to you from:

MUR GRAPHIQUE,
275 Bleeker St., N.Y., N.Y. 10014
$11 does it.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1272

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Probably stamped as being the Perfect Knight's defense? (5-5,4)
- 9 and 16 A line meeting a surface might make it to sound somewhat like a point of view with "happenings." (5,2,9)
- 10 I've got mixed up in some trouble to bring something about. (7)
- 11 Hue. (6)
- 12 What the owner might have done, given access. (8)
- 14 This writer is accomplished, finally getting the back rent. (7)
- 15 Seemingly, but not actually. (5)
- 17 Make the cargo separated? (5)
- 19 Listening closely, as Alfred E. Neuman seems to be. (3,4)
- 21 One might on leaving the hotel with an official. (8)
- 23 A number of yarns at the coast? (6)
- 25 See 3 down
- 26 It's a rotten matter to sound the order to continue, almost! (7)
- 27 Letters of identity? (14)

DOWN

- 1 Far-flung sort of dragon depicted by the painter? (9)
- 2 The grid struggle by which all wrongs are corrected? (7)
- 3 and 25 across Through which prisoners were led to trial, but perhaps not as big as it sounds. (3,6,2,5)

- 4 Bring into the wind. (4)
- 5 Legitimate enterprise, illicit enterprise—either should stop, if it comes to this! (10)
- 6 Mohammedan title of the expected one. (5)
- 7 One would have to overcome it before getting away from a 5. (7)
- 8 Have a natural inclination to take care? (4)
- 13 Sits at the first table? (10)
- 15 A couple of cuts might enable you to have things given accommodation. (9)
- 16 See 9 across
- 18 A little devil concerning technique! (7)
- 20 Where one gets express indication of social rank? (7)
- 21 By which the animals entered? (4)
- 22 Associated with German or American tanks. (5)
- 24 Reiterative sound of the chorus. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1271

ACROSS: 1 Downing Street; 9 U-boat; 10 Underline; 11 Lockout; 12 Watties; 13 Exult; 14 Detection; 16 Take cover; 18 Rodeo; 19 Natural; 21 Mennace; 22 Roumanian; 23 Ictus; 24 Berchtesgaden.
DOWN: 1 Double entendre; 2 Woodchuck; 3 Introit; 4 Grunt; 5 Tidewater; 6 Erratic; 7 Thill; 8 Person-to-person; 14 Devilfish; 15 Indicated; 17 Corsair; 18 Running; 20 Thumb; 21 Manse.

PERSONALS

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC. Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

Ronald Coleman

Harvard University Class '68
High School or college student name labels. One thousand gummed labels printed with student's name, school, and class year. Use on envelopes, records, or school work.

Price — One Dollar
Bodega Box 83 San Leandro, Calif. 95177

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

KENNEDY '72 bumper strips. It's never too soon. 3 $1.00. Drum, Box 609, Fairfield, Connecticut.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/81, 50/55, 125/510 and 1,000/575. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

SHOW THE WORLD

You're for peace and love

- the NOW symbol on a leather thong with beads
- suits you and your loving friends...

- pewter or gold finish
- swift delivery, guaranteed

groovy!

$2.00 postpaid

Three for $5.00

PAX, Box 3255

San Francisco, 94119

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74¢ a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10011

242-8400

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ Count me in the good fight for a new one-year (48 issues) subscription at $10, and send me also the new $2.95, 400-page The People's President for only $1 more. I enclose $11.
- ☐ I'll subscribe for one year (48 issues) plus four free bonus issues. I enclose $10. N 11-18
- ☐ I'll subscribe for six months. Here's $6.

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Subscribe to THE NATION now,
and get THE PEOPLE'S PRESIDENT
for only $1 more.

Estes Kefauver said it in 1961: "Every four years the Electoral College is a game of Russian roulette. Once its antiquated procedures trigger a loaded cylinder, it may be too late." Again and again, The Nation has warned of the ancient system's dire dangers.

Can this 18th century antique be "modernized"? Or shouldn't it be junked for direct voting by the people? Neal R. Peirce, of the Congressional Quarterly, covers a hundred such questions in lively detail in his milestone new book, The People's President.

Want to rescue the White House from the System and give it to the people? Join the Good Fight now with a one-year new subscription to The Nation, and get this not-to-be-missed book for only $1 more.

UNSAFE IN ANY ELECTION YEAR!

Why after '68 we can't risk the 1787-model Electoral College design for disaster.

Now yours for
only $1.00
with a new one-year
subscription to

THE NATION

BURLINGAME
NOV 23 1968
LIBRARY

SMOTHERS BROTHERS PHIL KERRY

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 25, 1968 35 cents

269K R-537
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

Atlanta Turkey

Thanksgiving in the Hoosegow

BENEDICT KIELY

HOW WE VOTED—and WHY

ANGUS CAMPBELL

Workers & Welfare THE POOR AGAINST THEMSELVES

RICHARD A. CLOWARD and FRANCES FOX PIVEN

Blacks and Students: Critics of Society

T. B. BOTTOMORE

Why Produce Lear? HAROLD CLURMAN

LETTERS

Franco's peace?

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: After reading your editorial entitled "Franco's Price" (Sept. 30), I feel it my duty to clarify quite a number of inaccurate and misleading statements. . . . Your editorial writer seems to know more than the official spokesmen—of the Pentagon, the State Department and the Spanish Embassy—when he unhesitatingly states that "Franco's invoice includes $1 billion in military aid over a period of five years." Could you be kind and fair enough to publish the source of that information? I seriously doubt that any of the three organizations above mentioned could be quoted. . . .

Circles close to the State Department and Pentagon will both confirm that through these negotiations, Spain has not requested aid stated in a specific sum of dollars. Spain has explained and clarified its defense requirements, and has insisted on an attempt to obtain a clear guarantee of security. Furthermore, who can put a price upon a World War II destroyer? . . .

Finally, I would like to refer your writer to the 175 American corporations which have branches in Spain. Let him ask why they are investing capital in my country. I will mention just one reason which is not of an essentially economic nature: Spain has been at peace since 1939, and enjoys this peace because of Franco. . . . Jaime de Urzaiz, Counselor of Information, Spanish Embassy

The Nation did not receive its information from any of the official sources suggested by Mr. Jaime de Urzaiz, but rather from the press coverage of Washington affairs. We assume that, as information officer of the Spanish Embassy, he must be familiar with the same sources. The Editors

two wrongs

Tokyo, Japan

DEAR SIR: Has it occurred to anyone that Japan is the "free-world's" Czechoslovakia? Consider. The United States regards Red China in the same way that Russia regards West Germany, and insists on stationing troops in Japan (including Okinawa) just as Russia does in Czechoslovakia.

Again, Japanese overtures to China (better trade relations, possible diplomatic recognition, etc.) raise the same howls of protest from the Chinese Ulbricht in Taiwan that Prague's liberalization policy did in East Berlin.

Finally, if through democratic means, Japan were, hypothetically speaking, to attempt to adopt its own independent "road to socialism," the United States—the "visible" as well as the "invisible" government—could hardly be expected to stand idly by. Greece alone should tell us that. . . . Two wrongs, it is true, don't make a right; but let's not kid ourselves about their existence. Abraham Glucksman

hawks of a feather

New York City

DEAR SIR: Helen Mears, in her letter [The Nation, Nov. 4], points out that Richard Nixon, as well as Curtis LeMay, has declared the use of nuclear weapons acceptable. It is only fair to add that this has also been the official and publicly proclaimed position of the United States, at least under the Johnson Administration:

Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara told House members in testimony published yesterday that the United States will use nuclear weapons "in any situation in the world when we believe it is desirable to use them in our own interest."—The Washington Post, May 15, 1965. Alice Alt

EDITORIALS

Moment of Truth

At some point in the Paris talks a rift between Saigon and Washington was bound to take place, and then the reality of the relationship would at last be naked for the world to see. For years Washington has kept up the pretense that we are in Vietnam merely to provide a military shield behind which the South Vietnamese might exercise the right of self-determination. In such matters it is always dangerous to establish a false frame of reference; the lesser or weaker party to the deception may eventually begin to take seriously the "cover story" designed to conceal the actual relationship.

We have not sacrificed 29,000 American lives and spent more than $83 billion in South Vietnam to insure the right of self-determination. We are there in pursuit of the policy, however mistaken, of containing Communist China and safeguarding the sea lanes to Japan, until such time as Japan is in a position to play a significant military role in Asia, particularly in Southeast Asia. But Mr. Rusk and his predecessors could not bring themselves to be candid about our purposes. Then, too, any frank statement of our real purposes might have produced embarrassing political repercussions in Japan, as well as in this country. Now, of course, American spokesmen in Washington and Saigon feel that they have been betrayed, and Secretary Clifford has angrily announced that we will negotiate with or without a South Vietnamese delegation in Paris.

He is right: the negotiations must go forward. But the vice in the relationship between Saigon and Washington has a deeper significance. Our policy makers have never been able to take the South Vietnamese seriously; to them the local leadership has been, at different times, a convenience, an irritation and an irrelevance. This attitude, which is implicit in the current confusion, no doubt contributed to it.

Ambassador Bunker thought he had Thieu's concurrence to the draft of the communiqué issued in Washington; it developed he did not. The Vietnamese contend that they had approved the draft of a counter-communiqué which indicated that they would attend a "preliminary" conference in Paris to discuss procedures, but that the communiqué issued in Washington omitted the qualifying word.

Thieu holds that Mr. Bunker and his deputy, Mr. Berger, must have known that they were required to secure the approval of other officials: How could we have forgotten the provisions of a constitution which we had gone to such pains to initiate, if not to draft? At one of the heated early-hour conferences in Saigon, Thieu is reported to have said to Mr. Berger: "It sounds as though you are the deputy ambassador representing Hanoi instead of the American deputy ambassador to Saigon." But given the real relationship, how could Mr. Berger not resent the reluctance of Thieu and his colleagues to go along with a plan which Washington had approved?

Puppets always resent the puppeteer who, in turn, is always annoyed when the puppets start pulling the strings.

The Shadow Presidency

Under this title in The Nation of September 6, 1965, James MacGregor Burns wrote an article which has become more, not less, timely in the intervening three years. Analyzing the "debility" of the opposition party under the American political system, Professor Burns attributed it to the aggrandizement of the Presidency by the electronic media and other factors, the splitting of the opposition into Presidential and Congressional factions, and the "titular" leadership accorded to the defeated Presidential candidate—which, Burns said bluntly, is "a polite term for being shelved or even repudiated."

The Congressional faction is almost equally impotent by reason of its own internal divisions, the frequent disagreements between Senate and House and, in contrast to the Shadow Cabinet in Great Britain, its lack of institutional structure. In the case that now obtains, when the opposition party is in control of Congress, responsibility and power are divided, and any conflict between the President and Congress has at least the semblance of willful partisanship on the part of the legislators, while the President is almost under compulsion to orient his strategy toward gaining control of Congress in the next election.

Whether the opposition is out all the way, or only in part, the problem is aggravated by the conglomerate nature of American political parties and their chronic programmatic confusion. The remedy would be a competitive shadow Presidency, supported by an adequately structured opposition. A beginning toward such an opposition was made in the 1950s with the creation of the Democratic Advisory Council, which formulated policy, issued position papers and provided collective leadership. Further steps might entail an annual or biennial convention or conference, with power to choose a top opposition leader and revise the program in the light of the unsuccessful campaign and subsequent developments.

In such a program Professor Burns saw a rare opportunity to build new political institutions and generate creative leadership, with a sense of national purpose. But where is the money to come from? Is it too radical to suggest that Congress, which supports the military so generously, might appropriate funds that would be insignificant by comparison for needed political innovation?

The Toronto Daily Star (October 31) reports that Prime Minister Trudeau has offered $195,000 a year in public funds to the three opposition parties for hiring research workers, to the end that criticism of the government may become more constructive. In principle the opposition parties have accepted, while differing (politics, after all, is politics) on the division of the funds. But if the principle is sound in Canada, is it not also sound here?

The Southern Negro Vote

Among the new breed of self-styled revolutionaries who have said farewell to electoral politics "and all that jazz," it is of course heresy to suggest that Southern Negroes are inching along politically. But a glance at the Negro vote in the Southern states is reassuring—if seen in proper

IN THIS ISSUE

November 25, 1968

EDITORIALS

546

ARTICLES

550 How We Voted—and Why

Angus Campbell

553 Atlanta Turkey:
Thanksgiving in the Hoosegow

Benedict Kiely

558 Workers & Welfare:
The Poor Against Themselves

Richard A. Cloward
and Frances Fox Piven

562 The Mothers Said No

Nicolaus C. Mills

563 Smothers Brothers:
Tom, Dick and the Censors

Phil Kerby

564 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

565 Blacks and Students:
Critics of Society

T. B. Bottomore

568 Monday, November 25, 1963
(poem)

Carolyn Stoloff

569 Camus as Himself

Donald Lazere

570 Snow (poem)

W. H. Howarth

571 Moral Semi-Paralysis

Robert G. Sherrill

572 Art

Lawrence Alloway

573 Theatre

Harold Clurman

575 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor

PHIL KERRY

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor

HELEN VELESIA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 18

perspective. In these states Negroes won seventy new posts, including seven seats in state legislatures. In the region they now hold something like 370 elective offices. For the first time since the turn of the century, Florida and North Carolina have a Negro each in their legislatures. In Georgia, Negroes gained three additional seats in the lower House of the state legislature, and in Tennessee they acquired two seats in the state Senate. They also won election to such offices as justice of the peace and county commissioner, with about half of their victories coming in Alabama and Mississippi. Some seventeen of the eighty candidates sponsored by the new National Democratic Party in Alabama were victorious.

This may not be sensational progress, but it is impressive when one recalls that not so long ago Negroes were afraid to register in these states except in selected communities. And the Negro turn-out in the region is the more impressive because the "choices" offered in most of the races were not such as to arouse much enthusiasm among blacks. In Arkansas, the Negro vote seems to have been responsible for the re-election of Governor Rockefeller, as well as Senator Fulbright who, in this campaign, actively sought their vote. Rep. Richard H. Fulton was re-elected from the 5th C.D. in Tennessee largely with the aid of Negro voters; in some sections Negroes voted for him in the ratio of 1,000 to 20. In North Carolina, Rep. Nick Galifianakis (5th C.D.) was returned with strong Negro support.

Negro gains in the South must, of course, be measured against the fact that Wallace carried six Southern states, but his vote thinned out noticeably in the rim of the South and border states. The potency of the Negro vote will increase in national calculations if the electoral college is abolished and with it the practice of giving all of a state's electoral votes to whoever carries the popular vote.

In an editorial introduction to a special issue on the Southern Negro voter (September 27, 1952), we said: "When Negroes are able to vote in the South in the same ratio as they now vote in the North and West, the liberal movement may experience another upsurge similar to the New Deal." That day is not yet, but it is rapidly approaching. If the elements outside the South who backed the voter-registration drives will continue their support, and if they begin to contribute to selected Negro candidacies and to campaigns in which the Negro vote is likely to be decisive, the landscape of Dixie politics can be substantially changed between now and 1972.

The Great German Spy Farce

If big-time international snooping were not such a deadly business, a musical comedy could be written about the current spy scandal in West Germany. It has shaken NATO to its depths—which these days, to be sure, are not very deep. So far, six West German Government officials, three of them high-ranking military officers including an admiral and a general, have been apparent suicides, five arrests have been made, and six suspects have fled behind the iron curtain. Without desiring to interfere in West Germany's internal affairs, a well-wisher might suggest that possibly its five or more separate counter-espionage organizations may be tripping over one another's feet.

The German spy scare appears to be connected with the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia. Defections among Czechoslovak officials are said to have included one senior intelligence officer, who presumably blew the whistle on members of a Soviet spy ring. The suicides followed.

The case of Rear Admiral Hermann Luedke, 57, is the most interesting. He was implicated when a Bonn photographic shop discovered nine pictures of secret NATO documents on the same roll with vacation shots of Luedke's family. Since Luedke would have had to be grotesquely absent-minded to send such material to a commercial developer, it has been suggested that he was first framed and then murdered. In the other cases, where suicide is not in doubt, the West German Government is trying hard to find respectable motives—like fear of cancer or unhappy love affairs; anything but espionage.

Whether murdered or dead by his own hand, Luedke knew a lot. According to a story in the November 3 Washington Post, he was responsible for, and had access to, all NATO tactical nuclear weapons depots, ammunition, fuel and arms dumps, and port, railway and other logistical resources. If it turns out that he was a spy, far-reaching adjustments will have to be made. As one example, NATO's 16,000 tactical nuclear warheads may have to be relocated.

The biggest joke of this grim business was the theft of a U.S. Sidewinder missile, with some pieces of navigational equipment, from a NATO base in West Germany. The thieves simply cut a hole in the fence, loaded the 165-pound missile on a wheelbarrow, and trundled it off to a waiting car. It was then disassembled and shipped to Moscow by air freight. But probably it was no great prize: many Sidewinders have been lost over North Vietnam, and presumably the Russians had samples.

Breaking the Code

Employees of large American corporations display a fervid loyalty to the "firm" that is matched only by the dedication of American politicians to the "team." There is no doubt something appealing about this extension of schoolboy sentiment into adult life, but there is little appealing about the results. Too often, it means that the only people who know where the body is buried are prevented by their somewhat arrested sense of honor from giving the hiding place away. Furthermore, the American abhorrence of "snitching" applies about equally to telling teacher who put the thumbtack on her chair and telling a government committee about practices that may cost consumers millions a year. Neither informant can expect much protection from public opinion.

Thus Jerry W. Finefrock, who dropped out of UCLA as a junior three years ago and went to work for General Telephone Co., installing equipment out of their Long Beach, Calif., office, is a hero of our times. General Telephone is the largest independent phone company in the country—large enough to appeal to the California State Public Utility Commission for a $46 million annual rate increase. When the PUC met to consider this request, Mr. Finebrock appeared before it with a 26-page statement on rates, quality of service and installation charges. On the last of these (with which presumably his work had given him some familiarity) Finebrock testified that company charges for such items as colored phones, amplifiers for the deaf, extra jacks, etc., could fairly be reduced or eliminated, to save customers $1 million a year.

The company promptly suspended Finebrock pending "analysis" of his testimony, and Finebrock called a press conference (when boy bites company, it is news). At this meeting it was announced that his suspension was being taken to the NLRB and the American Civil Liberties Union. Finebrock's union is also meeting on the case.

But perhaps the most interesting information that came out of the press conference was the news that Finebrock, though acting alone before the PUC, was a member of an organization among General Telephone employees known as the Telephone Underground. This group was formed "because we felt very strongly that action is needed to insure that General Telephone, in its rates and procedures, serves the public interest." The company, Mr. Finebrock added, "has discouraged all our previous efforts for change."

Efforts for change is what the revolt of youth is all about. And the current activity of Jerry Finebrock suggests that the revolt may not be definable much longer in terms entirely of campus impieties or long hair.

Puerto Rico's New Politics

The political upset which has swept Luis Muñoz Marín's perennial Popular Democratic Party from power foretells a stormy and intriguing political future for Puerto Rico. Statehood enthusiast Luis Ferré, who in launching a fourth campaign for governor had begun to resemble a tropical Harold Stassen, has had the last laugh. His new party won both the governorship and control of the House of Representatives, as well as many mayoralty races.

This drama was preceded by a kaleidoscopic shifting in political alignments on the island. Mr. Ferré himself, in an effort to broaden his "one issue man" image—in the absence of any overwhelming sentiment for statehood—played down his former affiliation with the Statehood Republican Party and won his victory as the head of the recently organized New Progressive Party. On the PDP side, Gov. Roberto Sánchez Vilella first promised to retire at the end of his term (in the wake of the "scandal" of his divorce and remarriage), later changed his mind and then was rejected by the PDP old guard, headed by Muñoz. The bosses were still nursing resentment at what they felt had been Sánchez's attempt to shelve them in favor of younger men in the party. Sen. Luis Negrón López, then Senate majority leader, was chosen instead of Sánchez to head the PDP ticket. Sánchez, stung by this brusque treatment, vowed to run anyway, and became the candidate of still another new group, the People's Party. Many voters were offended at having their governor, whose public record was adequate, so unceremoniously bounced. And much of this resentment turned to cynicism as Muñoz rushed madly about the island, making nonstop speeches and all but obliterating the lackluster Senator Negrón. That Sánchez found a potent issue in "bossism" was indicated by his respectable 81,800 votes—compared with 390,964 for Ferré and 367,355 for Negrón, despite domestic embarrassments and the loss of a viable political base.

With Muñoz, architect of the commonwealth status, retaining his leadership of the Senate, and Ferré already making clear his intention to push for statehood, the stage is set for fireworks in the months ahead. Puerto Rico's future status is the major issue at stake. TRAVIS PUGH

Song of the Rails

Our grandparents tell nostalgic stories of journeys by train across great sweeps of the American landscape: the humming Pullmans, the gleaming diners, the observation cars from which one could watch the land unroll to the syncopated click of the rails. Our grandchildren may well have like experiences to recall. We are the couple of generations in between that were forced onto the turnpikes and into the air by an industry that did not want our patronage and treated us like second-class citizens when we insisted on offering it.

Obviously, we exaggerate. The automobile and the airplane are not the products merely of railroad obduracy but the current agonizing congestion of highways and airports may well be caused by the fact that the average American these days boards a train (when he can still find one that will take him where he wants to go) in a spirit of well-based dejection.

Over the past ten years, 500 trains have been dropped from the country's timetables. This reduction of service, because of such factors as arrival and departure times, connections and public expectations, has a further depressing effect on surviving trains, and year by year the attrition continues. In the end, if the companies have their way, there will be no rail passenger service at all in the world's most highly industrialized nation.

The roads claim they lose millions carrying people, that the only thing they can move at a profit is freight. And the Interstate Commerce Commission, which allegedly regulates the railroads and permits them to drop their trains, has always gone along. But last month the ICC issued a report which stated that, for the years 1954-67, passenger service incurred much smaller losses (in some years there was a slight profit) than is alleged by the roads. Outcries from the carriers were immediate, loud and reproachful. The ICC had betrayed them by adopting practices of bookkeeping considered blasphemous by all devout railroad accountants. It is foolhardy for laymen to intervene between warring bookkeepers, but anyone reading both sides of the controversy can make a shrewd guess as to the true state of affairs: the shipping of people, now unprofitable, could perhaps be made modestly profitable by some display of management enterprise approximating the current revamping of Canadian National's passenger service; but it is unlikely that this branch of the business could ever match the money to be made from shipping goods. Therefore, the railroads have been stubbornly displaying their passenger deficits as hemorrhages bleeding the industry white, the better to frighten the ICC into letting them lap up the unadulterated cream of the freight profits.

This comes under the heading of Yankee ingenuity, or the public be damned, and is not to be criticized in the land of free enterprise. Except that railroads are a free enterprise of a particular sort. They enjoy franchises and they operate in the public interest under federal jurisdiction. Congress in the past weeks has been buzzing with the FCC report, and legislators—who enjoy riding today's trains as little as do their constituents—are muttering that something had better be done.

What may very well be done will evoke still shiller cries of outrage. Rep. Thomas M. Pelly of Washington has suggested in a speech to the House that, if the railroads cannot bring themselves to transport the public under conditions of suitable comfort and convenience, the government will have to take over the facilities. If it does so, it will take them, of course, lock, stock and freight revenues—and the private owners will have no one but their bookkeepers to blame.

Leo Huberman (1903-1968)

There were times, as during the era of Joe McCarthy, when one thought of Leo Huberman as perhaps the last American Socialist. But thanks in no small measure to his activities and writings—to his extraordinary persistence, courage and undaunted faith—the small band of authentic American Socialists has increased until socialism is, once again, a live option. He was a Marxist humanist, a Socialist who avoided sectarian ties, the better to concentrate on the task to which he devoted most of his life: testing Marxist insights in the study of American conditions, refining these insights, and convincing an ever larger intellectual audience of their relevance.

Huberman was a notably clear-headed thinker, never sentimental, never malicious, never dogmatic. In part his socialism derived from the generous tradition of William Morris; his taste in food and clothes and furnishings, as well as his manners, showed this influence. As a writer, and above all as an editor, he placed great emphasis on clarity and precision; you might disagree with him but you never had any difficulty understanding what he thought. His books—Man's Worldly Goods, We, The People and The Labor Spy Racket, among others—formed part of the initiation process by which thousands of Americans became aware of the kind of world in which they lived, and acquired a working knowledge of the nature of a capitalist economy.

Co-founder with Paul Sweezy of Monthly Review (1949) and Monthly Review Press (1952), he sustained the major administrative and managerial burdens of these important ventures. But to The Nation, Leo Huberman meant a great deal more than this brief statement implies; he was a good friend, a neighbor (Monthly Review shared part of our office space for some years), a friendly critic and preceptor, known, respected and admired by all of us.

New York residents may want to attend the memorial meeting for Leo Huberman to be held on December 2, 8 P.M., at the Community Church, 40 East 35th Street.

HOW WE VOTED—AND WHY

ANGUS CAMPBELL

Mr. Campbell is director of the Survey Research Center, University of Michigan, which has been studying Presidential elections since 1948. He is the author, with others, of The American Voter (Wiley).

Election returns tell who was elected but they do not say why. The 1968 returns do show, however, that the election was remarkable in a number of ways, and we may be able to discern something of the character of the electoral decision by examining some unusual aspects of the vote.

Most obvious is the fact that the Democrats carried both Houses of Congress while the Republican nominee was winning the Presidency. Mr. Eisenhower had a similar experience in 1956, but this kind of split in the vote has not happened to an incoming President since the establishment of the two-party system in 1860. Not only did the Democrats win but in the House of Representatives, which is more sensitive to current voting moods than is the Senate, they held virtually all their earlier majority. In other words, although the electorate turned down Mr. Humphrey it did not abandon the Democratic Party.

The fact that the Democrats held their House majority is certainly extraordinary in view of the many evidences of political disaffection which one saw in the latter stages of the Johnson Administration. The Democrats suffered severe losses in the House in 1966. Then followed two years of turmoil in American cities and the bloody stalemate in Vietnam; an extension into 1968 of the Democratic decline of 1966 would not have been surprising. But it did not occur, perhaps for a reason which was not anticipated. Over the years the vote for the House has not been as volatile as that for the Presidency. The Presidential vote is more influenced by the personal qualities of the candidates than is the Congressional vote, which more heavily depends on the standing party commitments of the electorate. Nevertheless, a swing toward a popular Presidential candidate often produces votes for the Congressmen running on the ticket with him. This is precisely what did not happen in 1968.

There was undoubtedly a swing away from customary voting habits in this election, but it did not primarily benefit either of the major party candidates; it went very heavily to George Wallace. Despite early predictions that the Wallace candidacy would mainly attract conservative Republican voters, it now seems clear that Mr. Wallace drew a large proportion of his votes from people who would ordinarily have voted Democratic. These Democrats voting for Wallace were not given the opportunity to support his American Independent Party ticket at the Congressional level; there were no candidates. Apparently most of these voters, having made their protest at the Presidential level, then dropped back to their accustomed support of the Democratic ticket, including the candidates for Congress. Thus the Democratic Party escaped the punishment which it would ordinarily have suffered in an election in which its Presidential candidate ran so poorly.

What the Democratic majorities in the Congress portend for Mr. Nixon remains to be seen. It is relevant, however, that Nixon is the first "genuine" Republican to be elected to the White House in forty years. The eight years of the Eisenhower administration do not provide a realistic comparison. Eisenhower appeared before the public as a man who stood above party and ran on the Republican ticket largely as a matter of convenience. He was, moreover, a man of such towering prestige and affection in the public mind that he was virtually above criticism. The Democrats were afraid to touch him for fear of reprisals from the electorate. Richard Nixon might well wish he were in this enviable position. It is hard to think of anyone since Senator Taft more deserving of the title "Mr. Republican" than the President-elect. He comes to the White House from a lifetime of identification with the Republican Party, whose battles he has fought with devotion, tenacity and an aggressive partisan spirit. We will now see a confrontation between a Republican President and the Democratic Party that has had no parallel since the administration of Herbert Hoover.

Nixon not only has the problem of a Democratic Congress; he also comes to national leadership as the choice of a minority of the electorate. Not since the election of Woodrow Wilson in 1912 has a President been elected with so small a proportion of the total vote. It is a wry fact that in losing to John F. Kennedy in 1960 Nixon received a considerably higher proportion of the popular vote than he did in winning against Hubert Humphrey. It is often said that Kennedy felt restricted in the initiative he could take because of his narrow electoral victory. It would not seem in character for Nixon to want to fill a mere caretaker role as President, yet it seems clear that his ability to exploit the potential of the office is seriously compromised by the conditions of his election. He can neither command the loyalty of the majority party in the Congress nor draw strength from a mandate of the electorate. It will require prodigies of leadership on Nixon's part to overcome the disabilities which the national vote has imposed upon him.

The contribution of George Wallace to all this can hardly be overestimated. His 13 per cent of the national vote is the largest a third party has achieved since Theodore Roosevelt undertook to defeat Wilson and Taft in 1912. The Alabamian's appeal was strongest in the South and weakest in New England and the Far West. Precinct data indicate that outside the South he drew most heavily from areas which would ordinarily be expected to vote Democratic. Preliminary survey findings provide evidence that the Wallace votes came much more commonly from Democrats and self-styled independents than they did from Republicans. Republicans have shown themselves in earlier elections to be more difficult to move than Democrats or independents. The evidence is that in 1968 they stood far more solidly with their party's nominees than the Democrats did with theirs.

One might be tempted to conclude that had George Wallace not been on the ballot in fifty states Hubert Humphrey would have won the Presidency handily. But that Albany Times Union (N.Y.).

"Thank God They Stopped Bombing Us on Tuesday!"

implies the improbable assumption that the vote for Wallace was for him, specifically, and would have been given to Humphrey if Wallace had not been there. It is more likely that the vote for Wallace was in the main a protest and a renunciation of the Democratic Administration, and that a large part of it would have gone to Nixon if Wallace had not been on the ballot. It became evident very early in this electoral year that the Johnson Administration had built up a formidable stockpile of resentment and ill will within the electorate, and that 1968 was not a propitious year to inherit the Democratic nomination. The American electorate has shown before that when it is displeased with the head of an incumbent party it has a predictable tendency to vote against that party. Nixon followed the classical strategy of attempting to exploit these grievances without being too specific in his proposed solutions. His rhetoric was not as violent as Wallace's, but it bore on the same issues. Wallace's post-election statement that Nixon had said "almost identically the same things we were saying in the campaign" exaggerates the similarity of their appeals, but both candidates had been playing variations on a theme.

Of course no one can say how many of the Wallace supporters would have found Nixon a satisfactory choice if Wallace had not been available. The strongest indication of where those votes would have gone comes from preliminary survey data which make it possible to compare the political attitudes of those respondents who were intending to vote for Humphrey, Nixon or Wallace. On questions of welfare legislation, Medicare, aid to education and guaranteed employment. Humphrey supporters were far more favorable than either Nixon or Wallace people, who did not differ greatly from each other. The Wallace supporters were very critical of the nation's foreign policies and very hawkish on Vietnam; in both respects they resembled Nixon supporters more than those favoring Humphrey. On questions of racial integration and civil rights, Humphrey supporters were clearly more favorable than Nixon people and the Wallaceites were by some distance the least favorable. In all these respects those intending to vote for Wallace stood much closer to Nixon supporters than to those favoring Humphrey. More than a third of them reported that they had voted for Goldwater in 1964. Would they have seen Humphrey as being closer to their point of view if they had had to choose between him and Nixon? It seems hardly plausible. George Wallace attracted the votes of a great many people who were out of sympathy with the Democratic Administration and all its works, and had he not been there to receive them, Nixon would almost certainly have been the principal beneficiary.

An additional attribute of the vote tells us something about the election. The total turn-out at the polls appears to have been about 72 million. This means that somewhat less than 60 per cent of the adult population exercised their franchise, the lowest turn-out record in a Presidential election since the phenomenally low one in 1948. That year, it will be remembered, neither major-party candidate stirred much enthusiasm; Harry Truman had been nominated with great reluctance by the Democrats and Thomas Dewey had lost decisively for the Republicans in 1944. The choice apparently bored a considerable proportion of the electorate, and there was obviously something of this same reaction to the election just past. Many Democrats would have preferred a nominee not closely identified with the Johnson Administration; some Republicans would have liked a fresher face than Nixon's. There was a good deal of bitter talk on the college campuses and in some of the liberal magazines about the irrelevance of the Humphrey-Nixon choice. In the end this alienation and apathy did not have as depressing an effect on the vote as it had earlier threatened, and it is likely that the swing toward Humphrey, which the polls recorded during the last few days of the campaign, was made up largely of disgruntled Democrats who finally decided it was better to support their party's ticket than not to vote at all.

With the election over and the issue of the Presidency settled for the next four years we may look back at some of the predictions made in the last few months regarding the future of the American system of choosing a Chief Executive. In the immediate aftermath of the Chicago imbroglio many unhappy Democrats were insisting that the convention system would have to go, to be replaced presumably by some system of national primaries. It would require an act of Congress to impose such a system on the states, and it does not seem likely that the new Congress will have much enthusiasm for any such revision of established practice. The conventions will probably remain with us for some time to come. Much of their madhouse quality could be eliminated by the obvious expedient of cutting the size of the state delegations by 50 per cent or more. It would also contribute to political sanity if a way could be found to restrict television to simple reporting rather than the reporting-cum-fomenting at which this group of the press has become so adept.

Much of the criticism of the convention system has come from followers of Eugene McCarthy who appeared to feel there was something basically undemocratic in the fact that their man—who had presented himself to the people in primaries throughout the country—was defeated by a man who had not won a single primary election. But these people have not always found this situation so offensive. It was, after all, Senator McCarthy himself who put the name of Adlai Stevenson in nomination only eight years earlier, although Governor Stevenson had not entered any of the preceding primaries. One may ask whether the grievance is actually with the convention system or with its specific choice in 1968.

There have also been a number of apocalyptic statements regarding the future of the two-party system and its failure to present meaningful alternatives to the electorate. The fact is that more than 9 million people voted for an alternative to the two major parties in this election. The various left-wing candidates for the Presidency drew few votes, and little promise exists of a serious party development to the Left of the Democrats. The potential at the other extreme seems far more real and George Wallace's 9 million supporters may well be the advance guard of a full-blown right-wing party.

The extraordinary difficulty of establishing a third party in the United States is best attested by the fact that for the past hundred years it has not happened. The problem of building an organization of true believers that extends down to the precinct level is overwhelming, especially when the organization cannot provide any immediate political rewards. Perhaps if Wallace undertakes to build on the impressive showing he made in this election he may be able to fashion the party apparatus and the mass following necessary for the continuing development of his party. Certainly there have been repeated demonstrations over the past twenty years that a fraction of the electorate is prepared to break away from the two-party pattern to support a right-wing candidate.

There is great respect in this country for the durability of the institutions of our party system and the power of the two established parties; it would thus be foolish to imagine that they will yield readily to pressure for change. But the Wallace vote this year was the most serious departure from a straight two-party vote we have seen in more than fifty years. Was this due to the particular genius of George Wallace? Was it a reflection of the out-of-jointness of this particular time? Did it reveal a growing alienation among people who feel the country is changing too fast? One cannot say at this point what precisely the Wallace vote meant, but it has shown beyond question that the two old parties are vulnerable to attack from the Right.

The one change in the rules of Presidential politics which is likely to come out of this election is a revision of the law regarding the electoral college. The long period of uncertainty during the counting of the vote as to whether Nixon would in fact reach the required 270 total, the rumors of "deals" which would be offered if he did not, and the threat of legal action if a deal were made gave the whole problem of the electoral college an immediacy it has not had before. We shall almost surely see the Congress take up this issue, and it may turn out to be a thorny one. If a proposal were made to replace the electoral college with a simple majority of the national vote we might find ourselves hung up on the same division of large states and small states which plagued the Constitutional Convention nearly 200 years ago. There may be enough small states unwilling to give up the power they now have (in the event an election goes to the House of Representatives) to make it impossible to pass the required amend-

ATLANTA TURKEY

THANKSGIVING IN THE HOOSEGOW

BENEDICT KIELY

Mr. Kiely is the author of Captain With the Whiskers (Criterion) and Dogs Enjoy the Morning (Gollancz), among other books.

Atlanta

I was walking one day with the late Brendan Behan, in Dublin, in the general direction of a house of refreshment that used to be called, rather mysteriously, "The Old Grinding Young." It was a day of rain and depressed low skies, and a bad Fianna Fail budget; and myself as depressed as the skies. So I said: "If things, Brendan, go on as they're going, like rising prices, rates, taxes, I mean we'll all be in jail for debt."

But it was difficult to be depressed in the presence of Brendan. He knelt down on the rainy pavement, clasped his hands and raised his eyes to the watery heaven, and cried: "No, no, sweet Lord. Keep my friends out of jail. Take not from me my greatest advantage as a writer: that I am a jailbird, repentant, but a jailbird." Then he leaped to his feet, draped his jacket shawlwise around his head, embraced me as a mother would an erring son, and sang to all the passers-by: "Don't send my boy to prison, don't send my boy to jail."

I recall this as I sit, or walk—nothing to sit on except naked wire mattresses—in one of the jail houses in the city of Atlanta, capital of Georgia, the Peach State. Beautiful Atlanta, Dogwood City of the South. I look back over the life of crime that led me hither. Why, to begin with, as an altar boy in a faraway Irish town, did I ever yield to temptation by nibbling at the altar wine? But then all my contemporaries did it, and some are bishops now.

"Welcome to Georgia," says the colored folder in my pocket, "the Vacation State! Georgia is the largest state east of the Mississippi. It is the Peanut, Pecan, Pimiento, Paper, Paperboard and Poultry Capital of the United States. . . ." And this is the evening of Thanksgiving Day.

ment to the Constitution. A simple clarification of the obligation of the individual electors to support the candidates in whose name they were elected may be all that Congress will be able to achieve.

This leads to the conclusion that despite the protests and dissatisfaction, despite the disorders and tragedies which have marked political life in this country during the last few months, our complicated system of nominating and electing the President has survived another election and may do so again in 1972. The American public has not been inspired by the election of 1968; some portions of it obviously found the whole process pointless. The next election could bring a new set of faces, which would be a blessing, but it is not likely to bring a new set of rules.

After lunch the nice hospitable young lady had called to take me, the stranger, out and show me the sights of the city. "So we'll walk," I said, "it's the best way to see a city." She paled, but politely agreed; and we walked downtown, our backs turned on green forested suburbia. We walked along the busy, exceedingly ugly main drag, a gigantic Sears Roebuck to the left, red-clay land, ravaged and cleared for more building, to the right, and beyond that a railroad track, and so on. A noble prospect, by heaven. A poster on a hoarding said: "There's more to see and more to do in Georgia." This, we are to find out before Thanksgiving Day was over, is absolutely true.

For in a high hotel at a street corner we stopped for a Thanksgiving drink. Up to this moment I had been carrying in my left-hand pants pocket a billfold containing a little less than $100, and belonging to the lady: carrying it, I may add, for safety because the catch of her handbag, or purse, as they say here, was inclined to come loose. But when we had entered the dining room-cum-bar of the hotel I had put the billfold down on the table at which we sat. It was a spacious dining room. We sat at a table near the door, intending to make only a brief stay. The service bar was in the far corner, diagonally away from us. The place was quiet, almost empty: a blonde lady dining on her own and sitting close to a pillar, her back to us; two small late luncheon parties, one far away, one quite close to us. Thanksgiving Day, like Christmas, is a home-keeping day; for those, that is, who are not strangers in a strange town.

A waitress came; we ordered; a little white wine for the lady, watery American beer for me. It was about three o'clock. We rested and sat and talked for awhile. My umbrella, which—having given away all my blackthorns to friends in Virginia and elsewhere—I was using as a walking stick, was hanging on the rack close to the door by which we had entered.

We talk and laugh and are quite content. It is Thanksgiving Day in the land of the free and the home of the brave, in Atlanta, Ga., a state in which "history abounds . . . in old Savannah, the battlefields of Atlanta, Andersonville. . . . Nature's wonders await you at Stone Mountain, Okefenokee swamp and in Georgia's mountains. . . ." At least that's what the brochures say.

I was discoursing the remnants of my third beer when the lady arose, excused herself in a way that ladies have and adjourned to the powder room to ttitivate in preparation for our departure, to see on Peachtree Street the outside (shops are closed for the holiday) of what she told me is an excellent secondhand book shop, whose owner has been twice in hospitable Dublin where strangers (she has heard), and particularly American strangers, are made so welcome. The owner of this book shop even spent his honeymoon in Dublin.

Since then I have seen the inside of that shop and met the owner, and both have pleased me exceedingly. But on that happy Thanksgiving Day we were not to be allowed to see even the outside of it. For in the privacy of the powder room her ladyship suddenly remembered the billfold with the dollars. It is not in her handbag nor, oddly enough, does she recall seeing it on the table when she left me. On winged feet she returns. It isn't there. Nor have I stolen it. You must believe me. Sitting right there we were, happy on Thanksgiving Day, paying no attention, when the billfold was swiped. How? When? Well, nobody except members of the staff of this elegant hotel in Atlanta, Ga., had approached the table. And where did the billfold, with its almost $100, go?

Longfellow, translating from Michelangelo, who was also a poet in a mild way, dwelt on that diverting topic, the law of the conservation of matter: "Nothing that is shall perish utterly, but perish only to revive again in some new form." In other words, that money was removed from that table in that Atlanta hotel, and brought to somewhere else. Money, as matter, lends itself easily to transformation. It was there in its container, the billfold, when we entered the hotel. Then, all of a sudden, it was not there. It could only have been taken away, from the table we sat at, under the cover of a napkin. Some member of the staff, in fact, stole it.

"O.K.," you say, "you wuz robbed. So what?" But wuz you ever robbed, and then arrested for being robbed, and charged with being drunk because you complained that you had been robbed?

Indignant because she has been robbed, the lady calls a waitress. The waitress, with a face like brass, says the lady should tell the management. So the lady leaves me, and goes prancing off to the reception desk. I sit and wait and wonder and the moments pass, until I grow impatient and arise and, leaving my umbrella behind me, go out looking for the lady—to find her conversing with two pistoleers, or policemen, in the foyer of the hotel. They have just arrested her for being drunk. When I venture a mild tourist's protest, they arrest me for being likewise.

They say, in gracious Southern fashion, to the lady who has been robbed of a billfold and almost $100:

"We're taking you to jail. Drunk." The lady says: "You're kidding."

They are not; and since it is unwise to accuse dashing Southern pistoleers of kidding when they are not, in sober truth, doing anything of the sort, we go with them to inspect the jail. I am, after all, a visitor and am eager to see every aspect of American life. We go, not in a police squad car but in a genuine black maria or paddy wagon, which we have all to ourselves: lady first, and mind the step.

Unquestionably, though, in that black maria or paddy wagon the lady is treated with impeccable Southern courtesy: she isn't struck once. She tells me that she complained to one of the pistoleers about being robbed and that he assured her that that was not possible because we had just been in one of the best hotels in Atlanta. For visitors, I think, to Beautiful Atlanta, Dogwood City of the South, that is, indeed, a comforting thought. Later, she told me that as she sat in solitary confinement a wardress, or policewoman, poked her head into the cell and asked: "You all right now, dearie?" Asked it so nicely, indeed, that the lady hadn't the heart to say that she would be fine and dandy if she but had the liberty she had been wrongfully deprived of and the dollars she had been robbed of in one of the best hotels in Atlanta.

As for myself, heavily escorted by pistoleers I was led or driven to a huge iron cage, as full of folk as Langland's Malvern hillside. Nor was I aware, nor was I informed, that one is legally entitled to ask for a drunkenness test: it seemed scarcely necessary after three watery beers, and all this was happening so rapidly that it was quite as incomprehensible to me as it is to you. This I told myself is what I hear happens in much despised Mexico: you land in jail for nothing, and then the jailers forget all about you and you may stay there forever. But this wasn't Mexico. This was Atlanta, on Thanksgiving Day, with life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Nor was my statement that I was a stranger, a visitor to an eminent college in the neighborhood, listened to with any gratifying attention. At the behest of the manager of the hotel where the money was stolen the pistoleers made up their minds. We have said that we have been robbed, so the easiest way to shut our mouths is to say that we are drunk. The charge is made: I am searched. A nail clipper and a Guinness knife, 2 inches long, were removed and never restored, and the pistoleers afterward denied ever having seen them.

Come with me then on Thanksgiving Day to this iron cage full of folk: bums, drunks, gay young men, sad old men, quiet men who mind their own business and who may, indeed, have some very special business to mind and good reasons for keeping it to themselves. Some talk in groups. Some go solitary. Some lean against the walls. Some sit uncomfortably on bare wire mattresses in a series of lesser cages along one wall of the greater cage. These lesser cages can be locked so as to segregate special prisoners, not on grounds of color—for there are no black men here—but on grounds of obstreperousness or importance in criminality. There is a constant outflow and intake, a clashing of keys and clanking of barred steel doors and, in general, a delightful aspect, seldom seen we hope by the tourist of the night life of Atlanta, Ga.

My tourist brochure, of which the search did not deprive me, assured me that "Families frolic at Jekyll Island, Callaway Gardens or thirty-seven state parks. Pitch your camp in the mountains, plant your toes on the beaches of Georgia's seacoast. . . ."

I got talking with a fellow prisoner from New Orleans. His shirt was striped red and white and bagged out over his pants. There was a streak of blood on his face. "Only a bum," he assured me, "would get arrested in Atlanta. It sure is the end of the world."

Exactly my own thoughts at that moment, but then we who lie in jail may not be inclined to regard highly the locality in which the jail is situated. I reminded him that Lacenaire, the assassin and a true Parisian, when he was apprehended in the French provinces, was perturbed that he might be guillotined there and not, as a civilized man should be, in Paris. The red-and-white man from New Orleans says: "Go on. Say it. What am I in for?"

"The best books say that it isn't etiquette for fellow prisoners to ask each other such questions."

"You an amateur?"

"You might say that. In the business, indeed, by the merest accident."

"Armed robbery," he says, "if you want to know."

"Your business is your business. Every man to his trade."

"Say, I like you, Irish," he says. "Might even like the country you come from. But to let ourselves be arrested in Atlanta. We're a pair of bums."

The reason, I gather, is that Georgian prisons have a sort of unhealthy reputation. In this I am, as yet, not qualified to speak, but my friend could well be an authority. He says: "What you in for?" I tell my story. Next to armed robbery, it doesn't add up to much, but at least it amuses my man from New Orleans. He laughs so immoderately that he then feels it necessary to apologize: "No offense, man. But you and that broad shouldn't be out without a keeper. Want to watch your roll in Atlanta. All the hotels are crooked here. All the bellboys pimps."

"They don't print that on the tourist brochures. They should. It might help a sort of trade."

"That trade don't need no help."

This witty interchange sends him into fits. We are attracting the attention of our fellows. The bipestoled keeper of the keys at the gate of steel eyes us dubiously. It is, perhaps, not the done thing for prisoners to laugh. In good Bible country, too, laughter may be a sure sign of intoxication. This is the merriest robber, if he is a robber, that I have ever met. To keep the laughter going he tells me the story about the sheriff arresting Snuffy Smith up thar in the hillbilly country. The sheriff says, "Snuffy, we have you in here for drinking." Snuffy says: "O.K., sheriff, let's go. Mine's Georgia Moon corn whiskey."

A new arrival is dragged, semi-conscious, through the steel-guarded gateway. It is, by no means, Snuffy Smith. He's a big fellow, and has clearly been to the wars. Half his face is missing or is, at least, a bloody, skinless mess. He has somewhere and from somebody taken a helluva beating. He may have been asking for it but, for sure, he got it: pressed down and flowing over. He may be drunk, or he may just be beaten unconscious. The two pistoleers cast him down, not exactly as his mother would, on a wire mattress, the butchered side of his face on the naked wire. They don't take time to turn him over to the side that isn't cooked. Pistoleers are busy men—what with all the coming and going. They lock him in and, pistol swinging, depart. He'll feel no pain until he awakens and tries to unstick his face from the wire mattress.

"What'd I tell you," says my merry robber. "Get yourself arrested in Georgia. He answered back. Wise guy. That's where it gets him."

He laughed some more at me when I asked him are policemen and prison warders not commonly trained to beat up prisoners so that the marks don't show. Where did I read that, in a book? He may, I feel, be a somewhat prejudiced man in spite of his laughter. For jails are jails the world over, and this one was just then doing a thriving business and it may just have been a little difficult to give close personal attention to the needs, medical or otherwise, of every customer.

There had recently been a considerable debate about the danger of sending out one-man police patrols by night in certain parts of Atlanta. A young police officer has been shot dead by a runaway gunman. But some people argue that two-men patrols would cost the city more than it can afford to spend on police. God knows, these busy, overworked, underpaid police have my sympathy. This particular night, among other urban diversions, four taxi men have been robbed at gunpoint, two of them stripped naked, one of the two, a black man, made to run naked through a white district and told, as was Lot, not to look back.

I feel the full sense of guilt that, while all this holiday fun was going on, myself and my lady companion had had the inconsiderateness to be robbed, to complain of being robbed, to be thereupon charged with being drunk in a public place, and that thereby we distracted those decent, hard-worked rozzers from protecting the taxi men. One-man or two-men patrols? There was no scarcity of police the evening we were arrested. Here before me I have the names of the two officers involved, two Irish names I am interested to note. They were in such a hurry to get back to their proper business that not one question did they ever ask either of us about the stolen money.

Let me count the cost of an evening out for two on Thanksgiving Day in Atlanta, Ga.: as good as $100, plus billfold, robbed from the lady; $15 apiece for bail money when a college colleague comes to bail us out; sundry small sums donated to fellows met during seven hours or so in the cage, tank or stockade. I'm not trying to pose as Croesus, but once in a while you do meet people who are worse off than yourself. There were a few other small sums donated to a fellow prisoner who came to see me after his release: a timid dipsomaniac flying the tatters of old decency. Only recently in Georgia is it being pointed out that dipsomania is not best treated by brutal police roundups and periodic dryings-out in cage, tank or stockade. Here is my last conversation with that poor man. My phone rang at about 4 A.M.:

The Voice: Can you help me, Irish Ben?

Myself: Where are you, Lefty?

Lefty: In this room, in this hotel. Can you ring this guy for me?

Myself: It's a bloody awful hour.

Lefty: He won't mind.

Myself: Can't you ring him yourself, or go to his place?

Lefty: Can't go out on the street, the cops'd pick me up and throw me in the tank again. You ring him, please. I told him about you. Ask him to help me.

This would seem to be the key phrase of the A.A. people. When I ring the man he speaks most civilly, even at that ungodly hour, thanks me, says he'll go over there right away and try to get Lefty back to his people in Tampa. I did not hear from Lefty again and can only assume hopefully that he was returned safely to Tampa. But I do not easily forget the terror in the poor alcoholic devil's voice when he said that he couldn't appear on the streets because the coppers would pick him up. Real friendly guys. An English woman who lives here told me that one morning when she was walking her little boy in a public park she saw the police, doing the routine roundup of bums. They used dogs, sending them under the bandstand to rout out some hapless wretches who had gone to earth there.

Lefty, the alcoholic, was for the moment my last contact with the tank, cage, stockade or jail house. Others, though, stay in my memory. There are two pleasant young men, as sober as judges, who were picked up leaving a downtown bar in a jovial mood, and charged with being drunk in a public place. When I marvel at this, they marvel at my Irish simplicity and try to explain to me the ancient but still much alive Protestant Prohibitionist attitude, not only toward fermented liquor but toward over-demonstrative enjoyment. The bars in this city, I have noticed, are mostly either sleazy dumps with raucous combos, or places of conspiratorial and unwelcoming gloom. These two young men did not seem to think it anything too wonderful to be robbed and then arrested for complaining about being robbed. They say: "You met the wrong guys: that hotel manager, those cops. You were unlucky." They have a point. They even think it funny, in a way. Again, they have a point. Any attempt to protest, through the bars of the cage, against the length or justice of the confinement, or even to inquire about the lady, was treated with the most sublime indifference. My young friends advised me not to pursue the point or I might have sore ribs and bruised kidneys for my pains.

There were two younger men, under 21, arrested for drinking canned beer in a parked automobile. They are in the army, old enough to kill or be killed in Vietnam, but not old enough to drink a can of watery beer. Their girl friends, or dates, two teen-agers, have also been arrested, although they were not even drinking beer. Then there were two quiet tough-looking men who sat side by side on the floor, backs to the wall, and talked to nobody and seldom to each other. Unlike my merry bandit they were telling nothing to nobody, as they say in Belfast; but they stayed in my memory. They have a sort of aura. And it isn't booze. One of them, when he overhears that I come from Dublin, stands up, shakes hand with me, sits down again, resumes his quietude. Those two cops with the Irish names had not shown me any such courtesy.

Then there was a prison guard or policeman, a pimply, pasty-faced fellow who, as I was on my way to the exit, overheard me using jocularly the fatal word: "white." Here is how I came to be so indiscreet. The summons docket with which I was served read thisaway: "Color—W., Sex—N. (the man meant, I hope, to write M). Age—48 (which is a year worse than the truth). So, when the elevator which was bearing me down toward freedom paused to admit Our Lady of the Pilfered Billfold, I said: "Step right this way. You are white, aren't you . . . ?"

That's as far as I got: Pimpled Pastiface was breathing sweet potato down my throat. He asks in the gracious accents of the Old South: "You shuah you sobah?" Politely and prudently, I defer to his judgment. But unmollified, he goes to the man at the desk, the one who signs you out, and says: "You shuah this guy sobah?" He suspects me, I feel and fear, of being Stokely Carmichael, whom I in no way resemble. He seems genuinely chagrined when I am allowed to depart in peace.

Georgia has so much to offer the tourist. Quote: For full information on vacation fun in Georgia for all the family, write: See Georgia First: 100 State Capitol, Atlanta, Georgia, 30303. Unquote.

But now, I am again a free man. So I go home and ring a lawyer. He says: "Do you want to go to court and fight it?"

So I say: "Not particularly. That hotel manager, for whom the police were so obliging, could quite easily produce half a dozen people to prove that I wrecked the dining room and had to be strait jacketed before the police could remove me."

"Sure," he says. "Just sit on your hands. What's another thirty bucks?"

"But what amazes me," I say, "was that being a stranger, and a visitor, and not exactly a drifter, made no difference. Nobody heard me when I said that. Could be they just didn't dig my accent. But where I come from, strangers are sacrosanct. A stranger, and particularly an American stranger, would want to do something for real in Ireland before he'd end up in jail. And if he complained he had been robbed somebody would listen to him."

So the lawyer laughs as heartily as ever did my merry bandit. "You're sweet," he said, "but you're simple. You're also lucky you're in Atlanta. Outside Atlanta, in the state of Georgia, they beat your head in for being a stranger."

My first day of freedom, back I go to that hotel to reclaim my umbrella. With me go the lady and a student of mine who is also a theological student, and who has been in his time a forest ranger in the Great Smokies and in the Far West in Nevada and in Yosemite. The umbrella is safe. We identify ourselves and ask to see the manager. He joins us in the most neighborly fashion. We ask about the stolen money. He is very sorry. He is also very sorry about the police. He says he did not call them in, but is rather bewildered when the lady tells him that she saw him talking to the police before they arrested her. He is not at all convincing. I ask him if it is customary for the Atlanta police to traipse the foyers of the so-called best hotels and to paddy-wagon away customers who complain of being robbed. I say that, by the sacred name of O'Sullivan, it wouldn't happen in the Gresham. He agrees with me. He has heard of the Gresham. He says that if the money is found, he will notify us. (He has never notified us.) He seems unhappy. It is tragic for me that my first close personal contact with Atlantian policemen has left me thinking that they are a crowd of boorish and dishonest bums. After that, how could I trust even Sergeant Joe Friday? But I console myself with the words of Setanta when he was set upon on the green at Emain Macha: "It is on themselves the fault is. I came as a stranger and I did not get a stranger's welcome."

And a happy Thanksgiving, next time round, to all my readers.

THE POOR AGAINST THEMSELVES

RICHARD A. CLOWARD
and FRANCES FOX PIVEN

Mr. Cloward and Mrs. Piven are members of the faculty of the Columbia University School of Social Work.

The New York City Coordinating Committee of Welfare Groups, which mainly represents mothers and children, has just announced a major campaign to recruit poorly paid male workers and their families onto the relief rolls to obtain substantial wage supplements. If the campaign succeeds, it could spread to other cities, providing the basis for a political alliance between the working and non-working poor. Such a coalition of poor people would be a defense against the mounting attacks on the welfare system—attacks spearheaded by better-paid segments of the working and middle class.

New York City's welfare system, the largest in the country, is in for a pummeling—the worst, we suspect, since its staff was purged of “leftists” in the late 1940s. Only this time its ranks may be purged of welfare recipients. Under the insistent prodding of the 175,000-member New York Teamsters Joint Council 16, legislatures at all levels of government have begun “full-scale investigations.” The first to take up the scent was a New York State legislative committee, responding to intense upstate hostility toward the city's poor; now both the City Council and the federal government are tooling up. Significantly, the New York Congressmen who demanded the federal investigation were not satisfied to let HEW conduct it, considering its people to be “in-house” investigators. Therefore, the General Accounting Office, a staff agency for the Congress, has been instructed to supervise the investigation. The intervention of GAO foreshadows renewed interest by Congress in the “welfare problem”; last year that body passed some of the most punitive amendments since the public welfare system was established three decades ago. One amendment requires states to institute compulsory training and employment programs for mothers in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program. Another (the implementation of which has been temporarily postponed) would “freeze” federal reimbursement to the states at the level of the number of AFDC children already on the rolls. Thus, as new families apply, the states will have to choose between rejecting them, accepting them and spreading existing funds among more people, or appropriating more local funds to carry the increase. As antagonism in America mounts toward the poor, especially the black poor, even more repressive measures can be expected.

Behind these probes is a growing political agitation for a “solution to the welfare problem.” The white working class is especially angered by the rising rolls. To white workers, welfare is a “black problem”—arising from the softheadedness of liberals in dealing with the black poor, or the opportunism of politicians in dealing for the black vote. And so with the Teamsters delivering the first blow, a new battle is about to take place between the white working class and the black (and in New York, the Puerto Rican) poor.

The sources of the controversy are easy to see. Welfare rolls are escalating, especially the AFDC rolls. Taking all categories together, the rolls in New York City have almost trebled since 1960, are now rising by about 20,000 each month, and will reach 1 million by the first of the year. Considering the vast migrations of the poor from Puerto Rico and the southern United States, these figures are not surprising. Furthermore, tens of thousands of families who are eligible for assistance are not yet receiving it, so the rise can be expected to continue—that is, unless new restrictions result from the upcoming investigations.

Relatively speaking, the cost of public assistance in America is quite modest—far less than the subsidies to better-off groups. But if welfare accounts for a small percentage of federal outlays, it is often a very large percentage of local expenditures. Even though New York City pays only about 25 per cent of welfare expenses (50 per cent is reimbursed by the federal government, and another 25 per cent by the state), welfare will cost the city about one-third of a billion dollars this year. That seems an intolerable burden in a city already teetering at the edge of bankruptcy.

The working poor carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden, given the regressive character of our tax system (especially local sales and property taxes). A broader view of class inequities would lead the Teamsters to mount an attack on a tax structure which benefits the affluent and victimizes the working class; instead, they attack the welfare poor. For to white working-class people, and even to many black workers, it appears that the welfare recipient is enjoying a free ride on their hard-earned tax dollars, meanwhile scorning the value of work and the self-esteem of workers.

Nor is that the worst of it. The welfare recipient seems to be undermining the financial rewards of work as well. In several Northern states, among them New York, a worker earning the minimum wage who has a nonworking wife and one child takes home less money than is allotted to a comparable family on welfare. For larger families, the advantage of being on welfare is even greater! That this issue provokes intense feeling is clear. “It doesn't pay to work any more!” is the angry complaint. The value of work is being affronted, and that value is deeply ingrained. How else explain the persistence with which those who do the dirtiest work at the most exploitative wage levels apply their shoulders to the wheel? If the working poor are victimized by their pride, they are also embittered by their lot, and it is upon the nonworking underclass that they vent their anger.

Nothing offends working-class spokesmen quite so much as demands by organized welfare recipients for higher levels of benefits, or for full entitlements. Needless to say, they find even more infuriating efforts by client groups to enroll the hundreds of thousands of eligible poor who have not been receiving benefits (usually because they do not know of their entitlements or have been illegally rejected). Welfare supplicants are supposed to be meek and grateful; instead they are confronting their benefactors with aggressive demands. The angry protests of the workers today echo the outrage voiced by the defenders of private property when these same "ungrateful" workers began to organize. Just as those workers, being the victims of the propertied, no longer held property rights to be sacrosanct, so welfare recipients now question the inviolability of work values, for the bulk of them, being the very old or the very young, or mothers or disabled, either cannot or should not work. Each phase of the struggle by the poor for some measure of justice is also a struggle against the catechisms which legitimate exploitation.

The welfare issue is contributing to the polarization of black and white in the cities, for the welfare rolls in the cities are disproportionately black. (Nationally, the AFDC rolls are half white.) But polarization is also partly the legacy of a long history in which blacks were used by employers to depress wages and retard unionization. The black scab is an old enemy—the central figure in a labor lore that goes back to a stevedores' strike in New York in 1855, to a miners' strike in Alabama in 1894, and to a factory strike in East St. Louis during World War I. The hatred lingers, for it is deeply imprinted. Other groups—Chinese, Japanese, Mexicans—have also been made to play the scab role, especially in efforts to break agricultural strikes, but none was used so regularly as the black. With the success of large-scale unionization, white workers had less to fear from strikebreaking. By excluding the blacks from union membership, they were able in many cases to exclude blacks from employment altogether. The New Deal even brought the blacks and whites of the cities together in a political coalition. A brief but uneasy peace followed.

Now the dislocation of blacks from agriculture has aroused the old antagonisms once more. The New Deal coalition, always tenuous, is fragmenting as blacks flood into the cities to threaten working-class residential areas, schools, services and jobs. Black and white are again being turned against one another in competition for scarce resources. And white workers are once again fixing blame on blacks, not on those above them. Once more, the black is cast as scab, not least in the emerging welfare controversy.

One working-class solution to welfare scabbing is to reaffirm the imperative of work—the slogan will be, "Put them to work!" Congress already sensed this rising sentiment a year ago when it enacted provisions requiring the states to train and assign mothers and children older than 16 to employment, unless there is "good cause." A few Congressmen opposed the measure, arguing properly that a society which has never provided full employment for men had no right to force work upon women and children, but the argument did not carry. In the wake of the debate, one satisfied Senator was heard to say, "We've solved the maid problem." And so perhaps they have, for compulsory work programs may succeed in removing large numbers of women and teen agers from the welfare rolls. Then perhaps Congress will contemplate extending the same remedy to the aged, to young children, and to the disabled.

But just how the lower stratum of the working class will benefit from these measures is difficult to see. At best, competition for low-paying jobs will intensify, and whatever leverage workers have in bargaining with employers will be undercut. For in many states, women and children will be discharged from the rolls to take any work at any wage and on any employer's terms. One can say this with certainty, since some of the states had one variation or another of "employable mother" rules long before the new federal requirement, and the experience with these rules has been dismal indeed. Together with a multitude of kindred rules (like "man-in-the-house" and "substitute-parent" regulations), such provisions have always been used to maintain an exploitable labor supply.

To keep ahead of welfare-payment levels, the working class will probably also call for an increase in the minimum wage of $1.60. But it is by no means clear that the better-paid segments of organized labor are committed to raising minimums in more than principle, for they generally resist any diminution of differentials between them and lower-paid workers. There is also a great deal of evidence to suggest that lower-paid workers are hurt when minimum wage levels are raised. Labor intensive industries migrate to low-wage areas or accelerate efforts to automate, or go out of business altogether. The result is fewer jobs for marginal workers. All in all, the popular solutions to the so-called welfare problem will not benefit the working poor—except, that is, as workers derive satisfaction from punishing nonworkers.

Ironically, it is the working poor who may be the chief losers in the present controversy, especially if welfare payment levels are scaled down to a point below the minimum wage. For it is not generally understood that some states have a wage supplement program through which low-paid workers can claim hundreds of millions of dollars, even raising their incomes above the levels now received by nonworking welfare recipients. These supplements may be jeopardized if welfare programs are made more restrictive.

In New York State, supplements now bring the annual income of a worker earning the minimum wage ($3,120) to as high as $6,000, $7,000 or $8,000, depending on the number and ages of family members. For example, a minimum-wage worker with a wife and four children receiving a wage supplement grosses $6,264. Furthermore, his wage supplement of $3,144 is not subject to federal, state or local income taxes. To achieve the same after-tax income from wages, this worker would have to be raised from $1.60 to $3.50 per hour. Between 150,000 and 300,000 working families in New York City alone are entitled to wage supplements: a mere 12,000 now claim them.

How is it that hundreds of millions of dollars in available wage supplements continue to go unclaimed by thousands of working poor? The answer is that the payments are not called wage supplements but "home relief," and they are not distributed by the Labor Department but by the Welfare Department. Union leaders have traditionally resisted encouraging their members to apply for welfare wage supplements, believing this an admission of their failure to obtain higher wages through collective bargaining. Welfare departments cannot be relied upon to inform people about benefits; quite the contrary. Consequently, many workers simply do not know that these payments are available or how to calculate their eligibility. Some workers who do know shy away because of their traditional contempt for the dole and for those who subsist on it.

In truth, low-paid families which fail to claim wage supplements are being taken in by the "free enterprise" ideology of the private economy, although that ideology bears little relation to what has become the reality. Ours is a "subsidy enterprise" economy and the subsidies go to those who are enterprising in the use of their political influence. The low-paid alone seem not to realize this. Farmers receive wage supplements—we call them agricultural subsidies. The construction unions enjoy high incomes partly because of government subsidies to builders who are required to pay the "prevailing wage." Large numbers of middle-income people enjoy the benefits of a host of housing and transportation and tax subsidies. And these are merely a few of the items on a very long list of government giveaways, both direct and indirect, which support the standard of living of the more affluent in America. In a subsidy economy, the singular faith of the working poor in advancement through wages alone is pathetic, to say the least.

The magnitude of supplemental income relinquished by the working poor is both staggering and sobering. In New York, wage supplements are determined by a simple calculation of the difference between what welfare calls the worker's "net income" and the scheduled welfare grant level. Net income is calculated by deducting a series of work-related expenses from gross earnings. For a typical male worker, these expenses over the course of a full year might be:

Carfare (40¢ per day)	$104
Lunch ($1.15 per day)	299
Social Security (on minimum wage)	137
Union dues	40
Flat allowance of $20 per month (for other work-related expenses)	240
	$820

In addition, income taxes are deducted. For a worker, his wife and one child at the minimum wage, federal and state taxes would be $140, yielding a total wage-related deduction of $960, and a net income of $2,160. With two children, taxes would be $20, which yield a deduction of $840 and a net income of $2,280. Workers with three or more children pay no income taxes, so their total deduction is $820, and their net income is $2,300.

Column A in the chart shows the payments that non-working welfare families receive. (In each family category, the smallest payment is made where the oldest child is under 6, and the largest payment where the oldest child is in college or equivalent institution.) Net incomes for working families earning the minimum wage are shown in Column B. The difference (Column A minus Column B) is the wage supplement to which the worker is entitled, as shown in Column C. The worker's new income (his earned income of $3,120 plus the wage supplement) is shown in Column D. Thus, a worker with five children, the oldest of whom is in college or vocational school, would receive $6,968 even though he earns only $3,120. As noted earlier, his wage supplement of $3,848 is not taxable. Furthermore we have assumed that all workers are paying a modest $100 monthly rental. Many pay more, especially those with large families, and the wage supplement calculated by welfare can be adjusted upward (or downward, if the rent is lower) to cover the actual cost of rent, within certain limits.

So far we have assumed that the worker earns only the minimum wage. Higher paid workers are also eligible for wage supplements, up to the maximum incomes shown in Column E. Families at the maximum are entitled to the wage supplements in the amounts shown in Column F, which are also nontaxable.

To calculate the wage supplement available to a worker whose earned income falls between the minimum wage and the maximums shown in Column E, one must first subtract $3,120 from the gross earned income; then sub-

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Wage Supplements Available in New York State

(A)		(B)	(C)	(D)	(E)	(F)
Worker and Housewife		Estimated "Net" Income* of a Worker Earning Minimum Wage	Annual Wage Supplement To Minimum-Wage Worker	Annual Total Income (Minimum Wage and Wage Supplement)	Maximum Earned Income for Those Eligible for Wage Supplement	Annual Wage Supplement To Maximum-Wage Worker
and	Non-worker Welfare Budget (1) ($100 Rent)	(2)
1 child
--Under 6 years	3204	2160	1044	4164	3804	360
In College (3)	3564	2160	1404	4524	4164	360
2 Children
-- Oldest Child	3616	2280	1336	4456	3996	460
Under 6 Years
-- Oldest Child	4264	2280	1984	5104	4644	460
In College
3 Children
-- Oldest Child	4052	2300	1752	4872	4312	560
Under 6 Years
-- Oldest Child	4916	2300	2616	5736	5176	560
In College
4 Children
-- Oldest Child	4340	2300	2140	5260	4500	660
Under 6 Years
-- Oldest Child	5444	2300	3144	6264	5604	660
In College
5 Children
-- Oldest Child	4900	2300	2600	5720	4960	760
Under 6 Years
-- Oldest Child	6148	2300	3848	6968	6208	760
In College

Note (1): The "flat grant" of $100 per person per year for replacement of heavy clothing and household furnishings has been included in estimating payment levels, but excluded from calculations of eligibility in accord with welfare regulations.

Note (2): All calculations assume a monthly rent of $100; if the actual rent is higher or lower, all columns except (F) would be adjusted by the difference, within limits prescribed by welfare regulations.

Note (3): Or in any legitimate institution of learning or vocational training beyond high school.

tract the remainder from the appropriate figure in Column C (determined by the number and ages of children). The difference is the wage supplement, assuming a rental of $100 per month.*

* There is one deterrent in establishing eligibility for wage supplements—the family must first divest itself of most assets. But low-paid families are not likely to have many assets, and these substantial wage supplements would quickly compensate them for the loss.

The assets which must be disposed of are these. If the worker has any equity in a private pension plan, he must borrow half and live on the proceeds at a rate equivalent to the scheduled levels in the above chart. At the scheduled levels, workers would use up their equity in a month or two, especially if they pay high rents. The remaining equity must then be assigned to the welfare department. Similarly, workers may not carry life insurance on themselves or any member of their family in excess of $500 face value per person. Equity beyond this amount must be assigned.

If the worker owns a home—as few low-paid workers in New York City do—it must be assigned. However, the family may continue to live in the house, and the mortgage and taxes will be paid in lieu of rent by the welfare department. If and when the house is finally sold, the department will claim the proceeds. Finally a family is not ordinarily allowed to own an automobile unless it is needed for work. However, experience shows that the enforcement of this rule is extremely discretionary.

For all of this, welfare departments are very much political animals. They possess considerable discretion in interpreting and enforcing various rules, and they would not be uninfluenced by pressure from unions representing workers. It might also be said that many of these rules about assets are of doubtful constitutionality: some of them are already being challenged by attorneys associated with the National Welfare Rights Movement, a struggle union attorneys could also take up.

As for the frequent charge that welfare destroys the incentive to work, it can readily be seen that those who work are better off. How much better can be calculated by comparing Column A (what nonworking welfare families receive) with Column D (the worker earning at the minimum wage with a wage supplement). The difference is equivalent to the work-related deductions described earlier. Furthermore, workers who claim wage supplements also become eligible for Medicaid, a considerable benefit in itself.

Some mention should be made of recent proposals by the Teamsters that children's allowances be made part of a new contract for employees of the New York City Housing Authority. At $5 per week, the annual allowance would be $260 per child—or about one-quarter to one-third of the wage supplement for the same worker earning the minimum wage. The children's allowance is taxable. More important, wage supplements can be obtained by all of the working poor, not just by those who belong to unions.

Even if in time the unions were to win these rather meager children's allowances for their members, the main consequences would merely be to enlarge the long-standing differences between the incomes of unorganized and organized workers. By contrast, wage supplements would benefit all low-paid workers now.

The Teamsters and other unions could help the working poor to obtain these extraordinary supplements, perhaps by distributing brochures throughout the city explaining why workers are entitled to these benefits in a subsidy economy and how to claim them. The unions are not likely to do this, hemmed in as they are by old prejudices, and by a rank-and-file version of an obsolete entrepreneurial ethic. But were low-paid workers to coalesce with non-workers in a fight for decent welfare payment levels and improved supplementary wage policies, all could gain. The political and economic stakes are high for all low-income families. New York might become the major national testing ground for major income reform. It is more likely, however, that the pending investigations of welfare in New York will become just another series of events in the lengthening chronicle of the American poor against themselves.

THE MOTHERS SAID NO

NICOLAUS C. MILLS

Mr. Mills is on the faculty of the Department of English, University of Michigan.

Ann Arbor

In the academic year of 1967-68 AFDC school children in Michigan's Washtenaw County will receive more than $90,000 in supplemental clothing funds. The agreement, reached after a week of demonstrations that threatened to turn Ann Arbor into a mini-Chicago, is one that should have consequences for welfare rights organizations throughout Michigan and the United States. For it demonstrates not only how important it is that mothers receiving payments for their dependent children should take their complaints beyond the welfare office, but that in communities like Washtenaw County, which do not have the financial burdens of a Detroit or a New York, there is money available to supplement inadequacies in AFDC schedules.

The protests began in Ann Arbor on September 3, when a group of welfare mothers, led by Mrs. Shirley Haywood of Ypsilanti and Mrs. Gloria Fuller of Ann Arbor, refused to accept the assertion of Alfred Brose, director of the County Social Services Department, that his office did not have the authority or the funds to meet their clothing demands. Their sit-in drew a response from Robert Harrison, chairman of the Washtenaw County Board of Supervisors, which appoints two of the three members of the County Social Services Board, the body that officially controls the administration of AFDC and county welfare funds.

Following an emergency meeting on Tuesday and a regular meeting on Wednesday, the Ways and Means Committee of the Board of Supervisors proposed to distribute $40 per child to those qualified to receive clothing funds. Their offer was rejected by the mothers, whose original demand was not for a "flat grant" but for a clothing supplement based on a "basic maintenance need" system that treated the children on an individual basis. On Thursday the supervisors raised their offer to $60, and again the mothers said no.

They were then joined by students and faculty from the University of Michigan, and from this point on they were assured of wide press coverage and the attention of the whole community (the Ann Arbor News stubbornly carried the continuing welfare story in its middle pages, although in cities as distant as Cleveland it received front-page headlines). On Thursday, fifty-two people were arrested for sitting in at the Washtenaw County Building, and the rough handling of the demonstrators by the sheriff's department further dramatized the gulf between county officials and the mothers. As Mrs. Haywood said: "We are resolved to carry this issue to its conclusion. This is for our children and their dignity and their future. Stalling and intimidation will not make us or the problem go away." By Friday the presence of police dogs, helicopters and deputies armed with AR-15 rifles had escalated the scene in Ann Arbor to that of Chicago during the Democratic convention. Before the day was over, 182 more arrests had been made.

It was, however, the county and not the mothers which now felt the need to make concessions. Mass arrests of students might be tolerable, but pictures of mothers being dragged to jail while weeping children look on were too much. At this point, no state or county official was prepared to say that AFDC in Michigan is adequate (it is based on the costs of living for 1960-61), nor was the idea that the mothers should get money for their children's clothing anywhere disputed. The questions were how much money and where was it to come from? While demonstrations and rallies continued over the weekend, AFDC mothers and city and county officials met on Sunday at a special meeting arranged by Ann Arbor Mayor Wendell Hulcher. On Monday the mothers and the Board of Supervisors agreed to terms laid down by a fact-finding committee headed by Dean F. F. Fauri of the University of Michigan School of Social Work. According to the agreement, each of the 1,500 AFDC school children in Washtenaw County would be eligible to receive as much as $70 in clothing vouchers. For this purpose $50,000 would be allocated by the county, $4,600 by the Social Services Board, and the remaining $36,400 by the state. In addition, if any of the $91,000 remained, it would be allocated to families with a clothing need of more than $70 per child.

The decision, reached after a court order was issued to prohibit "loitering" in and around the County Building, seemed to settle matters; but the agreement was in effect for only a week when the County Board of Supervisors voted to withhold the $50,000 it had promised on the ground that the Social Services Board (which administers AFDC through state and federal funds) had enough money to meet the mothers' request. Their decision, although contradicting their previous position, was sound. This year, as in the past, the Social Services Board is expected not to spend approximately $200,000 of its funds. No one has denied the figure, and the director of social services for Washtenaw County now finds himself able to provide what at the start of the protests he said he had neither the money nor the authority to give—a clothing allowance for AFDC children.

Why should it have taken more than two weeks for the budgetary information to be released? Why in the middle of negotiations should it have been discovered that there are 1,300 rather than 1,200 children on AFDC in Washtenaw County? The questions have not yet been answered, but the AFDC mothers have made one point clear: they can begin to get their rights only by organizing themselves and putting outside pressure on the welfare system. Two weeks after the protests began, the Welfare Rights Group of Washtenaw County doubled its membership, and because one of the conditions insisted upon was that AFDC recipients come in and fill out their clothing forms, it has been possible to bring together mothers who might otherwise have never met. In Washtenaw County the fact that mothers are becoming a force in their own right has immediate political consequences. One member of the Social Services Board is retiring next year, and it is hoped that a welfare mother will be appointed to that seat; and in the future, all county supervisors in Michigan will be elected, thereby giving mothers a chance for representation on a board that has traditionally been unsympathetic to their needs.

Moreover, the struggle between the AFDC mothers and Washtenaw County is relevant not only to Michigan but to any number of well-to-do communities in which welfare payments are needlessly low. For it suggests that in these areas welfare rights groups can best build their organizations by getting the system to work. Having done that, they may consider the long-range strategy (first suggested by Richard A. Cloward and Frances Fox Piven in "The Weapon of Poverty," The Nation, May 8, 1967) of breaking the welfare system and thereby forcing the federal government to initiate a program of family allowances or guaranteed income.

SMOTHERS BROTHERS

TOM, DICK AND THE CENSORS

PHIL KERBY

Los Angeles

Tommy Smothers said, "Mailer has it right. This country is like a drunk on a skateboard going down a toboggan run slipping on his own vomit."

DICK SMOTHERS: America is close to what Germany was before the war. Germany was ready for Hitler.

The reporter was curious and, as he thought about it afterward, perhaps a little patronizing. Put it down to the generation gap, experience and the accumulated barnacles of cynicism.

They had made it big before the deadly age of 30; they were famous and the money was rolling in. Why borrow trouble? Yet every other week they were skirmishing with C.B.S. censors at Los Angeles' Television City over the needle-sharp social satire that occasionally distinguishes the Smothers Brothers Comedy Hour from any other program on television. (On gun control: "Let's preserve our freedom to kill." On censorship: "We are not against censorship because we realize there is always the danger of something being said.")

TOM: We didn't want to be liberals off the program and not on the program. We felt we should be consistent.

DICK: At first it was a selfish view. We wanted creative freedom. We thought the show was insane. We wanted it to have some reason for existence. We grew with the show. And as an afterthought: I suppose if father had lived, we could have gone to West Point and would have believed in the war in Vietnam.

Their father, a Southerner, was Maj. Thomas Bowen Smothers, Jr., a West Point graduate, who had been captured by the Japanese, and died in 1945 as a result of that ordeal. The brothers were born in New York City and reared in Redondo Beach, Calif. They went placidly through most of the placid Eisenhower years and took degrees in retail merchandising and advertising at San Jose State College.

Both trace the beginning of their awareness of "the way things are" to the U-2 incident. They were shocked by the official lies. "We had been taught that everything this country did was right," Tom said. "Then we began to discover the truth."

The murder of the three young civil rights workers in Mississippi had a strong effect on the brothers. The war in Vietnam, riots in the ghettos, and the assassination of the Kennedys and Martin Luther King reinforced their belief that society "has to be overhauled. There are too many contradictions."

DICK: The kids want our politicians to tell the truth. Why would young middle-class whites support Eldridge Cleaver? They believe he tells it like it is.

TOM: Gene McCarthy laid it out the way it is. That is why he had such an appeal.

DICK: After the Democratic convention we gave a concert in Columbus, Ohio. There were 32,000 people there. We decided to test the crowd with a little put-on. We said we thought what Daley and the police did was O.K. The crowd boomed. And Ohio is about as American as you can get. Right?

In their bouts with the censor, Tom and Dick Smothers win a few and lose a few. One they lost recently was a segment during which Harry Belafonte sang, Don't Stop the Carnival in front of a news film showing Chicago police loading demonstrators into a paddy wagon during the convention.

Last season, the appearance on their program of Pete Seeger, the blacklisted folk singer, brought yips of outrage. They succeeded in getting him on, but the censors snipped the sixth stanza from Seeger's popular ballad, Waist Deep in the Big Muddy.

The scissored lines went:

*Now every time I read the papers
That old feelin' comes on
We're waist deep in the Big Muddy
And the big fool says to push on.*

The Smothers brothers "are talented comedians, but inept social commentators," said one Ohio editorial writer, who proceeded at great length to reveal how he had been ineptly but deeply wounded by them. His conclusion: "Let's smother the Smothers brothers." A syndicated columnist, less outraged and more amused, commented: "Nixon promises he'll end the war. Sure, but what does he plan to do about the Smothers brothers?"

Can sharp social satire—in contrast to the pleasantly innocuous Bob Hope or Red Skelton brand of neutral political humor—be injected successfully in an entertainment program?

DICK: Our show is entertainment, but it has to have social comment. It can't be created in a vacuum. In the fifties, for example, nothing was happening. Now everything is happening.

TOM: Social satire has to be done within the bounds of art. If it isn't, it won't work. It is self-defeating. All the best art comes out of society itself. Now is the time of change, and it is reflected in art.

The Smothers brothers aim their comedy at the 25-and-under age group, but the high ratings of their show (consistently in the top twenty and frequently in the top ten) indicate they are bridging the generation gap in their audience. "Just think," Tom said. "If they change the law, kids now 14 will be voting four years from now." He relished the idea and chuckled. "And they won't stand for double talk."

"This has been a tough year for satire," he added. "Two assassinations, riots and the elections. Not long before he was killed, Robert Kennedy asked me, 'How do you get away with that stuff on Johnson?'"

They proceed blithely on the basis that it is still a free country and will remain so, and they guard against the most effective form of suppression: self-censorship. They are the supremely unalienated supporters of the alienated. This quixotic combination of appealing traits may account for their wide popularity.

"It's exhilarating to live now," Tom said. "We're going through a revolution, not in the classic sense but a revolution of ideas—artistic, moral and political. The people are hungry for the truth."

Not a bad supposition. It may be true.

HARRY GOLDEN

The folks in Beaufort, S.C., don't think much of Dr. Donald Gatch; the doctors in Beaufort think even less. The weekly Beaufort Gazette said the 38-year-old doctor, who came originally from Nebraska, was "running off his mouth too much."

What got the folks down on him was that Gatch went to Columbia, S.C., to testify before the Citizens Board of Inquiry (representing the Washington-based Citizens Crusade Against Poverty). Dr. Gatch told the board that the Negro infant mortality rate in and around Beaufort was ten times that of the white infant mortality rate. Malnutrition and hunger were the rule, not the exception, and almost all the colored children were infected with tapeworm. "Two hundred of these worms in your belly," explained the doctor, "eat a lot of food. Tapeworms live twenty to forty years and in Beaufort they are outliving the people."

Negroes in Beaufort are at the bottom of the economic ladder; worse than the bottom, they are in a hole. They live in tar-paper shacks, insulated with cardboard boxes or the weekly paper. Usually there is no running water. Often there is not even an outside privy. That is what Dr. Gatch meant when he testified that "environmental factors often contribute to malnutrition."

After Dr. Gatch had said his piece, all his white patients found another doctor. Garland Mills, a textile plant, refused to rehire him as its physician. His office rent jumped from $100 a month to $200. Shoppers snarled insults at his wife in the supermarket.

The white doctors in the area indignantly complain that Dr. Gatch had no right to suggest that they might have been negligent. There was no reason, they go on, why he couldn't have consulted with them before testifying. That's the way to do things in the polite South.

Dr. Gatch did what they hoped: he closed up his office, sold his house, and left town. What else did he expect after calling such unfavorable publicity down upon the county?

Gatch says philosophically: "I think this is a rather typical response of the Establishment when they feel themselves threatened." The threat of a conscientious doctor agitating for sanitary privies and pure drinking water is indeed menacing. No one takes these for granted down he-ah—at least not if you're colored you don't.

Concludes Dr. Gatch, "I came from Nebraska where we have better pig pens than these people have homes." He thinks folks around Beaufort would feel they were coddling the Negroes if they allowed them first-rate sties.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Blacks and Students: Critics of Society

T. B. BOTTOMORE

Mr. Bottomore, formerly of Simon Fraser University is now at present at the University of Sussex. He is the author of Classes in Modern Society and Critics of Society (Pantheon). In slightly different form, the essay which follows will appear as the new introduction to reissues of Critics of Society to be published in England by Allen and Unwin, and in the United States by Pantheon.

In the last two and a half years, the North American social movements, and the criticism of society which they express, have grown more powerful and have taken new directions. Over the same period movements of protest and criticism which seem to arise from similar conditions have made their appearance in Europe. This essay will attempt to look at these recent developments, to compare the European movements, especially the student movement, with their American counterparts, and to add some reflections upon the prospects for radical social thought on both sides of the Atlantic.*

The Negro revolt has had a much greater impact since 1965, and its aims have come to be expressed in a new way through the doctrine of Black Power. The meaning of Black Power is still vague and ambiguous, open to diverse interpretations, as is shown by several recent expositions and criticisms. (The most interesting discussions will be found in Harold Cruse, The Crisis of the Negro Intellectual; Floyd B. Barbour (editor), The Black Power Revolt and Stokely Carmichael and Charles V. Hamilton, Black Power: The Politics of Liberation in America.) For some, both participants and observers, it expresses chiefly a growing militancy and a possible repudiation

* I shall not discuss here the student movements in Eastern Europe. They differ in important ways from those in the Western capitalist countries. It was made clear to me, for example, in discussions with Yugoslav students that they saw their own movement as being concerned primarily with the needs of workers and with the advancement of the system of workers' self-management. In Czechoslovakia too, the student movement has been closely associated with a more general movement of workers and intellectuals in a concerted attack upon economic, political and cultural obstacles to Socialist development, and which has provided, since the Russian invasion of their country, a strong basis for a courageous popular resistance. This deserves a separate study, which would lead far beyond my present subject.

of the nonviolent tactics adopted by Dr. Martin Luther King and other civil rights leaders. For others, it implies the ultimate aim of separatism. For others again, it represents the beginnings of a more complex social doctrine, in which at least three major themes can be distinguished: first, the claim that in those areas where Negroes form a majority of the population they should control the local administration, especially in matters concerning the police, education and housing, and that in other areas they should be properly represented; second, an assertion of the need to develop Negro business and to end exploitation by white businessmen in Negro areas; third, a concern with the formation of a Negro intellectual class which would be capable of elaborating and diffusing a distinctive culture.

All these interpretations begin from the fact of a growing Negro self-awareness and self-confidence; the emergence of an ethnic group which can look back with pride to its origins in Africa and recognize its kinship with black people everywhere, and at the same time assert the value of its Afro-American history and culture. In this sense the Black Power movement is inescapably nationalist, and potentially separatist; and it stands, necessarily, in an ambiguous relationship with American radicalism. Much of Harold Cruse's book is concerned with the historical opposition between the two tendencies in Negro social thought, the acceptance of white radicalism and the espousal of nationalism, and with the implications of these two lines of thought. He quotes from the greatest of Negro social critics, W. E. B. Du Bois, who observed that: "There faces the American Negro therefore an intricate and subtle problem of combining into one object two difficult sets of facts"; these "sets of facts" being on one side integrationism (that is, civil rights, racial equality), and on the other side nationalism (that is, group solidarity, self-segregation, separatism).

Cruse does not see in the present Black Power movement a resolution of this problem, but only a continuation of the previous confusion of thought: "Black Power slogans reveal the depth of unpreparedness and the lack of knowledge that go along with the eagerness of the new black generation of spokesmen. The further the Negro gets from his historical antecedents in time, the more tenuous become his conceptual ties, the emptier his social conceptions, the more superficial his visions." And in the same context he writes that the American Negro has still to produce any significant social theorists "to back up his . . . activist leaders, charismatic deliverers, black redemptionists, and moral suasionists."

Yet this does not do full justice to the Black Power movement, in which there are germinating ideas not entirely alien to those which Cruse himself expounds, concerning the need to awaken the Negro community to a sense of its place as a separate but equal group in the "nation of nations," which is the United States. These ideas are plainly nationalist, not radical. They envisage a movement of national liberation rather than an upheaval in the American social structure. One might argue indeed that they take for granted a traditional view of American society as a congeries of ethnic groups, each of which conforms to the American way of life, while interpreting it in its own cultural terms.

What the Black Power movement, and Cruse, oppose is the assimilation of Negroes as individuals, and the direct subservience to white values which that implies. On the assimilation, or integration, of Negroes as an ethnic group, received on equal terms, they have little that is radical to say. The Negro businessman in his own community would still, it seems, be an American businessman; the Negro politician an American politician. Cruse, although he condemns the "arid, materialistic and anti-cultural way of American life," only hints at the possibility of an alternative form of society. In the symposium edited by Floyd B. Barbour only one contributor questions in any serious way the economic structure of American society, and there is little indication, throughout the volume, that Negro thinkers and leaders are yet concerned with any fundamental social changes except in the position of Negroes in the present structure.

It may be reasonable to argue, as does Cruse, that American Negroes must first of all establish their aims as an ethnic group before they can take part on equal terms in a broader radical movement; but in the immediate future the consequences of Black Power doctrines seem likely to be a growing division between the Negro movement and white radicalism, along the lines which became apparent at the Conference for New Politics in 1967. There is another sense, however, in which Black Power is bound to have a radical influence, no matter how nationalistic the doctrines which it formulates. As a large-scale protest movement which challenges the present political leadership and some of the present trends in American society, and as the bearer of an egalitarian creed within a particular sphere, it is clearly aligned with other radical groups and provides in certain respects an example for them.

Indeed it has already influenced a part of the student movement, which claims a deep affinity with the Negro revolt, and has adopted for the representation of its own aims the slogan of Student Power. This may appear to be a misguided borrowing of doctrine, for students as a group have lived through no historical experience of slavery, oppression or discrimination, and as individuals they do not occupy lifelong positions of social inferiority and economic want which black Americans have to suffer. There is a sense, however, in which Student Power may express, though imperfectly, reasonable objectives of the student movement. One of these objectives is the intellectual freedom and independence of the university in relation to the surrounding society. Another is the participation of students in forming the general educational policies of their universities. These are important aspects of the American student movement.

In Germany and France, and in other European countries, students have not had to confront the same problems, because universities in these countries have not been governed in the main by absentee owners drawn largely from the business world. But there have been other forms of external control, by government officials for example, and in many universities the system of internal government has been profoundly autocratic or bureaucratic. It is partly as a result of these conditions that European students have become involved in campaigns which resemble those conducted by American students for greater participation in university policy making, for a limitation of the powers of the administration, and for the introduction of more flexible and less impersonal methods of teaching and examination.

Above all, however, it is the conjunction between issues on the campus and larger political issues affecting the whole society that accounts for the vigor of the radical student movement and, at the same time, poses a question about the nature of the students' role in contemporary politics. We should take note, first, of the great differences which exist between the social environment of the American student movement and that in the European countries. Since the late 1950s, students in the United States have been the leaders of the new radicalism, because there was no other viable radical movement. Even today the other principal source of radicalism, the Negro movement, is limited in a variety of ways which I have already discussed. Students took a leading part in the creation of a militant civil rights movement, and they have formed the core of the opposition to the Vietnamese War.

Among the other elements which enhance their political significance is the fact that their own government is conducting the war in Vietnam and pursuing counterrevolutionary policies in Latin America, and that students have to confront directly the issue of the war in deciding their attitude toward the draft. It is now obvious, particularly from the early successes of Sen. Eugene McCarthy's election campaign, that the student movement has succeeded, though not entirely alone, in arousing a much more widespread opposition to the war, and that it has created a climate of opinion in which the growth of a more comprehensive radical movement may be possible.

These conditions do not exist in Europe, where labor and Socialist organizations of various kinds form an established radical opposition, and where opposition to the Vietnamese War can only influence indirectly, if at all, the policies of the American Government, and so evokes a less vigorous response. Nevertheless, it may still be argued that the American experience is relevant to Western Europe to the extent that the traditional radical forces are declining as prosperity spreads more widely, and that there is emerging in some European countries a form of consensus politics (most fully developed in West Germany as a result of the coalition between the CDU and the SPD) which allows the growth of an extra-parliamentary opposition in which students have a leading role. C. Wright Mills was one of the first to examine closely, in the light of American experience, the possible consequences of this "embourgeoisement" of the working class; to criticize and reject what he called the "labor metaphysics," that is, the doctrine accepted in one fashion or another by the whole modern Socialist movement that the industrial working class is, and must be, the prime mover in any radical social change; and to argue that in the conditions of the mid-20th century the young intellectuals, and especially the students, would be the most likely source of a new radicalism.

Mills's ideas have received some confirmation from the development of the American student movement, which they also helped to inspire, but they are more questionable when applied to European societies. The fact that they are not irrelevant, however, is shown by the influence which similar ideas, expounded more recently by Herbert Marcuse, have had among the radical students, most notably in Germany, but also in France during the revolt of May, 1968. In One Dimensional Man Marcuse sets forth an elaborate criticism of modern industrial society, in both its capitalist and its Socialist forms, which weaves together many familiar themes: the worker's lack of control over his conditions of work in large corporations; the indoctrination by the mass media which regulates and circumscribes men's private lives; the pervasiveness of violence and repression. The distinguishing mark of the book, however, is its profound pessimism. The proletariat in the capitalist countries is no longer revolutionary; increasing prosperity has brought about its integration into the existing order. There remains, therefore, no real force in society which strives to create a freer and more rational kind of society. Yet Marcuse, like Mills, does not abandon hope entirely; he sees a faint promise in the intellectuals, and his hopefulness has increased with the development of the student movement.

In a recent volume of essays (Psychoanalyse und Politik) he formulates his hopes more plainly. The student movement, he says, is not itself a revolutionary force in any country, but it may become a revolutionary force in association with other underprivileged or marginal groups in society. In the United States these other groups include particularly the Negroes, but also other ethnic minorities, migrant workers, hippies, and the morally disenchanted members of the middle class. In Europe, where Marcuse acknowledges that a part at least of the labor movement may still be a radical force, the student movement is most likely to bring about revolutionary changes if it can associate itself with working-class organizations.

But whatever allies the intellectuals, including the students, may need they are still represented by Marcuse as being the pre-eminent radical force, and it is this conception of the process of social change in advanced industrial societies, as well as the ground upon which Marcuse's own criticism of society stands, which need to be critically examined. Up to a point I agree with Marcuse about the increasing importance of intellectuals as the source of a cultural criticism of modern capitalism. What I find unacceptable in Marcuse's thought, and in the conceptions held by some active participants in the student movement, is the supposition that intellectuals are in a

E. J. Hobsbawm
INDUSTRY AND EMPIRE
 The Making of Modern English Society

Vol. II: 1750 to the Present Day. "A masterly survey of the major economic developments and changes of the last 200 years... illustrated by a host of excellent diagrams and maps."

—Manchester Guardian $6.95

C. G. Jung
ANALYTICAL PSYCHOLOGY
 Its Theory and Practice

Introduction by E. A. Bennet. Published for the first time: Jung's "Tavistock Lectures", delivered in London in 1935, which provide a lucid introduction to his psychology. $6.95

Georges Balandier
DAILY LIFE IN THE KINGDOM OF THE KONGO

A distinguished French anthropologist re-creates a great African kingdom that existed from the 16th to the 18th centuries. "An important contribution to an understanding of African social history."

—Asia and Africa Review $6.95

Moshe Lewin
LENIN'S LAST STRUGGLE

"A first-rate analysis of Lenin's last half-year in power... clearly and sensitively written; it makes full use of new sources... one of the best available studies of a surprisingly important period."

—Kirkus' Service $4.95

Norman Dorsen
FRONTIERS OF CIVIL LIBERTIES

Preface by Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. Introduction by Louis Pollak, Dean of Yale Law School. A veteran of the legal struggle for civil liberties reconstructs four landmark cases in which he participated as counsel. $8.95

Richard M. Titmuss
COMMITMENT TO WELFARE

The foremost theoretician and strategist of the welfare state analyzes American and British social policy — and examines how policies can be designed to benefit all sections of the population instead of just a few. $6.95

PANTHEON

BOOKS ON MAN AND SOCIETY

Write for our new listing catalog. You may also order books from us, if they are unavailable at your local bookstore, by sending us your payment plus whatever sales tax applies. PANTHEON BOOKS, 437 Madison Ave., New York, N.Y. 10022 position to tell the rest of society in an authoritative manner what is good for it; that they, and they alone, represent reason in social life.

This outlook recalls, and in the context of a Hegelian philosophy actually renews, the thought of an earlier period, that of the Young Hegelians who saw themselves as "critical thinkers" confronting the "mass" which they were destined to lead toward a more rational form of society. The new "critical criticism," like that of the 1840s, misconstrues the relation between radical thought and radical social movements, but for different reasons. The Young Hegelians, according to Marx's indictment, overlooked the need for a "material force" in society to bring about social change, and they ignored the emergence of a new class, the proletariat, which might provide that force. The Hegelian critics of society in the 1960s seem to have concluded that a material force is no longer available, and will not be available, because the proletariat has been absorbed into existing society; so that radical thought by itself must suffice for the transformation of society.

This is qualified in some degree by a recognition that there are still material forces which may play a part; for example, ethnic groups and revolutionary movements in the Third World. But within the industrial societies themselves, radical thought is pre-eminent; hence the importance attached to the student movement. Yet it remains as unlikely now as in the past that ideas alone can change society. The great special transformations have generally occurred when a radical criticism of society has evoked a response from large social groups which are engaged in practical struggles to alter their conditions of life, and find in the new doctrines both an explanation of their troubles and a guide to effective political action. If the working class is now finally appeased and has entirely ceased to be radical, then we must accept the "end of radicalism" in the industrial countries. For my part I do not believe that this is the case, and I have outlined in Classes in Modern Society my reasons for thinking that class inequalities will continue to engender movements for radical social change.

There is another aspect of the student movement, however, which helps to account for the degree of importance which it has acquired, beyond its immediate impact in the United States: namely, that it achieves, on a limited scale, that association between radical thought and social action which is needed in order to bring about change. The student movement is not solely an embodiment of intellectual criticism; it is also a social movement which seeks to produce radical changes in the structure of the university and, more generally, because of the involvement of the university with other major institutions, changes in the whole social structure. The events of the past year, and especially those of May, 1968, demonstrate that student movements in many countries, often in association with faculty, have been successful in altering, or at the least in enforcing, a reconsideration of university government and administration.

But what can be said about the wider implications of student action? Can university reforms provide a model for other institutions? Will the student movement have any profound effect upon society as a whole? It is too early to answer these questions with any assurance, notwithstanding the voluminous documentation which has appeared in the past few months.*

In Germany and in France the limits of student action have become more apparent in recent months. Students are a small minority in society, and although they can initiate a radical movement, they are not able to continue it alone or to lead it. In France, the movement became a serious challenge to the Gaullist regime only at the stage when the trade unions gave it their qualified support and took advantage of the situation to press their own economic demands. It was doubtful from the beginning whether a general political movement for a change of regime would develop, but had it done so the leadership would certainly have passed into the hands of working-class organizations. In Germany, the student movement has not yet established any close links with the trade unions, most of which remain indifferent or hostile, and on any realistic assessment it constitutes a lesser challenge to the present regime than does the revival of right-wing politics in the NPD.

The American student movement seems exceptional in the influence which it has had, but even in this case it should be noted that it is mainly on the single issue of the war in Vietnam, which troubles large numbers of Americans who are not radicals at all, that the students have been able to arouse a nation-wide opposition, whereas they are still very far from having gained mass support for

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1963

*Drugged, we sit on air beyond rooms of belonging.
Roosts, nests of us, freeze.
Torn stripes hang, windless, from clotheslines.
Behind shutters, on kitchen chairs,
we crackle wrappers between numb fingers.
Almost all the leaves have fallen.*

*Almost all the leaves had fallen on the lawns when I lost my self in the vault of the event.
Even he was lost in the cathedral;
he forgot breakfast, forgot the telephone,
he forgot his stiff spine all over again.
The cathedral was larger than his absence.*

*All of us left the beds of our dying that day;
all felt blood on our tongues at the railing.
It was the body of the land he became,
its dust, the host we swallowed.
Cannon continued to boom.
Candles fell into formation.*

*I have dressed my lips in black.
The soldiers of my fingers march in black uniforms with the cortege behind the packed box, under the river of the sky.
Pockets empty, on kitchen chairs,
we listen to the drums.*

CAROLYN STOLOFF

* See, for example, on Germany, Friedrich Mayer and Ulrich Spinnarke, Was wollen die Studenten? (Fischer, 1967); on France, Le Canard de Mai (Le Canard Enchaîné, 1968), and Edgar Morin, Claude Lefort, Jean-Marc Coudray, Mai, 1968: La Brèche (Fayard, 1968); on Italy, Documenti della rivolta universitaria (Laterza, 1968).

any radical reconstruction of American society.

The most evident weakness of the student movement is its lack of a clearly articulated theory. During the revolt of the French students the most varied doctrines, mainly of a traditional kind, co-existed without much effort being made to resolve the differences among them; and many students seem to have regarded the events in a nonpolitical way, as a "happening" rather than a revolution. Student leaders often say, as they said repeatedly in France, that they are not concerned to draw up plans for a new society but only to eradicate the authoritarian and repressive features of the present society. Thereafter we will see what happens. This faith in spontaneity is engaging, and may be culturally creative, but it seems hardly adequate to meet the problems of a complex industrial society.

In any case, many student spokesmen do intimate the kind of society they would like to create by using such terms as "participatory democracy." The trouble is that their broad social aims are not well defined or set out in convincing detail. They are expressed most clearly in relation to the university itself, the milieu with which students are most familiar, and in which the conditions for participation and self-government are especially favorable because of the nature of the university community. Where the wider society is concerned many of the ideas formulated in the student movement are familiar and derive from a long tradition of Socialist thought; legalitarianism, community, voluntary co-operation instead of coercive government. But they have not been elaborated in a practical form, nor are they tested against the actual experience of new types of social organization such as the Yugoslav workers' councils.

Other ideas, for example the criticisms of industry and technology, and of the consumer society, suggest a new direction, although recalling earlier romantic movements against industrial capitalism; but here too the ideas are not given a practical embodiment except in the case of the hippies, whose way of life after all presupposes the existence of an industrial civilization.

Students, like other intellectual critics, inhabit a world of ideological confusion, and they are no more blame-worthy than others for the failure to produce a social theory which would direct men's efforts consistently toward a more desirable form of social life. But they are more to make a virtue out of this failure, and to talk idly about revolutionary action as though it could be relied upon to produce spontaneously a more just society, when the experience of this century shows that a revolution, whatever the slogans with which it is made, may easily end in a totalitarian society. Students ought to be reflecting deeply, and in a more practical way, upon the new structures which will be needed in order to humanize industrial society, to diffuse power and responsibility, and to create prosperity in the vast underdeveloped part of the world.

Marcuse, in the volume from which I quoted earlier, suggests that we can now speak of the "end of Utopia," in the sense that Utopia is actually realizable from the technological and economic aspect in the industrial countries, by the elimination of poverty and of alienated labor, and that this makes possible the creation of a free society in which aesthetic-erotic enjoyment, rather than work and consumption, will be men's chief concern. This social transformation also depends upon an intellectual reorientation, which Marcuse claims is already taking place through a revaluation of human needs. Only after these changes have been accomplished will it be possible to establish new social relationships.

Marcuse's argument seems to me realistic in some respects, highly speculative and even misleading in others. The progress of technology does make possible the elimination of poverty and of the least satisfying forms of work in the industrial countries, although it presents at the same time very complex problems of economic management which Marcuse ignores. Moreover, the eradication of poverty on a world scale, through aid to the developing countries, is likely to retard considerably the attainment of this economic Utopia in the advanced countries. The intellectual and cultural revolution seems likely to proceed even more slowly, and I differ from Marcuse in thinking that it is only likely to succeed if it is directly associated with changes in social relationships. In Sweden, where a cultural reorientation has probably advanced further than elsewhere, it seems to be linked with changes in the class structure, in the organization of industry, and in other institutions. It is unfortunate that Marcuse adopts such an abstract method in his study of these questions; that he opposes to each other his conceptions of a totally repressive industrial society in the present and a totally liberated society in the future, without examining in a more empirical fashion the actual cultural movements and changes in social structure which could lead to a freer society. One of the most hopeful aspects of the student movement is that it does give rise to new relationships and new forms of self-government which may provide an example to other spheres of society, particularly if students can carry with them into their future occupations the social attitudes which they have formed in the radical movement. This said, however, I remain convinced that the most important change still to be brought about in the industrial countries is the eradication of class inequalities, whether these rest upon property ownership or upon the control of the economy and the political system by a bureaucratic or party elite.

Camus as Himself

LYRICAL AND CRITICAL ESSAYS.
By Albert Camus. Edited and with notes by Philip Thody. Translated by Ellen Conroy Kennedy. Alfred A. Knopf. 365 pp. $6.95.

DONALD LAZERE

Mr. Lazere teaches English and comparative literature at California State College at Hayward. He is currently at work on a book on Camus.

Albert Camus was a much more elusive literary personality than has generally been recognized in America. In none of the works that are best known here does he reveal all sides of his temperament or thought; the first-person points of view in The Stranger, The Plague and The Fall are all partly ironic poses, while The Myth of Sisyphus, The Rebel and the political journalism isolate single lines of formal argument. The works in which Camus was most fully, comprehensively himself were the three volumes of short, lyrical essays, L'Envers et l'endroit (1937) and Noces (1938)—his first two published books—and L'Été (1954), which are collected in the first half of this new set of translations as The Wrong Side and the Right Side, Nuptials and Summer. Some of the pieces have been translated individually before, but several of the best have not, and the complete sequence forms what is in effect a new, single work for American readers that stands among his very finest.

The personal essay is the medium in which Camus seems to be most at home

* A disastrously misleading translation in its implied value judgment—exactly the kind of evaluative distinction that Camus constantly rejected. The "front and back" of a fabric or the "heads and tails" of a coin comes closer to the noncommittal sense of the French phrase.

—that is to say, in the world of immediate, concrete experience. In the lyrical essays (and to a large degree also in the random collection of literary criticism and interviews making up the book's second half) he relaxes and speaks in his own voice of the actual settings and personal relationships of his life, the flesh-and-blood inspirations of the abstract themes of the "major" essays. Here too he reveals the warmth of personality and zest for living, the amused affection for the details of everyday life that he subordinated—in his fiction and plays—perhaps regrettably—to the creation of mythic settings and characters and crisis-pitched action.

Suspending his usual principle of keeping his private life out of his writing, he comes close to autobiography in talking about the poverty of his youth in Algiers, the attack of tuberculosis that threatened his life at 17, early travels to Czechoslovakia, Italy and New York, and the later discomforts of living in Paris and becoming a literary celebrity. He tells of the awkward love between himself and his illiterate, half-deaf mother who raised him as best she could, working as a scrub woman, after his father was killed in World War I. (His mixed childhood feelings toward her of affection and estrangement that he describes in "Between Yes and No" and other pieces indicate the psychological source for the ambivalence toward all of his subjects that was to become the unifying force of his writing.)

Dominating all else is Camus' rhapsodic love affair with the Mediterranean sun, sea and flower-covered landscape. He succeeds in elevating intensity of sense experience into a rational metaphysic, and is able to exalt the communion of man with nature in overtly sexual imagery without lapsing into mysticism, pantheism or the pathetic fallacy. After the first autumn rains in Algiers, "the whole earth lies, its belly moistened with a bitter almond-scented seed, at rest from having yielded all summer long to the sun. And once again this fragrance consecrates the nuptials of man and earth, and gives rise in us to the only truly virile love in this world: one that is generous and will die."

With all their descriptive straightforwardness, the essays are far from artless. They follow a typical structure of a passage of straight narration that evokes a meditation that is in turn elaborated into a paradoxical metaphor or aphorism. For example:

Sometimes on those opening nights at the theater, which are the only times I ever meet what is insolently referred to as "all Paris," it seems to me that the audience is about to vanish, that this fashionable world does not exist. It is the others who seem real to me, the tall figures sounding forth upon the stage. Resisting the impulse to flee. I make myself remember that every one in the audience also has a rendezvous with himself: that he knows it and will doubtless be keeping it soon. Immediately he seems like a brother once more; solitudes unite those society separates.

Thematically, the essays from the very beginning present Camus' most concise, integrated expression of his ideal of a balance between several sets of antithetical attitudes, a balance that is implicitly embodied in the total of the individual works. First there is horror in the face of death (abstracted into "the absurd" in The Myth of Sisyphus), balanced by the pride of acknowledging it honestly: "Don't let them say about the man condemned to death: 'He is going to pay his debt to society,' but: 'They're going to chop his head off.' It may seem like nothing. But it does make a little difference. There are some people who prefer to look their destiny straight in the eye."

Camus also regards this lucidity toward death as a means of intensifying life's joys, in the carpe diem tradition: "There is no joy of life without despair of life." And, "My whole horror of death lies in my anxiety to live. I am jealous of those who will live and for whom flowers and the desire for women will have their full flesh and blood meaning." In other passages the anxiety of death is balanced against an attraction toward it as a Lucretian merging with inanimate, eternally indifferent nature. This is Meursault's final attitude in The Stranger, depicted there and in two of

SNOW

*falling:
it is the whisperings
of spiders. thorough
as the lives of ants.*

*falling:
the stillness
at the center of a bird's mind.
intricate as his small white bones.*

*melting:
a gray moth
dragging his wings
to places where insects die of old age. it vanishes like a poem
when you turn the page.*

W. H. HOWARTH

these essays in the image of being distracted from a funeral by flowerbeds or a Mediterranean seascape reminiscent of Valéry's cimetière marin. Camus rejected this early attitude in The Rebel in his attack on the romantic and mystical yearning for annihilation, but relapsed into it momentarily in the 1958 preface to The Wrong Side and the Right Side where he extols "that tranquil land where death itself is a happy silence."

This is part of a larger antithesis in which the solitary Camus contemplating nature and natural death is balanced against social responsibilities: "I hold onto the world with every gesture, to men with all my gratitude and pity. I do not want to choose between the right and wrong sides of the world." And, "To correct a natural indifference, I was placed halfway between poverty and the sun. Poverty kept me from thinking as was well under the sun and in history the sun taught me that history was not everything." This balance in Camus' life is confirmed by our knowledge that Rousseauian solitary wanderer thanatopsisizing in the Roman ruins of Tipasa and Djemila, or celebrating the noble savage of Algerian beaches, was in the same early period of his life joining and quitting the Communist Party, starting radical theatre, and getting in trouble with French colonial authority as a left wing newspaper reporter who exposed conditions of Arab poverty.

This antithesis finds a geographic expression as early as his 1937 contrast between his visits to Prague and Vicenza from then on northern Europe's grim climate is associated with rewardable social responsibility, Mediterranean sunshine with sensuous self-fulfillment.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

11-25-68

636 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name
Address
City
State Zip No.

1958 he writes: "Though born poor in a working-class neighborhood, I never knew what real misfortune was until I saw our chilling [northern] suburbs. Even extreme Arab poverty cannot be compared to it, because of the difference in climate. But anyone who has known these industrial slums feels forever soiled, it seems to me, and responsible for their existence."

The political dimension becomes more prominent in the essays written during and after World War II, when Camus expresses the all-consuming social commitments of the Resistance and cold war in terms of disruption of the Greek ideal of proportion; the romantic tone of the earlier essays gives way to the classicism of "Prometheus in the Underworld" and "Helen's Exile" (although here again the theme is already implicit by 1937 in "The New Mediterranean Culture," translated among the critical essays). A corollary here is Camus's conviction that the interminable struggle for social justice could be sustained only if it was undertaken toward the goal of winning back the freedom—for Camus himself as well as the victims of injustice—to be an egocentric hedonist.

Europe hates the daylight and can do nothing but confront one injustice with another. In order to prevent justice from shriveling up, from becoming nothing but a magnificent orange with a dry, bitter pulp, I discovered one must keep a freshness and a source of joy intact within, loving the daylight that injustice leaves unscathed, and returning to the fray with this light as a trophy. . . . Yes, there is beauty and there are the humiliated. Whatever difficulties the enterprise may present, I would like never to be unfaithful either to the one or the other.

Camus's aesthetic as a writer ingeniously embodies the same sets of antitheses. One writes about solitary experiences in order to communicate them to other men: one temporarily turns his back on social demands to write of nature, but thereby extends hope to those who have been deprived of the sun. The author accused of perpetrating a literature of despair in The Stranger and The Myth of Sisyphus explains:

What, in fact, does "literature of despair" mean? Despair is silent. . . . True despair is the agony of death, the grave or the abyss. If he speaks, if he reasons, above all if he writes, immediately the brother reaches out his hand, the tree is justified, love is born. Literature of despair is a contradiction in terms.

In the 1958 preface to The Wrong Side and the Right Side, Camus suggested that he was trying to work his way through the European gloom of that period of his writing—epitomized in the fog-bound Amsterdam of The Fall—back to the Mediterranean homeland and balanced outlook of his first book. In their emotional equilibrium, as well as in their warmth, intimacy and concreteness, the early essays represent a fulfillment that Camus was never, to recapture, as

Moral Semi-Paralysis

THE PRESIDENT'S MEN. By Patrick Anderson. Doubleday. 420 pp. $6.95.

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

In the preparation of this book covering five administrations, Patrick Anderson read sixty-three other books, interviewed more than forty persons who worked around or inhabited the White House at various times and, of course, he talked things over with newsmen who had had intimate dealings with the White House. This sizable and conscientious labor comes across only as a sizable and conscientious labor—tidy, well organized and spiritless. It is a bedside reference book, something that you can dip into for your daily quota of "serious reading."

There's nothing wrong with that, of course. But when you consider Anderson's access, his opportunities for pilfering and eavesdropping, it is hard not to damn him as a gentlemanly bungler. He has served on both Kennedy and Johnson committees, and still wallows in the privilege of an appointee. Very few Washington reporters have the time or the carte blanche that Anderson had for wandering down White House corridors, and I can think of very few of the best ones who, given his opportunities, would not have come up with a fuller or more fleshly portrait of the President's men.

Of the Johnson goon squad, for example, nobody is more intriguing than Marvin Watson. He is virtually unwritten about. Roy Reed of The New York Times ostensibly set out to do a critical profile of him and wound up writing a repulsive puff job that would insure a few insider stories for his newspaper. Except for columnists Evans and Novak, in fact, and occasionally Drew Pearson, nobody in the press has really shown us the dirt, hair and skin matter under Watson's fingernails. So here came Anderson with a perfect chance to really produce, and what do we get from him?

In his role of the President's political trouble-shooter, Watson is often blamed for outrageous acts performed by or on behalf of Johnson. One example was the smear campaign against Eugene McCarthy in the final days of the he concedes with Fitzgeraldian nostalgia: "If I have come a long way since this book, I have not made much progress. Often, when I thought I was moving forward, I was losing ground." A melancholy reflection—made all the more so by his death in an auto wreck less than two years later at 46.

Democratic primary in New Hampshire in March, 1968. The attack featured radio commercials which implied that a vote for McCarthy was a vote for Ho Chi Minh—a direct and dirty attack on McCarthy's patriotism. Outsiders do not know to what degree this smear campaign originated with Watson, or with Johnson, or with the New Hampshire party leaders. But it was widely believed to be the sort of thing that Watson would approve, or at the very least, not disapprove.

What a letdown. Anderson has no right to limp off the stage with that "outsiders do not know" line. He talked with Bushy, Califano, Cater, Levinson, McPherson, Moyers, Redmon, Reedy and Valenti—and he can't give us any fresh information of Watson's rascality? What a reporter. It's easy enough to characterize Watson as a "narrow, crude, and ignorant man," but Anderson supplies no new evidence to support it.

However, I may be abusing him for something he can't help. Although he worked for a couple of years on the Nashville Tennessean as reporter, Anderson probably is more of a historian than a reporter. He is capable at stringing together episodes, but he can't recognize

M-REIT

Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust

HOW TO INVEST IN OPEN HOUSING

M-REIT buys income producing apartment houses in good neighborhoods and offers housing to all.

$20 per share

with a minimum purchase of 10 shares
10% down. Balance in 45 days.

SEND FOR FREE PROSPECTUS

Morris Milgram
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

Dept. ND

Name

Address

Zip

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

the importance of something until somebody else has pointed it out. How else can one explain his saying: "I remember seeing the FBI report on one of America's most honored and distinguished journalists; he emerged from its pages as something close to a foreign agent, a man who 'was known' to have spoken to this or that radical politician in 1935, who 'admitted' contributing to some political journal in 1942, etc.," and just letting it go at that. What the report said is of little importance. Everyone knows the kind of stupid pap that finds its way into FBI reports. What I want to know is, does the White House staff slip FBI reports to every casual journalistic visitor? Does the White House staff regularly amuse itself by sitting around sucking on old FBI bones? Anderson doesn't tell us.

Of Billie Don Moyers' brother James, who was one of LBJ's assistants, too, Anderson writes only that he "died unexpectedly on September 17." The way I understand it, James Moyers escaped from the White House into a top job with a Texas company, was literally forced by LBJ to return to the White House despite the President's awareness of what Washington pressures were doing to James Moyers' nerves, and that the grind eventually drove him to suicide. If that, or any version of that, is true, it would be the sort of important shading of White House life that Anderson would kindly, and infuriatingly, ignore.

Several times he writes of Billie Don Moyers' "enemies," but he gives us no clear picture of who they are, or of the general sniping and backbiting and undercurrenting that goes on. He tries to make us see Moyers as a clever little dove who sneaked some dovish ideas past the hawks around Johnson; actually Moyers comes through as no more than what he was: a go-along toady who favored killing enough Vietnamese but not too many, the sort of decent chap who, in the LBJ milieu, doesn't count for much. And, in fact, Moyers seems just a bit addle-headed. In one place Anderson says Moyers wanted to return to the Peace Corps hierarchy until he changed his mind with "the realization that the real power to get things done was right here—in the White House." Later Anderson says, "Moyers may have felt deep in his heart of hearts, a bit like Prometheus Bound, as he struggled with the time-consuming trivia of the Press Secretary's job." So we are left to decide with considerable indifference, whether Moyers looked upon his job as "real power" or "trivia" or, perhaps, both.

The greatest defect, however, of the book is Anderson's semi-paralysis when it comes time to draw moral judgments. It is impossible to separate politics from ethics, or at least it is impossible to do so without falling into a pit of boredom. He talks about great national tragedies, and the men who cause them, as though they were the foibles of characters in a Victorian novel. He writes of the horrible folly of the Vietnamese War merely as something that "would seem" to "imperil this dream"—meaning the jerry-built Great Society—a nice balance of understatement with overstatement.

Then we have Clark Clifford, the man who persuaded, or helped persuade, Truman to smear Henry Wallace as a Communist, to leap fully dressed into the cold war, to recognize Israel as a state without reasonable consideration for the divisive effect of such recognition, to create the CIA and the Defense Department and, until recently in the Johnson Administration, to urge increased militancy in Vietnam. The other half of the same side of Clifford finds him earning more than $1 million a year as the attorney for industries that grow fat off a war economy. A completely unsavory character. And yet Anderson, by using old Nation and New Republic quotes, dresses him as a liberal. If The Nation once judged him as such, I am sure it would, in retrospect, alter its opinion; Anderson, as a historian, should be able to make the same adjustments but he is not able. And although he does not ignore the nastiness of Clifford, he clearly admires the man and reserves for him some of his choicest clichés ("a gorgeous man, smooth as silk and tough as nails. . . ." "Clifford's cordial manner is the velvet glove that conceals the iron hand").

However, Anderson is young. Given time he will doubtless produce something of considerable value. He is sophisticated, usually adept at style, and intelligent. If he now has a chance to stop hobnobbing with White House flunkies, he may develop what he really needs, judging from this book: conscience and perspective.

ART/Lawrence Alloway

Wayne Thiebaud's new work (Stone, through November 27) seems fatigued and desperate. In drily brushed paintings and pastels (the opposite of his previous fat paint) he reduces landscape to flat schemata which are then revived by being set against the light. The tonal masses and the glimpses of details have a deceptive resemblance to visual perception, but it is a put-on. He has drawn a horizon from the lower left corner to the upper right and strung a frieze of cows along it. Clouds, somewhere between UFOs and Indian smoke signals, cast funny shadows on a deep purple hillside. The play of serial and corresponding forms in his early cake paintings are being stretched by virtuoso extensions. Thiebaud was always a skillful painter, but until recently he kept his facility down to a bearable point. Now, he is making witty decorations with the thrust that only ostentatious technique can give them. Typical of the spatial tricks he succumbs to now is a painting of a wooded hill, the side of which is sharply rounded, like an astronaut's view of the planet. The two scales are frivolously posed as a "world view."

Thiebaud has become, in fact, rather like Norman Rockwell, one of whose rare exhibitions has just closed at the Danenbergh Galleries. The central tactic of Rockwell is a fusion of humble naturalism with a gasp-inducing verisimilitude. This flair for imitation is not lightly acquired and in Rockwell it extends to the textures of the American scene (Levis and white wood fences), as well as to expertise in small-town, big-family genre. The exhibition included a group of pictures of people in art galleries where the simulation of other artists' works is trompe l'oeil of a very high level. Rockwell is, on the one hand, disappearing behind the naturalness of his American eye and, on the other hand, swaggering forward as a smart technician, and the charm of his art is in the mock modesty of his style. That is not quite the same thing as the gallery claimed when it nominated him for a line "of painters including De Hoogh, Vermeer, Chardin and our own Bingham." Style as entertainment and double takes is Rockwell's business and it looks as though it has become Thiebaud's.

Alfonso Ossorio is showing assemblies at Cordier and Ekstrom (through November 30), not a retrospective but ten new works backed up by twenty-five or so pieces from the preceding twenty years. Without his horror vacui abating in the least, Ossorio is mixing his media a little differently; he is using more plastics, which gives a clearer and harder color and introduces a kind of panic-stricken clarity into his frenzied colonies of objects. Instead of suggesting parallels with Dubuffet or "Action Painting," as in his early pieces, he is in the domain of "new materials." His new objects might be designed for Barbarella's trophy room.

The new paintings by Larry Poons (Castelli, through November 23)

show him to have discarded games of order, indicated by neat color disks on fields of uniform color, to produce gestural art. The paint surface of the earlier works was always aerated by little gaps between colors, or by scattered surviving guidelines in pencil. These were indicators of his interest in an open surface, which is what comes forward as dominant in the new paintings. Floods of pigment, characterized by its original liquidity, and rather gingery in color, recall the work of two other painters: the surface crawling with rivulets and deltas, not thrown at the vertical canvas but puddled on the flat canvas, recalls Alexander Liberman; and the color is spicy in a rather Jules Olitsky way.

The point of these resemblances may be that Poons, like the other two, is interested in a non-expressionistic version of gestural painting. Tracks of the hand and open-material traces are not a sign of released emotion but an alternative to giggling and patient techniques (as in hard-edge painting). After all, flow mechanics are as exact as contour drawing; it is only that different things are being measured. It is time to consider precision in forms beyond those of outline and hard-edged color, as in the free play of materials. An extension of control into techniques previously regarded as accidental and impulsive may accompany this revival of gestural painting. Poons' present work looks transitional; the bunches of large but ghostly color disks, for instance, seem like telltale hangovers from his prior work. Another painter whose new work is more liquid and more open in surface than before is Edward Avedesian (Elkon, through November 21). In place of solid striped circles (which looked like beach balls) are flat, moist, overlapping bands of color, rather like the searchlights on the credits of Twentieth Century Fox movies.

A strange blurb by Edward Albee introduces the Antoni Tàpies show at Martha Jackson (through November 30). "I had been revisiting Leningrad, and flew to Helsinki because I had never been here. Among the quite wonderful people I met in that quite wonderful country was a gifted woman who invited me to her home, in the woods, on the Gulf of Finland, out of Helsinki toward the Soviet border." Well, anyway, she owned the first Tàpies that Mr. Albee ever saw. Whatever the significance of that may be, the show brings into the open what has been latent and occasional in Tàpies' mainly abstract work to date. The slabs of material, like walls or plots of earth, are now rudimentary images, such as armchair, bed, envelope, footprint, plate, torso. These images were needed to move Tàpies' art out of the conventional Matter Painting of the fifties. He has become a kind of Le Nain of Pop art, or a Spanish Jim Dine.

The embarrassments of writers confronted by art is indicated again this month by Julio Cortazar (he wrote the story on which Blow Up is based), who introduces Pierre Alechinsky (Lefebvre, through November 30). "He doesn't know it, but we like to roam through his paintings, we've wandered through his engravings and drawings for a long time now, examining each turn and every labyrinth with silent and meticulous attention, an interminable groping of our antennae"—which seems to be Mr. Cortazar's way of saying he's looked at Alechinsky's work. The paintings are on paper, mounted on canvas, and represent Alechinsky's most robust effort to add color to his basically graphic style. Acrylics, lighter in weight than oil, seem to have made the difference.

At the premises of Paula Cooper, 96 Prince Street, a group of mainly minimal artists are making "the most forceful statement for peace." According to a manifesto they are "against the war in Vietnam. They are supporting this commitment in the strongest manner open to them, by contributing major examples of their current work." Is that really the "strongest" form of commitment possible—doing your thing and then setting it in a verbal framework of protest? When Iris Clert, the Paris dealer, asked Robert Rauschenberg for a portrait of herself, he sent her a telegram to the effect that "this is a portrait of Iris if I say it is." I have always regarded the wire as a put-down of an importunate lady. Now the technique is being used to fabricate political positions. The artists are saying "this is a 'forceful statement for peace' if I say it is." It is not necessary to attend the show to support it passionately and admire the artists tremendously—and I haven't.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

"Please, please, oh Lord," theatre critics might well cry. "No more classics!" About King Lear, Hazlett wrote, "We wish that we could pass this play over and say nothing about it." He meant that it was too great to be encompassed by normal critical standards. I have wished and have been tempted not to say anything about its production at the Vivian Beaumont Theater at Lincoln Center because like 98 per cent of all such productions they make me feel as Tolstoy did with "firm, indubitable conviction that the unquestionable glory of great genius which Shakespeare enjoys . . . is a great evil."

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" —LIFE

PARAMOUNT PICTURES presents
CASTING BY
FRANCO ZEFFIRELLI
PRODUCED BY
ROMEO & JULIET
No ordinary love story...

THE Paris
TECHNICOLOR® A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

5th Avenue & 58th Street - MU 9-2011

"THERE'S PURE GOLD IN 'FINIAN'S RAINBOW'! THRILLING SINGING, DELIGHTFUL ACTING! A FILM YOU'LL WANT TO SEE!"
L.I. Press.

Finian's Rainbow

TECHNICOLOR® PANAVISION®
WARNER BROS.-SEVEN ARTS PRESENTS

PENTHOUSE A PACIFIC EAST THEATRE

BOS. OFFICE OPENS DAILY 10 A.M.-5 P.M. SEVENTH 11 NOON-8 P.M.

"About anyone as great as Shakespeare," T. S. Eliot has written, "it is probable that we can never be right; and if we can never be right it is better that we should from time to time change our way of being wrong." The value of being wrong as Jan Kott is in Shakespeare Our Contemporary and the way some of the new Shakespeare productions are in England today (not to mention the travesty of Joseph Papp's Hamlet) is that they challenge the routine of our reception of the masterpieces. They disturb us into thinking.

It was said of my two separate reviews of the Brook-Scofield Lear that they were "unfavorable." Not at all: they were a response to a new statement of the play which stirred me enough to grapple with it as I had done only once before in my long theatre-going habit. Such contention is part of true enjoyment in the theatre. To see Lear merely to say that the Goneril is inadequate (or O.K.), that the Fool's lines are (or not) audible, that the leading actor has his good points, that the setting is austere, handsome, unusual or whatever, is not to see the play at all, and has nothing to do with Shakespeare, art or anything else of moment to an adult.

I have just referred to an earlier Lear that brought me into a bewildered but rousing contact with the play. It was Michaels' Lear in the Jewish Chamber Theatre of Moscow in 1935, a production which Gordon Craig declared to be the best of any Shakespeare play he had ever seen. I could not then understand his enthusiasm despite the original settings.

Michaels was not "every inch a king."

He was physically a runt, a poor forked animal, almost a clown. He had very little dignity; the authority Kent sees in him was more an indication of Kent's character than of the king's person. Our audiences and critics would have been puzzled and shocked by that interpretation as I was. But I never forgot it. It was "wrong" in a way that has made me think about the play and led to a further and closer examination of the text.

Lear is a primitive. Shakespeare thought of the story as something that antedates history, timeless. Lear is an emotional savage. He has the furious instincts and wild passion of a primal being. He is like one of those volcanic creatures the rush of whose displeasure may very well turn to murder and just as quickly turn to tearful and equally hectic contrition. The play depicts the development of this man's crude conception of regal majesty to the dawn of his realization that power and nobility do not inhere in the trappings and privileges of kingship, but only in love. Once he is forced into this spiritual crisis even the prospect of imprisonment holds no terror for him so that he tells Cordelia: "We two will sing like birds i' th' cage. . . . So we'll live, and pray, and sing, and tell old tales, and laugh . . . and hear poor rogues talk of court news; and will talk with them too: who loses and who wins; who's in, who's out . . . and will wear out, in a wall'd prison, packs and nets of great ones that ebb and flow by th' moon."

Lear is insane long enough before the purgatory of the heath. The shock of his elder daughters' ingratitude drives him mad, but the anguish and turmoil of his madness leads him to wisdom. Before his fall he was all sudden and driving impulse, possessed, as he says, by "hy-steria passio." Nearly all his previous actions were choleric, headstrong, grotesquely simple-minded. He is in a constant boil: he is rent asunder by the wrathful elements within him as later he is shaken by the storm without. As the raiments of mundane glory are being torn from him he is only halfway between his old sense of imperial selfhood and his burgeoning humility. So, I imagine him saying: "Ay, every inch a king," beating himself in raging self-mockery, and yet holding to a remnant of that former foolish pride which still dwells within him. The smoothly grandiose Lear of romantic tradition is hardly borne out by the persistent folly of his early behavior. Lear is Man learning through agony and despair the lesson of life: that the most protected of beings is "safe" only through love. It is this progress from uncouth, barbaric passion to the simple dignity of the integrated person which the actor who plays Lear must present.

I am convinced that the ordinary common-sense or middle-class notion of Lear as an irascible dodo of a father who blunders and finds his children unkind not only diminishes the play but makes nonsense of it. Seen conventionally, King Lear is just as unworthy a piece as Tolstoy thought it. Shakespeare was not scribe of high-flown homilies; he was a Titan whose conceptions must be embodied with an epic force beyond the confines of familiar rationality.

I shall not blame or praise Lee Cobb. He is an excellent actor of more scope than he is credited with. (For one thing, he is a wonderful comedian, as those who saw him in the Turkish bath scene of Irwin Shaw's The Gentle People will remember.) His Lear, whatever its faults and merits, is in a vein which I cannot accept as relevant. For the rest, the production strikes me equally inept in setting and in staging: they are linked in such a way as to render both feckless. Nor has the direction served the actors. To take only one example: in the speech of Lear's declaration to Cordelia of his newfound insight into existence (it is in fact a beautiful love scene) Lear stands—there is no place on the stage for him to sit—and delivers a sweet old papa's consolatory lecture to his child, a benign bit of domestic philosophy.

Therefore: no more classics—unless the producer is impelled by some greater (personal) need than that of fulfilling the pedantic requirement to honor the ancients.

PUBLICATIONS

HELP Reduce World Population Without the "Pill." Read the "Cannibal Cook Book." $2.00. United Sales Co., P.O. Box 636, Reading, Pa. 19603.

Read MY TIME IN THE ARMY, the diary of a World War Two soldier. What a draftee experienced, endured, enjoyed, and thought—in 3½ years of army time. $2.95 in paperback; $3.95 in hard covers. Postpaid. Send to: Walter Gustafson, Glen Flora, Wisconsin 54526.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco. Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

HERE IS THE BEST—

International newsletter publication you have ever read. The Israel and Middle-East newsletter will keep you tuned in on what is happening in the Middle-East and Israel, in the Mediterranean basin, and on American, Russian and European policies as reflected in the region.

The information comes from Middle-Eastern sources, which facilitate the gaining of a perspective.

Write for free information and edition to:

IMN, Box 2331, Sunnyvale, Cal. 94087 D-A

MALVINA REYNOLDS PRODUCTIONS

You will enjoy . . .
these books	Little Boxes and Other Handmade Songs	$2.50
	The Muse of Parker Street	$2.50
this LP	Malvina Reynolds Sings The Truth	$3.75
	(Columbia 2614 - Stereo 9414)
You and the kids will enjoy . . .
this book	Tweedles and Foodies for Young Noodles	$1.75
these 45 rpm's	You Can't Make a Turtle Come Out	$1.00
	Morningtown Ride	$1.00

(Postage paid; tax included)

Write: Schroder Music Company, 2027 Parker Street, Berkeley, Ca. 94704

Crossword Puzzle No. 1273

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 and 12 across Less and less election results are unpopular with the businessman. (11,7)
- 9 Men on board jump—to take the pledge here? (8)
- 10 Ben said experience keeps a dear one. (6)
- 11 and 25 down Proving those that try to make you feel at home get walked on. (7,4)
- 12 See 1 across
- 14 Does it give the bark bite? (6)
- 15 They were only partly 3, as a race. (8)
- 17 Certain to be found in one's liquor of old, perhaps—and in uniform, too! (8)
- 20 See 2 down
- 22 The financial difficulties of artists? (7)
- 24 The counterpart of a gentleman's gentleman? (7)
- 26 See 6 down
- 27 Went regularly to 10, perhaps, and listened. (8)
- 28 Evidently the opponents advisers are confused by it. (11)

DOWN

- 2 and 20 across It almost sounds as though Twain's work is in no interpretation a wade one! (9,6)
- 3 Well, you can't say "just like a man"! (7)
- 4 Brings things into the country without a

- 5 scrap of food or spirits! (4)
- 5 One who once was, and probably won't be. (3,4)
- 6 and 26 across Was it a habit of Jawaharlal? (5,6)
- 7 Obtuse angle a cat's whisker used to have to touch? (6)
- 8 The angle of those who try to get all the stock together? (6)
- 13 Lots of little fish? (5)
- 16 An exhibition of superiority. (9)
- 18 One pays for them when it comes to automobiles, even though one might be super! (6)
- 19 How to give a new term involving the letter "i." (7)
- 20 One can be the judge. (7)
- 21 Stands and waits. (6)
- 23 Politely demanded a desk of different design. (5)
- 25 See 11 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1272

ACROSS: 1 First-class mail; 9 and 16 Angle of incidence; 10 Achieve; 11 Outcry; 12 Admitted; 14 Diderot; 15 Quasi; 17 Drive; 19 All ears; 21 Tipstaff; 23 Strand; 26 Carriage; 27 Correspondence; DOWN: 1 Fragonard; 2 Righted; 3 and 25 across The Bridge of Sighs; 4 Luff; 5 Standstill; 6 Mahdi; 7 Inertia; 8 Tend; 13 Breakfasts; 15 Quartered; 18 Impasto; 20 Station; 21 Twos; 22 Tiger; 24 Echo.

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

PERSONALS

'TIS THE SEASON—beautifully-designed card showing Madonna and Child with Madonna clutching Dr. Spock's book on child care. 35c each. Minimum order six. Caising, 3410 Granville, Los Angeles 90066.

KENNEDY '72 bumper strips, it's never too soon. 3¢/100. Drum, Box 609, Fairfield, Connecticut.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NT, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 43 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/51, 50/55, 125/510 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled editor, published writer, aids authors in revising manuscripts. (in French and English.) Man #619, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.13
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.10
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

11-25-68

Looking for something out of this world to give for the Holidays? If so read no further.

We have nothing exotic to offer. Just something challenging and informative. The kind of magazine that engages you, rouses you to write angry letters when you disagree. A magazine that wants to know what you think.

Why not give The Nation as a holiday gift this year? Our special gift rate is $10 for the first one-year subscription and $8 for each additional one. Act now and we will send you PAX AMERICANA by Ronald Steel as a free gift from us.

clip & mail

THE NATION

333 Sixth Avenue

New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free PAX AMERICANA by Ronald Steel. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N11-25

BURLINGAME
DEC 2 1968
LIBRARY

SKI BIZ WILLIAM B. ROLLINS

THE NATION

DECEMBER 2, 1968 35 cents

5-628 PL-337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

America Abroad

Our Image of Their Problems

ELDON KENWORTHY

'Any Action?'

The Acid Rock Vigil

KENNETH G. GROSS

NIXON vs. the CONSUMER

WILLIS PARK ROKES

Civil Disobedience: Moral or Not?

Carl Cohen on Howard Zinn

LETTERS

civil liberties in Taiwan

We print below parts of a letter written recently by Robert Merideth, director of American Studies at Miami University, Oxford, O., to the Foreign Ministry of the Republic of China, Taipei, Taiwan:

DEAR SIR: I want to bring to your attention the August 1, 1968, trial of Chen-Yu-hsi at Ching-mei, Taiwan. The procedures of the trial: the series of events preceding it; the repressive quality of the "charges" against Mr. Chen; all of these seem to me—as they seem also. I'm sure, to thousands of others in the academic community—to violate elementary principles of academic freedom and civil liberty. If the report of the Board of Directors of the Student Faculty-Union, University of Hawaii, is only half-true—and I have no reason to suppose it is not all true—such events suggest a great failure to understand what the image of a "free world" seeks to imply.

May I remind you that in no sense in a free world is it "subversive" to (a) read the Thoughts of Mao or anything in the Oriental section of the University of Hawaii's East-West Center Library, or to (b) write articles for any journal, "leftist" or not—the two primary "charges" against Mr. Chen, for which he has been sentenced to seven years in prison. When such "charges" are "confessed" to under duress, then when the "confession" is repudiated in court, furthermore, one begins to suspect a failure to understand not only the substance of freedom but, as well, the process due it. . . .

Robert Merideth

decentralization

Elizabeth, N.J.

DEAR SIR: Please bring this letter to the attention of Max Gordon, whose letter (on labor and race) you published Nov. 18.

As one who has just voted for Gregory and Frost, supportive integration and still do, as well as urging compensatory promotion of civil service employees, I am opposed to the take-over of public schools by neighborhood gangs (for window dressing called "community boards") of any color.

Since Mr. Gordon has a good grasp of historical movements, perhaps he can tell me why the black coalition now includes the Ford Foundation, Park Avenue luminaries, Wall Street philanthropists and other "intellectuals" whose children attend private schools?

Isn't this long-overdue black revolution really an aborted revolution? Should you ask sacrifices of workers "who have just made it" without attacking the citadels of power? Shouldn't we be decentralizing Ford Motor Co. and Consolidated Edison, for example?

Eleanor Genesson

Fort Hood sit-down

Copague, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: A slight correction in your editorial "Brothers in Arms" [Oct. 28] discussing the Fort Hood soldiers who refused to go to Chicago to fight dissidents against Mayor Daley.

Your phrasing gives the impression that forty-three soldiers were involved, possibly because that's how many are standing trial. Actually, 119 soldiers refused to go, all from the same company, and the forty-three who are being tried were selected almost at random, with emphasis on those thought to be the leaders of the "mutineers."

Thomas W. O'Malley

EDITORIALS

Money Jungle

After a brief cooling-off period following the gold and dollar crises of last March, the international monetary pot is once again boiling. Partly because of the pressure front between the stable, non-inflationary West German economy and the crisis-racked inflationary French economy, the world's "hot" money has been sucked from its former haven in France into Germany; in one day alone $500 million worth of currencies poured into the Bundesbank in pursuit of the mark. As a result there are now daily forecasts of an upward valuation of the mark and/or a downward valuation of the franc (both strongly resisted by their respective governments), with profit-seeking speculators doing their best to make these prophecies come true. While the mark and the franc are at the center of the conflagration, the pound and the dollar await their turn (as the price of gold creeps upward). In short, the whole jerry-built structure of the international monetary system is once again threatening to collapse.

As Nation readers should by now be aware, the recurring international financial crises have at their root an economic power struggle between the United States and Continental Europe. (See "The Dollar Invades Europe," The Nation, September 18, 1967, and "Arena of Gold: Europe Defies the Dollar," The Nation, September 23, 1968.) At the center of the conflict is Europe's attempt to turn its vast hoard of gold and dollars—painstakingly accumulated from the United States over two decades, as the latter acquired an enormous investment in European factories—into real economic power. Thus Europe's greatest hope for meeting the "American challenge" rests on its financial power. Unfortunately for the Europeans, while this power gives them benefits such as a limited veto over U.S. foreign and economic policy, the threat that it may be used also helps to promote international monetary uncertainties and crises.

The past weeks' events should have made clear that underneath the veneer of cooperation which glosses the international monetary system, the law of the jungle still operates. The post-World War II system worked fine as long as the United States was the solitary lion and could enforce stability with its undisputed power. Now that European "tabbies" have grown into (non-paper) tigers and are jockeying with the United States and each other for a place in the sun, the environment has become inherently unstable. This instability is then worsened by the wolf-pack speculators, who collectively leap at the throat of the first currency which threatens to lose its footing in the struggle.

Given this situation, whether or not the latest bout of speculation leads to immediate currency changes is less important than the fact that the prospects for orderly reform of the international monetary system appear extremely dim. According to an unidentified IMF expert quoted in The Wall Street Journal (November 18), "For all practical purposes it would be impossible to put through an orderly realignment" of major currency relationships. If this be so, the classic words of Thomas Hobbes about the condition of men seeking power without a common sovereign, the "warre of every man against every man," may become distressingly pertinent to nations: "and the life of man, solitary, poore, nasty, brutish."

MICHAEL TANZER

A Helm for the House

A leaderless, indecisive Democratic Party is the last thing Richard Nixon wants in the 91st Congress. He knows that a disorganized, ineffective opposition, with a mandate to control the House of Representatives but no muscle to do so, would make governing the country exceedingly difficult. The new President and his liaison aides must be able to rely on the ability of Democratic leaders to deliver what they promise, whether the word is yea or nay.

A number of Democratic Congressmen also realize that the country, as well as the party, will be in more trouble than otherwise unless cohesive leadership is established in the House. Thus a revolution of sorts is brewing among strong Democrats who are close to, but not of, the established holders of party positions. Early press reports have labeled the rebels "liberal House Democrats," but when the force rises to the political surface, it will turn out that the real movers are men not accustomed to that appellation.

Party caucuses before Congress convenes will bring the matter into the open. A cadre of Congressmen who have an opportunity to talk to one another on the Ways and Means Committee have decided that the Democrats lost the Presidential election because party leadership flunked the test of the Chicago convention. They don't blame the shambles on Hubert Humphrey. Aging John McCormack, Speaker of the House, did not play an active role and seemed to be uninterested in the proceedings. Carl Albert, majority leader and personally popular, was recovering from illness and lacked the will and stamina to gavel order out of the stockyard chaos that raised, rightly or wrongly, the question of Mr. Humphrey's ability to unify and lead the troops. Though how he might have managed it remains unclear, Majority Whip Hale Boggs, a Ways and Means member, is chided for not having done more to preserve face and decrease abrasions among the delegations, who spent most of their Chicago time fighting the Credentials Committee instead of worrying about the party.

The cadre would like to see Rep. Wilbur Mills, chairman of Ways and Means, run for Speaker. Mr. Mills deeply respects Speaker McCormack, although he realizes that the old man can't carry the burdens of the job and that much of the membership feels he was too close to the White House during the previous Congress. Mr. Mills doesn't want to hurt McCormack's feelings, but the pressure on him to run is building. It is apparently most intense from (in the order of their seniority) Reps. John C. Watts, Kentucky; Al Ullman, Oregon; Dan Rostenkowski, Illinois; and Phillip Mitchell Landrum, Georgia.

Their insistence isn't strictly partisan. Whether or not

IN THIS ISSUE

December 2, 1968

EDITORIALS

578

ARTICLES

582 UN: Keeping the Powder Dry

Anne Tuckerman

583 Nixon vs. the Consumer

Willis Park Rokes

586 America Abroad:

Our Image of Their Problems

Eldon Kenworthy

591 Ski Biz:

The North Slope Circus

William B. Rollins

593 Diplomatic Quotas:

Washington's Odd Logistics

W. E. Chilton III

594 "Any Action?"

The Acid Rock Vigil

Kenneth G. Gross

BOOKS & THE ARTS

597 Civil Disobedience:

Moral or Not?

Carl Cohen

598 Poems

James Moore

600 Tales of Macondo

Oliver T. Meyers

602 Danilo Dolci's Vita

Robert Hatch

602 Book Marks

Sara Blackburn

603 Theatre

Harold Clurman

604 Spider (poem)

Dora Sherwood

605 Records

David Hamilton

607 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher

JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor

CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor

ROBERT HATCH

Associate Publisher

GIFFORD FILLON

Associate Editor

PHIL KATZ

Literary Editor

HELEN TOLSON

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHEK; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ~~ALAN WERTH~~; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 19

579

they plan to support most of his activities, they believe that the new President, and the country, should have the benefit of more effective leadership in the House of Representatives. They also know that their necks are stuck out beyond the limits of political prudence, but the word is that they are determined not to retreat. Though this may sound contradictory, Mr. Nixon will be a weaker President if they do.

Bulletproof Illusions

Investigations of violence and conferences on the subject are the order of the day from coast to coast. Are we indeed obsessed with violence, as some suggest, or is security our hang-up? At a recent Stanford University symposium, two psychiatrists recommended that Presidents and Presidential candidates be prohibited by law from close contact with large crowds. "Mixing with the people," they said, "is a strongly embedded concept in the political tradition of the United States, but it has proved to be an accomplice of assassination."

If this recommendation were to be adopted, it would mean, in effect, that Presidents and candidates for the office would be largely restricted to the electronic media in their attempts to communicate with the American people. The two psychiatrists pointed out that "French President Charles de Gaulle has survived three assassination attempts over the past few years. What are the various protection systems employed? Answers to these questions might add useful information bearing on the protection of American Presidents."

The Nation is happy to be able to supply this useful information. On November 18, President de Gaulle took delivery of a new Citroen to replace the one he has used since 1954. Neither model is provided with any special protective equipment, such as bulletproof glass or heavy plating. By contrast, the latest limousine ordered for President Johnson resembles a de luxe, custom-built mobile fortress.

An obsession with security systems advertises the vulnerability of public officials; it cannot insure their protection. Nor can a political leader function from within an air-conditioned vault. The assassin is always the ruler's faithful attendant. The temper of the times may reduce the menace; "precautions" carried to ostentatious ceremony only invite the dagger.

But it is not "fatalism" alone which prompts such leaders as President de Gaulle, Gov. Nelson Rockefeller, Mayor John V. Lindsay—or that prompted John F. Kennedy and Robert Kennedy—to insist on appearing before large gatherings. Rather it is a sense of the fitness of things. A democratic leader who moves among his constituents in fear and trembling—protected by shatterproof glass, a bulletproof vest, heavy steel plating and a small army of security personnel—betrays a dangerous lack of confidence in the people as well as in the quality of his own leadership. And a people that insists on such measures to protect its leaders betrays a touching confidence in symbolic gadgetry as a means of frustrating assassins.

Domestic Arms Race

The same obsession with security is reflected in the fantastic upsurge in the sale of firearms. From a story in the Los Angeles Times (November 10), one learns the following: The average monthly sale of handguns has increased over a seven-year period at a rate wholly disproportionate to population increase. Last April, when Dr. King was assassinated, 26,057 Californians purchased handguns, by comparison with 11,067 in April, 1967. Last June, when Senator Kennedy was assassinated, 6,683 more handguns were sold than during the month of June, 1967. Authorities now estimate that there is one gun for every resident of the state of California—or something like 20 million guns in all. In the period from 1963 to 1967, the annual sale of rifles increased from 875,000 to 1,882,000; shotgun sales from 603,000 to 1,515,000; handgun sales from 596,000 to 1,182,000.

Gun dealers in California report that the sharp increase in the sale of firearms, particularly handguns, stems from a fixation on security, notably home protection. Most dealers view the possession of a handgun for home protection as "pretty silly." One of them is quoted as saying: "I don't think two-thirds of these people who are buying guns would know how or are qualified to use them." The same dealer told of selling a gun to a 72-year-old lady who was so nervous she could scarcely pull the trigger when he was showing her how to use it.

Three levels of arms buying are present in the new private arms race: by private citizens, black and white; by the police; and by paramilitary organizations. The all-white North Ward Committee in Newark, N.J., has encouraged its membership of 1,500 to own guns. The Home Defense Organization of Long Beach, Calif., assures its membership that "insurrection is at hand" and that they should therefore arm themselves. The Black Panther Party in Oakland has said that every black man should have "a shotgun, a .337 magnum or a .38 in his pad to defend it."

What the reports of the new private arms race indicate is that, as a people, we are obsessed not so much with violence as with security. And we seem to believe that security can be bought. For example, Gallup polls have shown since 1938 that at least two-thirds, and more often about 75 per cent, of the American people have favored more stringent registration or licensing of guns or gun owners. Such a strong and consistent opinion in favor of more stringent regulation, expressed over a period of three decades, hardly shows an appetite for violence per se or an obsession with it. However, the upsurge of firearms sales, correlated with particular events—riots, assassinations and the like—does suggest that many people believe that a gun provides a measure of security for person and property.

We exhibit the same obsession with security in our foreign policy. We are a nation armed to the teeth—not because we have a lust for violence but because we believe that a fantastic overkill capability will protect us from violence. The danger in all this is that an obsession with security can and does set the stage for violence, because it derives from fear and stimulates fear in others.

Odd Consensus

A year ago the Greek Embassy in Washington was boasting that more than 90 per cent of Greek-American newspapers and radio programs supported the Athens junta. In an editorial of November 6, 1967, The Nation asked what reasons might be suggested for this implausible behavior on the part of the Greek-American press, and advised that a Congressional investigation be launched to ascertain the facts behind it.

Today the pro-junta Greeks, or Greek-Americans, suggest that almost 98 per cent of all Greek publications abroad (not merely in the United States) favor the military-backed government in Athens. They allege that the constitutional referendum of September 29 showed that 92 per cent of Greeks themselves are in support of the regime. Apart from the fact that the referendum was a mockery of democratic process, these figures leave open the question as to why Greek publications in the free world should be even more enthusiastic about a dictatorship than are the Greeks who live under its martial law. The easy answer (as in a letter to The New York Times from Mr. George Vranopoulos, Greek Consul General in New York) is to claim that practically every Greek-American is pro-junta.

Another strong suspicion is that the government in Athens is trying to influence, and even control, Greek publications and radio programs abroad, especially in the United States. Reliable sources report that the junta, in addition to using a variety of inducements to bring Greek-American newspapers into line, resorts to threats—in a sense exporting terrorism to the free countries.

A letter just received from Mrs. Helen Vlachos, former publisher of two conservative daily newspapers in Athens, and now living in London, states that she was "forced" to suspend publication of the English-language anti-junta monthly Hellenic Review, which she started in England after her escape from Greece:

It is with great regret that we announce the suspension of the publication of the Hellenic Review. It is not possible at this time to explain fully the reasons which have forced this decision upon us. We hope that this will be possible in the future.

The decision to suspend publication does not imply that the magazine during the five months of its existence has failed in its objectives. On the contrary . . . the very success of the Hellenic Review is, paradoxically, one of the reasons for its suspension. . . . We cannot believe that the present situation will last forever.

Mrs. Vlachos cannot explain her reasons at the present time, but her husband, Admiral C. Loundras, who did not manage to escape with her, was arrested last September on a trivial charge and sentenced to eighteen months at hard labor. There have been other harassments against Mrs. Vlachos' immediate family. Friends of the junta, including some diplomats stationed in the United States, are active in denouncing and threatening foes of the dictators. Even if the anti-junta forces were a minority (they are probably, in fact, the overwhelming majority), they should be able to express their views freely in America and elsewhere in the free world.

Editor Against Apartheid

The Soviet Union has Pyotr Grigoryevich, and South Africa has Lawrence Gandar. Grigoryevich is the decorated—and cashiered—major general who inveighs publicly in Moscow against the arbitrary exercise of state power. Gandar is an editor who attacks apartheid in Johannesburg. Political gadflies are bred by repression; the only way to get rid of them is to kill or imprison them—and that is awkward, once they become internationally known.

Time, The Economist and The New York Times helped to make Gandar famous, but of course the government of South Africa played the cardinal role and, helplessly, continues to play it. The government must prosecute Gandar, for he defies it and other editors might follow his example. But even in South Africa, prosecution means publicity.

The press is free in the land of apartheid, in the sense that there is no official censorship. Control is by intimidation, and most of the press is intimidated. Not, however, the Johannesburg Rand Daily Mail, which Gandar edits.

As early as 1959, the government responded to reports of abuse of black prisoners by passing the Prisons Act. Among other provisions this made it illegal to publish information concerning the administration of prisons "without taking reasonable steps to verify such information, the onus of proving that reasonable steps were taken . . . being upon the accused." In practice, "reasonable steps" would involve clearing reports with the commissioner of prisons—who would deny any abuses. Whereupon another provision, against publishing "false information," would come into play. For the government's purposes, it was a well-conceived statute.

In 1965 Harold Strachan, an artist and former air force lieutenant, came to Gandar with information obtained during a three-year term as a political prisoner. He had seen black prisoners whipped, kicked and tortured with shocks from an electrotherapy machine. After securing affidavits from Strachan, two wardens and two ex-prisoners, Gandar published.

The government moved first against Gandar's sources, all of whom were convicted of making false statements, on the strength of testimony from a string of government witnesses. Strachan went back to jail for eighteen months, and other defense witnesses were similarly handled. With the informants convicted, the state could proceed against Gandar and Benjamin Pogund, the reporter who wrote the articles. Both face minimum penalties of two years.

But in the earlier trials proof of abuse of black prisoners was spread on the record. For instance, the prosecution did not dispute the evidence that prisoners were tortured with electric shocks. The contention that Gandar had published false information was based on the fact that such torture was not an everyday occurrence.

Gandar himself is now on trial. He and his paper are already punished: They have been harassed for three years and defense costs so far total £140,000, with more to come. But he said in court that not to publish "would have been a dereliction of duty, a suppression of a matter of vital public concern." By all indications the government of South Africa will pay dearly for whatever it manages to do to him; in fact, it has already paid.

UN: KEEPING THE POWDER DRY

ANNE TUCKERMAN

A member of a Western country's delegation to the UN, asked recently why his ambassador was attending a reception at the Soviet Mission in New York when Soviet receptions in other capitals were boycotted by top diplomats because of the occupation of Czechoslovakia, replied that "the UN is a place where we keep antifreeze in our radiator at all times." This quip may provide a realistic assessment of the role of the world body in the political field.

For the moment, the well-served car has little place to go. It has not even started down the road of a Middle East settlement. The hopes for some definite "movement" during the present session of the General Assembly have been dampened by the return to their capitals of the foreign ministers of the U.A.R., Jordan and Israel, after a prolonged stay at UN headquarters and numerous meetings with Ambassador Gunnar Jarring, representative of the Secretary-General. Yet, on the first anniversary of the Security Council resolution of November 22, 1967, which created Dr. Jarring's mission and outlined the major principles for a solution, political observers console themselves with the thought that the Swedish diplomat's mission is very much alive (if not well) and that, for the first time since the Six Day War, proposals by the parties have been passed around through his good offices.

It would be erroneous at this stage to speak of the start of a "dialogue" between Jerusalem and Cairo. That is the constant aim of Israel, an aim pursued by the latest Israeli memorandum handed to Mr. Jarring. This document offers Israel's position on many key issues and goes on to ask the U.A.R. whether it concurs and, if not, what is its attitude on questions like secure borders, refugees, free navigation through Suez and Tiran and, most important, its definition of peace. So far, the Egyptian Government has refused to play the game. It has a game of its own: the U.A.R.'s foreign minister, Mahmoud Riad, has proclaimed that his country is ready to apply in full the Security Council resolution of November 22, setting forth among the fundamentals of a settlement the evacuation by Israel of Arab territories conquered in the June war, the cessation of belligerency, the right of Israel to secure and recognized borders, freedom of navigation, etc. Mr. Riad asserts that this is to be done in whatever order Dr. Jarring may think best, under a guarantee of the Security Council, thus indicating that the Israeli withdrawal may not have to be a precondition to the other points. This attitude naturally entails a challenge to Israel to accept the November 22nd resolution as a working program.

Picha, The Special (Belgium)

General Dayan

Israel is balking. It considers the resolution as a "framework" or a "skeleton," to use Abba Eban's words, the flesh to be provided by negotiated settlements between the parties on each point covered. In his view, a guarantee of the Security Council might be imposed by the big powers: over the heads of the parties, and cannot replace a signature, however reluctant, of an Arab state in the area.

This is the stalemate which Ambassador Jarring, having once more agreed to extend his mission, will try again to break, probably in Geneva. Behind this diplomatic blind-man's buff one finds on both sides a firm desire, shared by all the big powers and the Secretary-General, to keep the mechanism of mediation well oiled, in spite of frequent border incidents—and even more because of them.

The anxiety over the possible escalation of these incidents into a new major conflict in the Middle East adds one more concern to a world where the Soviet move into Czechoslovakia has suddenly cast a big new shadow, even while the Vietnamese War appears to be on the wane. There is a great deal of bewilderment today at the direction of international relations, and the UN is sharing in this puzzle. The transformation of the compact postwar alliance set up at San Francisco into a 126-member speech factory, with a high degree of irresponsibility, adds to its impotence.

Any new initiative must spring from the major powers, and it is not likely to appear until Richard Nixon is well in the saddle. It is conceivable that the next President

Behrendt, Algemeen Handelsblad (Amsterdam)

Dialogue with Israel

may, in his turn, engage in a grand negotiation with Moscow in order to de-escalate the costly missile race and to reintroduce regional stability in Vietnam, in Central Europe, and in the Middle East and the Mediterranean (where Soviet expansion is a recent fact of life not foreseen in big-power arrangements after World War II).

Mr. Nixon's past pronouncements do not indicate that he has any strong interest or trust in the United Nations as an instrument for U.S. foreign policy. However, he may not depart much from the practice of the Johnson Administration, which used the UN in a limited way, mostly to help formulate details emanating from common interests which already existed in broad lines between Washington and Moscow. This was the case with the nonproliferation treaty or the cease-fire resolutions on the Middle East. The composition of the Security Council in 1969, where the neutralists are for the first time in a majority, will certainly not encourage the next President of the United States to seek its blessing for his decisions.

It is now likely that the UN, in the foreseeable future, will devote its most constructive activity to international cooperation in the technical and social fields—to problems of human environment, like air and sea pollution, the exploitation of sea resources, or communication by satellites, while maintaining its chairs well upholstered for informal diplomatic approaches and its peace-keeping mechanism in good running order—against the day when they are again called into use.

NIXON vs. the CONSUMER

WILLIS PARK ROKES

Mr. Rokes is professor of Government and Business at the University of Nebraska at Omaha. He recently served as consultant to the Advisory Panel on Insurance in Riot-Affected Areas of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders.

Richard M. Nixon recently announced that he intends to abolish the office of Presidential Assistant on Consumer Affairs, currently held by Betty Furness. His idea is that the consumer must be "encouraged to protect himself"—caveat emptor. He has also made the inconsistent announcement that consumer welfare will be "the explicit responsibility of every department and agency head." This general admonishment also seems odd, since Nixon simultaneously announced that he intends to put the brakes on activities of the regulatory agencies. He established the temper of his position in a letter of last September which criticized the Securities and Exchange Commission for proposing changes too abruptly in the rate structure of brokerage commissions. Elsewhere, he has deplored "excessive" involvement of both the regulatory agencies and the Executive branch in private enterprise.

Nixon's actions in the Securities and Exchange matter are the more noteworthy because in recent years the SEC has shown conspicuous reluctance to enforce vigorously laws designed to protect the public interest, and particularly laws that relate to the huge monopoly exchanges and their members. A case in point is the decision of the SEC to delay hearings on charges that Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., misused inside information about transactions of Douglas Aircraft stock. Observers believe the two parties are moving toward a settlement without hearing. If there is any truth in the allegations, the case is of a magnitude that demands public airing.

Mr. Nixon has made it clear that he will play down the subject of consumer legislation and will be hostile to activist regulatory policies. But the President-elect is naively optimistic if he believes that he can throw a blanket of indifference over the area of consumer protection. An examination of events in recent years gives a better forecast of probable developments.

A relatively few years ago consumer affairs enjoyed very little attention either in the halls of Congress or in books and the press. Today the subject is hot and it lacks the political partisanship that might encourage a President-elect to suppose that he might cool the concern. A host of laws relating to consumer affairs has been passed during the last four years, including the Wilderness Act of 1964, the Water Quality Standards Act of 1965, the National Traffic and Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1966, the 1966 Truth in Packaging Act, the Wholesome Meat Act of 1967, the Air Quality Act of 1967, acts creating national parks and recreation areas in 1968, the new Truth in Lending Law (which will take effect in July, 1969), and other legislation.

At the same time, a Democrat-dominated Congress has become interested in door-to-door sales fraud and deception, auto insurance reform, hazardous radiation from color TV sets and other electronic equipment, poultry and fish inspection, automobile warranties, and many other matters directly affecting the American consumer.

Mr. Johnson created the office of Presidential Assistant on Consumer Affairs in January, 1964, and named Esther Peterson, an assistant secretary of the Department of Labor, to the post. He charged Mrs. Peterson with the responsibility to make certain "that the voice of the consumer will be loud, clear and uncompromising in the White House." Taking her work seriously and President Johnson's instructions literally, Mrs. Peterson played her role as "guardian of the gullible" by focusing public attention on manufacturers and retailers who resorted to deceptive labeling, packaging and pricing. She crisscrossed the country, organizing consumer conferences and censuring petty-minded manufacturers who, in her words, find it "quite profitable to confuse."

At first the President gave Mrs. Peterson high praise, declaring that "through her dedication a new day has dawned for the American consumer." Unfortunately, the President was soon made to feel that the office was a political liability, particularly after Mrs. Peterson's Consumer Advisory Council recommended that a Cabinet-level Department of Consumers be established. The White House bottled up the report, and when the terms of the council members expired, no successors were named. Mrs. Peterson was relieved of her post at the White House. It was clear that the "voice of the consumer" had become too loud, clear and uncompromising.

To assuage the hurt feelings of businessmen, President Johnson, in March, 1967, appointed Betty Furness as his Presidential Assistant for Consumer Affairs. Since Miss Furness' only previous approach to consumer problems had been her famous refrigerator pitch on television, the appointment was greeted with more surprise than enthusiasm. "She doesn't know anything about consumer problems," complained Republican Rep. Robert Michel (Ill.). "This job is too sensitive to permit on-the-job training." One newspaper said of her appointment: "Incredible! Who's kidding whom?" Another remarked that President Johnson would use her appointment as a springboard "to get Batman for the aviation agency and Ed Sullivan for graves registration."

Ralph Nader stated: "Having her in that position is worse than having no consumer adviser to the President at all. It deludes the public into thinking they have a voice in the White House when they really don't."

Miss Furness' early activity in the office did little to dispel the skepticism. Avoiding criticism of specific products or industries, she took to the political stump, admonishing housewives across the country that they could be sure of protection in the market only if they put their trust in the President and the Democratic Party. "Let the people know which party really has their interests at heart!" she harangued the shoppers. "Let them know which party really cares about the consumer!" This approach must have made the President beam, but it did little to assure the consumer that he was represented at the White House.

However, in late 1967 the long dormant consumer protection movement caught fire, and it became politically astute to be associated with consumer legislation. Congress threatened to outdo the President in this area and Miss Furness was given the green light. She began hammering away on consumer affairs, distinguishing herself in testimony on the truth in lending legislation and in attacks on appliance makers and their unintelligible warranty statements. Her famous "I don't want maggots in my meat" at hearings on the meat-inspection bill infuriated the nation's packers and made obvious Mr. Johnson's new hard line on consumer protection. Her early critics were quick to admit that they had prematurely judged the lady. Last June, Miss Furness became one of the relatively few women ever invited to address the all-male National Press Club.

However, Mr. Johnson's Miss Furness was only one factor creating the legislative and popular interest in consumer affairs. One of the most effective catalysts was the dramatic disclosure in 1961 of the hazards in thalidomide. Sen. Estes Kefauver had introduced his drug reform amendments to the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, only to see the bill gutted of all these safety provisions by the highly effective lobbying activities of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association and the American Medical Association—aided by their strong Congressional spokesmen, Sens. Everett Dirksen and Roman Hruska. Then the disclosure that a tranquilizing drug, thalidomide, had caused thousands of birth deformities in Europe focused America's usually apathetic public attention on the drug reform bill. The safety precautions were hurriedly put back and the act passed in 1962.

In the last few years a great number of consumer-oriented books have sold well. A few examples are Jessica Mitford's The American Way of Death (the mortuary business), The Silent Spring by Rachel Carson (indiscriminate use of insecticides), The Quiet Crisis by Stewart Udall (our vanishing natural resources and inadequate conservation policies) and The Health Hucksters, a follow-up to The Bargain Hucksters, by Ralph Lee Smith (market trickery and deception practiced by various industry lobbies). Other influential books have been Overcharge by Sen. Lee Metcalf (private electric utilities), Monopoly by Joseph C. Goulden (American Telephone & Telegraph), The Mortality Merchants by G. Scott Reynolds (life insurance), The Dark Side of the Marketplace by Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (consumer exploitation by large and small business), God's Own Junkyard by Peter Blake (the man-made mess which we call America), and Not So Rich As You Think by George R. Stewart ("of the waters, they made a cesspool; of the air, a depository for poisons; and of the good earth itself, a dump where rats nuzzled in piles of refuse"). Ralph Nader's Unsafe At Any Speed, perhaps the most celebrated of these books, might have received less attention if it had not come out that General Motors had hired detectives to investigate Nader's private life (GM executives later made handsome apologies).

Observers agree that support for consumer legislation comes mainly from the middle- and upper-middle-income groups, the more articulate segment of the population. At the same time, such legislation and allied Executive action is of greatest benefit to the poor. Louis Harris, the pollster, sees two revolutions in America today. One is the revolt of the Negro; the other is a far more quiet one—the revolt of the educated people, those with some college education. Professionals dominate this group. They are the people who want consumer legislation, and they have relatively few of the ties to corporate structures that might restrain their social views. They represent only about 25 per cent of the present voting population, but by 1975 they will be 45 per cent. They do not identify with traditional party lines. One professional observer remarked of them that they are "the most educated, well-informed, finely tuned body of ticket splitters in the nation."

Splinter organizations, vocal individual spokesmen and isolated incidences of government action show the momentum of the consumer-interest drive. Consumers Union, publishers of Consumer Reports, which reaches 1,250,000 people each month, has taken a militant stance. Alarmed by the tendency of manufacturers to soften the effects of consumer legislation, Consumers Union is putting pressure on government to release the results of product research carried out with public funds. For example, it has brought suit against the Veterans Administration under the Public Information Act to compel release of VA tests on hearing aids. A new CR board member is Ralph Nader.

Consumer champions in Congress, conspicuously Sen. Warren G. Magnuson (D., Wash.), chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee; Sen. Philip Hart (D., Mich.), chairman of the Senate Antitrust and Monopoly subcommittee, and Rep. Leonor Sullivan (D., Mo.), chairman of a House banking subcommittee dealing with consumer affairs, have indicated that they have no intention of letting up on the matter. The Grocery Manufacturers of America is so convinced that federal emphasis on consumer questions will continue that it has established its own research institute to try to spot trouble ahead of the Washington watchdogs.

The Kansas legislature in 1967 created a Consumer Protection Division operating out of the Attorney General's office. According to the Council of State Governments, consumer agencies also exist in Hawaii, North Dakota, California, Connecticut, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Washington and Puerto Rico. In November, 1968, the Governor of Nebraska, its Attorney General, several Chambers of Commerce and two Better Business Bureaus announced creation of the Consumer Relations Association of Nebraska. (It remains to be seen what value this organization, made up primarily of business interests, will have for the consumer.)

Meanwhile, sentiment grows in Congress for a government department to represent the American consumer. Nader, who thinks a Department of Consumers might fall prey to bureaucracy, favors an Executive agency, an Office of Consumers' Counsel, to represent consumer interests before government regulators and the courts. Precedents for such a government function are to be found in almost every European nation, where agencies engage in product testing, publish the results, and subsidize consumer organizations. Only in the United States are such programs regarded as aimed at the destruction of free enterprise.

Fretting at the delay of government action, Nader has talked of establishing his own consumer protection office in Washington. Last summer, he recruited seven student volunteers from universities to do research in consumer protection. He is credited with goading the FTC into daring a bolder approach to consumer affairs, one result being its current hearings on consumer protection. Meanwhile, Nader continues to attract attention with speeches in which he declares that the United States "will see consumer demonstrations some day that will make civil rights demonstrations look small in comparison."

Some consumers' associations are proving themselves formidable. An example is the Association of California Consumers, which supported the Public Utilities Commission in its attack on the exorbitant telephone rates charged by the Bell System in that state. As a result, the California commission has a high reputation for zealous protection of the consumer.

Late in 1967, more than 500 representatives of sixty national and state consumer groups met in Washington for two days to create the Consumer Federation of America—in effect, a consumers' full-time national lobby. It is participating in the FTC consumer protection hearings mentioned earlier.

Mr. Nixon's proposed de-emphasis of consumer protection may have some effect on the activities of government agencies, but regulatory commission members do not submit their resignations with a change in administrations, and any shifts in personnel that Nixon wishes to make will come slowly, as fixed terms expire. Meanwhile, such men as Nicholas Johnson and Kenneth Cox of the FCC, Dr. Herbert L. Ley, Jr., of the FDA, Paul Rand Dixon of the FTC, and others can be expected to continue agitation on subjects of consumer concern. (Dixon can be removed from the FTC chairmanship by Nixon in January and may resign from the commission if so.)

The public may still be unable to express consistent opinions on consumer affairs, but a change is in the air—a prevalent unrest and a discontent capable of focusing quickly onto specific issues which affect the consumer's pocketbook, health and safety, or which offend his sense of justice and propriety. With 125,000 Americans injured each year by faulty heating devices (according to the U.S. Public Health Service), millions of automobiles returned to the factories because of potential safety defects, thousands of color TV sets needing modification because of potential radiation leaks, and 30,000 injuries per year caused by electrical extension cords, the emphasis on consumer protection must remain. With monopoly public utilities behaving like fiefdoms, with thousands of possibly dangerous drugs flooding the market, and with the great public disillusionment as to business guarantees and servicing, sales fraud and deception—plus countless additional areas of consumer concern—it is unlikely that the refreshing winds of consumer revolt will be abated, much less halted, by the bland unconcern of the Nixon approach.

OUR IMAGE OF THEIR PROBLEMS

ELDON KENWORTHY

Mr. Kenworthy teaches comparative government at Cornell University.

Our foreign policy derives from the kind of people we are and from the international environment in which we live. It is relatively simple, relatively long-term, and non-partisan.

Dean Rusk, May 1, 1967

For some years it has been fashionable to say that the deepest cleavage in international relations is no longer East-West but North-South: rich divided from poor, white from color, the first and second "worlds" from the third. Describing the world as he thought a Martian would see it, President Johnson spoke two years ago of peace and prosperity in the north—a region extending "deeply into the Soviet Union"—and of poverty and instability in the south. Since that time, our "northern" cities have been less than peaceful and "instability" in the world's south has seemed more than casually related to what we do there. The categories won't quite sort themselves out.

For many Americans evidence that our leaders do not understand the nature of social change at home casts new light on the blunders of their attempt to intervene abroad (Vietnam), and throws into question basic premises of foreign policy. To those led this far, listening to Republicans use against Democrats the arguments Democrats used against Republicans in 1960 (our international prestige, etc.) seems less important than attempting to sort out what is "long-term" and "nonpartisan" in our foreign policy. And this, many begin to suspect, may grow out of, if not "the kind of people we are" the kind of people we conceive ourselves to be. For like most human beings, Americans see others as they see themselves. Unlike most nations, however, ours acts on this perception in ways that affect people throughout the globe, and nowhere so strongly as among the vulnerable societies of the "south."

If in the thirties we began to solve the problem of recurring depressions, it was in large part because our leaders updated their image of the economy. The old image had led them onto counterproductive paths during downturns, and they thus aggravated the situation they sought to ameliorate. An analogous change may be needed today in our image of the Third World, a region as much an abstraction for most policy makers as the economy. It seems utopian, given that the flow of communications is so strongly from us to them, to hope that Americans could ever see the societies of the south simply as they are, in all their variety. Interpreting their struggles in terms of our own experience may be inescapable. It matters, however, which of our experiences we invoke.

For the present generation of leaders, particularly but not solely for Democrats, the New Deal is the relevant model. The depression had a decisive influence on their lives. Some of them experienced the "underdevelopment" of rural and small-town America in the years before cars, radios and federal programs became common. There was Rusk in rural Georgia, Johnson in rural Texas, Humphrey tending the family store in the small-town Midwest, even Nixon in the (then) backwaters of Southern California.¹ Add to this the normal human tendency to redefine unfamiliar problems in terms of ones already solved, and one can understand the appeal of a "New Deal" for the world's south. An alternative image lies closer at hand in today's interwoven urban conflicts of race and poverty. This, however, is a less genial view for political leaders to adopt, because American Government has yet to demonstrate that it can find solutions to social conflict as successful as the solutions it found for the business cycle.

To adopt this latter image for the Third World would entail admitting that we don't understand its problems, that we lack sure-fire solutions, and that as a consequence we might best retire to the side lines—or at least solve our own riddles before making prescriptions for others. Most pointedly, to abandon the New Deal analogy would deny Washington one of the rationalizations it frequently has used for intervening in the Third World. For this analogy, I would argue, is but an updated version of the Wilsonian idealism that cloaked American officiousness in the past. Whereas Wilson intervened in the Caribbean to bring democracy, meaning sound public administration, to the area ("I am going to teach the South American republics to elect good men," he is reported to have said), "development" justified Washington's active encouragement of the coup which toppled Brazil's Joao Goulart in 1964. Washington asserts that it knows what development is all about because the federal government "developed" the United States during and since the New Deal.

It would be silly to suggest that Washington lacks hard information on Third World countries, or does not weigh economic and strategic factors along with ideology and public opinion. Over recent decades, however, increasing publicity has been given foreign policy issues, particularly those with dramatic content. The public relations problem that Lyndon Johnson faces when he sends troops into Santo Domingo, or when CIA agents are discovered manipulating foundations engaged in overseas work, is far greater than anything Wilson or Taft confronted when they engaged in equivalent tactics. That is why the New

¹ In Dean Rusk's words: "Like millions of present-day North Americans, I spent my earliest years in what people now call underdeveloped circumstances. We were prescientific and pre-technical; we were without public health or medical care; typhoid, pellagra, hookworm and malaria were a part of the environment in which providence had placed us. Our schools were primitive. Our fathers and mothers earned a meager living with backbreaking toil: I remember well the bitter resistance before Franklin Roosevelt was able to win support for the Tennessee Valley Authority, that immense network of dams and power stations and fertilizer factories and agricultural extension offices which has wrought such miraculous changes in our South. But a succession of progressive leaders, determined to bring about social change within a framework of political consent, carried through an 'alliance for progress' within the United States."

Deal model—this contemporary reincarnation of our self-image as a successful society with lessons to impart—is helpful. It plays, along with anti-communism, an important role in making acceptable to the American public acts that often exact a price in our lives, wealth or good name.

"Can sweeping changes be progressive and be peaceful?" President Johnson rhetorically asked a group of Latin Americans. "My country knows of this question. We are going through such a change even as I speak. It began in the nineteen-thirties. . . ." Republicans, while not making such explicit reference to the New Deal, have cited our "mission . . . to show others, by conduct and example, that a free society could produce good fruits," a mission that imposes on the United States the duty of "doing much for others without seeking for itself any extension of its political power" (John Foster Dulles, in a speech made a week before the CIA-sponsored invasion of Guatemala).

A classic statement of the view is found in a 1967 speech by Hubert Humphrey. (As the Johnson and Humphrey statements indicate, what we call the New Deal image embraces subsequent administrations, down to the present.) Like Dulles, Mr. Humphrey begins with an acute sense of the American mission:

This New World has represented not just a new land to be exploited, not just a haven for the oppressed. Above all, it has signified a vision of a new human chance—an opportunity to create in a new world a society, a human political system, which would make possible a truly human life.

The speech concerned Latin America, also a resident of the New World; but to the south, the Vice President assumed, the great experiment had aborted. What in the United States is "a tiny minority" of the discontented, "misled by demagogues into seeing its only outlet in anarchy and violence," in Latin America "could be a dangerous and broad movement—or a majority." Our mission is to bring a "politics of hope and of faith" to Latin America through the Alliance for Progress, which embodies our way of successfully attacking social no less than economic problems:

Yes, we are beginning to develop right here at home a creative partnership—an Alliance for Progress—between free enterprise and representative government. And the lessons learned right here must be seized and put to work in other parts of the hemisphere.

When Humphrey spoke of "the lessons learned right here" from which Latin America could benefit, he included progress in racial justice.

The Administration of which Humphrey is a part, no less than that of which Nixon and Dulles were members, has intervened on behalf of Third World conservatives, who were challenged by revolutionaries or reformers with a far better claim to represent a majority of their countrymen. For the Iran and Guatemala of the Eisenhower years, there are the Dominican Republic, Guyana and Brazil of the last two Democratic administrations, while both parties must share responsibility for Cuba and Vietnam. These incursions into the affairs of other nations have been publicly justified by the New Deal tenet that political revolutions are legitimate only where Communists or foreigners rule, the latter being by now an almost empty category. Elsewhere "development," perceived as economic growth (after 1960 with some social reform), requires "stability"—meaning continued rule by existing elites or by their loyal opposition. "The economic progress we seek," Humphrey said of U.S. goals for Latin America in the 1967 speech, "can be securely achieved only where political institutions are strong and where political leadership is secure," meaning existing institutions and existing ways of recruiting leaders. Throughout the collection of his speeches entitled The Winds of Freedom, Dean Rusk acknowledged the struggle going on in the Third World for a sense of nationhood, social justice and economic transformation. Yet with total assurance he stated that "there is no reason to suppose that they [these far-reaching changes] could not be accommodated in the process of peaceful change."

It is but a short step from saying that real revolutions are unnecessary in the south to saying that, where rumblings of revolution do occur, they have been induced artificially by (again in Humphrey's words) "those who glorify violence and who seek not to change society but to destroy it." Such men almost by definition serve goals alien to the interests of the society in question. Therefore, even indigenous revolutionaries may be seen as "outside agitators." Here, however, Washington often falls into a paradox: If it is so obvious that reform can do the job, one would expect little response to the call of violence, surely few people seek gratuitous exposure to suffering. Why then is the revolutionary "agitator" so serious a threat?

Major social and economic change is theoretically possible without a concomitant political revolution, without, that is, basic renovation of change-directing institutions. The New Deal no doubt qualifies. The Third World example which advocates of this analogy frequently cite is Puerto Rico, economically among the fastest growing southern societies. As a model of national development, however, this example is flawed. Puerto Rico is also one of the least sovereign nations. Mexico is sometimes cited, for it too has achieved a rapid rate of economic growth under conditions of political stability. Here the difficulty is that Mexico went through a revolution. Latin America continues to be seen, however, as an appropriate area for testing the New Deal extrapolation. For this region long has typified the problems of "post-independence" that are emerging in Africa and Asia: for example military coups, difficulty in freeing the economy from dependence on primary exports, regional fragmentation. The conditions for peaceful reform also seem most favorable: Latin America possesses more technological resources than most of Africa or Asia, and is a region where Washington can implement its assistance with little interference from other great powers. Not surprisingly, then, the Alliance for Progress is our most explicit, operational statement of the New Deal model. (In one of its architects, Adolf Berle, there is even a direct link.) "Although the Alliance springs from the special relationships between the American nations," Mr. Rusk said in 1962, "it embodies basic principles of development which are of broader application." It is instructive, therefore, to examine briefly how the Alliance has worked in one Latin American country, Guatemala, which is more typical of the Third World than either Puerto Rico or Mexico.

For the first few years of the Alliance, the Guatemalan Government evinced little interest in its reform provisions. But "American officials felt in 1966 that Guatemala had at last acquired a government that was at once democratic and capable of putting the Alliance to work" (Henry Giniger in The New York Times). In the more than two years since this "democratic Left" government came into office, and despite significant infusions of U.S. "aid" (most Alliance funds are actually repayable loans tied to the purchase of U.S. goods), nothing approaching the process envisaged by the New Deal metaphor has occurred. Instead, President Méndez Montenegro soon abandoned all pretense of implementing the reforms on which he had campaigned, and concomitantly political violence grew to the point where, by last winter, it was claiming seventy-five to 100 lives a month. That is equivalent to 3,000 or 4,000 assassinations a month in the United States.

It is not difficult to discover why the Alliance has not worked in Guatemala, or why "revolutionary development" does not occur in South Vietnam. Those who have power—not always identical with those who staff high government posts—resist reform because they correctly perceive that it will diminish their status, wealth or influence. Unlike FDR's foes, they resist successfully because they possess resources that control the making and implementing of decisions far more effectively than do votes or public opinion. In Guatemala these include economic sabotage (denying the government the funds for anything beyond housekeeping functions) and the threat of a military coup. Under such circumstances, it is obvious why a civilian, reform-minded President may do no more than put his desires for change on record. When initially the Alliance made land reform a condition for U.S. economic aid, a dozen Latin American nations passed land reform statutes.

Six years later, these new laws have made a discernible difference in only two, possibly three, of the countries.

The New Deal model works, then, only where those who rule also have power and are responsive to majorities. In most of Latin America, as more people vote, elections yield increasingly radical governments—and elites rely more on military coups (or the threat thereof) to forestall implementation of promised reforms. Chile, one of the few countries on the continent with an apolitical military, almost elected a Socialist-Communist coalition in 1964 and may do so in 1970. Elsewhere, the military have abrogated this trend toward more radical, more nationalistic administrations. This pattern is apparent in case studies (e.g., Edwin Lieuwen's Presidents vs. Generals) and in such summary statistics as those published by Martin Needler in the September, 1966, issue of the American Political Science Review:

	All Successful 1935-44	Military Coups in Latin America 1945-54	1955-64
Were pro-reform	50%	23%	17%
Overthrew constitutional governments	12%	32%	50%

The only data omitted from this table are the simultaneous increase over time of (a) voting by lower status groups and (b) Washington's influence on Latin American military establishments. This is visible in grants and sales of hardware, personnel trained in the States and at the Canal Zone, and in the formulation by the Pentagon of the inward-directed strategies of "counterinsurgency" and "civic action," now adopted by most Latin American armies. At last reckoning we had trained one out of every ten members of Guatemala's military establishment, the national police included.

It would be inaccurate to say that Washington does not want reform in Latin America. It has counseled governments to institute "basic, even revolutionary changes in the structure of society" (Rusk). But without political revolution, which the New Deal image condemns and our military support undercuts, these reforms rarely occur. Perhaps Latin American elites are shortsighted to postpone them, but it would not be the first time that elites have failed to act in their own long-term interests. Our antebellum Southern aristocracy is a case in point. Viewed from these elites' perspective, moreover, such stalling may appear quite rational. Urban migration will continue to draw off much rural discontent. If things get out of hand, experience suggests that the United States will come to the aid of any beleaguered establishment that pins the label of international communism on its domestic opponents. This worked recently in Brazil (1964) and in the Dominican Republic (1965). It worked in Guatemala in 1954, when our intervention forestalled significant land reform and the incorporation of peasants for the first time into national institutions. The reprieve Guatemalan conservatives won then has stood up for fifteen years. Why, with fresh inputs from the United States, should it not last another fifteen years?

Vadillo, La Prensa (Mexico)

The New Deal metaphor generates, first, the false impression that we understand what is happening in the Third World and therefore are entitled to shape events there. Then, it biases the way in which we intervene. Believing that economic growth requires uninterrupted political stability and that revolutionaries are heretics and outsiders, we place our power at the disposal of counterrevolutionaries. The reformist element usually remains still-born, while the repressive element comes to life. The result is increased polarization—hence violence—within these societies.

That is precisely what happened in Guatemala. Under Arbenz in the early fifties, the country was ruled by a leftist coalition. Arbenz, a nationalist and not a Communist, entrusted much of his land reform program and peasant organization to local Communists because they had the necessary organizational skills, were incorruptible, and were staunchly loyal to the reform objectives of the government. The Communists had so little "hold" over Arbenz that he was able to refuse their demand, when the government was under attack in 1954, that workers be armed in its defense. One need not blink at Arbenz's errors and repression—characteristics in which prior and subsequent governments handsomely outdid him—to note that his regime marked a moment of hope for Guatemala that neither existed before nor has reappeared since. Following the 1954 intervention²—at the time hailed by Richard Nixon "as dramatic evidence that the idea of freedom was one for which men were willing to fight and die"—Guatemala has had fifteen years of "little but stagnant dictatorship" (Washington Post's Daniel Kurzman). The President installed by Washington turned out to be, in Tad Szulc's words, "a budding dictator, a political failure, a wastrel of American aid, a protector of corruption, and an unthinking defender of the prerevolutionary status quo" (The Winds of Revolution).

One may say that that all happened a long time ago. It is disconcerting, however, to discover that the motives Washington gave for its sudden interest in Guatemala in 1954 were identical to those offered for our involvement in Vietnam. We were, in accordance with the New Deal image, going to help the Guatemalan people achieve both democracy and development by denying local Communists control over the government. It is also disconcerting to read the speech Secretary of State Dulles made at the time, in which he stated that we are not of course the world's policeman:

We do not assume that we have any mandate to run the world. . . . We do not accept the view that whenever there is trouble anywhere that it is the fault of the United States and we must quickly fix it.

No disinterested observer of Guatemala today, whether journalist or academic, believes that our intervention contributed either to democracy or to development in that country. And those within Guatemala who are serious about social change increasingly find their only hope in revolution.

In Guatemala in 1954, as in Vietnam today, Washington's motives certainly included the fear that a major Communist power (Russia, China) would increase its influence in a previously Western-dominated area. But even as an expression of self-interest, and abandoning any pretense that it was undertaken to save others, the intervention proved counterproductive. The Soviet Union, somewhat to its own surprise, did establish a "beachhead" in this hemisphere—in Cuba in 1961. It had no comparable role in Guatemala in 1954 and it could hardly have hoped to achieve one under Arbenz. But Fidel Castro learned from Guatemala. Castro came to Mexico in 1955, exiled after imprisonment for his abortive attack on the Moncada Barracks. We know from his "History Will Absolve Me" speech that up to that time he had been a member of that "democratic Left" which Washington now applauds in Latin America. In Mexico, Castro moved in exile circles which included pro-Arbenz Guatemalans. In these groups, Herbert Dinerstein reports, it was assumed "that the United States would intervene against any genuine social reform under the guise of intervening against communism." The other lesson extracted from Guatemala was the futility of expecting the United Nations to protect a leftist regime against such U.S. moves. Washington could always argue, as it had done successfully in 1954, that the hemisphere had its own "peacekeeping" organization—one which it dominates.

Once in power in Cuba, Castro was wary of Washington and quickly moved to an ideological position that would secure Soviet support. The tragedy lay less in what Washington did or failed to do in 1960 than in what it had done in 1954. Again in Dinerstein's words (Intervention Against Communism):

² Many of the details are recounted by David Wise and Thomas Ross in The Invisible Government. Here it is enough to say that Arbenz, like most Latin American reformers, enjoyed only the conditional support of his own army. After U.S. pilots (CIA) strafed and bombed Guatemala City over a period of days in U.S. planes, the generals forced Arbenz to resign. The U.S. Ambassador then moved quickly to assure that the CIA-picked exile leader, Col. Castillo Armas, and not some other general, would assume the Presidency.

Most probably the United States would have been prepared to accept even a quite radical Cuban regime if it had not become Communist; and it is equally likely that Castro could not have believed this to be the case, given the lessons he had drawn from the intervention in Guatemala.

Another Latin American who drew lessons from Guatemala was Ernesto Guevara, then far from being the "Che" that the United States would spend millions to help trap in Bolivia. Guevara was a doctor planning to work in a leprosarium in Venezuela. He was in Guatemala City in 1954, this being one stop on a trip through Latin America. Though unquestionably holding leftist sentiments, he had never become politically affiliated; he was "the sarcastic medico, the uncommitted and unimpressed spectator." So incensed was Guevara, however, by the U.S. intervention he witnessed that he joined those trying to organize resistance. When that failed, he accompanied the other exiles to Mexico, where he met Castro for the first time. "The doctor died and the guerrilla leader was born there in Guatemala City in June, 1954." (Dolores Moyano Martin, "A Memoir of the Young Guevara," The New York Times, August 18, 1968.)

Like some self-fulfilling prophecy, then, Washington's "successful" intervention in Guatemala rid the hemisphere of a leftist coalition government only to contribute to the rise of a more monolithic and far more Soviet-penetrated regime. The tactical success of the CIA operation in Guatemala, however, encouraged Washington to meet the new Cuban threat with the Bay of Pigs operation. This time, however, the CIA miscalculated and the U.S. role was fully exposed; as a consequence, the Alliance was tarnished in its inception. (The Bay of Pigs invasion was appropriately launched from Guatemala, by that time ruled by U.S. protégés.) Four years later, the Santo Domingo affair—traceable to Johnson's fear of "another Cuba" and thus one more ripple from 1954—gave the Alliance what many observers considered its coup de grâce. For whatever Washington thought of Juan Bosch's supporters in the 1965 uprising, Bosch was considered "democratic Left" throughout Latin America. An Alliance without "democratic Left" leadership is, to many Latin Americans, too patently a holding action for the status quo.

Currently, to come full circle, many speak of Guatemala as a potential Vietnam. Already it has taken an infusion of U.S. Special Forces to contain two guerrilla bands inspired by Castro's example. Already U.S. military attachés and a U.S. ambassador have been killed, and napalm has been used.³ One need not predict victory for the guerrillas to suggest that Guatemala today is more of a "trouble spot" for Washington than it was—if correctly perceived—in 1954. Moreover, much of this trouble stems from our intervention which discredited, and in some instances destroyed, democratic reformers, while it strengthened the association of nationalism with communism. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the 1954 intervention was as destructive of U.S. interests, as Washington itself defines them, as it was of Guatemala's.

One case does not make a pattern. Space precludes doing more here, however. A "modest proposal" for the next administration would be to commission a study, at least as thorough as the Kerner Report, on the long-term results of every U.S. intervention in the Third World. Even if no one acted on this information, it might have the salutary effect of disabusing us of the hubris fostered by the New Deal image.

Perhaps Vietnam will cure us, but the evidence so far seems negative. Those most likely to shape the next administration still speak of Vietnam mainly as a tactical error: too much unilateral military involvement. It may be, however, that public wisdom will come from another source in the years ahead; from our ineludible domestic crisis. And here I mean something more than the fact that resources spent in Vietnam are needed at home.

Throughout the sixties, Washington has told the Third World that a major obstacle to its social and economic development is its failure to incorporate rural poor into national markets and institutions. Using the New Deal model, our leaders have said that this can, and only should, be achieved through nonviolent reform. Now that our cities are swelling with rural migrants for whom little suitable housing, relevant education or employment exists; now that the reform-making institutions of the New Deal vintage look bureaucratized and bewildered; now that we have experienced violence that cannot be explained by "outside agitators"—surely now, one thinks, fewer Americans will accept the universal applicability of "persuasion and consent" (Rusk). The point is a simple one but worth publicity: only now has this country faced problems at all analogous to those facing many Third World nations, and while by Third World standards we possess unlimited resources for dealing with these problems, we have yet to score any notable successes. The first "ulterior" use that might be made of our domestic crisis, then, is to deflate complacency to the point where leaders will admit they do not have the answers to the thorny questions of revolution versus reform, this set of institutions versus that, social priorities versus economic ones. Most southern societies may also lack optimal answers, but they have a right as well as a need to learn by making their own mistakes—including their own revolutions, if these turn out to be mistakes.

No one can examine north-south relations globally and black-white relations domestically without sensing that they call for analogous inventions. A major obstacle to viable solutions in both cases is the close association of control with resources. The poor in both instances need access to technology and wealth, but they also need to control their own experiments. The latter is not merely a psychic need, endorsed by justice; it is a functional requisite as well. The "have-nots" usually know best where they are and where they want to go. Most resources, however, are concentrated in the hands of the "haves"—of white Americans and of the rich, industrialized nations—and these have tended to make them available only on their own terms. So the “have-nots” find themselves forced to choose between self-determination with few resources and more resources with little self-determination.

³ Both Le Monde reporter Marcel Niedergang and Uruguayan journalist Eduardo Galeano quote Guatemalan Vice President Marroquin Rojas as saying that U.S. planes, based in the Canal Zone, have made napalm bombing raids on mountainous areas believed to contain guerrillas. For Galeano's account of the guerrillas and their attackers, see "With the Guerrillas in Guatemala," Latin America: Reform or Revolution?, edited by James Petras and Maurice Zeitlin.

Without developing the point further, the new policy needed in both instances is one that will create the environment in which all experiments that functionally relate the particular (e.g., the group culture of black citizens, the national culture of a southern society) to the minimal demands of the larger community (e.g., to buy one must have something to sell) will have an optimal chance of succeeding. At present, as has been demonstrated through trade statistics in the one sphere and “life chances” data in the other, the environment is not even neutral. Instead, to those that have, more usually is given. Just as Third World nations continually receive less for what they sell abroad, relative to the price of the manufactured goods they purchase (including the machinery they need to break this vicious cycle), so automation and the rise of suburbia leave many black Americans with relatively worsening education, housing and occupational choices.

The Third World does not inhabit our cities, does not confront us directly. Ultimately, the dispersal of cheap nuclear “equalizers” or the sheer enormity of mass starvation may give some southern regions a claim on our attention, but by then we may be too frightened to respond rationally. In the meantime, America’s attitude toward the world’s south might be characterized as white liberalism. We are so adept at explaining their situation to them, so sure they want what we want, so officious in “helping,” that we scarcely hear them tell it like it is. So there is something to be said for eliciting from our confrontation with nationalism, “rising expectations” and the desire for self-determination at home—a confrontation we cannot avoid—new images of similar phenomena abroad.

SKI BIZ

THE NORTH SLOPE CIRCUS

WILLIAM B. ROLLINS

Mr. Rollins is a free-lance writer (and one-time professional ski teacher), now living at Woody Creek, near Aspen.

Fred Iselin, ski boss at Sun Valley, Aspen and now Aspen Highlands, says: “When I started skiing, my face was schmooth and my pants were baggy. Now my face is baggy and my pants are schmooth.” Iselin neglects to mention that his pockets were once empty, but now there’s a noticeable bulge where his wallet weights his “pulsating-pink” parka. Like his neighboring ski school director at Snowmass-at-Aspen, Stein Eriksen (known to some as “The Golden Stud”), he is proof that there’s more to directing a ski school these days than saying, “Bend zee knees. Two dollars, please.”

One must make movies (Iselin’s latest, for United Airlines, is Yoo, Hoo, I’m a Bird), endorse beer and tanning lotion, produce celebrities and wax personalities as well as skis, now that posh has come to the slopes.

Skiing, they say, is a way of life. Just ask Shirley Kantrowitz. Eight years ago, the wife of a garage owner in Woodridge, N.Y., she borrowed the money to buy fifty pairs of skis, poles and boots, and open a rental shop at a new local ski resort called “Davos, USA.” Two years later, she and her partner, James Wynkoop, had paid for the first fifty pairs and 950 more. By noon on a busy Saturday they have rented out all 1,000 at $5 a pair. That is more than $4,000 clear profit for four hours’ work. Shirley’s husband has long since sold the garage to work in the rental shop. They have a new house, two new cars (license plates: SKE-5 and SKE-6), and take the summer off. They have opened rental shops at other Eastern ski areas. It’s a way of life, all right, but they seldom get a chance to ski any more.

The Iselins, Eriksens, and Kantrowitzes, however, are small-time compared to Howard Head, America’s biggest ski manufacturer, who counts his annual earnings in the millions, and recently announced a merger with the American Equipment Company. You can read about him in Fortune. In major operations, skiing tends to become subsidiary. The co-developers of Snowmass-at-Aspen, the Janss Corp., and the American Cement (that’s right, cement) Corp., sold $3 million worth of real estate from January to March of this year alone as they opened their West Village. Snowmass had more skiers in its first year of operation than nearby Aspen Mountain, which celebrated its twentieth anniversary during the season.

Skiers—an estimated 50,000 each year—have also changed. The old breed calls it dilution, or prostitution. When Hannes Schneider immigrated from the Arlberg in Austria, to get the sport really going in the United States in the 1930s, most of the devotees at North Conway, N.H., were individualists, pioneer sorts. You had to climb a foot or more for every foot you skied down; climb a mile for the reward of skiing back down a half-mile. After a big snow, the aficionados worked together, packing the slopes, step by sweating step.

Now, sophisticated snow vehicles do the packing. And the old rope tows and snowmobile at North Conway have been dated by Poma-lifts, T-bars, J-bars, chair lifts, gondolas and téléfériques. The modern skier is even carried down, too, if necessary. He can leave the kids in a nursery at the bottom, wine and dine at midway and again at the top, watching the parade at the sun deck. One of Iselin’s star attractions last winter, Tom LeRoy, performed a double somersault for the vicarious pleasure of those eating lunch midway at the Highlands.

Tino Koch, a former Swiss Olympian who runs the ski complex at the Concord Hotel, in the Catskill Borscht

Belt, says, "I don't run a ski school, I run a circus." (Tino made the original loan to Wynkoop and Kantrowitz.) I used to teach for Tino. In a class of ten people (mainly beginners from New York City) there would be five who, if they fell down, couldn't get up by themselves. Those five and two more, on the average, were incapable of climbing the practice slope (vertical drop: 15 feet). When the girls fell down and got their faces wet, blue and green mascara would run down their cheeks to blend with the colored, artificial snow. (The popular name for Sugarbush Mountain in Vermont is, appropriately, "Mascara Mountain.")

"Follow me," was often replaced in the instructor's lingo by "Hang on to me." The instructor needed more psychology than technical finesse. "What do you do if your feet hurt?" the students ask, or "What's the worst thing that can happen to me?" (Once, weary at the end of a long season, I told a woman, "Oh, you could get a ski pole in your stomach, and break your back.")

Koch charged $5 for a half-hour lesson (admitting, privately, that no one learned that much). With ten to twelve classes every half-hour, every day, he earned an estimated $80,000 in three months. But he lived in constant fear that the hotel would replace him with a champion with a bigger, or at least newer, name.

The hotel had a different fear. It was almost inevitable that anyone who fell would sue, claiming that the rental equipment was faulty, or the snow not properly groomed. Concord hired a full-time insurance adjuster to stand at the flag-draped chalet at the top of the hill with a camera. He took pictures of the equipment immediately after a fall and statements from witnesses to any accident, for possible use in court later. It was rumored that the hotel always settled for a nominal sum so as to maintain good will.

The springtime of skiing, the days of climbing half the day with a peanut butter sandwich and an apple in a sack on your back for one run down; too tired by dusk to do much but go to bed, are over. Those who climb to even the most remote peaks now are apt to find the fresh powder snow tracked up by more affluent skiers who got to the top by helicopter. Last winter, it cost $6.50 a day to ride up Aspen Mountain. Many resorts charged $8 for the same privilege. Since the $5-a-day barrier was broken, most skiers think that it will be $10 before long. The best skis now cost $200; boots, at least $50; poles, $15; pants, $45; parkas, $50. One skier spent $1,000 his first morning to outfit the family at Aspen Sports. (He may have been one of those who keep a $30,000 apartment in a condominium for vacation use.)

The summer season at Aspen is almost as busy, due largely to a music festival. Most modern ski resorts are seeking similar "cultural attractions" that will give them a year-around appeal and income. They usually start with golf courses and pools. Nearby Snowmass has snatched up a film conference that abandoned Aspen for lack of funds. (Snowmass doesn't lack funds.) They put up $1,000 for a chess conference that couldn't raise the kitty in Aspen. And Snowmass officials invested another $1,000 in an old shed, to make it suitable for a group of Aspen potters. (It may be no coincidence that the potters decided to move back to Aspen after the first guided tour of prospective Snowmass property buyers. Snowmass got another potter.)

Areas such as Vail, Colo., Park City, Utah, and Jackson Hole, Wyo., have discovered that quick success on the ski slopes cannot be as quickly backed up by "instant culture" in the community. But they're trying. Enterprising "arts and crafts" types might find—if they don't mind being displayed to guided tours—that life as an artist-in-residence at a ski area is financially more rewarding than a similar job on campus.

Oddly enough, summer is a good time to get a picture of what skiing has done to people, and what people are doing to skiing. In Aspen, this year, it was the summer of the bitch. Sour-faced shopkeepers bitched that there were not enough tourists; tanned old-timers whined that there were too many; soggy campers carped at the rain. They all stopped on the sidewalks to stare at hard-hatted workmen hammering nails into the frames and floors of condominiums, those climbing conglomerations that blot out the mountains. And they all agreed: Aspen had changed.

A summer of the harassed. Merchants harassed the city councilmen and police about the hippies and boycotted the Aspen Times for declaring that hippies had rights. There were so many mustaches on the streets it seemed like a perpetual convention of barbershop quartets. A season of Beatles and beads, meditation and macrobiotics, asanas and astrology, tarot cards and the I Ching. Of course, Aspen had no monopoly on the young, the dropouts (although it has always exerted a disproportionate attraction). But in Aspen, the new gypsy bands met a curious blend of earlier gypsies, one-time ski bums, surfers, others who had escaped the rat race. These older ones had well-defined symbols of, at once, rebellion and belonging; badges like jeeps, German shepherds, green rubber boots and pick-up trucks with names. And when the two bands met, in the mountains and valleys, alongside the Victorian gingerbread houses, many of the original rebels, who had run away from society in the 1940s, displayed short memories. They closed the doors of their precious Aspen society to such youths as they themselves had once been.

This was also the summer when the final 8 miles of Independence Pass were paved, making it easier for the soft and pale to invade, burying under asphalt the dirt-road nostalgia. It was the summer when wastes ran over the top of sewer-plant capacity, and trout turned up dead bellies to float down the Roaring Fork and rot on rock-strewn banks. The summer when the Aspen Ski Corporation decided it could no longer offer cut-rate lift tickets to employees: too many administration problems; too much cheating. "Remember," an old-timer said, "when you could stick your skis in a snowbank outside the Red Onion while you had a few drinks, and nobody would take them?"

Bow-tied drivers sped buses with stylized flowers on their sides, every half-hour, to West Village, Snowmass-at-Aspen, so visitors could see always smiling, all-American public relations men change costumes (not quite on the hour): Cowboy hats for Western Days at Snowmass-at-Aspen; sombreros for Fiesta Acapulco at Snowmass-at-Aspen; black suits for Mock Funeral at Snowmass-at-Aspen.

Yes, indeed: "Something's Always Happening at Snowmass-at-Aspen" (if you call that something). Masochists could dwell on the multi-brochured prospect that the IBM computer at Public Relations-Western-Acapulco-Black-West Village-Snowmass-at-Aspen is, even now, programming seven more villages, one for every dart on the compass rose. It takes great imagination. Perhaps only a computer would have the soul to re-create ghost towns with the veritable vacuity of the originals.

You can be sure that, this winter, everything will be bigger and (no, not better) more expensive at all the Davoses, Sugarbushes and Snowmasses-at-Aspen. And there will be at least 50,000 more skiers riding up and down the mountains. The late Freddie Fisher, a long-time Aspenite and non-skier, used to gaze up at the mountains and say, "I'm too poor to go up, and too smart to come down." Freddie was a good bitcher. It seems a long time since he died.

DIPLOMATIC QUOTAS

WASHINGTON'S ODD LOGISTICS

W. E. CHILTON III

Mr. Chilton is publisher of the Charleston (W.Va.) Gazette.

Militarily, two nations dominate the earth. Each owns—and boasts of owning—sufficient nuclear destruction to atomize several times over the 3 billion men, women and children alive today. Under these circumstances it might be thought the United States and the Soviet Union would covet extensive, purposeful diplomatic relations. What would seem unthinkable is that either superpower would, for lack of financing, slight agencies or processes specifically structured to promote understanding and friendship between governments and peoples, particularly in light of the orbital sums spent by the same societies on projects that only encourage distrust and raise levels of animosity.

When the United States and the Soviet Union reached agreement last June on the long-delayed Consular Treaty, I was in Moscow with an American Newspaper Study group preparatory to heading out to Siberia. [See "Plain Talk with Vodka," The Nation, November 11.] Through efforts of a colleague, three of us interviewed Ambassador Llewellyn Thompson.

Asked about the Consular Treaty, the Ambassador said his budget was so cramped that he would be lucky to open one consulate—at Leningrad. The Russian consulate, he noted, would be in San Francisco. Ambassador Thompson didn't dwell upon his financial difficulties, since it would have been unbecoming, not to say unavailing—his allocation, along with that of every other of the nation's multitudinous ministerial missions, is fixed from Washington out of the State Department's annual appropriation awarded by Congress.

Although no restrictions limit the number of personnel the United States may appoint to the Moscow embassy or the Soviet Union may send here, the latter's delegation is larger. Perhaps more surprising, the American staff at Moscow is substantially smaller than others stationed in far less important countries. Serving in Washington are eighty-seven Soviet diplomats; the United States has sixty-four diplomats in Moscow. The complete complement working at the embassies is higher: 135 Soviet employees consisting of 114 civilians and twenty-one military, against 108 Americans composed of sixty-four civilians and forty-four military. (The greater number of U.S. military, says the State Department, is due to thirteen Marine guards and Seabees.)

The American delegation on duty in Athens, Greece, totals 350, according to State Department figures obtained in October by the Associated Press. Departmental press agents could doubtless justify the quantitative discrepancy between our Greek and Russian missions, but the true reason in all probability has little to do with diplomacy. Heaven knows it can't square with reality because Greece relates to what's happening throughout the present world about as precisely as does a DAR chapter meeting.

Athens, however, is a comfortable city, with ample creature consolations, moderate climate much of the year, and the environs chock-full of marvelous antiquities. It is accessible to touring relatives and family friends, and is the ideal base from which to launch vacation expeditions to Egypt's pyramids or the Colosseum in Rome.

Moscow, on the other hand, is conspicuously deficient in the niceties, even the essentials, of modern living. Cultural attractions, though excellent, are few. Night life is nil. Making friends among the natives is an impossibility. The weather ranges from poor to awful, and winters are colder than a Pravda editorial discussing U.S. foreign policy. In addition, the work load is formidable.

To suggest that Athens' charms and Moscow's drawbacks account for the pronounced difference in size of the ambassadorial staffs assigned to these capital cities is on its face an absurdity. Yet equally absurd is an American diplomatic commitment to Greece more than three times as large as the commitment to the USSR. Either our Greek embassy is crawling with supernumeraries or our Russian delegation is slaving away on the edge of exhaustion.

Likewise deplorable is the failure to unearth enough dollars to create more than one consulate within the Soviet Union. But since the money can't be found, the decision to run the one consulate the United States does intend to support from Leningrad, an overnight train hop from Moscow, is unfortunate. The Soviet Union's future lies literally in Siberia.

Russian authorities are determined to develop this remote region that is bigger than the continental United States. Japanese industrialists are being courted for investment capital on joint enterprises. Soviet laborers, skilled and unskilled, who move to Siberia receive double compensation for equivalent work performed elsewhere in the country. Scientific cities are being built. Already the world's largest hydroelectric installation is operative at Bratsk; it is so highly automated that two engineers command the energy output from a single small control room. A chain of identical facilities is being planned nearby to provide the whole of the USSR with plentiful, cheap electricity.

Lake Baikal, an hour's bus drive from Irkutsk, is the Soviet Union's first designated national park. It is the world's oldest, deepest, purest body of fresh water, and the recreational complex to be situated there will ultimately accommodate at any given time 160,000 vacationers. Lake Superior's perimeter is longer than Lake Baikal's, but the latter's volume of water exceeds the combined volume of all the Great Lakes.

More and more American excursionists—and businessmen, too, since gold, diamonds and other scarce mineable materials are buried beneath Siberia's timbered tracts—will be journeying to the Soviet Union's Asian territories, and a consulate could prove to be a very welcome facility. For example, our tour director lost his passport on the flight to Khabarovsk, some 5,000 miles from Moscow. He found it finally, but if he hadn't, he'd have had to retrace that incredible distance to acquire another at the Moscow embassy before being permitted to leave the USSR.

Soviet-American diplomacy can doom or validate mankind's aspirations for peace and for a decent interment of cold-war irritations. To stint on the instrumentalities required to pursue these objectives strengthens the case of those who insist the United States really doesn't desire a harmonious world, unless such a world is to be wrapped to pax Americana specifications. Some of the State Department's more knowledgeable critics—recently re-elected Sen. J. William Fulbright of Arkansas, perhaps?—ought to examine closely the wisdom of assigning 350 employees to discharge the nation's diplomatic responsibilities in Greece and 108 to master the same task in the Soviet Union. Figures like these fail to add up in more ways than one.

'ANY ACTION?'

THE ACID ROCK VIGIL

KENNETH G. GROSS

Mr. Gross, a reporter on the New York Post, is completing with Bernard Lejkowitz a book on the Wylie-Hoffert murder case.

It ended late election night in the bloodshot glare of a television screen hung over the bar of a midtown Manhattan hotel ballroom. It ended as dazed hippies spilled whisky on the dance floor's soiled confetti. It ended while a sobbing girl with a papoose on her back slumped into sleep while her child kept a vigil. It ended with the insane howl of a plastic horn, blown in the nearest ear by a staggering youth. It ended with the stumbling dropouts washing away the sight of their defeat—as the television recorded new scores—in liquor or pot or acid.

The anti-election campaign was ended.

It had begun in the brisk afternoon sunshine of Union

Square Park, an American Hyde Park, and the ghostlike remains of the old Bolsheviks of the depression cocked a cynical ear at these wild new revolutionaries who knew nothing of the old battles and repressions. The old foxes, in their overlong greatcoats, left the chess boards grudgingly to hear these children too young to vote urging and taunting their elders away from the ballot. They listened silently and smiled in recognition and had a special fondness for those who slumped against the trees in despair—those who sensed the doom of their mission. The bloodied older crowd recognized themselves and returned to their chess boards with a shrug. For a moment, they had been stirred.

They had been stirred. But they had watched the growing detail of police who surrounded the park. They had watched the policemen slipping into place, roping off the demonstration areas and bringing up the wagons for the arrests. The cops seemed bored, a sure sign that something dangerous was brewing. The Tactical Patrol Force buses rolled into the side streets. The Community Relations people arrived to explain it all to the press.

A white-haired veteran of the park's political and social past tried quietly to discourage a boy who was wearing a "Vote No!" button.

"If you provoke them," he said, pointing off toward the building line of policemen, "you will get hurt."

The boy looked at the old gentleman as if the man were mad.

"You see," the man continued, "I really don't believe that you people are ready for the streets."

"We have to turn this into Chicago," the boy said, starting to turn away, as if this guy could never comprehend anyway.

"It's not that," the man said, grabbing his arm to stop the boy. "I agree with everything you say. I agree that the candidates are terrible. Terrible. I'm not voting. But what I'm saying is that you're doing something foolish by provoking violence. You aren't ready. You'll find that you'll be all alone on the streets. There won't be anyone there to help. . . ."

"Listen, Pop. You just don't know what I'm talking about. We have to go to the streets. That's our only recourse. We have no choice. But how can you understand?"

The old man started to say something. Smiled. And walked away. "They will learn," he mumbled. "They will learn."

A group of white-faced players performed an anti-war drama that seemed too whimsical for the cops in the crowd, too esoteric for anyone else except a small core of unsmiling theatregoers up front. It ended and a young girl in the cast started to pass a hat.

"How come you din' sing the National Anthem?" shouted a toothless black woman. The girl passing the hat didn't hear the remark, only the bitter tinge to the delivery, and ran up expecting to find an ally. She smiled and said something about solidarity.

"I said how come you din' sing the National Anthem? . . . Motherfucker!"

The players made an immediate withdrawal, taking with them the half-filled Uncle Sam hat. They retreated to the far end of the park at 17th Street, where a speakers' platform had been arranged.

The groups from Columbia and City College and other outposts of Students for a Democratic Society began arriving, each wave bringing a surge of applause and hope. The men were uniformly ragged. Some wore tattered army fatigue jackets. The girls wore no make-up and expressions of humorless dedication. They would taunt a cop here and there, but the humor was bitter, bitter, bitter. They had tacked up pictures of Hubert Humphrey, Richard Nixon and George Wallace. Each had been transformed by ink mustache and drooping lock of hair to a caricature of Hitler.

A boy held the amplifier for the speaker: "Racist war . . . Fascist government . . . revolutionary movements . . . pig departments."

The words became snatches and there were flinches in the line of cops when an insult hit its mark. But almost no one except the cops was listening. The girls were strolling among the crowd, now approaching 500, teasing the boys. The boys were showing off their militancy to the girls. And in one corner, hidden by a circle of friends, a pair of kids blew pot to demonstrate defiance in public.

A cardboard coffin was passed overhead to signify the mordant quality of the election. A pair of doctors circulated among the crowd in long white gowns with large red crosses on the front. They said that they had been at Columbia.

A policeman stood off in the background counting the crowd. He was telling his superior that the march, if there was one, would be illegal. The demonstrators planned to march to Times Square, about a mile north.

"There's nothing illegal about a stroll," said the superior.

"But they don't have a parade permit," argued the cop.

"Who says that they can't all decide to walk uptown?"

And that's what they did. After conferring with the police brass, the groups broke into clusters of about fifty and started walking north along the sidewalk. Some walked up Sixth Avenue; others walked up Broadway. Each group was accompanied by a detail of cops.

The first group to reach the rendezvous—Rockefeller Center at 49th Street, chosen for poetic aptness—numbered about seventy-five. The ice skaters were stunned by the sudden appearance of the hippies who marched all around the ice chanting, "The ice belongs to the people." An attendant cleared the ice and the hippies blew whistles at a terrified couple huddling on the stairs. They advanced on the flower displays, heading east toward Fifth Avenue, growing bolder and escalating the language.

Suddenly, two TPF patrolmen appeared. They walked with absolute authority on the leader of the group, who was waving a Vietcong flag wildly at Rockefeller Plaza. The cops were undaunted by the numbers. They simply raised their arms in a sweep and the crowd of hippies broke and started running south on Fifth Avenue. A black demonstrator said that in a black area two cops would never dare try to cope with such a crowd, and that it was a sure sign of the group's fundamental weakness that they broke so easily.

The group started south along Fifth Avenue. Another larger group was heading north and the police began to get nervous. There was a cheer when the two groups spotted each other. The cops started breaking up the groups and sending them down various side streets. Suddenly, at 47th Street, the arrests began. The kid with the Vietcong flag was thrown into a wagon. Then a girl. Then others. "If anyone doesn't listen instantly, grab 'em," shouted Assistant Chief Inspector Joseph McLaughlin, in charge of the plain-clothes detail.

The groups were chased to Broadway. There were other arrests. There would be eighty-seven before the night was over. It was the police tactic to grab the leaders and keep the streets clear of demonstrators. Already, the first election returns were beginning to circle the electrical bulletin board on the Chemical Tower. The hippies had hired the second-floor ballroom of the Hotel Diplomat, where they would wait out the election results. Just like good Democrats or Republicans. They had paid $200 for the ballroom, beating out the Communist Party, which also wanted it.

The room was dimly lit and the two tiers of balconies appeared faded and chipped. Some ladies were selling baloney sandwiches and soda. The bar would not open until 9 P.M. An acid rock group did what they could to damage the eardrums.

"We got lots of police here," announced one of the SDS leaders over a microphone. "So be careful who you talk to. Now, we got plenty of busts. More than 200 already (there were only about fifty up to that point). So we need money and we need volunteers."

"The streets are very hot," he said in a much higher pitch.

On the staircase outside the ballroom, the kids were smoking marijuana.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

"We got to go to the Waldorf [where Nixon headquarters had been established]. We got to split up and get there in small groups. Put on Nixon buttons to fake out those people!"

There was no perceptible stir in the audience.

"Hey," a black man yelled, getting to his feet. "We got to get ourselves together. Are we together?"

There was a weak assent.

"You a bunch of jive motherfuckers," he said, retreating into his beer.

By now, groups of twos and threes were slipping out and heading toward the Waldorf. But the police were waiting. They were waiting on the west side of Park Avenue and turning the hippies back.

It was like that all night. Even the plain-clothes cops who led one group astray were growing weary. The kids stopped trusting anyone. They headed back in dribs and drabs to the Diplomat, where the party was now being held in the bar near the ballroom.

"I better call my mother," said one teenybopper. "She'll kill me if I stay out too late."

A teacher groaned. He kept grabbing people coming in off the streets.

"Is there any action?" he would ask desperately.

A kid blew a horn in his face.

"Hey," he said. "Cool it. That's a real drag."

Some of the girls formed a circle on the floor. Since the early warning against cops, they refused to talk to anyone who looked "straight." They lit candles. A group around one table discussed the techniques of revolution. A girl held her boy friend's head in her lap after he threw up on the floor. They began to sag, the kids in that room. Each new election figure struck like a blow. They sagged and drank and smoked.

"Hey," said the teacher grabbing another stranger just arriving. "Any action?"

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Civil Disobedience: Moral or Not?

DISOBEDIENCE AND DEMOCRACY: Nine Fallacies on Law and Order. By Howard Zinn, Random House. 124 pp. $3.95. Paper $1.45.

CARL COHEN

Mr. Cohen teaches philosophy at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.

Civil disobedience has become one of the most puzzling and provocative issues of the times. There are two kinds of reasons for this. First, those who have recently been engaging in disobedient demonstrations have done so, most usually, to register vehement protest against laws, acts and conditions that cry out for remedy, while remedy continues to elude us. The barbarity of the war in Vietnam; the cruelty of racism at home; the maldistribution of wealth and power; and, above all, the apparent unwillingness or inability of our national institutions—Congress, the courts, private enterprise—to deal effectively with injustice, frustrates and angers all decent citizens, and forces us to ask ourselves how changes we know to be essential can be brought about. Those who practice civil disobedience seek to provide at least a partial answer to this question, often breaking new ground at considerable risk to themselves. Most often we find ourselves in strong sympathy with such disobedients, knowing their intentions honorable and their cause just. Even so, many remain in genuine doubt about the moral justifiability of deliberately unlawful protest. To be sure, the end may be entirely worthy; but that, as we have been so long saying to ourselves and others, does not justify any means to its accomplishment. The wrong protested may be a thousand times more harmful than the wrong of illegal protest; is that justification enough? How should we decide, in practice, upon the rightness of certain methods—even methods deliberately disobedient and intrinsically unhappy—intended to further worthy social goals? This is one side, the practical side, of the puzzle.

As soon as we seek to resolve this practical question in any given case, we find ourselves facing a maze of difficult philosophical questions—questions with which we are all familiar, but that we had never before been forced to resolve in some conclusive way. This is the second, deeper aspect of the puzzle. Civil disobedience, its nature and justification, takes us directly to the core of some of the hardest and most important philosophical questions regarding social life. What are the limits of state authority? When, if ever, is a man justified in defying that authority, and on what grounds must such justification be based? What do we mean by the "rule of law" and how high in our catalogue of values must it remain? Nothing presses these questions upon us so quickly and so clearly as the practice of civil disobedience in a democracy, and the need to appraise it.

In this sphere Howard Zinn has written a most extraordinary book. I do not think his views entirely correct or even consistent: I find the frame within which they are put to be restrictive and disjointed; I am convinced that he is deeply mistaken on certain central issues. Yet the book is splendid—crisp and biting, reflective and insightful, sympathetic and humane. It deserves to be very widely read and very thoughtfully discussed.

The complexity of the issues with which this book deals renders it difficult to do it full justice briefly. It ranges over a great host of problems—the obligations of the citizen, the protection of the freedom of speech, the adequacy of our judicial and representative machinery, the need to devise new techniques of change—and there is hardly a page on which the reader is not impelled to register strong objection, or further observation, or (most often) a cheer. Let me register here two strong objections, one observation and three cheers.

First, objections: The inadequacy of the standard "liberal" view of civil disobedience (of which Justice Fortas' pamphlet Concerning Dissent and Civil Disobedience is taken as the archetype) is Zinn's principal target.

His attack takes the form of identifying a series of fundamental but (allegedly) mistaken propositions upon which the liberal view (more accurately, Fortas' view) is founded. These fallacies, as he calls them, in being widely and uncritically accepted, distort a realistic and healthy view both of the country itself and of civil disobedience as an instrument for change within it. Zinn argues that such disobedience offers rich possibilities for social reform, and ought to be more generously conceived and more liberally practiced. He is careful to say that civil disobedience is not all good, but he is sure that it most often is. Thus, he is obliged to deal with a number of the philosophical issues mentioned earlier, and at such critical points his argument is sometimes very weak.

The first great fallacy attacked is "that the rule of law has an intrinsic value apart from moral ends," where by moral ends Zinn means only real human needs. It is important for him that this be shown false, because so many (including Justice Fortas) have insisted that there is a universal duty to obey the law, and that this is a moral as well as a legal imperative. On the basis of this belief (Zinn argues), liberals mistakenly conclude that civil disobedience is always unjustifiable unless the law disobeyed is itself clearly and profoundly immoral.

Confusion develops quickly here. Zinn is quite right in maintaining that those who elevate the rule of law to an absolute, and who find every case of civil disobedience unjustifiable simply because it does break the law, and because breaking the law is always wrong, must suffer from serious moral blindness, and must have a cramped and distorted view of history and their own times. Obedience to law, and the order it promotes, is only one great value, after all, and must sometimes be measured against others with which it may come into conflict—economic justice, human liberty, international peace. To accomplish these, or others, the laws may be good instruments; but they may, on occasion, be obstacles instead. A rational citizen must make that judgment. In attacking those who are slavish in their submission to law, Zinn is wise and right.

He is not right or wise, however, when he concludes from this that, apart from the benefits achieved by specific good laws, there is no general moral obligation to obey the law. There is. It is a universal and, I submit, a very weighty obligation upon every citizen stemming from the universal human need to live in a society in which one can have reasonable expectations concerning the conduct (and the limitations upon the conduct) of one's fellow human beings. In that sense the rule of the law is both noble and practical, and it is a value of high moral import, quite apart from the particular content of individual laws. It is for this reason that one does have an obligation—a moral as well as a legal obligation—to obey a law even if he is quite convinced the law is bad. This, I think, is the force of the claim made by Fortas as well as the man in the street, that the

Poems by James Moore

I WANT TO BECOME THIN

*I want to become thin as a flute song
Which goes into the delicate inner ear
And coils there, holding in balance the lives
Of everyone I love. We should end
These stupid troubles.*

HOW TO CLOSE THE GREAT DISTANCE BETWEEN PEOPLE

*Do it over coffee,
Like fish that appear to be talking,
But are really eating to stay alive.*

THE SKY

*The sky is like an animal we have never seen before
And will never see again. Suddenly it is here!
Our talk turns into whispers, then stops.
Nothing prepared for this.
It is no butterfly, no animal at all
And remains silent as we become happy
Or sad. Our lives no longer matter.
When it is blue or pink or red
We are nothing. Its face is turned upwards past the stars, Past color. For years beyond number it floats upwards.
There is nothing left to do but go
Indoors and begin touching one another.*

FLUTE SONG

*It's late and the furnace goes full blast
Filling the room like a good joke.
I read aloud, pausing for rain.
If my pipe were alive
I could not hold it more lovingly.
Soon, I will make some green tea
And pray that the flute song I barely hear
Is not a signal for dawn
And is not a record, nor an answer
To any questions I might pose it.*

FOR A MOMENT

*I stood deep inside a willow and found it better than love.
I saw a willow's heart. It was green and easy to touch.
For a moment I was a willow-animal.
Anyone could touch me deep inside. I was easy to touch.*

RAIN-DROP

*No one can see the ears of the rain:
Let us drop on the houses of our distant friends
And hear how much they miss us.*

AT 7:00 A.M., WATCHING THE CARS ON THE BRIDGE

*Everybody's going to work. Well,
Not me, I'm not Going to work.*

laws always ought to be obeyed. However confusedly expressed, there is deep truth in the proposition that there is something morally wrong in breaking duly constituted laws. Indeed, Zinn exhibits a similar feeling himself when, later in the book, he expresses his distress at the willful disregard, on the part of the American Government as a whole, for the rule of international law to which it is committed. He argues there that nations are bound by the same larger moral principles that bind individual men, and he is right. Among these is the principle that the laws ought to be obeyed.

Of course this principle cannot be absolutely compelling in every circumstance. The assumption that it is absolute, and the careless invocation of this principle whenever the disobedient protest in question happens to offend, are common errors against which Zinn might properly bridle. He goes much further than this, however, even to the extreme of rejecting the intrinsic moral value of government by law.

That is an unhappy turn. I have considerable confidence in Zinn's practical wisdom: but we are not governed by men such as he, nor are we likely to be. Individual judgments of what is right are often essential, but they are never sufficient for good human government. We must have laws, even if they are less good than they might be. In a healthy democratic community the laws will be respected and honored, although they are imperfect, because they are the laws. There is, therefore, a standing presumption against civil disobedience although that presumption may, in exceptional cases, be countered. This is what the standard liberal view is fumbling for; the cheap purposes to which the words of this principle are sometimes put do not in the least detract from its truth.

Of course our national community is, at present, far from healthy. The laws are often disregarded by officials sworn to obey them, and obeyed by citizens who have a higher obligation not to obey them. For it does not follow from the fact that there is a moral obligation to obey the law that such an obligation can never be overridden. It can. It is in such circumstances precisely that civil disobedience may prove justifiable or even obligatory. But what kinds of circumstances these might be, Zinn—partly because of the looseness of his argument—never finds it necessary to make clear.

The second fallacy under attack is that "the person who commits civil disobedience must accept his punishment as right." Zinn's argument comes to this: if the law is grossly unjust, any punishment for deliberately breaking it is unjust, and therefore the disobedient need not accept any such punishment administered by the state. Here again the position is weak, and the conclusion partly wrong, due to insufficient care and refinement in the analysis. The matter is complicated; Zinn tries to make it appear simple.

At an earlier point Zinn had introduced (less sharply than he might have) the distinction between what I have (elsewhere) called direct disobedience, in which the law broken is the very law protested, and indirect disobedience, in which the law broken is in some other way—symbolically or conventionally—relevant to the issue of the rightness of protest. What needs to be seen here is that this distinction is also importantly relevant to the issue of the rightness of punishment.

Normally, the civil disobedient does expect to be punished for his deliberately unlawful act. This is true because the disobedient is usually not a rebel (contrary to the suggestion of Zinn's language at some points) but a dedicated reformer within a larger system he is determined both to accept and to improve. Should he accept his punishment, then, as right? That depends on what he did, on what kind of law he broke. If he deliberately disobeyed a law he thought immoral in itself he is justified, of course, in fighting punishment in every reasonable way at his command, chiefly through the courts. He will seek to have the bad law struck down, or at least to have it declared inapplicable in his case. If he loses in the end, he is likely, as a citizen who is generally law-abiding, to accept the punishment, not as right but as a painful price he helps to pay for a law-governed community. If the law he broke really was in itself immoral (and we may be in some doubt about that), the legal system will have done an injustice; but we cannot allow every man to sit as the judge in his own case. Of course justice is not always done, and the fight against bad laws must never stop, but miscarriages of justice do not, in themselves, justify the abandonment of a legal system.

If, on the other hand, the disobedient has deliberately broken what he knows to be itself a good law (a traffic or trespass law, or the like) to protest some other evil, say, the war in Vietnam, or oppression in the cities, it is right for him to be punished, not because he is a bad man but because punishment in such cases of indirect disobedience is a part—an essential part—of the act of protest itself. Indirect civil disobedience, if it is to be an effective tactic, must do more than disrupt; it must exhibit the depth and intensity of the commitment of the protester. To be a successful political act within the system, it must be a genuinely moral act within that system. It cannot be that if the system is entirely disregarded. The beauty of this kind of protest lies in the fact that, though the law is broken, the system of laws is respected. Accepting the punishment, when one has deliberately broken a good law, is the only way to show that respect. To evade the punishment, therefore, is to emasculate the protest. The matter is more complex than Zinn's treatment of it would lead us to suppose.

Enough of criticism. One could raise similar objections to others among the arguments Zinn presents. But his work is so effective in opening our eyes and our minds that we profit more from considering his mistakes than from the muddy and superficial truths often encountered elsewhere.

Next, one observation: Disobedience and Democracy is a creative book, rich in insight and suggestion, but its positive impact is less than it could and should have been, largely because of the disjointed form in which it appears. That form is one of rebuttal: everything is framed as a response to Fortas' pamphlet (Concerning Dissent and Civil Disobedience) in which the several fallacies are alleged to appear.

But Fortas' work is itself poorly organized and loosely written, so that in providing a needed blow-by-blow response

"a beautiful, beautiful book."

Fred Sweet, President
Int'l. Labor Press Assn.

"... historical, dramatic and dynamic. 'Out Of The Jungle' traces organization drives of the low-paid workers, their strikes, the side-by-side working relationship between Negro and white."

The Chicago Daily News

Just $2.95 brings you this penetrating account of 60 years of struggle focused on an industry made infamous by Upton Sinclair's 1905 masterpiece, "The Jungle."

OUT OF THE JUNGLE/$2.95
By Leslie F. Orear and Stephen H. Diamond
Designed by Leo Tanenbaum

THE HYDE PARK PRESS
1007 E. 55 St., Chicago, Ill. 60637
Send a copy of Out of the Jungle to:

name (print) _____

street _____

city and state _____

☐ here is check for $2.95

☐ Please bill me. zip _____

to it, Zinn is unhappily obliged to share some of its structural weakness. In fact, Zinn's nine fallacies are strung together with little in the way of unifying order; the consequence is that much of the constructive value of his argument is lost in the noise of battle. He has many important things to say about the need for imaginative techniques of social change and the forms they might take; but the force of what he says is partly obscured by the contest in which he is eager to score (and generally does) against a weaker opponent. In fairness it should be added that, treating these two small books as an intellectual confrontation, they present a highly absorbing spectacle, in which the Supreme Court Justice, a man of generous inclinations and considerable mental power, is bested again and again—shown to have been inconsistent, careless, occasionally shallow or unfair. A justice ought to write with greater depth and care than Fortas did, considering the gravity of the matter, Zinn is right in not going easy on him. But the upshot is, in both cases, that the threads which hang the whole together are thin and tangled.

Finally, three cheers, briefly put. One cheer for a short, punchy book, written in a prose that is plain and beautiful. Zinn writes with a directness and candor rare among scholarly men. Just reading the book is a pleasure.

A second cheer for Zinn as a perceptive critic of the American scene. He is a merciless enemy of hypocrisy and cruelty, and he makes us bite our collective lip. He is bitter, but not without hope. The largest thrust of his argument is that of a search for the instruments through which the radical reforms our condition demands can be effected with a minimum of violence and misery. He is good for us.

A third and final cheer for an author who comes through to his reader as a compassionate and gentle man, deeply anguished by the wrongs our nation does in his and all our names. Anguish cannot, by itself, justify civil disobedience as an instrument of change; but the compassion that underlies this book is desperately needed if the wrongs provoking disobedient protest are ever to be righted.

Tales of Macondo

NO ONE WRITES TO THE COLONEL: And Other Stories, By Gabriel García Márquez. Translated from the Spanish by J. S. Bernstein. Harper & Row. 170 pp. $5.95.

OLIVER T. MYERS

Mr. Myers is chairman of the Department of Spanish and Portuguese at the University of Wisconsin (Milwaukee).

Gabriel García Márquez is the author of perhaps the most successful bestseller in the history of the Spanish-American novel, 100 Years of Solitude, which Harper & Row promises for next year. The publisher has shrewdly laid the groundwork for the American reader by issuing this collection of earlier stories first. By this timing we can not only make the acquaintance of García Márquez as a writer (he looks like a Latin Ernie Kovacs), and additionally get to know Macondo, the fictional locale of both books, but also avoid the feeling of anti-climax which would surely result from reading the novel before the stories. The current anthology whets the appetite but does not fully satisfy.

García Márquez is a political novelist in the sense that his characters must be seen against a particular political background and we are made aware, most subtly, of the author's political orientation. But this does not imply that he is putting together a series of thesis novels in the style of the 1930s, with black and white cardboard figures and heavy-handed propaganda. He's political because his people, who for the most part are more real than is fashionable today, are operating in a context that could be found only in a place like Colombia, where a type of stability had been achieved through the machinery of a repressive dictatorship.

The character of the Colonel in the title story (actually a novella, and published as such in Latin America) is the most fully realized in the collection, and one of the most memorable in Spanish-American fiction. But to have become the person he is, it was necessary for him to live in a country where a talented 20-year-old could rise to colonel in a revolution overnight, and then wait around half a century for his reward; where his son could be shot down for handing out subversive pamphlets at a cockfight, and where anyone at any time could be stopped and searched at gun point by government thugs.

When the stories are read as a whole, as much as they differ from one another, the central figure that emerges is not the Colonel, not Big Mama, not the hovering Buendía clan but Macondo itself. Anticipating 100 Years of Solitude, the official history of Macondo, No One Writes to the Colonel ranges from detailed realism, through dreamy fragments and images, to political allegory. One story is linked to another by an event, or a person or merely a mood, and no one story can be fully understood without reading them all; it will take 100 Years of Solitude to understand why Macondo is what it is.

The Colonel's history ended with the end of the revolution fifty years before. He is waiting, as he has been all the time, for the arrival of word of his pension; he had not the cunning for politics or compromises; he picked the

Paper Walls

America and the Refugee Crisis 1938-1941

DAVID S. WYMAN

Anti-Semitism, nativism, fear of Nazi subversives and unemployment closed the eyes of the American people, and the gates of their country to hundreds of thousands of European refugees during the crucial period, 1938-1941. Avoiding the familiar, simplistic condemnations of FDR, the State Department, and Congress, David Wyman makes clear that American immigration policy was no better and no worse than what the majority of the American people wanted. "A vitally important book, not only for what it tells us of the past, but also as a warning for the future" — Frank Freidel, Harvard University. xiv + 306 pp., approx., bibliog., index, cloth, $6.00

The University of Massachusetts Press
Munson Hall, Amherst, Massachusetts 01002

wrong party. And now, with his son assassinated, and nothing left but the legacy of a fighting cock, he still waits for the pension, for victory at the cockpit, or for death by starvation, whatever comes first. The Colonel has never been quite sure how to get along in times of peace. With his pride and a curious mixture of idealistic patriotism and cynicism, he can't help getting cheated.

But the coolness and courage which must have been what raised him to his rank by the age of 20 are not dead; he is caught in a police raid with some anti-government pamphlets in his pocket, and his son's murderer pokes his rifle in his belly: "The colonel gritted his teeth and gently pushed the rifle barrel away with the tips of his fingers. 'Excuse me,' he said." It is his second finest hour. His finest hour comes after he has made his decision not to sell the cock, which symbolizes vengeance for his son and, incidentally, represents the sole source of potential income for him and his wife. What do we eat in the meanwhile? she wants to know, at the end of her patience, shaking him by the collar. "It had taken the colonel seventy-five years—the seventy-five years of his life, minute by minute—to reach this moment. He felt pure, explicit, invincible at the moment when he replied: 'Shit.'"

The Colonel had served with Col.

Aureliano Buendia. At one point in "Tuesday Siesta" a woman is looking for a revolver that hadn't been fired since the days of Col. Aureliano Buendia. Aureliano is a cousin of the widow in "One Day After Saturday"; one of his patrols in the War of 1885 had been confronted by the grandmother of Big Mama, who tells "Montiel's Widow" when she will die and is laid to rest herself in "Big Mama's Funeral." Montiel, in "Balthazar's Marvelous Afternoon," had earlier bought the world's most marvelous bird cage. And in "One of These Days" we learn why the Mayor appeared in "No One Writes to the Colonel" with only half of his face shaven. This is not just a superficial and arbitrary device. As each linkage is revealed, the effect is that of tumbled falling in place in a combination lock. And the last story, where Big Mama dies, almost gives the combination.

In "Big Mama's Funeral" the technique works, but it doesn't quite come off. Everything has led up to this moment, from Colonel Buendia on down. Big Mama and her far-flung family own Macondo and have run it like a feudal land grant. She is the absolute sovereign, the unmarried matriarch, the empress of Macondo. She is also the symbol of all that ails the place. The intricate empire that she built up, with its complex family ties, its religious and military alliances, calls to mind the bases of power of any Latin American oligarchy. The incredible mess of filth left behind by her funeral celebrants (the Pope himself came) suggests the state of things when a dictatorship long entrenched in power finally dies away, and now "the garbage men will come and will sweep up the garbage from her funeral, forever and ever."

The moderate tone of all the preceding stories, even the mystery of "One Day After Saturday," is changed too abruptly in "Big Mama's Funeral." Bitter satire and thinly veiled allegory have replaced irony and realism, and the author's versatility doesn't quite extend so far. Maybe in a segregated context, not in the Macondo created in the first pages of the book, we could buy this farce. But as it is, the link with reality, so carefully wrought, is broken, and we feel that the author has simply taken the easy way out for some cheap and bitter laughs.

It is a pleasure to read the smooth translation by J. S. Bernstein; there isn't much of the original that doesn't come through with the same impact. The characters talk the same way in English as in Spanish, and the same effect of style, whether understatement, exaggeration or sarcasm, reaches the reader of this book as it has already delighted García Márquez's compatriots.

GUERRILLA WARFARE & MARXISM

William J. Pomeroy, Editor

Selections from a century of writings on revolutionary warfare by Marx, Engels, Lenin, Connolly, Lister, Tito, Mao, Giap, Guevara, Castro, Debray, Cabral, Nkrumah and others. The editor, himself a veteran guerrilla, provides a lengthy introduction and commentary on current controversies.

$5.95

MARX & ENGELS SELECTED WORKS

Their essential writings are gathered in this 800-page source book, including in full basic classics—Communist Manifesto, 18th Brumaire, Civil War in France, Wage-Labor and Capital, Origin of the Family, Ludwig Feuerbach and others, as well as selections from other works, essays and correspondence. Fully annotated; name and subject indexes.

Cloth $8.50; New World Paperback $3.95

SENSE AND NONSENSE OF McLUHAN

by Sydney Finkelstein

A devastating and witty critique of Marshall McLuhan, the high priest of the media.

Cloth $4.95; New World Paperback $1.45

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF W. E. B. DU BOIS

Completed a year before his death, this is the last literary work of Dr. Du Bois. "Every page is valuable... a classic of American narrative."—Harper's Magazine. "A reflective, moving and gracefully written account."—New York Times. "Reminiscences of a passionate man."

—Saturday Review. "The long-awaited summing up of one of the most vital intellectual lives of our time."—Washington Post.

(Illustrated) $10.00

HEAR THE WIND BLOW!

Poems of Protest and Prophecy

by John Beecher

"A rebellious talent bringing to modern times the spirit of his famous ancestors... A fine poet who speaks directly to my soul (and yours)."—Maxwell Geismar.

Cloth $5.95; New World Paperback $2.25

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS

381 Park Avenue South, New York, N. Y. 10016

Danilo Dolci's Vita

A PASSION FOR SICILIANS: The World Around Danilo Dolci. By Jerre Mangione. William Morrow & Co. 372 pp. $7.95.

ROBERT HATCH

The title of his book is in one sense Jerre Mangione's amiable acknowledgment of his own attitude. Born in Rochester, N.Y., of Sicilian parents and brought up speaking Sicilian, he has been motivated all his life, as the bulk of his writing shows, by that profound affection for his European roots that is characteristic of first-generation Americans. In a second sense, the title refers quite literally to the book's central figure, Danilo Dolci, who is not a Sicilian, but who has given his life to those ill-fated, ill-treated islanders.

Mangione has been several times to Sicily, most recently in 1965 on a Fulbright grant to spend six months studying Dolci's struggle with the leaden misery that oppresses the Western region around Partinico, where he makes his headquarters. The topic is somber; Dolci is having some success, but so slowly against the malevolence of the Mafia, the hostility of the Church, and the fatalistic ignorance of the people that one wonders whether his fasts, his demonstrations, his centers of instruction, and his bold attacks upon dangerous and high-placed enemies gain any permanent ground against the steady decay of Sicily. Many Italians think they do not, and it is depressing that the support and enthusiasm for Dolci come principally from outside the country. Still, the dams are being built, contemporary knowledge is to a degree ventilating the squalid, suspicious-eyed towns; the stultifying code of silence has on occasion been broken, and Dolci, whose physical strength is as impressive as his stolid idealism, works on for the creation of a momentum that could bring his vision into being. Meanwhile, Esso's oil refineries have brought a 20th-century boom economy—and smog—to the island's east coast, effecting a change in the habits and aspirations of the Sicilians that the world recognizes as progress.

Though an American, Mangione is a "native" in Sicily, and in some respects he is accepted as Dolci, the Italian outsider, will never be. Because of this advantage of blood, and also because he is a sophisticated observer, he records Dolci's status in western Sicily with admiration unclouded by sentimentality. Dolci has been called a saint, which irritates him both for its foolishness and because it hampers his work. Tell a simple, deprived people that a saint has come among them, and they will confidently await miracles. Dolci is not in the miracle business; he is at the much harder work of persuading a feudal-minded, cynical people to build their own future. Further, the helpers from abroad who are attracted to Dolci because of his reputed spirituality, too often arrive in a mood of self-congratulation that is readily bruised by the reality. Dolci is not a grateful man, often he is not a particularly amiable or tactful man; he uses himself without reserve, and he will use anyone else. This causes ruptures among the self-anointed "faithful"; there have been charges of despotism and his project has been scarred with feuding. Dolci's most valuable associates are young men and women of the area who know the situation too well to have illusions, and who dedicate themselves, not to spiritual excellence but to the salvation of their own kin and community.

Mangione raises, at least by implication, the question of whether Dolci is the best possible man for the job. Dolci does not collaborate well, and there are in fact several other groups in Sicily that strive for similar goals. His principles are admirably clear, but they may be too narrow, and he is undiplomatic toward friends as well as toward enemies. But the wisdom of Dolci is that he understands himself, and has shaped his course, according to his own possibilities. There may be a theoretical man who could do a theoretically better job, but that man is not at work in Sicily. Measuring the quality of Dolci against the scope of his task, Mangione strikes a balance of admiration that is more effective than praise.

And he has written a buoyant book. It offers a parade of vivid personalities; it records ironic episodes and grotesque mischances. There are fasts and marches, but also visits to ancient ruins and picnics above the sea. Mangione loves being in Sicily; you can sense him breathing the air. Almost inadvertently, he has written a splendid travel book, though having seen Sicily through Mangione's eyes, it would be hard to be a tourist there in good conscience.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

UNDER THE BOARDWALK. By Norman Rosten. Prentice-Hall. 131 pp. $4.95.

Mr. Rosten's touching account of some moments in the life of a very likable Jewish boy growing up in Coney Island is told in fifteen interlocking chapters, each of which deals with a separate event. For his young hero, the troubles of the world—warring parents, a dying grandmother, neighbors permanently afflicted by loneliness and desperation—are fixed and mysterious in their seeming complexity; his own sense of freedom is constantly being brought up short by bars he can't see, but assumes must be there if others seem to be suffering so from their effects. This is a book about people locked into the rituals of their lives by fear and feelings of helplessness; yet the exuberance of its young narrator and its deceptively simple style make it a pleasure to read.

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF CHUANG TZU. Translated by Burton Watson. Columbia University Press. 397 pp. $10.

"Each translator who takes up the text will produce his own Chuang Tzu, and the more that are available for the reader to enjoy and compare, the better." Burton Watson is a modest man, for the lively and colloquial translation of the ancient Taoist classic which he has produced is, along with his wonderfully straightforward Introduction, a gift for Western readers, even at $10. The Chuang Tzu is a handbook for achieving personal freedom in a world of chaos, beckoning the reader to abandon the conventional values which bog him down. With its witty anecdotes, joltingly

M-REIT

Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust

HOW TO INVEST IN OPEN HOUSING

M-REIT buys income producing apartment houses in good neighborhoods and offers housing to all.

$20 per share
with a minimum purchase of 10 shares
10% down. Balance in 45 days.

SEND FOR FREE PROSPECTUS

Morris Milgram
Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust
30 East 42 St., New York 10017

ND-12-2

Name _____

Address _____

Zip _____

This advertisement is not an offering. No offering is made except by a prospectus filed with the Department of Law of the State of New York. The Attorney General of the State of New York has not passed on, or endorsed the merits of this offering.

paradoxical dialogues, and the brilliant imagery which Professor Watson has so beautifully rendered into English, it stands as an astonishingly successful assault on our ways of looking at the world. "Joy, anger, grief, delight, worry, regret, fickleness, inflexibility, modesty, willfulness, candor, insolence—music from empty holes, mushrooms springing up in dampness, day and night replacing each other before us, and no one knows where they sprout from. Let it be! Let it be!"

IT'S WINGS THAT MAKE BIRDS FLY: The Story of a Boy. By Sandra Weiner. 27 black and white photographs by the author. Foreword by Gordon Parks. Pantheon Books. 55 pp. $3.95.

Based on conversations taped by the author, this photo-story of a year in the life of Otis, a 10-year-old resident of a black urban ghetto, is being published as a children's picture book, but it deserves a broader audience. Otis, whose parents are separated, tells in matter-of-fact fashion how he ran away from the home of one of his grandmothers to live with the other, kinder one; changed schools; effected a similar grandmother switch for a younger brother whom he badly missed; traveled to Baltimore for a Jehovah's Witness convention; disliked a mean teacher, and learned to do fractions with a teacher who cared about him; lived on a "Fresh Air Family" farm one summer, and visited the Statue of Liberty with his class. Gordon Parks, in a terse preface, hopes that Otis "will be allowed to grow up straight," but a note at the end reveals that he was killed in an accident while playing in the street, after his story was written.

GOOD TIMES/BAD TIMES. By James Kirkwood. Simon & Schuster, 348 pp. $5.95.

Just as Holden Caulfield (whom Mr. Kirkwood's hero dangerously resembles) has apparently failed to turn on new generations of readers and remains a unique phenomenon of the fifties, so is there something Salingerish about this rather slick novel of real and imagined homosexuality in a New England prep school. Mr. Kirkwood's first-person narrator has landed in jail as the alleged murderer of his monstrous and pathetic headmaster; the novel takes the form of a letter he is writing to his lawyer to explain what really happened. It may be O.K. for the movies (it has already been sold to Hollywood), but this is an oddly unconvincing novel.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

In a severe frame of mind I might argue that the critic's function can be honorably pursued only apropos of masterpieces. He may also serve to expose the gilded fourth rate and the flatulently pretentious. All the rest is vanity.

None of the plays I feel obliged to notice this week fits any of these categories: George Tabori's The Cannibals (American Place Theatre) and William Gibson's A Cry of Players (Vivian Beaumont) are finely intentioned pieces by honest playwrights. If they fail of important effect it is not for want of trying.

Tabori is obsessed with the horror of Hitlerism. Nearly all his writing deals with Fascist savagery. It would be misguided to suggest that he forgo the subject: he has sufficient reason (a close relative died in a Hungarian concentration camp) to be haunted by it. The moral and social implications of that terror are certainly not a matter of merely "historical" interest. One of the merits of The Cannibals is that in it Tabori has dignified the very essence of that which torments him. He has also strived to make a statement beyond the bloody events.

Even in the midst of hell, Tabori tells us, where because of intense suffering everything becomes possible, a few men are able to retain the remnants of their stature as human beings. The starved inmates of a prison camp choose to go quietly to their death rather than (on the orders of their Nazi overseer) to eat the grotesque fellow prisoner whom most of them have joined in killing. Two men consent to eat, they are the survivors who later become prosperous American citizens.

The fault here is not the atrociousness of the material nor even the fact that we, well fed, who sit in the audience cannot conceive of the hunger pangs that might press people to such brutishness. Tabori mitigates the sheer disgust of the incident by "alienating" the scene through having his characters pause to comment on it and by having all the physical cruelty coldly stylized. What is wrong is that the whole process of his play has been rendered as a naked account of the facts. We may be shocked, we are not moved. It is still another item, fiercer than most, but not different in kind from any of those previously related.

For his play to have accomplished something more than an attack on our nerves, Tabori, who is basically of a gently romantic temperament, should have fleshed his characters, giving them more of the emotional eloquence of which he is capable. As it stands, the play is a diagram of hideousness. The actors grovel, howl, curse and emit obscenities which fail to convey more than vile information—to which within a very short span of time in the theatre we have become inured.

Martin Fried's direction and Wolfgang Roth's setting (resembling a steel-traplike network that a Léger might have designed) are striking enough, but they duplicate the script's shortcomings. They might have given it greater human texture.

the Humanist

Have you been reading The Humanist lately? If not, look at what you've been missing:

BENJAMIN SPOCK, STAUGHTON LYND, SIDNEY HOOK and MICHAEL FERBER on "Civil Disobedience"

LESLIE FIEDLER, ALLEN GINSBERG and EDGAR FRIEDENBERG on "In Defense of Youth"

DICK GREGORY, FATHER GROPP and JAMES FARMER on "Morals and Black Power"

BERTRAM WOLFE, JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH on "Are Russia and the U.S. Converging?"

BARBARA WARD, LOUIS SOHN and A. A. BERLE on "World Government"

... and many others! Don't delay. Join the growing list of subscribers to The Humanist.

A journal of humanist and ethical concern, published by the American Humanist Association.

Please enter my subscription to The Humanist immediately.

TO: THE HUMANIST

Department 12N
4244 Ridge Lea Road
Amherst, New York 14226

☐ payment enclosed

☐ please bill me

☐ one year ($4.50)

☐ two years ($8.00)

Name

Street

City

State Zip

ture if more authentically intimate notes had been introduced instead of bare stage skill.

Gibson's A Cry of Players is one of the author's earliest plays. He must have a special attachment to it because it is the work of his youth with clearly autobiographical overtones. He also esteems it because it is written in a cherished mode from which his later plays—Two for the Seesaw and The Miracle Worker—have departed.

A Cry of Players might be called "The Importance of Being Shakespeare." The haloed Bard was, we know, a genius, and Gibson has tried to imagine what such a genius must have been before anyone could have guessed that he might become one. He marries a "mother" (Anne is 8 years his senior), he loves her sincerely as he does his child, but he is constantly unfaithful and fairly forthright about it. He cannot make his kindly father understand him; he angers his obtuse brother and he is indifferent to ■ respectable job as a teacher. As a young hellion he engages in poaching, for which he is put in the stocks; and for flouting the ruling Establishment he is publicly flogged. He rails at injustice, is inspired by (Marlowe's) glorious verbiage, and finally learns to humble himself before authority—which is the lesson of discipline. When he abandons his wife and child, perhaps for years, we know that he is prepared to embark on the path to glory.

SPIDER

It's winter. A leftover spider has spun a web between the screen and the storm window. More than a web, a caul, a winding-sheet, a gift of silk through which the weak sun strains. Except to a weaver, perhaps, his steps are irrefractable: imprisoned without prey, still he spun himself out. Wizen and brittle on the sill, he left me something beautiful, a note of sorts, a testimony, a will written in a weakening hand, a shawl impractical though remarkable for its slipped stitches where dying dimmed his skill.

DORA SHERWOOD

I could not quite understand many of the lines spoken by Frank Langella as the poet-to-be; whether because of defects in his articulation or because of the unstageworthiness of the words themselves I cannot tell. What I did catch sounded like those a novice employs to be "literary" at all costs. I cannot believe them to have been the early Will's kind of speech, but that of the latter Will's (Gibson's) first writing. The effect is strained and lacks impact. Diffidently I submit that the author's prose—even when spoken by the Gittel of his Seesaw—is far more memorable and meaningful than that of his "Shakespeare."

And there is one scene in which husband and wife discuss their mutual infidelities (hers from pique and his from push or avidity for experience) which sounds like the exchange of two students in one of our "advanced" theatre academies after several sessions with a psychoanalyst. To think of it as occurring in the far more rank and ribald Elizabethan days is appalling.

Gene Frankel's direction makes an interesting pageantlike display of the script. Langella looks good and is sympathetic, with a touch of the sensitive "feminine" which is presumed to foreshadow the creative person. Anne Bancroft, an actress with a rooted reality and a firmness of fiber in her voice and being, wants only the right part and auspices to release the womanly power which abides in her. Stephen Elliott as the local Governor is helpfully impressive in the crucial encounter with Will, and Susan Tyrrell is carnally warm as the wench with whom he cuddles.

I have often maintained that while musical comedy as a generic product is the unique achievement of our stage, very few individual examples match the best of Offenbach, Gilbert and Sullivan, or Brecht-Weill, though their works are not, strictly speaking, "musicals." One reason for this is that our efforts in this area are vast corporate affairs, the initial impulse for which is largely commercial.

Still we have produced some "darned good shows" in this form, and Zorba (at the Imperial), adapted from the novel by

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" —LIFE

Nikos Kazantzakis, with an intelligent "hook" by Joseph Stein, music by John Kander, lyrics by Fred Ebb, is the latest of these. It is an unqualified hit.

The basic story is sound, robust, hearty, amusing and perhaps touching. The toughness and rich boisterousness of peasant life in a village in Crete (anno 1924) provide a colorful background. The story's theme may be set down, solemnly, as the joyous drama and brave acceptance of the harsh facts of life.

The show has been admirably engineered by Harold Prince in what must have been blood, sweat and tears to make a fine package of entertainment. Besides the rousing fun and gay instrumentation plus "personality" of the Bouzouki circle in present-day Piraeus, which constitutes the framework of the tale itself, there is a vigorously attractive performance by Hershel Bernardi, ably seconded by Maria Karnilova and John Cunningham; the striking presence and agreeably shrill voice of Lorraine Serabian; some come-hither girls, and a great number of splendidly muscular and kinetic men. But above all is the triumph of Boris Aronson's scenic artistry, at once spectacularly theatrical and real through the astute employment of modern sculptural effects. These envelop the proceedings in a rough atmosphere which still remains wittily sophisticated, handsome and efficient.

In short, while no depths are stirred, no heights attained, the pastime is ample and of good vintage.

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

BACH: Cantatas 79, 80. Soloists, Süd-deutsche Madrigalchor, Consortium Musicum; Wolfgang Gönnerwein, cond. Odeon SME 91659 (stereo). $5.79.

Cantatas 126, 149. Same performers. Odeon SME 91659 (stereo). $5.79.

Cantatas 140, 148. Same performers. Odeon SME 91658 (stereo). $5.79.

Cantatas 137, 190. Soloists, Windsbacher Knabenchor, Consortium Musicum; Hans Thamm, cond. Odeon SME 91605 (stereo). $5.79.

Cantatas 51, 202. Agnes Giebel, soprano; Concerto Amsterdam. Telefunken SAWT 9513 (stereo). $5.95.

Cantata 198. Soloists, Monteverdi Chorus of Hamburg, Concerto Amsterdam; Jürgen Jürgens, cond. Telefunken SAWT 9496 (stereo). $5.95.

Just what remains more or less unheard in the corpus of Bach's cantatas may be guessed from the fact that three of the works in this recent batch (Nos. 126, 148 and 190) are apparently first recordings, and two others (137 and 149) are not otherwise available at present. All of these are works of quality, with the two on Odeon 91605 being exceptional examples of Bach's use of chorale melodies in juxtaposition with different rates of textural motion—a procedure most highly developed in the well-known examples of Cantatas 80 (Ein feste Burg) and 140 (Wachet auf), but also present in other works not ostensibly chorale-oriented.

Unfortunately, the performances on the Odeon records offer only minimal subtlety, chugging along in unvaried semi-legato articulation with little regard for phrasing or textural clarity. Thamm's choir is further handicapped by the use of boys, and the overly spacious recorded sound doesn't help much either. Even in the generally capable solo singing, one doesn't find much regard for the specific details of a given phrase, and there is often resort to strenuous "selling" of the music in lieu of projecting its particular qualities.

By contrast, the Amsterdam-originated Telefunken disks display variety of articulation, aptness of phrasing, and a considerable feeling for the contrapuntal interplay of lines. Although Giebel is occasionally overcome by the rigorous coloratura in Cantata 51, the playing of the violins in the chorale movement of that work, as well as nearly every aspect of the Wedding Cantata (No. 202), is musically and stylistically on a superior level. The elaborately scored Funeral Ode (No. 198) is done with equal distinction and is recorded with a transparent spaciousness that keeps the lines clear. These people know more about things like ornaments and double-dotting than the Germans, but it is what they know about melodic structure and harmonic motion that makes the performances good; doubtless both stylistic and musical elegance are related to the presence, as continuo player, of Gustav Leonhardt, perhaps the most distinguished performer of baroque music today (his most recent solo disk, of Louis Couperin and d'Anglebert suites, on Victrola VICS-1370, is a fine example of the subtle use of rhythmic flow as an articulative technique in keyboard music of this period).

HANDEL: Solomon. Soloists, Vienna Jeunesse Chorus, Vienna Volksoper Orchestra; Stephen Simon, cond. RCA LSC 6187 (stereo). $17.37.

Ode for St. Cecilia's Day. Soloists, Choir of King's College (Cambridge), Acad-

IN SASKATCHEWAN

- At a rapidly growing new campus of an established University
- Where student sport is only "for fun" and there is no fraternity system
- Where ethnic diversity resists the cultural "melting-pot"
- Where social innovation (e.g. Medicare) and a range of developmental stages (from the hunting-and-fishing economy of Northern Indians and Metis to the urban centers of the South) provide a natural laboratory for social research
- Where all research is unclassified
- Where a divisional academic organization permits a combination of interdisciplinary and traditional teaching and research
- Where the sun shines 87 per cent of the days, winters are tough and challenging, and the summers are beautiful.

You are invited to apply for the following positions for 1969-70:

Anthropology

Anthropologist experienced with North American Indian and Peabody Station Director; Archaeologist-Ethnologist

Economics

Mathematical economics; Econometrics; Labour; Public Finance. One of these to spend part time on Sample Surveys

Geography

Human Geography; Climatology; Biogeography; Economic Geography; Regional Geography of America; Quantitative Geography

History

Historiography; Technology; United States; Canadian

Political Science

Local Government; Canadian Federal Government; European political systems. One of these to spend part time on Sample Surveys and field work.

Psychology

Personality; Clinical; Abnormal; Social; Developmental; Experimental; Research Methods with humanistic approach. One of these to spend part time on Sample Surveys

Human Ecology & Information

Human Ecology; Information access and retrieval.

Methods

Statistical Methods; Linear Programming; Computer Science.

All positions are filled according to qualifications.

Salaries in current academic year

Professor	$16,900 minimum
Associate Professor	12,500—$16,300
Assistant Professor	9,200—12,200
Lecturer	7,200—9,800
Instructor	6,800—8,800

Reasonable allowances made for removal expenses.

Teaching duties:

Normal teaching load two classes for eight hours per week, September to April.

For further information, write to:
DALLAS W. SMYTHE, Chairman

Division of the Social Sciences
University of Saskatchewan
Regina Campus, Regina, Canada

PERSONALS

CUSTOM-MADE BUTTONS, BALLOONS, BUMPER STRIPS, DECALS. Union made. Send $1 (refundable) for price list and samples. Estimates on request. Larry Fox, Box 581-T, Hempstead, N.Y., 11551 (516) 295-1034.

ANTI-SMOKING KIT, $1.00 WITH ACCESSORIES. Anti-smoking Flavored Pacifier, only 50¢ each. Educational, P.O. Box 987, GPO, N.Y.C. 10001.

ATHEISTS, Socialists and Racists challenge Christians, defenders of the capitalist system or believers in Negro-White equality to correspondence debates. Meritorious debates will be published. Details: American Debating Society, Box 199, Ridgewood, New York 11451.

ISN'T YOUR LIFE WORTH $2.95? Now selling palm-size spray weapon—the perfect protection—100 per cent effective against attackers with complete safety—only $2.95 pp. or $2/$5.00. Order now: Marly Berlanstein, Box 12492, Nashville, Tenn 37212.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25¢, 5/51, 50/55, 125/510 and 500/575. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

INVEST INTEGRATED HOUSING. Prospectus tells all. Free copy: write Morris Milgram, Dept. NC-12-2, Mutual Real Estate Investment Trust, 30 East 42 Street, N.Y.C. 10017.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

12-2-68

121 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

emy of St. Martin-in-the-Fields; David Willcocks, cond. Argo ZRG-563 (stereo). $5.95.

Handel rarely attempts the contrapuntal or harmonic density found in Bach's cantatas, but when he exerts himself, as in the elaborate (up to eight parts) choruses of Solomon, the resulting effects of sonority and variety are most impressive. Beecham's recording of this work was badly flawed by misconceived abridgment and reordering, and by grotesque reorchestration; this new version, only slightly cut, makes no egregious stylistic errors but does achieve the one thing Beecham never managed—monotony. Aside from some good solo singing (notably by Alexander Young, who commands an almost heroic coloratura technique), most of this album is a disaster: an amateur chorus of heavy sound and fuzzy enunciation; a sloppy orchestral ensemble (probably only once removed from reading at sight); a routiner at the helm. This music is less "specific," more "open" than Bach's, more oriented in terms of sonority and melodic charm—aspects that are thoroughly traduced in this reading, which is thus far more damaging than the least successful of the Bach recordings discussed above. It is bewildering that someone should have gone so far as to arrange for this much needed recording and then failed to supply the most necessary ingredients.

The earlier setting of Dryden's ode is a more schematized, Purcellian work: as with a fine episode in the third act of Solomon, the subject matter of the text is music itself, which here stimulates Handel to ingenuities more textural than structural, such as a soprano aria with cello obbligato. Aside from the handicap of boy sopranos and altos in the chorus (the altos boosted by a few strained tenors, with the disconcerting result that their low-lying lines sound "high"), this is a stylish and lively performance, with an excellent tenor (Ian Partridge) and a capable soprano (April Cantelo).

RAVEL: Boléro. Lamoureux Orchestra; Maurice Ravel, cond. Chansons mado-casses. Madeleine Grey, soprano; ensemble conducted by Ravel. Pavane; La Vallée des cloches. Maurice Ravel, piano. Turnabout TV 4256 (mono). $2.50.

The Vox-Turnabout series of composer recordings started rather unfortunately last year with a poor performance of Bartók's Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion, played by the composer and his wife and apparently dubbed from the worst possible copy of that occasionally interesting but often chaotic radio broadcast. This Ravel disk is not much of an improvement, but for different reasons. To begin with, the piano pieces are almost certainly taken from rather primitive piano rolls, but no mention of this is made anywhere on the jacket or label. Now piano rolls by a composer have certain points of interest to specialists, but only rarely are they convincing as performances: the present ones leave you wondering how a man who played these pieces so mechanically could possibly have written them.

Then there is the Boléro, a remarkable study in orchestration if a completely uninteresting piece of music (a disparity that Ravel was perfectly aware of), as recorded nearly four decades ago in one of those telephone booths that the French record companies used to use for studios. Given the nature of the piece, only a conductor or similar student of performance practice would find any particular interest in such an antique: most of the orchestral subtlety is hardly to be heard at all, and Vox have applied a strong filter to reduce surface noise, thereby further reducing the timbral content of the sound (they have also apparently dubbed from an off-center copy of the 78s, introducing an unpleasant "wow"); the dynamic range necessary to encompass the fifteen-minute crescendo is simply nonexistent.

There are some interesting details in the performance, however, such as the phrasing of the tenor saxophone and trombone solos, which are played in a jazzy style that nobody today attempts to imitate; this is an important historical document, and should be available—but documents should be presented with care and clearly marked as such, not carelessly slapped onto disks to turn a fast buck.

The final item, the Chansons mado-casses sung by Madeleine Grey, is a superb performance even today: fortunately, it can be obtained in a better dubbing on Angel COLC-152, which also contains the same singer's performance of the Three Hebraic Songs (with Ravel at the piano) and the famous Songs of the Auvergne as arranged by Canteloube. Incidentally, according to the very complete documentation with the Angel disk, Ravel only conducts the Chansons, and does not play the piano part as stated on the Vox jacket.

The moral of this is very simple; many phonograph recordings are important documents in the history of musical performance, and apparently need to be not only preserved but also protected from the misdeeds of their commercial proprietors. If there are to be elaborate subsidized productions of correct texts of literary works (and of authentic scores to musical works, for that matter), why not proper re-editions of obviously significant recordings?

Crossword Puzzle No. 1274

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Dutch Guiana in total might have a rain storm. (7)
- 5 and 4 down Only one-third effective as a stopper? (7,7)
- 9 One inclined to set about the right beginning? Obviously! (7)
- 10 A supporter of T. Lester, it seems. (7)
- 11 In the manner of Antarctica, rather than most of a Mediterranean spot. (5)
- 12, 15 and 17 down and 27 across What William started finds not one person to study the pursuit. (6,8)
- 14 and 13 across Many a passage might have something to hold things like this. (7,5)
- 16 Produced electric activity. (7)
- 18 Top fishermen might use one. (7)
- 21 The rather uncertain end lies in what might produce oil. (7)
- 24 It might go around the neck like a pallet. (5)
- 26 See 27 down
- 27 See 12 across
- 28 Retiring types might look forward to it. (7)
- 29 Those who shorten certain kinds of cigarettes? (7)
- 30 The record type might be diamond. (7)
- 31 Not to sow back around it indicates the answer. (7)

DOWN

- 1 Brilliant remarks made on excursions? (7)

- 2 Grasp. (7)
- 3 Traditional sailor's mate in town? (5)
- 4 See 5 across
- 5 Housman is about to begin a moon association with her! (7)
- 6 Equivalent to 13, but not all in a body. (7)
- 7 Commit in confidence. (7)
- 8 Traveled—by wagon, originally. (7)
- 15 and 17 See 12 across
- 18 Honest, there isn't any good man for the equivalent. (7)
- 19 Burn up, or burnt up? (7)
- 20 Sids back the red man's case. (7)
- 21 Did Herculean work. (7)
- 22 The height of the day before all else. (7)
- 23 Doesn't act like the abiding type. (7)
- 25 Might it involve "The Case of the Hairless Tribunal"? (5)
- 26 and 26 across Mercutio said she gallops through lovers' brains. (5,3)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1273

ACROSS: 1 and 12 Diminishing returns; 9 Pawnshop; 10 School; 11 and 25 Welcome mats; 14 Tannin; 15 Centaurs; 17 Measured; 22 Straits; 24 Abigail; 27 Attended; 29 Adversaries. DOWN: 2 and 20 Innocents Abroad; 3 Inhuman; 4 Imps; 5 Has-been; 6 and 26 Nehru Jacket; 7 Galena; 8 Corner; 13 Scads; 16 Arrogance; 18 Extras; 19 Retire; 20 Arbitrator; 21 Abides; 23 Asked.

PUBLICATIONS

INFOCUS: Iconoclastic photojournalism quarterly. $5.00. Box 6254, Carmel, Calif. 93921. Quality photoessays sought.

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco. Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

COSMOPOLITAN CONTACT—polyglot magazine for international friendship, trade, exchange, including Communist countries; $1.00. Postbox 29117, Hollywood, California 90029.

FREE PAPERBACK LISTS. Write, inquire how thousands save! PAPERBACKS, HARDBOOKS, RECORDS. Fast service. New York Office, West 43rd Street, N.Y.C. 10036.

HELP Reduce World Population Without the "Pill." Read the "Cannibal Cook Book." $2.00. United Sales Co., P.O. Box 636, Reading, Pa. 19603.

CRITICAL uncensored book on higher education. Send $4.00 (guaranteed). "College Racket," Box 1107, Edinburgh, Texas.

"THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES"

Books 1 and 2,
Still available as Xmas gifts!
$2.25 for both—132 puzzles in all.
Address: Frank W. Lewis
119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md. 20770.

TRAVEL

JET CHARTER FLIGHTS/JAPAN SUMMER '69. From $389. Limited space, members only. c/o A.A.T., 3765 E. Colorado, Pasadena, Calif. 91107

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALGONQUIN 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.18
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $4.45

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.
122-68

Looking for something out of this world to give for the Holidays? If so read no further.

We have nothing exotic to offer. Just something challenging and informative. The kind of magazine that engages you, rouses you to write angry letters when you disagree. A magazine that wants to know what you think.

Why not give The Nation as a holiday gift this year? Our special gift rate is $10 for the first one-year subscription and $8 for each additional one. Act now and we will send you PAX AMERICANA by Ronald Steel as a free gift from us.

clip & mail

THE NATION

333 Sixth Avenue

New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME

STREET

CITY

STATE

ZIP

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free PAX AMERICANA by Ronald Steel. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N12-2

THE NATION

DECEMBER 9, 1968 35 cents

BURLINGAME
DEC 9 1968
LIBRARY

5-69R PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

LIBERAL COMMUNISM

The Basic Dogma, the Scope for Freedom, the Danger in Optimism

C. P. SNOW

ONE NATION — CAN NIXON DO IT?

HOWARD L. REITER

AMERICAN HISTORY LESSONS

Alan Trachtenberg on Mailer's Miami & Chicago
Alexander Zucker on Lawrence & Oppenheimer
Christopher D. Stone on the Mooney-Billings Case

LETTERS

at odds

New York City

DEAR SIR: In the Nov. 11 issue of The Nation, you published my review of Robert McNamara's The Essence of Security under the grotesquely misleading title, "McNamara: The Glacial Technocrat." If whoever conceived that title had bothered to read the review, rather than hunting through it in search of a provocative phrase reflecting his or her political predilections, that title would have been an inconceivable choice. You will admit, I trust, that it suggests a perception of Mr. McNamara rather at odds with my conclusion that he was "easily the most admirable figure ever to have occupied . . . the office of the Secretary of Defense." . . .

Tom J. Furer

New York City

DEAR SIR: Tom Furer's eminently fair review of Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara brought a smile to my face when he described one of the Secretary's "most attractive qualities" as "natural candor." . . . In a March 3, 1965, hearing of the House Appropriations Committee, McNamara was questioned on the escalation of the Vietnamese War:

McNamara: The problem is one of semantics. I think. . . . What I call policy on the one hand and what I call tactics on the other, you might lump all under the head of policy. The basic policy is assistance to South Vietnam to maintain its independence. In that sense the policy has not changed at all. What I call tactics, which is the form of assistance and the pressure we apply militarily in support of that policy, has changed. A good illustration, I think, is the fact that within the past week or ten days we used U.S. piloted jet aircraft against the Viet Cong in South Vietnam. I do not call that a change of policy, but it certainly is a change of equipment or weaponry or tactics, whatever you want to call it. There is no question but that is a change . . . a year ago we were not striking North Vietnam with U.S. aircraft or South Vietnamese aircraft . . . we've had several strikes, a total of perhaps six within five weeks. This is a change. The question is: Is this a change of policy? You, apparently, would say it is a change of policy. I would say the policy is constant, the tactics have changed. (Emphasis added.)

Morris Reneke

credit

Carbondale, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In "Moscow Is So Dull" (The Nation, Nov. 11), Desmond Smith quoted from my translation of Voznesensky and did not give me credit. . . . The quatrain in question:

*An artist firstborn
Is always a tribune.
In him the spirit of overturning,
And rebellion—eternal.*

comes from page 20 of Voznesensky: Selected Poems, authorized translation by Herbert Marshall; Hill & Wang, paperback edition.

Herbert Marshall

once upon a future

Newtonville, Mass.

DEAR SIR: E. J. Mishan ["Abys of Progress," The Nation, Nov. 4] argues in favor of restraining the application of scientific discoveries in order to slow down technological

(Continued on page 628)

EDITORIALS

Predictable and Preventable

The coal mine disaster at Consol No. 9 in Mannington, W. Va., was easily predictable and almost certainly preventable. Ever since federal inspectors have had the right to enter mines—that is, since 1941—not only has almost every mine disaster been predictable, it has actually been predicted. Last year only eighteen mines were free of statutory code violations, or one-third of 1 per cent of the mines. At Mannington, the mine lies over an oil and natural gas field and it had been posted as "extremely gassy" by federal inspectors in August. The miners themselves regarded it as "hot"—that is, known to be gassy and dangerous. The hazard was increased by the fact that the company was "pushing production"; it was working three shifts, producing 10,000 or more tons of coal a day.

There is also a high degree of probability that this particular disaster was preventable. No mine will ever be thoroughly safe; mining is inherently hazardous, the most hazardous of some forty major industries. Most of the deaths are from "accidents" befalling individual miners, not from major disasters. But the statistics of mine accidents show that they can be drastically reduced, if not eliminated, because that in fact is what has happened. The death toll, which was once as high as 2,000, is now down to 200 or so a year. However, in the entire history of hazardous occupations there is no parallel for the extent to which the coal mining industry has resisted the introduction of ways and means to prevent major disasters. The argument has been that, as an industry, coal mining operates at a low margin of profit and that safety devices and better prevention methods are expensive. But major mine disasters are enormously costly; the losses in the present disaster will run into the millions.

Few bosses, however, can match the mine owners for stubbornness and arrogance. For decades they argued that coal dust could not be ignited underground by sparks, etc. From the time the Bureau of Mines was established in 1911, at the initiative of the union (it was then actively concerned with safety), until 1941, no federal inspector had a right to enter a mine. He could make an inspection if the owner permitted, and he could file a report—which the owner could and generally did ignore.

On December 21, 1951, a frightful explosion in a mine at West Frankfort, Ill., took 119 lives. This disaster was reported to have been "absolutely preventable"; in the previous July two federal inspectors had posted the mine as hazardous (see editorial, The Nation, January 5, 1952, and "Murder in the Mines" by Willard Shelton, The Nation, February 9, 1952). In the aftermath of that tragedy, new legislation was adopted to give federal inspectors the right of inspection and, under certain circumstances, the power to shut down a mine. But it was not until 1966 that the so-called "small mines," those employing no more than fourteen miners, were brought within the purview of the act.

Federal inspectors are well-trained, experienced men, and West Virginia has perhaps better mine safety legislation than any other state; still, inspection, enforcement and improvement lag far behind what could be regarded as satisfactory present-day standards. Lack of funds is a major shortcoming. At the time of the United Mine Workers convention this year in Denver, the President proposed new and more adequate mine safety legislation, but the proposal was so palpably political that no one took it seriously. In January, a new administration and a new Congress will take over; perhaps they will act, as the Eisenhower administration acted in 1952 after the West Frankfort disaster, to take the steps which are so obviously indicated.

December 9, 1968

But one cannot be sure. Coal mine disasters are a classic example of what might be called the "disappearing" news story. Few recurrent news stories are more dramatic or have a wider human interest. But once the headlines have subsided—once the fires have been extinguished and the bodies removed—the public is permitted to forget about coal mine disasters until the next one. Coal mines are located in areas off the beaten path; legislators from these areas in the House and Senate represent, for the most part, mine owners, not miners. The media have little occasion to focus on coal mining except when tragedy strikes.

What is needed is a sustained drive to keep public attention fixed on what is, and always has been, a national scandal. "The story of coal is always the same," wrote "Mother" Mary Harris Jones in her autobiography, "it is a dark story." And she knew, for she had spent thirty years of her life in West Virginia. "When I get to the other side," she said, "I shall tell God Almighty about West Virginia!" It is not West Virginia alone that she should report on today but the entire nation which, from its extraordinary susceptibility to journalistic distraction, fails to worry about mine safety between disasters, salving its conscience by ritualistic pity for the survivors during the high point of the drama, only to forget them the day after the mass funeral.

The Campus Ombudsman

The Swedish-Danish idea of a "citizens' protector" has been caught on in the universities. In the November 11 Chronicle of Higher Education James W. Brann reports on a Detroit get-together of campus ombudsmen, of whom there are at present between twenty and thirty in the United States, with several dozen other institutions considering such positions. The mode of application varies widely: some ombudsmen are appointed by the university president, some by the faculty, some by the student body. The post may be a full-time job, or it may be administered part-time by a member of the teaching faculty. Some are kept busy, but a professor-ombudsman at a Montana college has had only a handful of cases in two years.

Opinions about the value of ombudsman mediation also vary. Earle W. Clifford, dean of student affairs at Rutgers, likens the appointment of an ombudsman to putting a penny in the fuse socket when a circuit blows. "A decision to go the ombudsman route," he says, "is a fine advertisement for the failure of an administration in general or a student personnel program in particular to meet responsi-

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

610

ARTICLES

614 One Nation—Can Nixon Do It?

Howard L. Reiter

617 Liberal Communism: The Basic Dogma, the Scope for Freedom, the Danger in Optimism

C. P. Snow

623 What We Know About Poverty

Robert J. Lampman

626 Ebb Tide of Integration

Barney Sellers

BOOKS & THE ARTS

629 The Great National Trial As History

Christopher D. Stone

630 Death (poem)

Philip Dow

631 Repeat Performance

Alan Trachtenberg

632 A Plague and a Pleasure

Daniel Stern

632 The Dead Sailor (poem)

Lewis Turco

633 The Dangerous Scientific Life

Alexander Zucker

634 Playacting Theatre Critic

Harold Clurman

635 Palefaces and Redskins

Richard Freedman

636 Nonsense and Erudition

Sean Cronin

636 Art

Lawrence Alloway

636 Films

Robert Hatch

639 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD FELLOWS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL LEVY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN TOLSON

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERNILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 925 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 20

bilities for equity and communication in an academic community."

Mr. Clifford agreed with some other speakers that the universities are due for radical change, and that often the faculties stand in the way: "I need a student government mobilized to play a part, with me, in rocking the faculty boat." Along the same line, Frank Lucatelli, who directs the student-run free university at the University of Detroit, advocates that students walk out of inadequately conducted classes and set up their own classes, to show administrators and faculty members "how a meaningful learning experience is created."

By its nature, the ombudsman remedy, whether at an institution of learning or in government, is a palliative. If those in charge were wise and unselfish, an ombudsman would not be needed, nor can the concept help materially in situations where radical reform is the only solution. Yet, within its limitations, it can avoid or resolve a certain number of painful and even dangerous conflicts.

Brann tells, for example, of an incident at San Jose State College where a Negro student walking in a corridor of a classroom building had his hat knocked off by a faculty member, who told him: "We don't wear our hats in here." The student was furious, as were other Negroes on the campus. The incident might have resulted in a major confrontation, since the college was already racially troubled. However, J. Benton White, the San Jose ombudsman, quickly cooled things off. The faculty member, it seems, had been knocking off students' hats for years to "teach them courtesy"; he apologized, and presumably has learned courtesy himself. In this single incident, the ombudsman may have earned his keep for the whole semester.

Many less dramatic instances can be cited, and there may be beneficial side effects. As Thomas F. Davis, a part-time ombudsman at the University of Detroit puts it, "The ombudsman is not the conscience of the university, but he makes it possible for a conscience to exist on the campus."

Snow's War

As his recent photographs show, C. P. Snow, with advancing years, grows to resemble Winston Churchill. This similarity adds emphasis to the fact that, twenty-two years after Sir Winston created the iron curtain image at Fulton, Mo., Lord Snow used the same platform of the John Findlay Green lecture at Westminster College last month to warn the world of a looming peril. He, too, referred to curtains; he said that we—meaning the prosperous nations of the West—"draw the curtains and take care not to listen to anything which is going on in the streets outside."

What is going on is man's lemming-like suicide by proliferation. This is not prophecy; it is happening now, according to the British novelist and scientist, and any day the evidence will be on our television screens. We—this time meaning the world at large—are in process of proving the mathematics of Malthus with our own emaciated corpses. Snow confesses himself to be in a state of despair, but as a man of reason he spurns despair, and offers a minimal prescription for stopping, if not reversing, the universal flood of population. First, the underdeveloped nations, and to only a somewhat lesser degree, the advanced nations, must determine to reduce their birth rates by major proportions. (This will be very difficult: Lord Ritchie-Calder has pointed out recently that the world is not staging an "orgy of procreation"; it is just that more children are surviving to have more children.) Next, the prosperous nations must contribute to the impoverished lands a percentage of their annual incomes that exceeds even what they have been able, or willing, to expend for self-defense in their days of greatest peril. And finally, the two superpowers—Russia and the United States—must collaborate to these ends.

It is on this third point that Lord Snow strikingly parts company with his distinguished predecessor at Fulton, Churchill, by coining the phrase, "iron curtain," did as much as a man can do with words to assure the waging of the cold war. It was the wrong war to fight, as both belligerents admit at least tacitly today, and it not only distracted attention from C. P. Snow's war (which even twenty-two years ago was already in train) but it made the logistics of that war the more baleful. Because when nations rattle the saber, they also rock the cradle—sons for the fatherland!

Not one nation has tried seriously to make its people understand what is meant by the statement—no longer subject to dispute—that at going rates the present world population will have doubled by the year 2000, and will double again in a still briefer span. It is a matter of debate whether the food supply can, even theoretically, keep pace with this inundation of flesh. And it is a matter of trivial debate, for the resources are finite and the end must come in a later decade, if it does not in an earlier. Moreover, long before that day, mankind will be reduced to the choices and enterprise of a dairy herd, each of us chewing his daily ration of synthetics on his allotted square yard of living space.

That is the doomsday against which C. P. Snow is fighting—with the resolute hope that a rational man employs when there is no choice but hope. He bids the world cease its petty battles—now—and close ranks, not against the invader from space but against our own fecundity.

Why Mercenaries?

Addressing the American Legion of Monroe County (New York) on November 11, the fiftieth anniversary of the veterans' organization, Dr. W. Allen Wallis, president of the University of Rochester, took a bold stand. "To be invited to participate with you today," he said with urbane irony, "is a pleasure which I am enjoying greatly, at least up to this point in the proceedings." With that, he launched into a devastating attack on the draft, calling for its abolition "immediately—with no ifs, ands, or buts."

Dr. Wallis' denunciation came with the more force because he is no pacifist. While admiring the "basic pacifism" of the American people, he feels—quoting Wendell Willkie ("only the strong can be free")—that it "is fraught with peril in the modern world." His attack on the draft system was therefore not on the ground that it is immoral in principle and inequitable in practice, but that its inefficiency menaces national security.

Ultimately most draftees make fair-to-middling soldiers, and a certain proportion are as good as they come. But their training is difficult and expensive, and the one desire of most of them is to get home. As for the inequities, at this stage they surely require no further demonstration. Consequently, Dr. Wallis would tolerate the draft only under conditions of total mobilization or an approach to it, as in World Wars I and II—a type of war which by every indication will never recur.

He dismisses "universal" military service on the ground that (assuming it was really universal) everyone would be equally mistreated, everyone being a chattel of the government. A lottery would be no more equitable than the present arrangement. Though there are some objections to an all-volunteer force, the advantages outweigh the drawbacks. Military pay would have to be raised, but the true cost would probably be less than under the draft, since more of the cost would be open and paid by the taxpayers, instead of being hidden, with a large part paid by the draftees.

Dr. Wallis notes that General Hershey and others have referred to volunteers as "mercenaries," "hired killers," and "in there just for the money." This is essentially a class argument; under the present system 90 per cent of the commissioned officers are volunteers, and no one calls them mercenaries. Dr. Wallis quotes Prof. Harry Gilman: "Why . . . are officers who are encouraged to enter and to remain in the service by reasonably high levels of pay called 'dedicated career men,' but privates who would volunteer when they too received higher levels of pay are called 'mercenaries'?"

Of course a still better solution would be the demilitarization of the United States, but since that is not an early prospect, Mr. Nixon (who has made some unspecific statements regarding the faults of the present system) should make abolition of the draft one of his first items of business.

Bowlful of Jelly

On November 24, and with President-elect Nixon in the congregation, Dr. Norman Vincent Peale preached a sermon in which, according to The New York Times, he asserted that "God doesn't want anyone to be hungry and oppressed. He just puts His big arms around everybody and hugs them up against Himself." This image of the Almighty as Santa Claus is no doubt appropriate to the season, but it is a perilous doctrine to serve up to a political leader already disposed to assign the nation's ghetto problems to the benevolence of free enterprise.

Upton Sinclair

Most of what needs to be said about Upton Sinclair will be said. The editorials will note his passion for social justice, his "awesome fecundity" as a writer, and his addiction to various fads and nostrums. It will be said that he was extraordinarily gracious and benign for a person who so consistently castigated the high and mighty, applying the verbal whip with such relish to institutions, persons and practices he found abhorrent.

The contrast between his rhetoric and his manner was indeed striking. What is not likely to be said is that, at a certain level, he had a talent for communication that was close to genius. To this day one can find the slogans of the EPIC campaign (End Poverty in California) scrawled on bridge approaches, rocks, abandoned barns and tree trunks in the most remote areas of the state. Sinclair's pamphlet of that title was the basic—indeed the only—document used in his remarkable race for governor of California in 1934. In previous campaigns he had run as a Socialist, but in 1934 he decided to enter the Democratic primary. A million or more unemployed were willing to listen to anyone, even a former Socialist, atheist and advocate of free love, who made some sense and offered a little hope. Sinclair set out to convince the people of the state that poverty was not part of the natural order of the universe and that it could be ended.

He spoke from one end of the state to the other, at every imaginable kind of meeting, and he spoke with incandescent brilliance. What he said was simplistic, naive, unrealistic, but on the basic proposition he was so obviously right that he could not be refuted. Those with eyes to see knew that thousands of tons of foodstuffs were being regularly destroyed, in a misguided effort to sustain market prices. Citrus growers sprayed tons of fruit with oil in huge dumps protected by barbed wire—to prevent the poor from stealing a few oranges. In 1934 the notion that poverty could be ended was not so much a radical idea as it was utterly novel. Sinclair, the teacher, the superb educator, made his point. His handling of questions from his audiences was beyond praise. He was quiet, deft, smiling, never condescending, always direct and responsive; he never failed to communicate.

As an effort in mass education through political means the EPIC campaign was a great success. Sinclair was supported by an army of rank amateurs; Eugene McCarthy's affluent "volunteers" were political sophisticates by comparison. A key to Sinclair's success was that there really had not been a Democratic Party in California, in any meaningful sense, for decades. When the EPIC campaign was over, there was a new, largely rank-and-file, Democratic organization. Scores of prominent politicians, some still in office, came out of the EPIC movement. Sinclair's defeat, incidentally, was not due to the smear campaigns directed against him, or the wild quotes from his books and pamphlets, or the systematic attempts to panic the voters. He won the Democratic nomination and might well have been elected, but for the fact that a respected progressive, Raymond Haight, entered the race as the nominee of the old Progressive Party and polled enough votes to defeat Sinclair. But a more basic reason is that Upton had lost interest in the governorship long before the votes were counted. He had lived it all in his imagination; there was no need to experience it.

Sinclair was not a great novelist or social critic; he was a master of communication techniques, a remarkable pamphleteer, educator and speaker. He didn't think—he saw, he had visions. As a muckraker he lacked Lincoln Steffens' remarkable insight and analytic powers; for the most part he communicated indignation, not understanding. He kept to the surface and lived on first impressions.

All who knew him liked him. Those who knew him best were endlessly baffled by the strange and contradictory elements that made him the kind of person he was; at the same time, they were full of admiration for his qualities and talents.

ONE NATION — CAN NIXON DO IT?

HOWARD L. REITER

Mr. Reiter, a doctoral candidate in political science at Harvard, is on the executive board of the Cambridge chapter of the Ripon Society, a national organization of liberal Republicans.

On the night when he accepted his second Presidential nomination, Richard Nixon told the Miami Beach convention that "a party that can unite itself will unite America." The events in Chicago three weeks later gave his words new significance, and he reiterated the theme throughout the campaign. Now he must deliver on his pledge.

Can Richard Nixon unite America? The odds are mixed. They begin with his popular vote, embarrassingly small for a man who presents himself as a unifying force. Of course, the other Presidents who began their administrations in a similar predicament, Lincoln and Wilson, were quite effective in office. But both had working Congressional majorities, and Mr. Nixon does not. In one sense, however, he may have an advantage that Hubert Humphrey would have lacked: he may be able to rely on the great bulk of his co-partisans in Congress to support his program, and then hope to attract Democrats looking for half a loaf. That was the strategy Dwight Eisenhower employed for eight years, and it generally worked. But Eisenhower was able to use his enormous popularity and prestige in this endeavor; Richard Nixon will have neither great popularity nor great prestige at his disposal.

Mr. Nixon throughout his career has dealt in the currency of partisanship, and the next four years may provide him with something of a cultural shock. For he should apprise himself of the fact that the bonds of party have been steadily loosening in the last twenty years, and are now close to atrophy. Perhaps declining partisanship is a sign of our post-industrial times, and will persist far into the future. More likely, it is a sign of a realignment in party politics, a change strikingly similar to that described by Joel H. Silbey in The Transformation of American Politics, 1840-1860:

The political change of the ante-bellum period was the outgrowth of changing conditions in American life and the failure of the traditional parties to cope with these changes adequately. . . . Ultimately, as these issues became more salient, that is, more important to them, several of the groups shifted politically in order to restore the necessary conditions for maximizing their satisfactions. Concern over these issues was powerful enough to weaken the strongest of traditional partisan loyalties.

Jusp, Wir Brunckenbauer (Switzerland)
Will His Reach Be Long Enough?

The strains on the present party system probably reflect a similar kind of shift in the salient issues. As Edward Schneider has cogently argued in The Nation ("The New Tide of National Politics," January 22, and "The Scar of Wallace," November 4), this change is most likely one from economic issues to status issues—those relating to the comparative position of groups in the society. They include race relations, crime control, anti-intellectualism, local versus centralized control of societal institutions.

Whether or not we are headed for a major realignment, the waning effect of party on the political scene cannot be denied. In the Gallup Poll, the proportion of self-styled "independents" has been rising dramatically since 1940, and now exceeds that of Mr. Nixon's party. Voting patterns reflect this trend: in 1946, of twenty-four states which held simultaneous gubernatorial and Senatorial elections, only one elected a Democrat to one office and a Republican to the other. Since that time, the number of states with split outcomes has risen steadily, and in 1964, 1966 and 1968, an outright majority of those states simultaneously electing a governor and a Senator so divided. In Presidential election years, there has been an almost identical increase in the incidence of states voting for the Presidential candidate of one party and state-wide office seekers of the other. In this connection, the voters of Arkansas deserve some kind of accolade this year for bestowing their electoral favors upon George Wallace, J. William Fulbright and Winthrop Rockefeller.

Congressional party ties have also slackened. The measure of party unity compiled each year by the Congressional Quarterly has gradually declined for both parties, in both houses of Congress, since the journal began its studies in the late 1940s. Even Lyndon Johnson's masterful leadership of the Senate Democrats during the Eisenhower years did not arrest this trend. Today, there is not one party leader in Congress who can marshal his forces in every major legislative contest. On a number of key issues, such as the Powell expulsion and the Fortas nomination, various "leaders" have actually changed their positions to accommodate their "followers." There are signs of atrophy in the old folkways, too, as freshman Senators are playing a more important role than ever before. The spectacle of a Percy housing bill or a Griffin fight against Abe Fortas would have been unthinkable a few years ago.

What all this means to Richard Nixon is that he cannot rely on party labels to guarantee him a bloc of support, a bloc of opposition, or legislative leaders who can deliver the votes. For purposes of both popular and Congressional coalition building, he must present his program on its merits, and expect support and opposition to develop on that basis. That suggests the distinct possibility of new and perhaps even lasting party coalitions. The disadvantages inherent in a state of party flux go hand in hand with enormous new opportunities.

These new opportunities begin with an anomaly. Throughout the long and hectic campaign, Richard Nixon's standing in the polls varied hardly a percentage point. Hubert Humphrey's dramatic last-minute gains were at the expense of George Wallace and the previously undecided bloc. This raises the intriguing likelihood that a sizable majority of Americans never even considered voting for Nixon and a quite large minority never considered anyone else. It is the price one pays for being highly controversial, and it does not augur well for the Republicans in 1972. In short, Nixon must break out of the 43 per cent bloc, who will probably support him whatever he does, and construct the new majority he has been promising his party.

How this can be done is by no means clear. Viewing his 1960 campaign in retrospect in Six Crises, Nixon wrote:

Had I lost by two million votes, or more, no one could say "if you had just done this or that you would have won." But when a shift of ten or twelve thousand votes in three or four key states would have overturned the result, anyone could make a pretty good case for the proposition—"if only you had taken my advice, you would have won."

The same analysis can be applied in reverse to his 1968 campaign. If Strom Thurmond, John Tower and Spiro Agnew can claim that their hard line on law and order provided the winning electoral votes, Midwestern moderates like Richard Ogilvie, William Saxbe and Warren Knowles can take credit for the victory, too. All of them ran ahead of Nixon in their states. This is a critical matter, for Nixon's response to the choice will determine what kind of coalition he can assemble. If he is sufficiently perceptive, he knows that the law and order issue was a campaign gimmick that has been milked for almost all it is worth. The forty-five electoral votes won by George Wallace might conceivably be picked up by Nixon in 1972, but it could be at the cost of enough industrial states to insure defeat.

In the industrial states of the Northeast lies Nixon's greatest room for improvement. Of the region's 149 electoral votes he carried just twenty-seven. It was, furthermore, the only region in which his proportion of the two-party vote dropped below what he won in 1960. Surprisingly, his performance in the suburbs also fell, a fact noted by all three major newsweeklies. While some of that decline may be attributed to the Wallace vote, there is no question that Wallace drew support from both parties. (In New York, he did equally well in New York City, the suburbs and upstate.) This means that a good number of suburban Republicans switched to Humphrey.

This strayed suburban vote must be regained by the Republicans if Nixon is to serve with any hope of uniting the country and winning re-election. For these were the fence sitters through most of the campaign, and they are the least solid element of the Humphrey vote. They are white-collar or successful blue-collar employees, better educated and better off than most Americans; a large number of them were strongly attracted to the McCarthy and Rockefeller campaigns. While they may provide the margin of victory in the major industrial states in a given election, their numbers are less important than their influence—they are a kind of managerial, professional and intellectual elite, manning the institutions of business, scientific research, education and the mass media. They are, in short, the opinion leaders of American society.

How can this group be wooed? An obvious step would be to put a rapid end to the war in Vietnam, a war opposed in part because the sons of the middle class are now being sent to wage it. But the more basic issue is the domestic crisis, which does not lend itself to as easy a solution as the war. Nixon lacks the confidence of the suburban swing group, in part because he has failed to demonstrate a sincere and sophisticated concern for metropolitan problems. His conspicuous absence from the ghettos (and Agnew's flip bromides), his desire to limit federal aid, and his reliance on the rubric of law and order handicap him with those who fear for the future of the republic if the cities are not saved, and soon.

But there are surely those who are now telling Nixon that success depends upon appeals to the disgruntled members of the middle and lower-middle classes who desire above all else ■ cut in federal poverty programs and an increase of law and order. Indeed, that is Nixon's own concept of the "forgotten man." Tempting as it must be for him to submit to this line of strategy, he must realize that this group, concentrated in small towns, ethnic enclaves, and parts of the blue-collar labor force, is on the wane in numbers and influence. (For the most part, too, it is Democratic in its leanings on economic issues.) A man from Yorba Linda, Calif., who has spent the last twenty years on the Republican chicken-dinner circuit, might come to think that these forgotten men comprise the vast majority of Americans. But the party that throws

King, Telegraph (Australia)

"Well?"

in its lot with them has embarked, demographically speaking, on a slowly sinking ship.

Indeed, what is needed, not only by Nixon but by all of us, is a proper perspective on the so-called law and order issue. It is not simply the race issue clouded in euphemism, for it has strong appeal in areas where black faces have never been seen. Nor is it merely a collection of the grievances of the "forgotten man." And it has precious little to do with crime prevention.

When men focus attention on "law" and "order," they are in effect reconsidering the fundamental premises of the political system. In this regard, it is fitting that the only Supreme Court decision in American history to play a major role in national politics was the Dred Scott decision, for it was part of a decisive national reconsideration of the nature of the American union. Likewise, the controversiality of the Warren court is derived from its role in the reconsideration of the basic relations of our society in the post-industrial period—black and white, rural and urban, police and accused, and so on. Its decisions in these areas have resulted in a natural inclination to lay blame for the turmoil at the door of the Court, and to overlook the fact that the Court's decisions constitute a symptom and not a cause of the changes. Dismay at these changes has led to a plaintive cry for obedience to law and preservation of order—the forgotten man wants to stop the world and throw the troublemakers off.

In short, we are entering a crisis of legitimacy, when a large segment of the population questions whether laws should protect impatient blacks, accused criminals, draft-card burners, campus rebels and alleged pornographers. Their frustration is partly due to a genuine sense of alienation from the nation's leaders—first from John Kennedy, who assembled a coalition almost the exact reverse of Nixon's this year, and then from Lyndon Johnson, whose racial policies seemed too liberal and whose war policies became hopelessly muddled and deceitful. Neither President became a repository of trust for the forgotten man.

Despite his failure to seduce the suburban white-collar swing voter, Nixon makes an enormous appeal to the forgotten man of the lower middle class. His life is something with which they can identify: born in humble circumstances, working his way up on his own, preaching the virtues of Americanism and standing foursquare against communism, losing two major political battles, and yet succeeding in the end. The Algeresque overtones may seem corny to much of the population, but they represent something very real to the millions whose world view features lazy welfare chiselers, honest workingmen, malodorous hippies and friendly cops.

And it is among this segment of Americans that Richard Nixon can exercise a high degree of statesmanship and even, quite possibly, make an outstanding contribution to the development of American democracy. Just as it took a Republican Chief Justice to preside over the end of legal segregation, a Republican President to call for the first massive federal aid to education, and a Republican administration to stop Joe McCarthy, so it will take a Republican to make the new relationships in this country seem legitimate to the forgotten man. This surely is not the result of the Republican Party's superior virtue or liberalism. It is, on the other hand, a function of its image of stolid orthodoxy, which enables it to do some things that nobody else could do without being labeled crank or subversive. When Northern Democrats call for integration, propose federal aid, or attack Joe McCarthy, they are merely acting "in character"; when Republicans do it, they appear to be acting sincerely in the national interest.

It is thus vital that Nixon retain much of the impetus of the Great Society; not only will it enable him to woo the decisive suburban vote but it will demonstrate to the loyal 43 per cent that there is some merit to social reform and racial equality that stands above parties and belongs in the American tradition. Hubert Humphrey could never persuade this group: Richard Nixon at this moment in history is the only man who can.

Is there room for optimism? Richard Nixon's career is like the Bible; you can read almost anything into it that you want. But its general tenor has been cautious and conservative. Now that he has attained the goal for which all the caution and conservatism were so skillfully employed, Nixon must break out of the strait jacket of the 43 per cent and commit himself to a broad program of positive accomplishment. For if the Republican Party is ever to be reborn, and if America is ever to be reunited, then the President must make credible some degree of common ground for the managers and professionals and the forgotten men. And for this task, if he possesses the vision, Richard Nixon has been chosen.

LIBERAL COMMUNISM The Basic Dogma, the Scope for Freedom, the Danger in Optimism

C. P. SNOW

Lord Snow's The Sleep of Reason, eleventh and next to last novel in the "Strangers and Brothers" series, will be published by Scribner's in January and is the January Book-of-the-Month Club selection. Lord Snow has been in this country recently to deliver the John Findley Green Lecture at Westminster College, Fulton, Mo. (delivering this lecture in 1946, Sir Winston Churchill proclaimed that an "iron curtain" had descended in Europe).

The following text is the introduction to Georgi Dzhagarov's play, The Public Prosecutor, as adapted from the Bulgarian by C. P. Snow and Pamela Hansford Johnson. It will be published in 1969 by Peter Owen (London).

London

Georgi Dzhagarov is a Bulgarian. He is a Communist, and a member of the Communist Party. After making a reputation as a poet (he is now in his early 40s), he had a play produced on the Bulgarian stage. This was in 1964, and the play was The Public Prosecutor. It is the most direct attack on Stalinism yet made by a writer in Eastern Europe. The play is the biggest success his own country has seen for years. Not long after it was produced, he was appointed President of the Writers' Union; as in all Socialist countries, that is an official position, and one that he still holds. Dzhagarov had been sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment by the pre-Communist regime. He is now a member of the Bulgarian parliament.

To anyone who doesn't know Eastern Europe it is perhaps no more surprising that Dzhagarov and his play should come from Bulgaria than from anywhere else east of a line between, say, Hamburg and Trieste. Yet in fact it is in many ways very surprising. To begin with, Bulgaria is in sympathy by far the closest to Russia of all the Eastern countries. There are good reasons, historical, traditional, cultural, ethnic, even linguistic, for this. It was the Russian army which in the 1870s freed Bulgaria from very nearly 500 years of what is always called "the Turkish yoke." That was an occupation which seems to have kept the country as stagnant as is possible for a human society, and which did not bring, so far as anyone can trace, a scrap of art or a single idea; so that both culture and language could be kept alive by one agency only, the Bulgarian priests of the orthodox Church, whose predecessors had in earlier and more glorious days, before the Turks arrived, given the emerging Russians both the Cyrillic alphabet and a liturgical language (Church Slavonic, which takes the place of Latin in Russian orthodox services, is actually medieval Bulgarian).

The Russians put an end to Turkish rule: and the people, and nearly all the intellectuals—though not the ruling class, who with singular cunning got on the losing side in both World Wars—have been pro-Russian to this day. The great cathedral in Sofia, which is mentioned in Dzhagarov's play, is called the Alexander Nevsky, after the Russian hero and saint. A gigantic monument in Plovdiv is in the shape of a 19th-century Russian soldier. Bulgaria is the only country in Eastern Europe where one could hear someone say, with complete simplicity and openness, as I have heard myself, that here we regard the Russians as our big brothers. Not a trace of irony. It was said with the emotional candor which they share with the Russians, as well as the "broad nature," for which they have an equivalent phrase. For me personally, the fact that I am known to love Russians as Russians has been a help in Bulgaria, instead of the handicap it can be elsewhere in Eastern Europe (or rather the incomprehensible addiction of someone who appears otherwise to be a reputable writer and a fairly sensible man).

If one forgets the extreme variety and beauty of the Bulgarian landscape, so much in contrast to the endless stretches of the steppes, one might imagine oneself in southern Russia. The faces in the street look very much the same. The language is much closer to Russian than is Polish or Czech, and Russian is a real second language in Bulgarian schools. Dzhagarov himself could pass for a Russian. Bulgarian scientists go to work in Moscow, and tend to stay there, rather as English scientists go to the United States. There is, and has been for a long time, a very easy flow of feeling between the two countries. You can see it in Turgenev's novels. When Turgenev wanted an active hero, higher spirited and less inhibited than his Russian men, he chose a Bulgarian. This is still the picture Russians have of these other Slavs—much like themselves, but several drinks above par. Incidentally, it is a picture which Bulgarians themselves accept with considerable enthusiasm.

All this sympathy and interplay made it fairly natural for Bulgarian political development, after the Hitler war, to follow the Soviet line. On September 9, 1944—the day referred to by Dzhagarov's characters as "the Ninth"—Soviet armies were in the Balkans and the Bulgarians joined their side. There were plenty of trained Bulgarian Communists available, such as Dimitrov, the hero of the Reichstag trial. Between the two wars, underground movements had been struggling against various reactionary regimes: old Voynov in The Public Prosecutor is both a reminder and a personification of those struggles, and the suffering and hopes that the Communist forefathers had been through. After the Ninth, it would have taken more than protests from Washington, which duly arrived, to prevent the country's becoming a Soviet-type state. It happened with less friction than anywhere else in Eastern Europe. Since the Soviet Union was in its most rigorous Stalinist phase, Bulgaria took on the same form, and between 1945 and 1956 became, at least on the surface, more Stalinist than the Stalinists. It is precisely this period which Dzhagarov is writing about in his play.

The Basic Creed

There are certain elements in a Socialist state which anyone who can really be called a Communist takes for granted. For example:

- (a) Public ownership of the means of production.
- (b) Central planning and control of all major activities, such as industry and education.
- (c) The role of the Communist Party—itsself a select minority—as the sole policy-making and decision-making body in the state.

One cannot be a Communist without taking these features for granted although, as these pages go to the printer, some Czech Communists are disputing the third point. More than that, Communists must believe that in the long run they will make for the good society, or at the very least for a better society than has yet existed. Men like Dzhagarov or the Russian liberal Communists certainly believe that. Some peripheral questions, to which I now come, have been raised by Communists in Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland; but it is important to realize that they are peripheral. The fundamental axioms remain.

There follows an area of real doubt, which I will call (d): the necessity for the Communist Party, in order to build the new society and a new race of Communist men (what the Russians call Soviet Man), to guide and control all intellectual expression. This is an area which has aroused great passion in the West, and I shall return to it later. I will just say here that within it are contained some very difficult problems for the most liberal of Communists. All of them will, of course, want the control of expression to be much looser than it is in contemporary Russia. But none—certainly none that I have ever met—would consider that complete liberty, in the Western sense, is either possible in a Socialist society, or even desirable (I am speaking here of persons who are Communists, however liberal: there are, needless to say, others, non-Communists, some of them alienated, who would welcome Western liberty at any price).

All Stalinists, which is a bad expression and herds together people of many shades of opinion, would be in substantial agreement on the necessity for this control. In fact, it is one of the classical features of what we call Stalinism. There are two others.

- (e) Extreme concentration of power. In the original theory of the early phases of the Socialist state, opinion was supposed to flow up from the party at the worker level, expressing the workers' desires and needs; and then decision would flow down from the higher echelons of the party. But it didn't work quite like that. The crisis of the October Revolution, the civil war, the tasks of surviving afterward, helped to concentrate power into fewer and fewer hands; and so did the nature of power structures themselves. There was nothing surprising in this. It could have been predicted, or feared—in fact, it had been both predicted and feared—by anyone who had thought seriously about the politics of power. In some aspects it had major advantages: when you are struggling to survive, you must avoid compromise decisions, and that is what power concentrations can do. But they can also produce all the evils of a society without checks and balances—arbitrary arrest, the existence of powers dominating or side-stepping the law—and this is what Stalinist phases have invariably done. There are various discreet or euphemistic names for those happenings, such as "violation of Socialist legality."

(f) The cult of personality. Now this really is surprising. As I have just mentioned, political thinkers for a long time past have been aware of the dangers of concentrated power: but no one that I have heard of ever thought that, in modern times, one of those dangers was deification. Yet that was what, in front of everyone's mystified eyes, happened to Stalin. No human being in his own lifetime, it seemed, had received such choruses from cherubim and seraphim since the time of Alexander the Great. It was astonishing to observe from the viewpoint of another country. It would have been equally astonishing to Marx and Lenin, who were after all rational 19th-century intellectuals.

Of course, the power structure encouraged the process. Stalin himself, it must be presumed, found it tactically helpful. And there is no reason to believe that he found it personally distasteful (anyone can stop being a god if he really wants). Yet the process, though astonishing, wasn't just an official device: that helped, but only a little, compared with the scale of a worship which spread not only through the Soviet Union but among Communists everywhere. And not only among simple people. Pasternak wrote poetry in praise of Stalin. Maybe Pasternak was trying to be diplomatic, though the words don't read like that. But Joliot-Curie, Bernal—two of the cleverest men in the world—I am quite certain they believed what they said. At the time, their hallicujahs ("Stalin is the greatest scientist in the world") made it more difficult to argue, as plenty of well-wishers wanted to, that this mass prostration was a purely Russian, as opposed to a Communist, phenomenon. The Russian had always needed a god figure, we heard. The Czar as Little Father. The Czar emerging through the iconostasis. The profound obeisances of the orthodox Church. Peter the Great. The Bronze Horseman. The Russian religious spirit. The Russian soul.

All that was argued. But it came to look singularly ridiculous when precisely the same phenomenon, multiplied by a factor of 100, happened in a society which culturally couldn't have been more different. For China, as compared with Russia, has always been sensible and secular: there aren't any Dostoevskys in Chinese literature; no culture had gone in less for gods, or even heroes. And yet—the deification of Mao soon reached a point where the tributes paid to Stalin in his heyday began to seem grudging. One can now say of Mao, with fair certainty, that no human being in the whole of history has ever heard with his own ears so much praise uttered by so many. So this "cult of personality" has happened twice, in the only two profound revolutions so far experienced. It begins to look as though it is part of the morphology of a revolution. It is the one part which contemporary Stalinists in Russia would not attempt to defend. Once more the "cult of personality" is a euphemistic phrase.

Motives of Stalinism

What about contemporary Stalinists? Yes, there are some. I am referring to the Soviet Union and the Eastern European countries. (Obviously in China there are several hundred million, but China is going through a more primitive stage of the revolution, in some ways resembling Russia in the late twenties and early thirties, but with extreme idiosyncrasies of its own: it is possible that its social development may be wildly different. I don't really believe that it will, in the long run, because technology imposes a good many of its own forms. But that battle of technology versus political abstraction is what the Cultural Revolution is all about.) Even after the Twentieth Party Congress, when Stalinism was officially denounced in Russia, there have been Stalinists left in all Eastern European countries, often in high places. This fact is noticed, with a good deal of unfriendly pleasure, in the West; and it is assumed that all these people (the Stalin's Heirs of Yevtushenko's well-known poem) must be very wicked men. The truth, however, is more complicated.

The people who administered the Soviet Stalinist state between, say, 1934 and the death of Stalin, did so from a variety of motives: conviction, opportunism and self-interest (any state apparatus multiplies jobs, not so much with material advantages though they sometimes exist but much more with status and power), and fear. Some people, since Russians are very much like the rest of us, acted out of a mixture of these motives, and some out of just one of them. Fear has been a reality in any Stalinist state. Self-interest operates as in all societies, and is no more interesting in Eastern Europe than it is in Los Angeles or Manchester. It ought to be noticed that, in Dzhagharov's play, the one character for whom he has no charity at all is the smooth operator, Boyan, who is, as a matter of calculation, prepared to accept the Stalinist regime when it is in full vigor, has a shrewd nose for when it is breaking down, and is cheerfully prepared to get on well in the reformed state. But then Dzhagharov is a brave and pure soul; there are plenty of Boyans. If this country had known an extreme situation—such as Nazi occupation—there would have been a surprising number of Boyans. It is not for us to condemn them to the limit, unless we were to know how we ourselves would have behaved.

Still, those who were and are Stalinists out of conviction are not so commonplace. And here, with his police officer Nikolov (who in Bulgarian or other Continental legal procedures is called an investigating magistrate), Dzhagharov shows great sympathy and understanding. What is such a man convinced of? I have met similar people in Russia, often much more intellectual, often of complete integrity. If the year of my birth (1905) had remained unchanged, but I had been born a Russian, I suppose I should be a liberal Communist, and should have aligned myself with Tvardovsky. It probably wouldn't be easy to remember today that some of my opponents, holding views which I believed to be destructive, were in character better than I. Yet that would be the case.

What are these convictions that such opponents would hold? I am going to be a little more articulate than Nikolov—who is a fairly humble officer of a Stalinist regime—and try to find words for him. First of all, it goes without saying, he accepts, not passively but actively, with absolute certainty, the three major doctrines which I listed earlier as (a), (b) and (c). He would not admit the slightest qualification even at the edges, e.g., the minor amount of private ownership that is permitted in Poland. Even if it makes material life slightly more comfortable, which it does, that isn't good enough. You've got to be inflexible and not worry about short-run amenities if you're going to create Soviet Man.

On the other hand, our super-Nikolov—I am really thinking of one or two pillars of society whom I have known in Russia—would admit that the "cult of personality" had been a mistake. He would admit it without much emotion or regret. If you are performing great historical tasks, great mistakes are likely to occur. It won't happen again (in fact in the Soviet Union there seems to be a real collective will in favor of keeping the leaders about as free from charisma as the President of Switzerland).

History and Necessity

The same would apply to "abuses of Socialist legality." But here the contemporary Stalinist might become quite rough. Yes, bad things took place. But in the sight of history they will be small compared with the great things. We have transformed a society in fifty years. It is now a good society, compared with others. It hasn't fulfilled all our hopes: there is still crime, incompetence, backwardness. But there is less backwardness than anyone would have believed who knew the deep Russia of 1917. There is far less crime than in the United States. By and large, this is a healthier society than that of the West. Millions of lives have been lost in making it; some of them innocent lives, because of the abuses of legality. But they have been lost in a gigantic historic task, like the innocent victims of the English Industrial Revolution. Now that task is effectively complete, and there won't be any more such victims. We have attended to the matter of legality. Abuses have been stopped and won't recur. Nevertheless, that does not mean that we shan't need vigilance and discipline. We have enemies outside, even now that we are successful: they are still capable of doing harm inside. After all, we know about the techniques of revolution. Remember, the more senior of us have been revolutionaries ourselves. We shall need a security service, KGB or whatever new name we give it, for at least another generation. We are becoming a successful society, and we're not taking any risks: if we're going to make an error, it will be an error on the safe side.

I have heard something like that a good many times. I have also heard, a good deal more strongly, the attitude about intellectual expression. Of course the party must control it. We believe that people are capable of being improved: we also believe that they are capable of being degraded. You (addressing me) have seen our television. We know it is dull, but it cannot do a single person harm. Can you say as much of your own?

A very sophisticated neo-Stalinist once told me that no society with a purpose could possibly believe in freedom of expression as an absolute value. In fact, the more this was taken as an absolute value, the more purposeless we could assume the society was.

This divide about the motive and function of art is very deep—much deeper, I fancy, than, say, Italian Communists, brought up in a Western tradition, realize. It is worth remembering that Tolstoy and Dostoevsky would have agreed with my neo-Stalinist acquaintances without considering that the matter deserved a second thought. Naturally, there are Western-oriented Communists in Russia, and even more non-Communists, who take to Western art very easily: a fortiori, that is more common in Western-looking countries, such as Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Romania. But I think it is quite rare for a gremial Russian, or a gremial Bulgarian, to read our books or look at our pictures as we do ourselves: they may even like them, but the divide is greater than we think. Obviously, exactly the same is true the other way round.

The position is complicated by what may be an accident. Or I may be imagining it. But it does seem to a foreigner that Russians, though highly literary and musical, are a notably nonvisual people, so far as these generalizations mean anything at all. It is true that Kandinsky, Malevich, Lessitsky were pioneers of abstraction, but otherwise we have to go back to Rublev and the other icon painters to find anything approaching the world class. One certainly gets the impression in Russia—Russian Russia—that there is a level of visual uninterest: it is possible that a visitor to 19th-century England might have got a similar impression. The contrast is very sharp when one moves into Latvia or Poland or Bulgaria—and most of all into Georgia, a country of painters and visual brilliance.

So that even with the most cultivated orthodox Communist or neo-Stalinist, it is next door to impossible to have a serious discussion about abstract art. But it is quite easy to have such a discussion about free expression in literature, “modernism,” and so on. I have had many of them myself, with people eminent in Soviet intellectual life. Don’t think they feel on the defensive. They think that they are broadly right, and that the West is wrong. They will admit that the West has gained something technically in literature through its total freedom, but that it has lost much more. They just despise “modernist” (that is the word they use, meaning historically what we do, though it has with them a pejorative edge) literature. It seems to them decadent both in form and content; and they are perfectly prepared to put their own up against it. Restrictions? No great literature, they say, has ever thrived without them: otherwise it is not engaged with society. They are a little uneasy that the greatest prose work of the Soviet period, Sholokhov’s And Quiet Flows the Don, was first published nearly forty years ago. But they claim that their poetry is now the best in the world. Since the idiom is so different from ours, and even the purpose (except with the “private” poets, e.g., Akhmatova, Akhmadulina, Voznesensky), that is a proposition which one can’t test. One can test their new prose writing, and there is no doubt that in short stories and novellas a couple of dozen people are writing with an ease and naturalness that flows out of the great Russian tradition. The official climate in 1968 is bleaker than it was six or seven years ago: a lot of this fine work has come out in this same year, and there is nothing quite like it in the West.

Limits of Freedom

What does a liberal Communist want? Let me repeat, I am talking about liberal or reforming Communists, such as Tvardovsky and Dzhagarov, and not about Soviet or Bulgarian citizens who are not Communists at all. There are a number in this latter category, including some first-class writers. As I have said before, these are crying out for all the literary liberties of the West, Ulysses and Lady Chatterley’s Lover, even if that means The Night Clerk and Candy, the latest work of Gore Vidal and all. Now I come to think of it, I have never pressed them, or any root-and-branch libertarian anywhere, about what happens if some enterprising publisher produces selected excerpts from Der Stürmer. Freedom is an odd word.

That is, however, beside the point. Take a liberal Communist round a bookstore in London or New York: he may be as uninhibited as a man can reasonably be, he may be a pin-up idol in his own country (that is, incidentally, as true of Dzhagarov as it is of Yevtushenko), but he will say that a good many of these exhibits are unthinkable in his society. And, like the rest of us, he will be concerned with one of the most intractable of problems, which is where the limits of freedom can be drawn.

On the other hand, he won't be anything like so acceptant as his orthodox compatriots whom I have just been discussing. He will feel that the restrictions have done both artistic and political harm. He will be more passionate about the political restrictions than the sexual ones. Russians and Bulgarians are hearty people, near enough to their peasant stock not to make much fuss about sex. There is, as it happens, very little tradition of pornography or aestheticized sex in their literature. But political restrictions cut nearer to the bone. Bulgakov's The Master and Margarita affected intellectual Moscow last year like half a dozen shots of vodka per head. No novel for years had had such a success. But Bulgakov has been dead for nearly thirty years, and the novel—which is a bizarre satire on Soviet society, with a touch of something like eccentric genius—has been held up for longer than that. Many members in the Union of Soviet Writers wanted Novy Mir to be allowed to publish The Cancer Ward by Solzhenitsyn. They were overruled at a high party level. That was three steps back for the liberals.

Perhaps the simplest example is the best, and it brings us to the present play. Although it is known in various countries of Eastern Europe in different forms (radio, publication of the script) it has not yet, so far as I know, been produced on the stage outside Bulgaria. Many theatres would like to do it: but, to the best of my belief, the 1967 production at the Hampstead Theatre Club in London was the first outside its author's native country.

The liberal writers soldier on, confident that, despite reverses, things are going, and must ultimately go, their way. Bulgaria is lucky in having several party leaders who are unusually benevolent—and well informed—about the arts. But one must remember that in all Socialist countries this is an occupational problem which doesn't seem real, or probably doesn't even touch the general public. The public may vote with their feet, so to speak, and refuse to buy dull literary works. As soon as Soviet magazines had to earn their circulations, editors found the public wanted to read Agatha Christie and Simenon. In the political struggle, though, the liberal writers are on their own. There will be a good many compromises. No foreign intervention is any good: in fact, any foreign intervention, from any source whatever, can only do harm. Meanwhile, the writers will go on trying to find their own solutions. Financially, they are by and large much better off than Western writers. Perhaps as a result of this, or perhaps because of other conditions, they produce very much less.

It is important to get the priorities straight. The problem of the limits of artistic freedom, though it is a genuine one, isn't a first consideration for serious anti-Stalinists. They have been through too many extreme situations for that. Dzhagarov's play deals with something both simpler and graver. Get that right, he is saying; then we can move on to other things.

The same applies to the economic reforms which occupy a certain amount of liberal Communist discussion. In overall strategy, the Socialist economy has been a major success. That is, it has produced national wealth, not only in the Soviet Union but in other Socialist countries, very fast; almost certainly, much faster than could have been done under capitalism. Still, too little of this wealth filters down to the individual citizen. And further, an economy nationalized down to the last tearoom seems singularly inept at providing the minor social comforts. Food inside Russian homes, for instance, is among the best in the world. In hotels, when you have waited long enough, you don't notice what the food is like.

In some of the Socialist countries, particularly those that have links with the West and know the things at which we are proficient—that is true of Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland—those questions are being raised. They are not trivial questions. To some of them, answers may be found quite soon. But they are peripheral. At the core of real anti-Stalinism, of committed liberal Communist thinking, there is something much more fundamental. It is that to which Dzhagarov addressed himself, and it is time we got there.

The Tap at Midnight

The most essential of human freedoms is simply to live. The next most essential is a negative one. It is freedom from illegality. You can't breathe easily if you don't know what the law will do, when the police will pick you up, when you may suddenly find yourself under arbitrary arrest. The tap on the door at midnight. Nacht und Nebel. In this violent century, that has been a horror to many; and the fear of it has been a horror to very many more.

It is intolerable. It is not to be borne. But many people have had to bear it, all over the world. In Eastern Europe, hundreds of thousands, or millions, of Russians, most of them in the period between the purges of the thirties and the death of Stalin: in the other Socialist countries, tens of thousands more, most of them between 1945 and the de-Stalinization (in Bulgaria, following Moscow, this meant 1956). No one knows the number of lives that were lost. Why did it happen? How did it happen? How can it be prevented from happening again? To a man like Dzhagarov, these are the cardinal questions. Anything else can be laughed off and endured, but not this. In his play, he tries to give the answers, symbolized in the fate of one Bulgarian. And in the connected fates of two decent men, a police officer who believes devoutly in the Stalinist necessities, and the hero of the play, the Public Prosecutor, who has come to doubt them. The time is carefully chosen: it is not stated explicitly, but from internal references it must fall between 1953 and 1956, which in Bulgaria was just before the beginning of the thaw.

Why is the victim Pavel in trouble? To understand Dzhagarov's play, one must grasp the social ambience. With the exception of the Public Prosecutor, all his characters are simple but not stupid people. They are living in a small Bulgarian town with its own party headquarters and apparatus. The relatives of all of them would still be peasants, as Pavel's mother is. Often, though not in the official dialogues, they talk like peasants, with the time-worn comfortable phrases, proverbs and clichés. (Some English drama critics, with their incorrigible provincialism, blamed either Dzhagarov or the adaptation for this, as though the characters ought to speak like an English intellectual's concept of the Lumpenproletariat. It should have been apparent that Dzhagarov, who is a highly sophisticated man, wrote it in that idiom deliberately; and in English the idiom was deliberately imitated.)

Pavel has been denounced. He never appears on stage, but his personality emerges. He is a party member; something of a local hero: brave, imprudent, unable to keep his mouth shut, ready to criticize. He has made a speech at a party plenary session. He has run foul of a cooperative chairman. He is clearly a bit of a busybody. In English terms, he might be a very active member of a local Labour Party, drafting resolutions criticizing the government at the annual conference.

In the paranoia of a Stalinist atmosphere, that is enough to convince the security police that he is an enemy of the state. Nikolov, who is an entirely honest man, believes this without a tremor of doubt. And having come to believe, he doesn't care where the evidence comes from. The iron necessity is to get rid of Pavel. Since he is an enemy, all that matters is to see him put away.

Duty and Conscience

The Public Prosecutor has known many such cases. He is himself a dedicated Communist: he too has accepted the necessity of detecting enemies of the state. There have, of course, been many genuine ones (for us, who live in a very old and stable society it is difficult to remember that—but cast your mind back to Elizabethan England). But more than once, doing his official duty, the Public Prosecutor has had to smother his doubts. He has acted like a lawyer with a brief, not knowing the prisoners (any more than an English prosecuting counsel would know the prisoners), following his official instructions. But sometimes he has not liked the look of the brief. We are not told how acute his doubts had become before the Pavel case, but it is a fair inference that very soon, Pavel or no Pavel, he would have made his stand. But he happens to know Pavel intimately, and of this the security police are entirely aware. That is one reason why they are insisting that he should do his official duty. It is a test of his political reliability also. He has known Pavel from childhood; he knows that Pavel, though wild, is a good Communist and a good man.

In the long run, the Public Prosecutor has no choice. It won't help Pavel, but he sacrifices himself.

How do such things happen? Dzhagarov underlines two reasons, and hints at more. The two reasons he stresses are not novel, and are interlinked. One is that a society in its Socialist phase puts a premium on blind faith: that is, there will be plenty of Nikolovs, who will justify any action, so long as it is proclaimed a necessity. And the necessity is proclaimed from above, so that blind faith gets blended with a lack of individual responsibility. The whole play is, in fact, a passionate cry for individual responsibility. Unless, in the old protestant sense, a man stands by himself, there is no health in us. It was that cry which brought storms of agreement when it was uttered from the Sofia stage.

But what about the party in all this? The power comes from above, the necessities are proclaimed from above. Yet at least in theory, the power is held by consent of the party, coming right up from below. And old Voynov, that pure soul, who has devoted his life to the party, at one stage expresses his faith in this process: "It [the party] will speak when the time comes. . . . Sometimes it speaks in such a way that you have to listen with your mind and your heart. Sometimes it is silent, because it believes that we should manage on our own."

But the retired schoolteacher broods to himself, after making inquiries about Pavel: "I saw my old pupils, men in responsible positions who once fought on our side. One after another, they carefully elbowed me away. . . . Just look a bit deeper into them, and all you'll see is fear." That is the final horror to old Voynov. To reforming Communists like Dzhagarov, who might be his son, it presents the final problem. How can we prevent these things happening again?

Dangers of Optimism

Dzhagarov says it can be done only by the individual taking his responsibility. That is a moral injunction. But, of course, he is writing a play, not a worked-out plan for a new structure of society or the reform of Socialist jurisprudence. The problem remains. It has occupied, and is still occupying, some of the best minds in Eastern Europe—jurists, political thinkers, scientists. How do you make Socialist legality powerproof? Optimists claim that now the violations have been exposed to the world, legality is safe. That is too facile.

Optimism has always been more than half the trouble. Communism, like Christianity, is an optimistic creed. That is one of its sources of strength, and also of creeping danger. It was optimism that helped the Soviet Union win the greatest war in history; and that has helped it make a major material advance all over Eastern Europe. Men are right to be hopeful about what can be done with the social condition: with courage and intelligence there is no reason for most of the human race to live in hunger or to die before their time. That is one of the messages of communism: if the rest of us don't listen to it, then we're no good. But there are other messages; all are hopeful: one of them has done a lot of harm. It is that, once you transform society (i.e., take production out of private hands, and so abolish classes except for the formal distinctions between workers, peasants, intellectuals), then you eliminate—apart from survivals—the conflicts of the bourgeois world. Since by definition the conflicts don't exist, you don't need the controls, the checks and balances, of bourgeois justice.

That optimistic assumption sprang right out of the 19th century's hopeful and innocent air. It is, unfortunately, quite wrong. No one is going to be romantic about bourgeois justice. We all know how it has developed and for what reasons. We all know that its safeguards have been built in through clashes of interest, suspiciousness and distrust. But that doesn't matter objectively, to use the Marxist word. The point is, the safeguards are there. Clashes of interest, suspiciousness and distrust have their uses. It is genuinely difficult to arrest anyone in a bourgeois society. In England in particular the scales are loaded pretty heavily against the police. There are hundreds of persons walking around London today whom the police know to be guilty, many of them of serious crimes. Because of our laws of evidence, the police can't prove their case in court.

Pavel in London might have been involved in gang murder: the police through their informers would know precisely what he had done: and, quite as likely as not, they couldn't pick him up.

Now that is clearly wrong. But it is better to be wrong that way than the other. In particular it is better to be wrong that way—in favor of the suspect—when it comes to political offenses, if a state is worried about political offenses. Somehow, the safeguards have to be built into Socialist law. In bourgeois societies we have been lucky: they have accumulated through clashes of interest, suspiciousness and distrust. It is clear, though orthodox Communists and some hopeful liberal Communists would deny it, that too much power still, after twelve years, rests with the Nikolovs of Eastern Europe.

How does Socialist law become powerproof? No one of whom I know has a satisfactory answer to that question; certainly I haven't. We should many of us be happier if we could see the answer: because we need the spirit and the hope of Dzhangarov and all that he represents.

As I said, he gives us, not a code of law but a moral injunction. I am going to finish, not with a code of law but with a psychological reflection. It is right to be optimistic about the social condition: it is wrong, if you are going to put the proper safeguards into a legal system, to be optimistic about the individual condition. We know—if we don't know it now, then we must be crazy—how men behave when they are given power. This isn't an abnormality or a pure accident or a consequence of the class strength that will soon be washed away. It is part of the blood and bone of the species, as much so as our sexuality.

False hopes drive out good. There are times when it is necessary to be pessimistic: when in fact pessimism is the only base on which to build real hopes.

I don't know about Dzhangarov himself, but it seems to me possible that communism of his kind is feeling its way to such a base.

WHAT WE KNOW ABOUT POVERTY

ROBERT J. LAMPMAN

Mr. Lampman is a staff member of the Institute for Research on Poverty at the University of Wisconsin. He is the author of Top Wealth-Holders' Share of National Wealth (Princeton University Press), one of several books he has written on the subject of poverty and wealth.

In 1964 President Johnson declared a war on poverty as one theme for his Administration. It was fated to be the "other war," and to receive less than an all-out fight. Though it is too early to evaluate the historic significance of this first national effort to abolish poverty, it is time to ask what we have learned about the effectiveness of different approaches to the problem.

One thing that we have learned again we knew before: the faster the economy grows, the faster drops the number of the poor. In 1959-63, when unemployment was high and economic growth slow, the ranks of poverty were reduced by about only a million persons per year. In 1963-67, when unemployment was cut and real family income rose by 3 per cent per year, poverty reduction stepped up to 2 million persons per year. In 1959, 22 per cent of the total American population was poor and in 1963 the number had fallen only to 19 per cent. But by 1967, the proportion of Americans who were poor had sunk to 13 per cent.

To measure the problem in terms of numbers of persons, I have used the official Social Security definition of "poverty income," which differs according to family size. For example, a family of four is considered poor if it has an income below $3,315 in 1967 prices. (It is worth noting in this connection that a man may be fully employed at the minimum wage all year round, and still not reach as high as the officially recognized poverty line unless he has less than two children.) There is, however, another way of measuring America's poverty. We can also add up the amount by which the total income of all the poor together falls short of what it would be if the income of each of them was as high as the poverty line. This figure is called the poverty-income gap, and it also has been shrinking. It is now under $10 billion and falling each year.

But there is more to the problem of reducing poverty than simply keeping the rate of economic activity high, and other trends of the last four years are reflected in these figures. High economic activity leads to increases in earned income; a companion factor is increased unearned income.

There has been a considerable growth of income to the poor in the form of social insurance and public assistance payments. Between 1964 and 1967, payments from this source rose from $33 billion to $46 billion (though by no means all of this went to the poor). The other part of the improvement in unearned income has been the growth of educational, health and other services. I estimate that the total of cash payments to the poor plus the value of actual services flowing to them from federal, state and local governments rose from $34 billion in 1964 to $40 billion in 1967. The Office of Economic Opportunity budget of under $2 billion a year is obviously only a small part of this increase. Large parts come from Medicare and Medicaid funds, federal aid to low-income school districts, vocational education and job training. Increased voluntary efforts have also been made by churches, associations of professionals, business leaders and the poor themselves. How well have such "service" programs worked?

One broad type of effort has been to equalize the access to community services. Police, courts, schools, welfare administrators, churches, libraries, hospitals and others have learned that they can do much to improve the quality of service to the poorest and least demanding of their clients. This instruction has been led by a new crop of specialists in the several professions dealing with the problem of the poor, who have learned to work with previously unidentified leaders of the poor. They have established new rights for the poor, new ways to enforce old rights, and have spread knowledge of such rights among the people. There can be no doubt that this campaign to equalize community services has improved the prospects that some poor persons will seize opportunities to escape from poverty.

It is also true, however, that some of the poor need not merely equal treatment but remedial or compensatory programs to overcome deficiencies of historic origin. If a child from a poor background is to be ready for school, he may need special Headstart training, special health care, even food. Some youngsters need a way to finance completion of high school or special training. The Neighborhood Youth Corps, Job Corps, and on-the-job training point the way. If we are to assure real equality of opportunity for higher education, those from poor families require the outreaching services of an Upward Bound Program.

We have found that such compensatory programs do assist many young people to get more out of school than they otherwise might. It is too early to know whether significant change in the rate of poverty reduction will result, but some early indications are that we must expect low benefits from such programs in relation to the amounts of money spent on them.

This push for equal and, more particularly, specialized services for the poor has produced a political backlash. The new alliance between experts and the poor themselves has rubbed hard against many in the lower middle class who customarily delivered such services. Many of the programs are short-lived and narrow of scope, and these limitations have created bitterness among those dropped from the programs, and those left out altogether. And the mere promise to spend more for the poorest than for those not quite so poor has aroused resentments of its own.

The most controversial of all the anti-poverty activities during the last four years has been the effort to achieve, according to the mandate of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, "maximum feasible participation of the poor" in "community action." It is charged that this rhetoric has encouraged militant protest; and many people have associated it with the riots of 1967 and 1968. But the character and timing of those civil disorders were such that they could not have been due solely, or even mainly, to this approach. Very little community action is actually involved in "organizing the poor."

One may agree to all that and yet subscribe to Daniel P. Moynihan's assertion in Commentary (August) that it is destructive to teach the poor that their salvation is assured if they will only organize to knock down the "walls" that bar them from "opportunity." One may also agree that organization of the poor has not always been directed to the attainment of the equal and special rights referred to above. In certain cases, such organization has drawn the poor into a general struggle against City Hall, or "the system," without any assurance that it will advance the cause of the poor. Some who advocate organization of the poor are, indeed, less concerned with poverty than with exploiting the energies of the poor in visionary efforts to transform the larger society and usher in a new social order. But for all that, community action has been responsible for numerous advances in many specific areas; and participation by an organized community of the poor may be a necessary condition to successful prosecution of the poverty war. It is not sufficient, however, for rapid progress. It can take the poor only so far.

Those involved in the scattered and diverse community action projects have made one great discovery; while poverty has many facets, it has a central core—lack of money. Perhaps it was not unpredictable that the specialists on the problems of the poor would become advocates of general as well as specific remedies—since the problems in one field (schools) often relate to problems in other fields (housing or health). These problems stem in turn from the basic matter of income, which can come only from jobs or income maintenance programs. Community actionists have gradually come to see that, as Michael Harrington put it in Saturday Review (July 27), "There is no simple, or even bloody, way to abolish poverty." He believes that the power to force the passage of sweeping federal legislation, which he thinks necessary, will come from a new political majority, or not at all.

So it is, then, that the war on poverty has raised up prophets who call for ultimate weapons. It is interesting that the 1964 declaration by President Johnson was silent on both the topics—jobs and income maintenance—singled out by the Poor People's March. These demands have been sloganeered as "government as employer of last resort" and "guaranteed minimum income." Even partial response to either demand would imply a significant escalation of the war on poverty; and President Johnson last January named a commission, headed by Ben W. Heineman, to study these and other radical proposals. Several other commissions, notably the Advisory Council on Public Assistance, the Commission on Automation and Technology, and the (Kerner) Commission on Civil Disorders, have called for action on the "jobs and income" fronts, but none of them has considered the options in detail.

Such demands for job and income guarantees have led many to observe that the country could abolish poverty with one blow at the cost of the $10 billion poverty income gap, and that we are not doing so because of a failure of national will. It is doubtful that it could be completely done at twice the price.

Consider the idea of job creation by government. Most of the poor, aside from the aged, disabled, and women with small children at home, are employed most of the time. And most of the people who are unemployed for any one time are not poor. This means that there is likely to be a serious discrepancy between the number of hard-core unemployed who are poor, and those who would like to have a government job with regularity of employment at minimum-wage rates.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

If a limited number of such jobs were carefully rationed out to those with the poorest employment prospects, that would create a gross inequity between those who get such jobs and the 10 million who continue on their present jobs at less than the minimum wage. To avoid such inequities, and to strike a really major blow at poverty, the program would have to be on a scale of several million jobs. At $4,000 per job, even 2 million jobs would cost $8 billion. Moreover, what are the long-run prospects for maintaining high morale with such an operation? What would do about the fact that a flat annual wage might exceed the poverty line for a small family, but fall short of it for a large family?

The latter consideration points toward an assured minimum income with a guarantee equal to the poverty line for each family size. But such a straightforward plan to fill each family's poverty-income gap would surely cost much more than the existing nation-wide gap of $10 billion. It is wide open to the abuse that many of those with earnings and property incomes of less than the poverty line, and some of those just above the line, would find it not worth their time to strive for earned income if it were completely offset by a reduction in their guaranteed income. This means that the plan would cost at least $20 billion—plus what we now spend on assistance.

It is worth repeating that most of the poor are now working most of the time. This strongly urges that any guaranteed income plan must build in some incentives to work and save. The person who adds to his earned income must be assured that he will not have that addition fully offset by a reduction in his benefit. But such a feature adds to the cost by making many more people eligible for benefits. A guarantee as high as the poverty line, together with a 50 per cent offset for earned income, would make almost 40 per cent of the population eligible for some benefits—and would cost about $25 billion.

The only way to avoid this huge cost is to cut the level of the guarantee. But to cut it very much will not only take it below the poverty line but also below assistance levels in many of the high-income states. Let us accept, for the moment, the idea that a moderate-cost guaranteed-income plan will not replace public assistance, which is now received by 9 million people. We are still left with the question: what will it do for the 17 million who are not on assistance—the working poor?

The answer is that it could do a great deal at relatively low cost, and without encouraging them to do less work. This can be accomplished by setting a low guarantee (say $750 for a family of four) and allow the family to keep it without any offset for the first $1,500 of earnings. The benefit would then be diminished by 50c for each dollar of additional earnings, until the benefit cancels out at $3,000. Such a plan would fill half the poverty income gap for most working poor families, and would do so for a total cost of about $4 billion.

Alternatives to government jobs and guaranteed income abound—government subsidy to private jobs, a children's allowance, increased benefits and easier eligibility under existing social insurance and public assistance programs. But concerning all these options there is no apparent consensus among the experts as to which should have priority, or how new money should be allocated.

EBB TIDE OF INTEGRATION

BARNEY SELLERS

Mr. Sellers, a director in Washington of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, was formerly special assistant to the director of the Office for Civil Rights in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 were the high-water marks of a liberal effort to achieve social change through protective, remedial legislation. A notably unpopular war Administration has been responsible for seeing civil rights enforcement through its first years, but the era appears to be coming to an end. In a time when law and order is an increasingly loud cry from a white majority, law enforcement for minorities may go to the wall. The incoming Republicans seem of that opinion, and many liberals are abandoning the camp. Strangely enough, a last-minute about-face by the outgoing Administration may be contributing to the destruction.

The Presidential campaign gave clues of what we can expect. It inflamed racial sores and played upon popular misconceptions about federal interventions in school desegregation. Richard Nixon tried to appeal to segregationist voters in the South without sounding like a racist. In a panicky response to the late Humphrey upsurge, he made last-minute televised appeals for Wallace votes. During a discussion of desegregation enforcement under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, he announced his refusal "to use the withholding power to bring about enforced integration." In doing so, and by his promises to slow down federal school desegregation efforts, he won the White House with a Dixiecrat shadow.

The campaign will contribute to future troubles because it continued the distortion of major racial issues. For the most part, public misconceptions glaringly played upon by Wallace were quietly, though sometimes ignorantly, picked up by the Republicans. "Freedom of choice" school desegregation plans, in most cases subterfuges for the maintenance of segregation, were in the public eye. Nixon at first announced support of this student assignment pro-

We have had numerous studies but no consensus among experts, let alone political leaders, concerning new proposals for special jobs created for the poor, and variations of guaranteed incomes. It is not, then, a mere lack of will which prevents our eliminating poverty at one blow. There is a matter of substantial and uncertain cost, coupled with a lack of agreement concerning the most advantageous way to proceed.

We have, however, made some progress in at least getting these calculations and considerations on the national agenda. In the meantime, it is important to maintain the momentum of the last four years on the health, education, welfare, housing, labor and other fronts. They are all essential to victory.

cedure and objected to federal withholding of funds for plans which don't produce results. Afterward, outside the South, Nixon expressed his basic support of the 1954 Brown school desegregation decision, which "freedom of choice" is being used to evade, but insisted "the law does not require compulsory integration." But it does. In its May, 1968, Green case, the Supreme Court found that where free choice plans fail, school systems must "come forward with a plan that promises realistically to work, and promises realistically to work now."

The campaign touched on several other issues, one of them being the false, but emotional, issue of busing. Even though 90 per cent of all districts in the nation now deploy 230,000 buses to transport 17 million children, the procedure was declared irrelevant to desegregation, supposedly because it is rarely used. Withholding of federal aid was also questioned and its extent exaggerated. Contrary to campaign-made impressions, Washington has cut off money to only 120 school systems in the South, about 2 per cent of the total, and far fewer than are violating the law. Nixon echoed Wallace's colorful but wildly misleading picture of federal intervention in local school affairs. While Wallace unhesitatingly spoke of "throwing the brief-case totin' bureaucrats into the Potomac," Nixon theorized about returning educational functions to the states. These promises were made even though nine of every ten federal employees work outside Washington, and spend most of their time handing out federal benefits. Of 800 HEW employees in the South, for example, about fifty work on school desegregation. That's one bureaucrat for every 100 school districts.

While the campaign thus raised serious doubts about Republican intentions to enforce the law, other political considerations may push the new administration toward the same end. Although Nixon failed to capture the Deep South, he picked up most of the border states and is mindful of the key Southern committee chairmen who must support his programs, especially in military and financial affairs. An administration which has already voiced its intention to increase military expenditures as a secure base for a foreign policy, and to attack urban problems by changing the tax laws for private capital, is unlikely to buck John Stennis, Richard Russell, Mendel Rivers (who campaigned for Wallace) and Wilbur Mills. Furthermore, Republican gains and near misses in the South promise an administration that must also grant favors to its Southern colleagues in Congress. Edward Gurney from Florida won a Republican seat in the Senate as a segregationist conservative. John Tower of Texas comes from a divided state which failed to go to Nixon by only 1 per cent of the vote, and where the Republican candidate for governor lost by less than 2 per cent. Strom Thurmond, hailed at the Miami convention as the voice of Dixie, came through by delivering South Carolina, the only Nixon victory in the Deep South. The new House will seat thirty-five Republican Congressmen from Southern and border states. Since the GOP is seeking desperately to be reborn in that region, it will be difficult for the administration to ignore the pleas of its legislative colleagues for a relaxation of federal desegregation pressure.

And the particular interests of the Republican Party may not be far from the temper of Congress at large. In the closing weeks of the 90th Congress, the House came within eight votes of accepting the distorted arguments of segregationist Jamie Whitten of Mississippi and supporting an amendment which would have legalized free-choice school desegregation plans, thus thwarting the Supreme Court's Green pronouncement and setting enforcement efforts back to the "separate but equal" days. The closeness of the vote on that significant civil rights issue indicates a possible falling away of liberal Northern support. This is likely to increase, and is partial proof of Southern predictions that Northern support for civil rights would die as the issue came closer to home. The Southern desegregation program is starting to hit larger cities, like Charleston and Greensboro, and is finally beginning to scout Northern districts that are appropriate for enforcement action. Northern Congressmen are therefore not as conspicuous as they once were when key enforcement votes come to the floor. Southerners, knowing this, are encouraged to keep up their steady attack on federal programs until they can win with quiet Northern defection.

These tendencies may be abetted by a move the present Administration made during the last days of the campaign. HEW recommended consideration of a shift of its compliance activities to the Department of Justice. Ordinarily, such an administrative change should pass unnoticed, but this action, if carried out, could prove fatal to civil rights enforcement. HEW has weathered one too many civil rights storms and is acting instinctively to safeguard the other social legislation it has long fought for. The recent Whitten battle placed the Department's $18 billion budget in danger and last year there were similar threats to the billion-dollar Elementary and Secondary Education Act.

A number of questions can be raised about the proposed move to Justice. First, it recalls painfully the demise of the President's Council on Equal Opportunity, a short-lived agency headed by the Vice President, which was suddenly killed after eight months as a dynamic leader of federal civil rights activity. Its broad functions were pared and the remainder—compliance under Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—was transferred to Justice, with a "coordination" mandate. The vigor of that past leadership has since dried up in the limitations of the amorphous coordination order issued to a conservative federal agency that is concerned entirely with litigation. With Nixon promising even greater conservatism through the naming of a new Attorney General, there is little likelihood of improvement.

If the transfer goes through, there is even some thought that the shift might be broadened to include the remaining twenty federal agencies with Title VI duties. To date, the leadership Justice has shown other agencies has been limited largely to situations that fit into its own interests. The shift of school desegregation powers would conflict with present Justice priorities, since fair employment is now the top Justice preoccupation. In addition, past Justice experience has been confined entirely to litigation. It has no practice with Title VI administrative hearings, the technique that HEW has used to obtain compliance. The court route would be impeded by the small staff available to Justice, its innate concern with the attitudes of Southern district judges who still can't accept desegregation and the delays inherent in judicial appeal, which could affect the government's ability to enforce change before the opening of each school year. The transfer of staff from HEW would raise the hackles of Congressmen who have fought to decentralize the program into regional offices—a setup which Justice does not have. In addition, federal enforcement of civil rights would become one fat target for Congressional attack instead of the diffuse picture it now is—a happy opportunity for Richard Russell, new chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, and James Eastland, chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Pat Fink

"In This Neighborhood We Ain't Got No White Knights Ridin' up on White Chargers—We Got Black Panthers Ridin' off in Black Marias."

Most important, if the shift did mean return to the court route, it would yield less desegregation. The latest figures available from HEW show that school districts under court order have desegregated their Negro students only half as fast as the already slow-moving systems under administrative plans.

In the end, however, the coffin of enforcement may be nailed down by those who up to now have supported its life. First, liberals and Black Power advocates are ignoring the issue. In part, this indifference arises from a growing eagerness to disparage enforcement as a means of social change. "It isn't the answer any more," several have told me with reference to the growing complexities of urban issues. To a degree, they are right—because it never was the answer but only one tool. What they are complaining about is the failure of legislation they helped pass four years ago to solve all the nation's ills, as was then promised.

Second, enforcement is to liberal intellectuals an old, unsophisticated, and therefore distasteful approach to the solution of social problems. They can mentally enjoy the complexities of the urban crisis, and continually seek, support, and join the avant garde of liberal social debate. Enforcement doesn't fit their mood.

Third, there is a Northern blind spot in most discussions of national urban issues which ignores Southern problems. While attention is often paid to the effects of black Southern migration, little is done to counteract it. Finally, Southern liberals, most recently the Southern Regional Council, are properly concerned that enforcement simply hasn't achieved its goal—85 per cent of all black children in the South still attend segregated schools (we don't know the Northern figure). True, there is no answer to this. But true or not, it's more progress than we've had elsewhere.

White liberal feelings about enforcement also merge with new black feelings about separatism. The black militant refusal to support integration is being picked up by those whites who have lost the will to fight for it where it is still possible. In many Southern cities, for example, growing segregation can still be fought through legal means because the original forced separation provides a path for constitutional attack. While there is no certainty to this approach, there is hope. But if white officials can use Northern separatist arguments to stifle it, Southern chances for change will die completely.

Enforcement is not the answer to our racial and urban ills, but it would be foolish to ignore its use as a tool in a sophisticated strategy for change which considers, among other things, differences in region and community size. About 95 per cent of the black children in the Gary, Ind., elementary schools are in predominantly black schools: the same is true of Little Rock, Ark. In both cities the schools are substantially unequal. If enforcement can do anything to help any child in either of these cities, without impairing the effectiveness of other efforts at change, it should not be abandoned—by Republicans or anyone else. We owe it to the children. And that's where it all began.

LETTERS (Continued from page 610)

change. In reply to his argument I will take a few liberties with history and unfold a parable. The quotes are from Mr. Mishan.

"This new and wiser society will be wealthy enough, I assume, to finance their [the scientists'] activity for some time. . . ."

Once upon a time there was a wealthy, leisured society, in which kings and princes kept astronomers as pets. The only task these astronomers had to perform was to cast an occasional horoscope, advising as to the general favor of the stars, or about the moment most propitious to conceive an heir, etc. In return for this service astronomers had much free time and money. One such astronomer, B, spent his time and money in his observatory, improving his instruments and collecting very accurate data. Nobody at court paid attention to this data. . . .

"... and to allay their craving for recognition by the provision of prizes and titles."

B's first patron gave him plenty of subsidy to publish his books, which he printed himself (vanity of vanities). They were nothing but tables of data and descriptions of instruments, of no immediate use to society. Still, when B's patron died, these books did help him to find another sponsor. So B moved to another court in another country, where for a little while life went on as before. . . .

"All their contributions to knowledge would be faithfully recorded for the admiration of their colleagues and for the wonder of future generations."

In his second place of employment B had met and worked with another astronomer, young K, who wasn't so much interested in data as in lofty speculation and mystical rhapsodizing about the nature of the universe. He also was said to cast very good horoscopes, and probably helped B in his tasks at court. After B died, K inherited all his data. In his spare time, over a period of about ten years, K fiddled with this data just to satisfy his mystical cravings for order in the universe. But when he announced his results in a letter to another of these pet scientists, one G, G did not admire but rather laughed at his mystical ravings and never read K's book.

"Applications of any of their discoveries would, however, be strictly forbidden."

Later, in 1616, the authorities made their first move. They finally realized that scientific speculations about the nature of the universe were subversive of the status quo. They suppressed Johannes Kepler's works—and Kepler had used Tycho Brahe's data as the indispensable basis for his calculations—as well as those of Galileo. They might have justified their action somewhat as follows:

"History will not stop. The human drama will continue to unfold. Music, art, literature, politics—and theology—will, we hope, flourish. Only ideological change as a consequence of scientific innovation will be a thing of the past."

But the most efficient "thought police" of the 17th century could not stop scientific theory from having a revolutionary effect upon human life. I suggest that the solutions to social problems raised today by the advance of science and technology will not be found that way either.

Theo J. Kalikow

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Great National Trial As History

THE MOONEY CASE. By Richard H. Frost. Stanford University Press. 563 pp. $12.50.

FRAME-UP: The Incredible Case of Tom Mooney and Warren Billings. By Curt Gentry. W. W. Norton & Co. 496 pp. $7.50.

CHRISTOPHER D. STONE

Mr. Stone is associate professor of law at the University of Southern California Law Center.

At six minutes after two o'clock on the afternoon of July 22, 1916, a bomb exploded along the route of a Preparedness Day Parade in San Francisco. Ten persons were killed and another forty injured. Within the next few days, the San Francisco police arrested a number of union agitators including, most memorably, Tom Mooney and Warren Billings. They were tried, convicted and ultimately sentenced to life imprisonment.

For more than two decades, Mooney and Billings remained in prison while friends and lawyers tested the capacities of America's institutions—from its public rallies to its courts, investigative commissions, governors and Presidents—to right what was possibly a grievous wrong. The trials had been conducted in, and were themselves to contribute to, a period of tumultuous national disorders. Charges that Mooney and Billings were pawns in a Bolshevik plot were soon paired off against theories that the police and prosecutors had been intent on framing Mooney and Billings, that Mexican patriots had planted the bomb, and that agents of the Kaiser had done it to foster disunity. Newspapers and pamphleteers set up a trade in fresh evidence, most significantly suggestions (buttressed in some instances by confessions) that crucial witnesses against the defendants had perjured themselves, quite possibly with the encouragement—at least—of District Attorney Fickert's office. In this atmosphere the proceedings assumed national and then even international significance.

Governor Olson freed Mooney and Billings in 1939, but the literature of the Mooney affair rolls on, still showing unflagging preoccupation with a seemingly fixed constellation of questions. The prosecution had stated, for example, that Mooney and Billings had planted the bomb at Market and Stewart Streets at about 1:50 P.M. The defense was able to obtain photographs of the parade made by an amateur from a rooftop some thirteen blocks from the explosion scene. Was it not Mooney and his wife who appeared in the foreground of the pictures? And did an enlargement of a clock face in the background of the photographs not show the hands of the clock at 1:58? How could Mooney have set the bomb at Market and Stewart Streets no earlier than 1:40, and by 1:58 have made his way through heavy parade traffic back to his rooftop reviewing stand thirteen blocks away? And what about the witnesses at the scene of the explosion who claimed to have seen a cylindrical object fall from the roof of a building only an instant before the flash? And how explain that one prosecution witness described Billings (who was 5 ft. 4 in.) as 5 ft. 10 in., wearing a dark gray suit, and another as being 5 ft. 7 in. or 5 ft. 8 in. in a light brown suit?

And so on and so forth. We went through all that in the first years after Dallas. What do these authors expect to achieve by stirring over these questions yet twice more, a half-century after the "facts" are in, when the scattering of memoranda and the deaths of men and memories have so hobbled judgment? Surely not to finally settle "what happened." What justifies our tilting so persistently at some questions of history long after we have judiciously surrendered up the hope of conquering others?

Unless the author answers these questions, he will not succeed in making history of the Mooney affair precisely because the story—like that of Sacco and Vanzetti, the Rosenbergs, Dreyfus and Hiss—can be exploited so fascinatingly without his turning out a really intellectually aspiring job. Two reasons for this fascination ought to be confronted.

For one, somewhere deep in our mental lives we are all living out the ordeal of a Vanzetti innocent, or a Dreyfus innocent, each of us held, like a loathsome insect over the fire of a wrathful prosecutor-state. There is an appetite for books that can succeed in confirming our fantasies because they feed and justify that part of ourselves which we are continuously constrained to keep hidden.

For another thing, such books readily (though, again, perhaps unintentionally) find themselves exploiting a sheerly aesthetic dimension. We study the characters and other bits of evidence that are strewn about the picture. We work the fragments into a whole, a unity in which dynamic tensions have been eliminated and, hence, everything is explained; then, someone draws our attention to an aspect of the picture we had not duly considered before—a shadow on a grassy knoll, the handwriting on a letter to the German Military Attaché, the hands on a fortuitously photographed clock—and then the picture loses its wholeness, falls away into parts once more incongruous, dissonant, unexplained. No matter; something deep in us wants to puzzle these things over anew, for in reorganizing the meaning of the pieces and energies we are creating something, reliving the act not as it was but as ourselves the artists make it, all the while discovering and testing our own senses of life.

By playing upon these tendencies, an author can make of a Mooney affair a work that grips our attention as does Kafka's The Trial, or Antonioni's Blow-Up. But from one who deals with "real" facts, we can demand something more (as well as something less) than we expect of literature. Not a search as narrow and unspiraling (and, for that matter, as naive and futile) as to establish whether Mooney was guilty or innocent, or even whether he was accorded a fair trial. A historian's task involves more mind, a looking through events to bring into focus the underlying rhythms of social and individual processes and perceptions.

At the least, what ought to be brought out of the Mooney affair is the interplay between great national trials and political action. We are told in Mr. Frost's painstaking book that the Chicago Federation of Labor rallied to support Mooney; a more seminal question is, how did Mooney (that is, the affair) bring support to the Chicago Federation of Labor? Do causes célèbres bring new members into activist causes? Or is there merely a shifting and spreading of affiliations so that, e.g., supporters of the Rosenbergs move over into support of a contender of HUAC, with no net increase in radical activists? And one looks to a historian to discover not merely where the individual members of defense groups go but what happens to the power structure of the ad hoc defense groups as particular causes fade: do they disband—or are they such that new causes expand to fill them?

The effect of the great national trial in promoting social change may then turn out, on conscientious historical inspection, to be far less positive than hasty appearances might have it. For one thing, there is always a tendency for the various protests and rallies that build up around the trials to focus on imagined injustices of the judicial procedure rather than, as the Mooney activists would originally have preferred, on a broader spectrum of "class-warfare" grievances. The Spock trial may afford us a contemporary example of how the trial process can turn dissenters' energies aside if the rubric of the law—did Spock get a "fair trial"?—overwhelms the rubric of political action.

Not only may the great national trial make it difficult for social protests to maintain their original direction; there is also inherent in them a capacity for abating the tensions of the original confrontations, making the crisis appear less serious, and thus serving to suspend or impede meaningful social action.

This capacity stems from a fundamental ambivalence in popular reactions. The trials would seem, on the surface, to force individuals and groups to take serious stock of their positions. The society is afflicted with unrests, vaguely attributable. Then, suddenly, the law provides us with a suit. Now, there are symbolic champions and now we can see more clearly than before what it was: it was the Jews, or it was the anti-Semites, or it was the intellectuals, or it was the "pigs," those who loved children, or those who wanted to burn children, the railroad interests or the worker. The law, with its demands for a solution in either-or terms of guilt or innocence, lends itself to an art form that resembles, in many respects, the medieval passion play. The virtues and faults of the characters are writ so large and clear as would seem to force each man to make a moral choice that was avoidable so long as the issues had remained ill-defined, and therefore debatable.

But the consequences on the audience are not so simple. Dramatized through law, the original moral dilemma has been made too unreal, too caricatured, to serve as a drive to earnest and productive ethical inquiry and action. Indeed, that is probably a strong reason why the dramatization through law is so satisfying. Each individual is given an opportunity to cast his own conflicts of conscience out of himself, making of Spock or Dreyfus the one who will act out not only the physical hardships of confrontation but the moral hardships as well.

Then, too, just as the great national trial is drama, so also is it play. There are players and super-players, rules that we can learn; progress that we can follow; robes and roles and standard moves; and, of course we can—as with drama—both be involved and yet not really involved. Thus a substantial portion of the human endeavors that are built up, however serious they may be in form, are susceptible to be drawn into the service of the play element in man, Huizinga's homo ludens.

There is reason then to demand that these authors help us establish how much the great national trial spurs individuals and organizations to socially productive action, and to what extent the tumult is but a choosing up, a decision to be "on the side of" Mooney, or "on the side of" Fickert. This would not imply that great national trials are of no political consequence; on the contrary it may mean that the state, with the power to select the time and place of these events, has large political power, but not so much through the implied threats of the trials as through their capacity to absorb and divert energies, to turn issues, and to spread an illusion that "now we are having it out."

To study the Mooney affair is inevitably to study the rank the society accords to reason—that is, to the capacity of the society's institutions, primarily its courts, to confront urgently expressed demands for action with the claims of deeper principles. Both Mr. Gentry's book and Mr. Frost's book (the latter the less sensational and more scholarly of the two) keep this significance before the reader's mind.

Yet one may wonder whether the great national trial does not test something more about the judiciary than its capacity to maintain integrity in the face of high passions.

The nation, during the period of the Mooney affair, was as insane as a person who, in the face of a sudden onrush of terrifying new hopes and chaos, has simply lost the ability to tie together his identity, his purposes, and what it is that he is experiencing. Such a state signals a retreat inward that does not allow the exploring of new possibilities. Hence, protests that are constructive are perceived as threatening. Encroachments on freedom of thought and action are symbolized as liberating. Propositions that the society was once, in its abundance, willing to submit to testing, are now closeted beyond review.

This was the era of the Palmer raids, and the jailing of Debs, of dynamite packages shipped through the parcel post, of shattered windows in German-American shops. In Los Angeles, the producer of a film, The Spirit of '76, was sentenced to ten years in federal prison on the theory that he had cast an im-

DEATH

is patiently
making my mask as I sleep.

Each morning I awake to discover in the corners of my eyes
the small tears of his wax.

PHILIP DOW

portant ally in our war effort in an unfavorable light. In Montana, an organizer named Starr refused, in the face of an angry mob, to kiss an American flag. ("What is this thing anyway? Nothing but a piece of cotton with a little paint on it and some marks in the corner there.") When the mob had left him, beaten and bloody, he was given ten to twenty years for using language "calculated to bring the flag into contempt and disrepute."

While both books allude to contemporary derangements, their focus is primarily on the defendants. Their authors parade out evidence of the society's "bad nerves" only so far as is necessary to increase the credibility of their thesis that the judicial system failed Mooney and Billings. To evaluate how seriously the judicial system failed the nation calls for more digging and a broader focus.

It takes, first, an awareness that the task of securing national sanity—ordinarily thought to lie in the provinces of literature and art, and perhaps journalism—can draw significantly from the courts as well. They are in a unique capacity to contribute, partly because they are not in phase with the same rhythm of turmoil that activates the issues brought before them. They are in a position to set up a dialogue with the society not only through their dispositions of cases and through the reasoning of their opinions (as in Brown v. Board) but through their decisions as to what issues are to be called for review at all, e.g., to hear argument on the legality of a war or only on the legality of jury-selection procedures.

In the light of this potential, one has the feeling—which someone with the patience of a historian might substantiate or refute—that there was for perhaps two decades a critical failure of the nation's court systems; and that, further, the whole of this failure was a failure greater than the sum of all its parts, that is, the failure to free Mooney, plus the failure to free Debs, plus the failure to free the producer of The Spirit of '76. It was a failure to draw the country into a reconsideration of values that transcended the felt necessities of that terrible summer. It thus appears an abdication of whatever influence courts have to lead toward morality, and to lead toward sanity.

What are the boundaries of this influence? Why have the courts remained so reluctant to use it? How much should the judiciary look beyond the immediate parties before it? How much of the courts' function should be that of cultural psychoanalyst? All these are questions we should see weighed by the historian of the great national trial of Mooney's day and ours.

Repeat Performance

MIAMI AND THE SIEGE OF CHICAGO: An Informal History of the Republican and Democratic Conventions of 1968. By Norman Mailer. World Publishing Co. 223 pp. $5.95. Signet Books. Paper 95c.

ALAN TRACHTENBERG

Mr. Trachtenberg, author of Brooklyn Bridge: Fact and Symbol, is currently a fellow of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences at Stanford University.

Politics did not, however, so much engage him as to withhold his thoughts from things of more importance.

Samuel Johnson
on George Lyttleton

Norman Mailer presents himself once more as a witness of our times, but the performance does not stand up to expectations. In his recent fiction and journalism Mailer has sharpened his language into an instrument impressively plastic and versatile; his powers of representation and emotional statement are formidable. Writing about the national conventions in the early 1960s, he emerged unexpectedly as a political journalist, and since then national politics, especially the "politics of confrontation," has absorbed much of his attention. In the essays on the Goldwater, Kennedy and Johnson nominations, and the Pentagon demonstration of October, 1967, Mailer combined the resources of fiction and reporting to create an authentic personal manner, with himself at the center of the account as the engaged, embattled witness, both participant and observer.

Miami and the Siege of Chicago employs many of the devices of the Pentagon work, The Armies of the Night, and has many passages of Mailer's indisputable genius. But the book does not measure up to its predecessor. Produced in haste immediately after the event—"only two weeks in which to do it, if his article were to appear before election"—the book is, not the best Mailer can give us; it is the work of a tired and oppressed imagination. Part of the fault must lie in the nature of the assignment, which exploits Mailer's role as "hot" political observer. Mailer is called upon to repeat himself, to play for an anticipated mass audience, as if to complete the media event: first the assembling of the conventions, the congregation of delegates, faces scanned by close-up cameras, "types" depicting ideologies and interests, varieties of boredom; then the process of nomination, its air of intrigue, of pay-off and purchase, set against scenes of grotesque opulence and brawling violence; then Mailer on the scene. One detects a pattern, a formula devised somewhere else than the writer's own imagination.

The book, in short, seems to lack an inner necessity. Many of the descriptions and portraits are worth having, but very little is added by way of insight, let alone wisdom, regarding these two critical conventions and what they reveal about American political life. Virtually all the metaphors are familiar to Mailer's readers, the images of cancer, intestinal disorders, cannibalism, plastic architecture, technology land, and they fail to harvest any new meanings. The format or scenario continues with encounters with the famous and the notorious, fear and timidity washed away in drinking, rising combativeness, platforms, microphones, cheers, confrontations with police and military, fantasies of heroism together with twinges of remorse over private failures.

During much of the book Mailer, cast in the third person as "the reporter," is depressed, weary, frightened, avoiding action rather than searching it out. These feelings are understandable in the face of the sodden details of the conventions, the sense of crisis only tenuously held at bay by expensive Miami parties, or the new Nixon "sincerity" or the blind piggishness of the prevailing powers in Chicago. But oppression and fear are part of the book's atmosphere as well as explicit admissions; the joints and muscles of the words themselves, their attachment to one another and to the world they evoke, seem unaccountably stiff. The words betray a gnawing presence of feeling unformulated, a something nibbling at the far edge of consciousness; perhaps, as Mailer writes at one point, "the possibility of succumbing to fears larger than himself."

Does the problem lie, at least in part, in the fact that self-imitation was the fearful price Mailer had to pay for this book? The new book is an encore without the passion or fun, the controlled distance between player and role. By the sheer force of repetition, roles taken over by media culture become headlocks on the imagination. In The American Dream and Why Are We in Vietnam? Mailer showed he was able, brilliantly and persuasively, to mimic the voices and styles of mass culture, to separate the banal from the genuine, and to salvage from debasement a valuable core of dream and hope and energy. But in the current work, has he permitted himself to become a media extension?

Thanks to TV and mass-circulation magazines, politics is a major feature of popular culture. Nominating conventions have some of the characteristics of popular drama, accentuated by TV coverage which "stages" them in a format calculated to place the actors (including the commentators, the chorus) in a uniquely immediate relation with a live (if not living) audience. The value of engaging novelists as reporters lies in their expanded and enlightened treatment of politics as symptomatic of deeper human and cultural issues. But any marriage of serious art and popular or mass culture

When a man is rich enough to do anything, what does he do —
and why does he do it?

THE RICH

ARE THEY DIFFERENT?

by George G. Kirstein

"An intelligent, shrewdly written book explaining how the rich are truly different from other people. He doesn't knock the rich, and he can be amusing at their expense without the usual jealous spite . . . he tells it how it is."

— MARIO PUZO, Book World

"Perhaps the sanest study of the rich and the very rich yet to appear."

— DAVID CORT, N.Y. Times

At your bookstore • $5.95
HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY

runs certain risks, one of which is that the novelist will become just another feature of the scene, of it rather than apart from it, at best an ironic apurtenance allowing certain media to confirm their "sophistication" by transforming the popular event into a "Pop" happening. Esquire's unleashing of such insightful political sachems as Terry Southern, William Burroughs and Genet on the Chicago scene is an example.

I hardly mean to say there is no place for serious writers in the mass media; to the contrary, the future of culture may very well depend on collaboration between the "serious" and the "popular." But some vigilance seems in order. Mailer's best audience is not the group which begs for a performance or a "Pop" hero, nor those (whoever they might be) who look to him as general of the troops. I'm not sure it is even the young people in Chicago who cheered him with cries, "Write! Write! . . . You're right, baby, do the writing!" If an old-timer like Samuel Johnson can still get a review in, his comment which heads this review might also be taken as pertinent.

distance between the author and his supernatural material. Thus one infers that the palpable presence of a theological evil on earth is what creates the living dead.

Or, take a story like "The Warehouse," which applies modern corporate conditions to a collection of souls waiting for bodies in the other world. The strength of the irony here comes precisely from the strength of the belief. The point being that Singer need not believe in a literal warehouse of souls—but, for his kind of stories to be as successful as they are, it is essential that he believe in the immortality of the soul. "The Dead Fiddler" is a completely convincing story of a dybbuk taking control of a lovely young girl. Again, Singer may not believe in actual dybbuks—though I rather suspect he does—but he does treat the spirit as substance and not poetic image.

Of course there are many stories in this book which also run in the vein of straight naturalism, rich with sharp social observation and humor. "The Needle" is the quintessential mother-in-law story, describing some very funny stratagems a rich woman employs to find the best wife for her son. (Incidentally, I heard Singer read it at the YMHA and he presented it as if he were telling a story he'd just heard about a local wily old woman. But he read his mad, impressionistic tales of the supernatural with the same easy familiarity.) "The Brooch" is a perhaps too facile story about a thief who is a good family man and is shattered when he discovers that his wife has learned his trade.

One of the longer stories in the book is called "The Letter Writer." It is also one of the more recent ones—and one of the few that deal with modern America. (Singer is apparently sensitive about this. In a prefatory note he writes: "I am glad that three of the stories . . . deal with events in the United States or Canada." Obviously he is tired of being tagged as the sage of 19th-century Poland.) "The Letter Writer" is a beautiful, atypical story about a refugee engulfed in loneliness and futility on the upper West Side of New York. It has a touch of Malamud and Bellow in it. It would seem on the surface to be a skeptical, sad study of the losses inflicted by age and tragedy. Yet the hero, Herman Gombiner, is prey to dreams that are more like visions, and when a strange woman comes to take care of him and perhaps end his loneliness, she does so because her dead grandmother spoke to her in a dream. "The Letter Writer" is one of Singer's most extraordinary achievements, as good as or better than "The Spinoza of Market Street" or "Gimpel the Fool." The interweaving of

A Plague and a Pleasure

THE SEANCE. By Isaac Bashevis Singer. Translated by Alizah Shevrin. Elizabeth Shub. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 276 pp. $5.95.

DANIEL STERN

Mr. Stern is a novelist and critic whose most recent book is The Suicide Academy (McGraw-Hill).

Isaac Bashevis Singer is a plague and a pleasure to most serious readers and critics of fiction. He is a pleasure because he writes with all the felicity of a 19th-century master—and a plague because no one knows where to place him. He is, on the one hand a Yiddish writer—an exponent of a dying language (though he recently said, in an interview: "Listen, young man, between dying and dead is a lot of difference"). On the other hand he is full of such modern nuances as irony, the macabre and symbolism. On the one hand he is a chronicler of a certain very special time and place: Polish Jewry and the shtetl life in the middle-to-late 19th century (with the exception of The Slave which takes place much earlier, during the scourge of Chmielnicki). And on the other hand he is a writer of universals: love, eroticism, passion, God. What to make of him?

Of late a certain querulousness has crept into the comments about Singer's work. At first I put it down to the fact that he was now no longer a minor classic, the property of a few hip mavens—but the property of the front page of The New York Times Book Review, the book clubs. And, starting with The Slave, he has made the bestseller lists. But the trouble lies deeper than such pettiness. Singer is easy to handle if you take his devils, his dybbuks, his saints, his elves as metaphors; mere material designed to illuminate larger symbolic matters. But, I maintain, no one will truly understand the special nature of Singer's genius until they realize that he is separated from us by more than the gulf of tradition dividing the old Polish Jew and the modern secular reader. The truth is Singer believes in God, in dybbuks, in magic, in a life after death.

"Let metaphor be God now Gods are metaphors," W. H. Gass has written. But what if God is not a metaphor? In one sense it is Singer's eroticism that has misled us. Only in this parochial age and this Protestant country could eroticism and religion appear to cancel each other out. In Singer—as in Judaism—God is as real as a woman's body. And if God and love-sex go hand in hand, cannot the devil and a wild, distorted eroticism also coexist?

In Singer's new book of stories, The Seance, all the elements of his previous work are present. And so is the very real presence of the supernatural. In "Two Corpses Go Dancing," one of the best of the stories, the narrator is the Devil. He tells us of his ability to raise the dead and send them back to roam among the living, not quite alive and not quite dead. Now, one can easily make metaphor out of this. Especially in light of the last lines: "The world is full of dead ones in sable capes and fur coats who carouse among the living. Maybe your wife, maybe your neighbor, maybe you yourself. . . ." Of course if Singer means that the spiritually empty are always with us, those who only partially live life, that is an authentic modern notion. But, going further, one finds in a story narrated by the Devil none of the usual

THE DEAD SAILOR

As he drowned he saw the ship following him like the shark of the world.

LEWIS TURCO

the daily urban life with that of the invisible worlds of heaven, the past, the imagination—all coalesce into the best work of a great writer.

The temper of our time is skeptical, ironic and unbelieving—in spite of a current tendency toward religious revival and mysticism. I think it is healthy for us to have Singer among us—with his real devils, his real God. William James wrote that it might be that what we call God may not be a finished process. "Something wild in the universe needs us and our works," he said. Among such needed works must be counted the tales of Isaac Bashevis Singer.

duality that no impresses the literary intellectual. A man who can live with equal ease with quantum mechanics and Eastern philosophy, two of the most abstruse subjects imaginable, must surely be an intellectual superman. Any faults of character must surely be due to an innocence of worldly ways, a kind of social virginity that goes well with theoretical physics and the Vedas. In only one instance is Oppenheimer criticized; when he agrees to drop the first bomb on Hiroshima instead of arranging a demonstration in Tokyo Bay. His motivation here is not made clear. Was he merely going along with Groves and the military, or did he decide that a drop on Hiroshima would, in the long run, not only save American as well as Japanese lives but would also provide the only credible demonstration to the world community of an apocalypse so terrible that nuclear weapons would never be used again?

The Dangerous Scientific Life

LAWRENCE AND OPPENHEIMER.
By Noel Pharr Davis. Simon & Schuster, 384 pp. $7.50.

ALEXANDER ZUCKER

Mr. Zucker is a nuclear physicist at the Oak Ridge National Laboratory.

Lawrence and Oppenheimer reads like a novel. In his effort to rivet the reader's interest and to maintain a fast pace, Davis frequently heightens the tone to make his story even more exciting. The two main characters appear, already formed, at the Berkeley campus of a university that is headed for greatness, where fate leads them, in Davis' account, to mortal conflict. This, then, is a story of their creative years—not biography, not history but more of a journalistic account of the major accomplishments of two famous scientists. Suspense is maintained by crosscutting the action abruptly from Lawrence's lab in Berkeley, to Oppenheimer's intellectual activities, to the scientific policy makers in Washington, and by the deft use of verbatim quotations, skillfully made to read like conversation. Hence the impression that one is reading fiction rather than history.

In many ways the book succeeds. It is generally accurate; and in view of the large amount of technical material Davis presents, this can only be the result of long and effective research. Not only the facts of scientific discovery are given. The author manages to convey as well the blind groping frequently involved in research. What is destined to be a commonplace concept, accessible to children, is an impenetrable mystery before it is realized by way of a search filled with high excitement, at the cost of entirely disproportionate amounts of physical and mental energy.

But the characterizations of both Lawrence and Oppenheimer are flat. The two eminent men possess few traits not related to their work or their eventual conflict; what motivates them remains obscure. What are the wellsprings of their ambition? What part of each man is sacrificed to science? The minor characters are even weaker. They have walked on parts: when a suitable quotation is required they are trotted out to deliver their lines and then quickly yanked into the wings. Each is given a thumbnail characterization: Fermi is a childlike genius; Alvarez, this year's Nobel Prize winner, is mean and destructively ambitious. Teller might have made his entry as a Hungarian csikos wearing a black ten-gallon hat: he is clearly villainous and his arrival on the scene calls for loud booing from the matinee audience. Groves, the army general in charge of the Manhattan Project, is an all-powerful father figure; he must be in command, yet he is unsure of himself because he does not understand his scientists or his own limitations.

Davis sees Lawrence as a slow-witted driver of men. He is exceptionally hardworking and determined. Once he has his mind made up nothing will induce him to leave a problem. Yet he does not seem really to understand what he is about. Time after time his students, his colleagues, or just plain luck, pull him back from the abyss of a monstrous blunder. Politically, Lawrence is described as neutral, but his friends are ultraconservative. In sum, he is a dull fool for his predestined opponent.

On the other hand, Davis' Oppenheimer is a brooding saint, a man of unquestionable brilliance, the foremost American theoretical physicist of his time who is also a devoted student of the Indian holy books. It is this astonishing

Davis' judgment of Lawrence and Oppenheimer deserves some critical examination. How, after all, do we decide the merits of a person as a scientist, or as a human being? In Lawrence's case, Davis' view is only partly correct. If Lawrence had been as doltish as he is described, he could certainly never have collected and inspired so creative a group as his students and his collaborators. No one is a keener judge of the worth of a professor than a graduate student in search of a thesis. So many of them sought out Lawrence. But there are other measures of the man. He envisioned and realized a big physics laboratory. He knew that big machines demand a different style of research, and that only big machines can uncover the secrets of atomic nuclei and the ephemeral elementary particles that were yet to come. It is because of Lawrence, more than any other single scientist, that we now have large physics laboratories throughout the world, and that we have uncovered many awesome wonders of the subnuclear world. No one knows

"THERE'S PURE GOLD IN 'FINIAN'S RAINBOW'! THRILLING SINGING, DELIGHTFUL ACTING! A FILM YOU'LL WANT TO SEE!"
L.I. Press

Finian's Rainbow

TECHNICOLOR® FINISHION®
WALKER BROS. SEVEN ARTS
BROADWAY
47th St.
757-5450
PENTHOUSE EAST THEATRE
SHOWS DAILY 10 A.M.-9 P.M. SUNDAY 12 NOON-9 P.M.

where it will lead, but it began with Lawrence.

It is easier to rehabilitate Lawrence from Davis' account than it is to know Oppenheimer. Oppenheimer appears to have been more complicated than the saint that emerges from Davis' book. He had faults of character: the most evident was his disdainful and often insulting intolerance of people who were not his intellectual equals. Though he was a superb and brilliant leader of the bomb project, and could grasp ideas as quickly as they were uttered, his impact on the future of physics was much smaller than Lawrence's. His special gift was as a teacher of outstanding students. There was a period between 1928 and 1932 when he was the fountainhead of theoretical physics in this country. Still his own contributions to physics were not extraordinary. It must have galled Oppenheimer that his greatest achievement was administrative. His legacy to the world is not only the bomb but also Los Alamos. This superb laboratory remains, twenty-five years after its inception, a monument to Oppenheimer; his spirit still fructifies it.

The requirements of fictional history demand characters and situations of sharp conflict. Here Davis misleads the reader by stretching each incident to create an impression of impending conflict between Lawrence and Oppenheimer, or by sharpening technical disagreements into personal vendettas. He illuminates the nuclear scene with a sharp light where shadows deepen and high spots glow. The actual landscape was not nearly so dramatic. For example, in the race to separate U235 there was competition between the electromagnetic process (Lawrence), and the diffusion process (Dunning). But even in retrospect it seems like a good idea to have tried both in parallel. After all, nothing was known with certainty, urgency was extreme in the face of a possible German bomb, and both systems were in the end productive. How could one have predicted which of two unknown technological tours de force would be more efficient in the end? As a matter of fact this question was not finally settled in favor of the diffusion process until 1950, five years after the bomb. There were heated discussions undoubtedly among the leaders of the Manhattan Project, and frequent disagreements. But the sharp personal clashes and lasting antagonisms that grew out of them are heightened by Davis, one suspects, for dramatic impact, to enthrall the reader rather than to inform him.

Oppenheimer's trial is the crux of the book. It is gripping to read even after all these years. One feels something ancient and almost primeval in the tale of the celebration of a hero, his downfall, his disgrace amidst shouts of treason, and his eventual rehabilitation. The world may remember Oppenheimer with Pericles.

An interesting question is raised by Davis: why did the Eisenhower administration decide to pursue the Oppenheimer affair? He gives three fascinating possible answers. First, it might have been pure revenge on the part of Lewis Strauss, who was publicly ridiculed and humiliated by Oppenheimer before a Congressional committee. Second, the trial was really an effort to spare Oppenheimer a far worse fate at the hands of Joseph McCarthy. And third, Oppenheimer was victimized as the result of a visceral response on the part of a conservative Establishment angry because it was felt that the United States had lost the lead in thermonuclear weapons. But the reader must wait for another author, and another book, to explore this intriguing question.

Playacting Theatre Critic

THEATRE NOTEBOOK: 1947-1967.
By Jan Kott. Translated from the Polish by Boleslaw Taborski. Doubleday & Co. 268 pp. $5.95.

HAROLD CLURMAN

Jan Kott is a theatre critic after my own heart. He discerns the play as a whole, the stage presentation as part of the total dramatic context. Still more important he believes that "a critic should first of all know, and sense, the points at which political and social events, tradition, history, and the present intersect with art. A critic's seat is actually located not in the third, or fifth, row of the orchestra, but in a public square." Beyond all this Kott is a personality. His Theatre Notebook ranges from the old and new theatre of Poland to Happenings in Edinburgh.

I began reading him with certain reservations, almost distrust. There is something in him of the intellectual playboy, an actor ready to assume any guise, perform any role. In these notebooks (a collection of little essays and reviews) as in his indispensable Shakespeare Our Contemporary I am inclined to refuse my whole assent not so much in regard to his opinions (most of which accord with mine) but in relation to his postures. He clownes a bit, plays the chameleon, flirts with too many divergent notions. I don't mean that he contradicts himself, which is inevitable and interesting, but that one suspects him at times, despite his erudition and common sense, of lacking seriousness.

For all that, in this, as in his earlier book, he ends by capturing me. He is lively: he seems to create the performance he describes. Theatregoing and writing about it is an adventure to him, a show in itself. It offers him the opportunity to do some of his own playacting. With the additional sparkle of the mirror he reflects what he sees on the stage. His appreciation of certain Polish actors (several of whom I have seen) makes one feel as if in the presence of those performers. He exaggerates—a common characteristic of effusive critics—but his exaggerations are rarely distortions because he is a keen observer.

Most of his pieces begin with a description of settings: not the settings of a play but of the town, the geographical, ethnic, social ambience in which the play has been seen. This is done with such relish, the traveler's delight in discovery, that one may fail to notice that the criticism of the play is sometimes hasty, summary and a little superficial. He will also choose a single trait in the event and make it appear to be the whole, trying to convince us, by piling one image or metaphor upon another, that what he has emphasized is nothing but the truth. This leads to a certain entrancing falsification.

The style is the man: it is extremely rapid, full of little leaps and bounds—always very clever—colorful flourishes, allusions to paintings and philosophies, bird's-eye views of places, hints of personal tastes in food or women. Thus some of what is said is soon forgotten; we do not come closer to the subject of inquiry but are rushed away from it. There is a brilliant levity in this which is perhaps light-minded. It is the reverse side of either a possible cynicism or pessimism, as if nothing were sufficiently important to be dwelt on. Kott is theatrical in both senses: exciting and slightly frivolous.

Yet my resistance always ends in enthusiasm. His very "errors" are illuminating: his "Shakespeare" is more paradox than profound, but it is salutary. To begin with, in his Notebook read the essay "Oedipus in Prose": it is first rate. In another piece he says: "In every performance of Greek tragedies that I have seen the Chorus has always been a disguised hantler"—which is why I prefer the handling of the Chorus in Schopenhauer's Dionysus in '69 to Cacoyannis' in Iphigenia. His formulations are often extremely revealing: "In Poland even a strip-tease act may have ideological overtones." He tells us significantly that the Theatre of the Absurd in Poland may be labeled a "political grotesque."

He is "mainly interested in life"—bravo!—which makes him superior to most theatre critics whose scope is no broader than the distance from the lobby to the typewriter. He began as a romantic youth, he was converted to Marxism; in contact with Paris, after the shock of Stalinism, he veered toward existentialism. Marks of all these influences are evident throughout his Notebook. These give his writing a tone if not always the weight of genuine substance.

He feels theatre in his every fiber; his senses stir. He is truly cultivated and generously informed. He possesses an alert mind, a cosmopolitan background, a canny spirit. We must follow him carefully to ascertain where he is merely being cute and where genuine. He is always arresting and fun; one of the finest theatre critics to be read in English.

Palefaces and Redskins

VIBRATIONS. By David Amram. The Macmillan Co. 469 pp. $6.95.

MUSIC AND PEOPLE. By Ned Rorem. George Braziller. 250 pp. $5.95.

RICHARD FREEDMAN

Mr. Freedman teaches at Simmons College. He has written for The Kenyon Review, Book World, Life and Saturday Review.

Philip Rahv's famous distinction between Palefaces and Redskins among American authors is equally valid for grouping our composers. Rorem and Amram, although they sound like some Dickensian law firm, are the most recent examples of Rahv's observation. Both are moderately young, moderately talented, but terribly American composers who feel a burning compulsion to express themselves in words as well as notes, perhaps because their notes have not attracted as much attention thus far as they could wish.

At this point, however, their paths diverge. Amram sings a wildly exuberant barbaric yawn about himself, while Rorem daintily places before our fastidious noses some scented petits fours—slim book reviews, reveries, diary entries. Sloppily written and ludicrously naive, Amram's book is nevertheless the more interesting.

Every other word is fabulous, terrific, fantastic or stunning. He can seriously—and with apparent approval—report a friend saying to him: "Groovissimo." Gleefully recounting the filming of Pull My Daisy, for which he wrote the score and in which he played the role of Mezz MacGillicuddy, he tells how Allen Ginsberg and Gregory Corso would "pour water on anybody that looked like they weren't interested." The hippie rape of the English language is complete here, although Amram modestly sees himself as too old to be a hippie and too young to be a guru.

Even though he is 37, he just digs being alive because "every heartbeat is a groove." As a swinging young Jewish farm boy out of Feasterville, Pa., he decided that "if I was going to be a composer I would have to learn something about composing." One wishes he had felt similar compunctions before becoming an author.

The result is a musical autobiography that reads like Berlioz's Memoirs as rewritten, or unwritten, by Jack Kerouac. But Berlioz was a great composer by the time he wrote his Memoirs, and the book is itself a work of literature. Amram, as he himself is all too aware, is known as "Mr. Background Music," largely for the evocative but slight scores he contributed to Joseph Papp's Shakespeare in the Park productions, and for some Hollywood films. He has more grandiose aspirations, and I hope they come to fruition, because despite the book's pretentiousness (it is exactly three times as long and self-important as it should be—don't they edit books any more?) he comes across as a disarming and engaging young man.

He has some good stories to tell, too. He played the French horn in the raffish Seventh Army Orchestra in Germany, a most unilitary outfit in which "most of us looked like survivors of Valley Forge . . . with holes in our clothes, long hair, small beards, goatees, mustaches, frayed shirts, unshined shoes and corroded buttons." Standing at attention they made quite a spectacle, but did more than all the army's public relations men combined to convince Europeans that not all Americans were gum-chewing barbarians with cameras blopping against their bellies. Needless to say, the orchestra usually faced a cutoff of funds.

Excellent too, and most instructive about the financial status of the serious musician in this country, is an account of coming home to a rat-and-roach-infested sixth-floor Village walk-up after a prestigious musical triumph.

Amram is equally grounded in jazz and classical music and, as usual, jazz produces the worst writing. We get the obligatory eulogy of Charlie Parker, culminating in "Bird's" profound observation: "Man, doesn't Modigliani have a lot of soul?" Or, listening to Thelonious Monk, "you could feel that there was something in the music, no matter what it was." One expects musicians, like photographers, to be idiots savants, but sometimes Amram overdoes it.

Among his most beguiling eccentricities is his conviction that hate rays emanate toward him from conventional musicians, and even, on one occasion, "Queens Boulevard hate rays" from an agent's receptionist. On the whole, though, he tries to love everybody, gives exhaustive lists of musicians to whom he feels indebted, and even admires the plays of Arthur Miller and Paddy Chayevsky, which makes one wonder just how deeply he "digs" Shakespeare.

Because of this all-embracing, Whitmanesque attitude, he gets few hate rays but many good vibrations, not merely from his mellifluous French horn but from simpatico jazz musicians, and "heavenly, tinkling" ones from beautiful girls, all of whom get a "terrific, fabulous" build-up when they first make the scene, only to be quietly dropped a few pages later.

So much for our Redskin. Our Paleface, Ned Rorem, is the composer of vast numbers of respectable technically conservative art songs by whatever librettist, and of the opera Miss Julie, which was regarded by the critics as a losing battle with Strindberg, but which Rorem likes well enough to discuss its creation in infinite narcissistic detail.

He is perhaps best known for the gratuitous revelations of his love life in his Paris Diary, from which Gore Vidal, according to Rorem, plagiarized Myra Breckenridge. We get little of that here, for Music and People is essentially a collection of modish reviews which hardly warranted reprinting. The most famous review, of the Beatles, started the vogue for taking them seriously—a vogue of which Rorem himself is now heartily sick. He just thought they sounded "like a choir of male nymphets."

Rorem's affectations are a good deal less ingenious than Amram's. His Paleface vocabulary specializes in words like melismatic, coprophagiac, vetivered, mal-

Coming
A Two-Part Holiday Issue
December 16 & 23

adive, fructuous and connote (fruitful and connote not being classy enough for him).

But "ignorance," as Lady Bracknell observes, "is like a delicate exotic fruit; touch it and the bloom is gone." She could be commenting on Rorem's description of a visit to Poulenc: "A few days later, as bread-and-butter gift, I left a rare and fragrant package of Hindu josh [sic] sticks (purchased the previous month near Tangier's Xoco Chico) with the concierge of Poulenc's Paris apartment." Did Bach carry on this way? All the epigraphs in the world from Nietzsche, Alice B. Toklas and Tom Lehrer can't redeem this sort of inaccurate chichi.

equally ignorant." Also paddywhackery and Irish writers with one eye on the British market in order to cash in on their "witty Celtic act" and "lovable playboy role" for the Saxon shilling.

He could be unfair too and as narrow as some of his victims. One of those he mocked was the playwright John M. Synge: "... he brought forward with the utmost solemnity amusing clowns talking a sub-language of their own and bade us take them very seriously." But the very next day Myles stormed into the breach for a Rouault painting, banished by order of the Dublin Municipal Gallery board of directors.

Some of those Dublin topics of a quarter-century ago may make little sense to one unfamiliar with the time and place of writing. The editing might have been more helpful here; at the very least the dates of the columns should have been noted. All the same it's a fair compendium of Myles's nonsense and erudition, his wit and concern for language.

Nonsense and Erudition

THE BEST OF MYLES. By Myles na Gopaleen. Walker & Co, 400 pp. $7.50.

SEAN CRONIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist who has lived in Ireland and the United States, and has written for publications in both countries.

Kevin O'Nolan died two years ago at the age of 54, having spent most of his working life as a civil servant in Dublin. He had two other identities. As Flann O'Brien he wrote the comic fantasies At Swim-Two-Birds, The Hard Life, The Dalkey Archive, The Third Policeman. The first is a minor masterpiece. "That's a real writer," said James Joyce on reading it, and critics have been echoing his remark in one form or another since. The others didn't measure up to it; except perhaps The Third Policeman, written in 1940 but not published here until last year (see Kevin Sullivan's review, The Nation, February 5).

To most Irish people the name Flann O'Brien was shadowy enough, but as Myles na Gopaleen he was famous. Myles was renowned because of his column in the Irish Times called "Cruiskeen Lawn," a satiric hash of droll tales, broad farce, literary puns, parodies and occasional pedantry. He enraged his readers as often as he amused them, and he kept it up—off and on—for twenty-seven years. In the process he pricked the bubble of many Irish illusions.

For Myles, words were a joy in any language, and he used them like a craftsman. He started the column in 1939 in Irish; he switched to English on alternate days, and eventually dropped Irish altogether. Sometimes he wrote in Latin and sometimes he invented a language as he went along. He also created a host of characters who were as well known to his readers as members of their own family. They knew the inside of pubs well, which was fitting since "Cruiskeen Lawn" means "full little jug," and the overflowing liquid usually is alcoholic. (There's a drinking song in Irish with that title. It might have been Myles's anthem.)

Myles on good days was a modern Swift come to judge and scourge the Yahoos in prose as plain as that of the Dean himself. On bad days he could be tiresome and preachy as an old parish priest sermonizing to peasants. Most of the time his material had the tangy flavor of a well-drawn pint of Guinness stout which, as everyone knows, works wonders on the brain and provides sustenance for the body. This selection is culled from his first five years when Myles was at his best. He grew gloomy with the years and no wonder.

In wartime, neutral Ireland, Myles had no shortage of targets for his shafts. His zaniness gave him a kind of safe passage through the Irish mine field. Rationing was tight, censorship strict, public transport slow, bureaucrats powerful, and politicians self-righteous as always. Myles took them all on. To show that he played no favorites, occasionally he turned on the editor of the Irish Times and his writers. His lists of dislikes included bores, clichés and "people who are very important and

ART LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

The first impression of the Francis Bacon exhibition (Marlborough-Gerson) is one of unaccustomed abundance; a painter once celebrated for a small output of dark paintings comes on now in rococo luxuriance. It is not merely that his productive capacity has increased; he seems always to have worked hard and long, but his impulse to self-censorship has relaxed. He now lets more work out of the studio. The formal basis of his art has undergone a radical shift. too. A majority of the new works are of several figures, or of one figure repeated, which amounts visually to the same thing, whereas all his best work before 1963 was one of the single human figure. Where there were more than one they were of homosexual pairs, at least temporarily one flesh. As the cast of his pictures has increased in number, the figures have correspondingly shrunk in relation to the size of the painting. (Something similar happened in the movies of the mid-fifties, when big screens brought middle shots forward to the place occupied by close-ups in small-screen movies.)

The majority of his works from 1945 to 1962 were of fairly large figures, filling the canvas in the way that a man fills a bed or a bathtub. The actual size of Bacon's paintings has not changed, only the proportion of the painted figures to the whole area. In earlier Bacon pieces

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

12-9-68

100 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18-
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
 (Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name
 Address
 City
 State Zip No.

the drama was in the confrontation of the image and the spectator; the violent or provocative nature of the image turned us, as we looked, into involuntary witnesses. (Early criticism of Bacon testifies to this power to implicate the observer, sliding his attention from "aesthetic contemplation" to guilty involvement.) In his work since 1962, however, Bacon has moved the drama from a relation between his image and the spectator to something enacted by several figures within the painting. The transition is, in effect, from being a kind of lyrical poet to a kind of dramatist, and he can't do it.

It is hard enough to formulate convincing relationships, human and social, among multiple figures in painting. To do so when they are distorted by the fusion of successive views in time is hazardedly difficult. The new pictures end up looking like paralytic children enacting Racine, or Sartre's No Exit in the hands of Godard. This grotesque effect comes from Bacon's failure to control his groups as he controlled his single figures. In the new work, even the single figures are accompanied by excreted pets or sticky mise-en-scène. If Bacon could hold them together with the tough ease he brought to his work of the fifties, there would be no problem, but as the space has become scenic, the extended areas have become ornate and flabby.

The earlier work of Bacon depended on quotation and paraphrase. Sometimes he referred to specific paintings such as Velasquez's "Pope Innocent X" or Van Gogh's "The Road to Tarascon," but at all times he took the general stylistic character of the grand manner, his adaptations of which retained its formal grandeur while he modified it in terms of his own irony or anxiety. This formal infrastructure has been abandoned in the new group and in its absence Bacon's work flies apart. He lacks the capacity to invent coherent spatial structures for the complex and relational action of figure groups. The new work, for all its handsome color, is short-winded and fragmentary.

It is a curious fact of present-day painting that single figures or crowds seem to have been fairly easy to paint. Precisely related groups of figures in an articulated environment, on the other hand, are harder to handle. The painterly resources of modern art can accommodate easily either the one or the many; paint takes only a little persuading to be a body (swarming paint marks inside a simple contour) or a horde (every brush mark is a member of the mob). To be precise about a few figures, however, is awkward. It is to Bacon's credit that he is putting his whole effort to the problem, but disappointing that the result to date is so far below what he has shown himself able to do.

Robert Rauschenberg's "Soundings" was installed at the Museum of Modern Art after being shown at the Stedelijk Museum, Amsterdam—a nice case of prompt international communications. And the problem to which the work contributes is one that interests artists in both Europe and the United States: spectator participation. "Soundings" is a 36-feet-long relief, with a mirror surface, reflecting grayly the spectators; at sound cues from the spectators, lights behind the mirror are activated. As these flash, the mirror is seen to be one-way glass, and printed images of chairs, big and small, every which way, can be glimpsed. The sounds which trigger this activity are picked up by mikes suspended over the viewing zone, out in front of the mirror wall.

It must be admitted that the installation at the Modern is not a help. "Soundings" is displayed in a rather secluded spot, which means that there are almost no accidental animations from casual passers-by. Also the area is carpeted, which reduces the sounds considerably. If the machine were more sensitive, carpeting might be necessary to prevent an orgy of perpetual flickering; as it is, however, the general impression of the wall is dim and withdrawn, like a storage attic seen by summer lightning. Only a fairly high and persistent noise level can induce anything but brief flashes, the lights being cued to one-to-one responses, so that one clap of the hands is rewarded by a momentary sight of chair silhouettes that obliterate the spectators in their watchful poses. Hence, the zone for viewing is usually full of people snapping their fingers, clapping their hands, whistling, to make the inert wall do something, and to make it do more.

The rate of change is central to works of art that offer physical options. If the shifts are too fast, or unstopable, the spectator soon learns he is excluded and the movement of the works becomes as fascinating as an on-off neon sign. If the changes are too slow or too slight, the spectator is forced to clear his throat repeatedly or keep kicking the wall, as visitors to the Modern kept doing. The one-way glass and the layers of plexiglass on which the chair images are printed, reduced the too quick lights to a dim as well as a perfunctory display. There was no jackpot, at which the random flickerings suddenly shone forth in unison: the whole thing was muted and grudging. Understandably, Rauschenberg stayed away from the discotheque spectacles, but all he presented instead was huge, indirect and cumbersome, reproductions of the effects he gets easily and directly in his lithographs. The grainy image, overlapping forms and low-keyed monochrome are characteristic of his later graphics, a bunch of which showed with "Soundings."

Physical participation is not automatically more fun or more rewarding than the attention given to static works of art. In fact, the function of attention has been reduced in "Soundings" to a few bare options. Instead of the chance of experiencing Rauschenberg's work freely, in terms of "random order" (the artist's own term for his organizational sense), the spectator's participative role is a drag. You stand there and get less new information than from a distorting mirror at a carnival. It is as if we were to prize landscapes with echoes as more "participatory" than silent landscapes.

FILMS ROBERT HATCH

You can see why Twentieth Century Fox dumped Pretty Poison straight into the neighborhood houses, with no downtown openings. It has Tony Perkins playing a nut again, it is about the kinks of youth, and it is directed by an unknown young American named Noel Black (unknown young European directors make good box office, but in the American film business you are supposed to arrive famous). And you can see why the reviewers, in a bleak season of commercial art nouveau and permuting sex, hauled Pretty Poison out of popcorn oblivion and sent it on the art-house circuit.

It is rather awful to look at, being made in that hyper-chromatic, triple-primed technicolor that transforms the carefully selected, very specific New England setting (Great Barrington) into a full-color daily special on the Howard Johnson menu. I swear I wouldn't recognize my own street corner if they brought it on tarked up that way. Also, the creators of this film (Lorenzo Semple, Jr., wrote the screenplay from a novel by Stephen Geller) are so struck by the sardonic viewpoint and mordant humor of their own work that they repeat and underline as though instructing an audience of dropouts. Still, the film does have a viewpoint and its laughs do come where least appropriate; so that in an arid season of "Like, man, let's strip" it was worth its rescue. Plus, it is blessed with a genuinely jarring story.

So blessed, in fact, that I must be circumspect in discussing the events, not to spoil the fun. The trouble with the boy (Perkins) is that he embellishes his day dreams with just a little more real substance than most of us would care to

EDUCATIONAL

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, BERKELEY CAMPUS: unique lecture notes. Hundreds of courses, taken directly in class by professionals from world-famous teachers. $1.54. Send for free catalog. Fybate Lecture Notes, Dept. H, 2440 Bancroft Way, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

PERSONALS

BENEFIT PERFORMANCE FOR

THE CALIFORNIA GRAPE WORKERS

December 4, 8:30 p.m.

Carnegie Hall, New York City

Alan King, Peter, Paul and Mary and more.

For ticket information phone or write:

Room 914, 515 Madison Ave., N.Y. 10022

(212) 355-4748

BLOW YOURSELF UP. Any photo, clipping, sketch enlarged to giant poster. Great one-of-a-kind gift. Immediate service. Send photos and $2.99 each, plus 50c handling to: A.I.R., Dept. N, Box 1405, Bloomington, Indiana. 47404. Refund if not satisfied.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled editor, published writer, aids authors in revising manuscripts. (In French and English.) Box #619, c/o The Nation.

ATHEISTS, Socialists and Racists challenge Christians, defenders of the capitalist system or believers in Negro-White equality to correspondence debates. Meritorious debates will be published. Details: American Debating Society, Box 199, Ridgewood, New Jersey 07451.

CUSTOM-MADE BUTTONS, BALLOONS, BUMPER STRIPS, DECALS. Union made. Send $1 (refundable) for price list and samples. Estimates on request. Larry Fox, Box 581-T, Hempstead, N.Y., 11551 (516) 295-1034.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC. Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 235 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

Per line (15 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

225 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10011
242-9400

attempt. Also, that he is not really as adroit—or as ruthless—as he enjoys pretending (though in fact quite bright). Thus if he imagines burning down the house of an offending relative, he will light a small fire in the basement, to bolster his fancy—and then watch in dismay as the whole place goes up, with the offender in the heart of the bonfire.

This sort of thing has landed him in a state institution, from which he is being released as the picture opens, to the parting words of his parole officer that "out there" he will find no tolerance for fantasy. The next thing Perkins—or we—see is Tuesday Weld leading a high school girls' rifle team in acrobatic maneuvers on a riverside meadow. That sort of juxtaposition gives Pretty Poison its tone.

Perkins has meanwhile been hired by one of those specialty chemical firms that have fitted themselves into abandoned New England spinning mills as hermit crabs take over snail shells. Like most of its kind, the plant is polluting air and water, and Perkins fancies himself a government man casing the infractions (the little bit of verisimilitude here is that he collects evidence with a real miniature camera). Then he meets Miss Weld, playing the ideal small-town girl who drives a sports car, lives on a pto-maine diet and preoccupies herself with the love life of her widowed mother. To impress her, and with seduction on his mind, Perkins begins acting and talking like a TV secret agent. Only a crazy kid could fall for such mumbo jumbo, but the fact is—well, the fact is what makes the story, produces much of the humor and a good deal of the terror. But the terror builds also because Perkins, who knows some of the truth about himself and his surroundings, goes down under the fist of society that understands nothing about him or itself. There is a palliating final episode, involving the parole officer, but it looked to me like a slight loss of nerve in the home stretch. Unrelieved pessimism as to the health of the nation is bad for business and probably un-American.

Pretty Poison offers a good deal of cold violence, material which is these days out of favor with the enlightened, but it seemed to me violence for comment, not for kicks. Perkins and Miss Weld perform well—they are handsome and expressive, but a little spastic and as though on strings. The style fits their individual parts and the milieu from which they are misbegotten.

The Beatles' Yellow Submarine is doubtless studded with "in" references which I don't get. One that has been pointed out to me (and which the Beatles deny) is to LSD in the song title,

"Lucy in the Sky with Diamonds." Another reference that I discovered for myself is to the graphics of Saul Steinberg. What with the pointing finger; the preoccupation with vanishing points and the anomalies of time, space and mathematics; the deployment of words in block letters—NOW, O.K., LOVE—as architectural elements; the cut-out mannikin figures set in a linear context; the prominence of a ziggurat; the affection for parades of replicated figures, and the magic proliferation of Rousseau-like foliage, the visual excellence of this animated movie owes a great deal to the basic furniture of Steinberg's elegant fantasy. I did not see his name among the screen credits and consider that a failure of candor by the film's proprietors.

What do take up a major share of the very long credits are the lists, arranged in squads and platoons, of the animators. These technicians, anonymous by reason of their numbers, have produced something novel, if not exactly new, in their rigorous trade. They combine the simulation of self-generated motion, customary in screen cartoons, with the shifting of scene blocks and character units by unseen hands, as though in one of those miniature cardboard theatres that delighted Victorian nurseries. This ambiguity of style sets up a visual tension which, along with the inventive absurdity of some of the Breughel-like fauna, keeps the film lively during most of its not great length, and which accords with the somewhat ambiguous benevolence of the Beatles themselves.

The representations of John, Paul, George and Ringo are, I presume deliberately, such wooden approximations that they seem more remote than they would be if present only on the sound track. Their Liverpool accent, with the depreciating, dead-pan fall of the sentence rhythms, is the most ingratiating entertainment voice since the Scots of Sir Harry Lauder. And it serves the same purpose of authenticating some very dubious material. The Beatles are sometimes witty; when they are not, their accents are witty for them.

Yellow Submarine is essentially a framework for a dozen or so of the Beatles' songs, and like most musical revues its story line is its least important element. When the plot does intrude, it is distressingly cute in the manner of false naïveté; the children around me in the audience screamed with pleasure at these giggly goings-on, which increased my doubts as to the alleged innate good taste of the very young. What makes the picture go are a sound track that pours exuberance out of an electronic cornucopia, and the visual instruction of Saul Steinberg, who is never cute.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1275

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 and 18 across Happy alternative, where everything goes to the plunger. (3,3,3,6)
 6 Bovine, not of a higher order. (5)
 9 It's bad to stare, as one who takes his turn does. (7)
 10 The last thing to expect in some crimes!
 1 Fight bare-back? (3)
 2 Subjects composed by Siegel. (6)
 3 In a different case, she precedes a goddess. (4)
 16 More than one heavy wind blows up this way! (6)
 23 Bird of 31. (4)
 24 We and 10 set out to get money. (6)
 25 The whole tree, or a stick of it? (3)
 28 Away at the beginning, understands as Burns might say, what a rousing type does. (7)
 29 Where there might have been a tilt without a real tip. (7)
 30 Passing sound? (5)
 31 Rents were brought into line for one coming from places that were thought of as being wide open. (9)

DOWN

- 1 Is 11 confused with the alternative, as an old implement of 11? (5)
 2 "All right!" or as you might put it, "exactly so!" (7)
 3 Are 7 by the heavies? (10)
 4 Left us at some trouble to become suitable to sensibilities. (8)
 5 A tree's naturally bursting out in time of spring. (6)

- 6 A settlement for such as Francis Lightfoot and Robert Edward? (4)
 7 Heaves and tosses between the light and the middle. (7)
 8 Listens in the authentic environment in getting ready for play. (9)
 14 City area with just one building on it? It might be a strong point. (10)
 15 Gobble gabble? (5,4)
 17 A noisy blow-out to you and me? It's an inspiration! (8)
 19 The fleet might be so measured, with no agent involved. (7)
 21 What one might have to turn before playing, if electric, according to the rules. (7)
 22 Observe both present and past recreation for some. (6)
 26 The urban leader might otherwise make it. (5)
 27, 15 across and 20 What the author of "Drop-out Stories" does? (4,5,3,2,6)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1274

ACROSS: 1 Surinam; 5 and 4 down Ancient Mariner; 9 Learner; 10 Trestle; 11 Icily; 12, 15, 17 and 27 across Norman Conquest; 14 and 13 Steamer trunk; 16 Excited; 18 Spinner; 21 Linseed; 24 Ascot; 28 Pension; 29 Reefers; 30 Needles; 31 Denoted. DOWN: 1 Sallies; 2 Realize; 3 Nancy; 5 Astarte; 6 Chest; 7 Entrust; 8 Treked; 18 Sharpen; 19 Incense; 20 Remands; 21 Labored; 22 Everest; 23 De-tests; 25 Trial; 27 and 26 Queen Mab.

TRAVEL

TWO 1969

TRAVEL SEMINARS ABROAD

WEST & EAST AFRICA (July 10-31):

Senegal, Sierra Leone, Ghana, Kenya, Ethiopia. Interviews, Sight-seeing. $1,694.

EASTERN EUROPE (July 17-Aug. 7)

Stockholm, Baltic Cruise, Leningrad, Novgorod, Moscow, Bucharest, Belgrade, Prague. Interviews, sight-seeing, theatre, $1,040.

For details on leadership, program, services address:

PROMOTING ENDURING PEACE

P.O. Box 163, Woodmont, Conn. 06460

Tel. (203) 878-4769

PUBLICATIONS

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're Invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46032.

COSMOPOLITAN CONTACT—polyplot magazine for international friendship, trade, exchange, including Communist countries; $1.00. Postbox 29117, Hollywood, California 90029.

INFOCUS: Iconoclastic photojournalism quarterly. $5.00. Box 6356, Carmel, Calif. 93921. Quality photoessays sought.

"THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES"

Books 1 and 2
 Still available as Xmas gifts!
 $2.25 for both—132 puzzles in all.
 Address: Frank W. Lewis
 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md. 20770.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Date Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Licensed and MID-TOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07607.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!
 Read CANADIAN DIMENSION
 Independent, lively, and original.
 Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:
 CANADIAN DIMENSION
 P.O. Box 1413
 Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

For the real conversation piece on your gift list, pick either one...

Live armadillo, pedigree and registered.
$96 per copy, without leash.

The NATION, always unleashed
and uninhibited.
20.8c per copy, $10 for the year.

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

Please process my gift order as indicated below, to the recipients shown. ☐ Send gift card.

☐ Have Neiman-Marcus rush the armadillo. I enclose $96.

☐ Send The NATION for one year (48 issues) to the name(s) listed. I enclose $10 for each subscription.

To _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

To _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

(Use extra paper for additional names)

From (your name) _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

If your friend or loved one ventures out for a stroll with his armadillo, he won't be ignored. We join Neiman-Marcus in guaranteeing it.

But when you give him (or her) a year of The NATION, you can be even surer of the talk it'll generate—and the kind of talk it'll be. Talk that inquires, challenges, inspires, angers, demolishes old biases, builds new understandings, blasts apart fallacies, strengthens convictions. The kind of talk that comes only from the open, informed and forever inquiring mind.

Either choice is a flattering gift. Why not use the coupon today?

THE

NATION

DECEMBER 16, 1968 35 cents

2-69R PL-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

BURLINGAME
DEC 14 1968
LIBRARY

THE BRAMBLE OF POWER

RONALD V. SAMPSON

WALKING OUT ON NEW YORK

City Schools and Albany Politics

JEROME WILSON

Emancipating the Mental Wards

MAX GORDON

THE HOLIDAYS PART ONE

John Berger on Max Raphael

Art Books of 1968 LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Books by Nation Contributors

LETTERS

agility

Ann Arbor, Mich.

DEAR SIR: Nicolaus C. Mills's article, "The Mothers Said No" (The Nation, Nov. 25) gives a clear history of the Ann Arbor ADC mothers' success in getting money for school clothes in a confrontation which involved more than 200 arrests. He claims two quite different successes for the mothers and their supporters: (1) prying additional money out of the Welfare Department at that specific time, and (2) becoming a strong and continuing political power. Mr. Mills seemed to be writing before the November election cast serious doubt on the accuracy of his second assumption.

At the county level, Sheriff Douglas Harvey ran on a platform which identified him as an opponent of the mothers and especially of their tactics (demonstrations—sit-ins). Harvey, stressing "safety," not only won but was the county's largest vote getter. . . . These election results do not foreshadow the emergence of the mothers as "a force in their own right," nor the appointment of one of them or their supporters to the County Social Services Board. More likely, the results of October and November will be read by county officials as authorizing a much tougher line should the mothers return. . . .

The next step for the academic and student supporters of the mothers is to devise a range of strategies and tactics including, but not limited to, direct confrontation. A smaller contender must rely on change of pace, footwork and speed, not slugging power. . . .

Sydney E. Bernard

age of reason

Boise, Ida.

DEAR SIR: The electoral age barrier has already been broken in four states. Two, Kentucky and Georgia, have set the voting age at 18; in Alaska and Hawaii, it has been set at 19 and 20, respectively. No deleterious consequences, or at least none that can be attributed to the ballots of voters under 21, have occurred.

The youth of today is better educated than was the youth of the 1920s. In 1920, less than 30 per cent of the high school age population was in high school and only 17 per cent graduated. Today, more than 85 per cent of Americans, 14 to 17, are attending high school and more than three-fourths receive diplomas. In 1920, less than 8 per cent of the 18 to 21 population were enrolled in college. Today, half the country's young people are receiving some form of higher education. . . .

Eighteen-year-olds facing civil or criminal charges are brought into adult, not juvenile courts; as wage earners they are required to pay taxes; they are often free to marry without the consent of their parents; they are allowed to enter civil service. Age should limit our electorate to a group . . . ready to handle the responsibilities of citizenship.

Erik Gabrielson, Boise State College

irony of history

Brooklyn, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: Roy Cohn participated, as special assistant prosecutor, in the trial of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg and Morton Sobell. The Rosenbergs were executed in June, 1953, their convictions founded on the testimony of criminals and informers, Harry Gold, David Greenglass and Elizabeth Bentley.

Now Mr. Cohn . . . condemns his successors in the Justice Department for basing their indictment of him on criminals' and informers' testimony! Meanwhile, Cohn's living victim, Sobell, is scheduled to spend yet another Chanukah and Christmas in prison at Lewisburg, Pa.

Aaron Katz

EDITORIALS

The Hurdle

When Peking proposed in a November 26 radio broadcast that the Warsaw talks with the United States be resumed as of next February 20, officials in Washington were surprised and, one may safely assume, far from enraptured. Nothing has made State happier, during its fifteen years under John Foster Dulles and Dean Rusk (Christian Herter's tenure hardly counts) than the isolation of Red China, imposed partly by the United States and partly by the Chinese Communists themselves. The incoming administration, however, acceded to the Chinese proposal with commendable promptness. Robert D. Murphy, the Nixon liaison officer for national security affairs, told the press on the following afternoon that Mr. Nixon wished to go ahead with the proposed meeting, and that the Johnson Administration was drafting a reply to Peking on this basis.

Even old China hands can only conjecture as to the Red Chinese motivation, which, as always by standardized American tradition, is held to be inscrutable, if not treacherous. However, the prevalent impression among those observers who have oftener than not been right (and were rewarded for their perspicacity during the Joe McCarthy era) is that the Red Guard furor is abating and the moderates are edging back into power. The Chinese may feel, also, that while a settlement in Vietnam is certainly not imminent, it is no longer utterly remote. With the Russians apparently working for peace in Southeast Asia, the Chinese can hardly afford to push for continued war. And by resuming talks with the United States, they may hope to put themselves in a position to influence the outcome.

The proposal that Chinese-American relations should be based on "the five principles of coexistence" has an air of déjà vu about it. Apparently the Chinese were referring to the China-India agreement of 1954, which included mutual respect for each country's territorial integrity and sovereignty, mutual noninterference in internal affairs, mutual nonaggression, equality and mutual benefit—all adding up to peaceful coexistence. But the promulgation of these admirable sentiments did not avert considerable fighting between the equal, nonaggressing, mutually benefiting partners. Neither did Chou En-lai's overtures to the United States in 1955 result in anything more than the sterile meetings in Warsaw—which, nevertheless, continued for thirteen years and are now to be resumed.

Chou referred on that occasion particularly to "relaxing tension in the Taiwan area," and the present Chinese proposal likewise makes it plain that peaceful coexistence between China and the United States is contingent on the "immediate" cessation of American military aid to Chiang Kai-shek's regime. This requirement the Chinese are not likely to waive, any more than the United States is likely to forgo its control of the entire Pacific Ocean, with Chiang's snout in the very harbor of Amoy. The resumption of talks is a step away from perpetual hostility, but American support of Chiang remains an obstacle to any real détente.

Will Nixon 'Get' the Press?

A number of publications have begun to worry over the question, "Will the Press Be Out To 'Get' Nixon?" (U.S. News & World Report, December 2). But a more realistic concern would seem to be: Will Nixon be out to "get" the press?

At a recent press conference at the Hotel Pierre, Ronald Ziegler, Mr. Nixon's press aide, failed to announce a meeting that had taken place between Mr. Nixon and Governor Rockefeller. He was reminded by the press that only the day before Herbert G. Klein, who is to be the new "Director of Communications," had promised that there would be an unimpeded flow of information to the press and public. "Isn't this precisely the sort of thing," one reporter asked, "that builds the kind of 'credibility gap' you say you're trying to avoid?"

At the same time, Rep. John E. Moss (D., Calif.), who heads the House Government Operations subcommittee concerned with freedom of information, expressed his misgivings about the information setup and called on Mr. Nixon to reconsider it before it is too late. "No matter how well intended," he said, "the awesome powers seemingly proposed for a communications director lend themselves toward the concept of a dictatorial and suppressive single voice in government."

The President-elect obviously wants to avoid President Johnson's obsessive personal involvement in news management; but what he proposed could turn out to be an institutionalization of Mr. Johnson's personal practice. Under President Johnson the press was concerned with discrepancies, distortions and deceptions; under Nixon and problem may be much simpler—a sharp reduction in the flow of information.

New Sobriety

Addressing the French National Assembly on November 26, Premier Couve de Murville rallied his audience, and indirectly all of France, to volunteer in a victorious "war of the franc." The speech, during which Couve de Murville repeatedly referred to President de Gaulle in terms of admiration which recalled the formalistic obeisances of Communist state papers, rang with a national fervor that might seem exaggerated in a statement dealing entirely with economics. But in fact it was not dealing entirely, or even primarily, with economic matters—France is engaged in a political struggle, and the line of battle is once more the Rhine. Small wonder, then, that one seemed to hear the Marseillaise in the background of the Premier's earnest words.

For some time now, the mark has been the strongest currency in Europe. With a population about equal to that of France, West Germany's gross national product is $20 billion greater, and the German trade surplus today is massive. It is normally assumed that in any congress of nations, the country with the strongest money will speak with the loudest political voice; but up to now Germany has allowed France to make the rules and call the plays. Its demeanor in such areas as the Common Market has been relatively meek. In November, however, when it was

IN THIS ISSUE

December 16, 1968

EDITORIALS

542

ARTICLES

- 546 The New Left:
Rhetoric of Ambivalence

Edward Witten

- Walking Out on New York:

- 548 City Schools &
Albany Politics

Jerome Wilson

- 550 Emancipating the Mental Wards

Max Gordon

- 553 The Bramble of Power

Ronald V. Sampson

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 559 The Undoing of the World of Things

John Berger

- 561 Art Books

Lawrence Alloway

- 565 Theatre

Harold Clurman

- 566 Films

Robert Hatch

- 567 Books by Nation Contributors

- 569 Crooked Carol (poem)

Norma Farber

- 571 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERMILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 925 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 21

instructed, rather peremptorily, by France, Great Britain and the United States to raise the value of the mark, Bonn said no. By hindsight, this obduracy was not particularly surprising. In the first place, Germans live in terror of monetary fluctuation; no people have suffered from it more. In the second place, Germany's leaders decided that the sudden collapse of the franc gave them a chance to transform economic solidity into political muscle.

They were not particularly tactful about it; the counsel of industry and prudence volunteered by the German representatives at the hastily called international meetings was perhaps not arrogance, since the Germans deny any such intent, but it was difficult for the other hard-pressed nations to endure. However, it is likely that the Germans are more intent on flexing their muscles than on using them. De Gaulle is engaged in that classic form of gamble which involves pulling at the very pillars of the temple. The financial roof might as a result fall in on France; it would also not spare the related economies as it crashed. So Germany, like the other "partners" of France, has contributed heavily to support the franc. Bonn made its point—it is no longer to be pushed about—and is now hard at work on the money dikes.

And de Gaulle, having called on Frenchmen to pull in their belts and stop gadding about the world, at least showed his own commitment to a newly sober French economy by canceling the nuclear tests scheduled for next year. This time, when the gold dust settles, the Europeans may be in a position to sit around a table, and will no longer be required to cluster at the great man's knees. La Gloire is out of style for the moment; there is no pressing need for its return.

Finger Pointing

Now that the election is over, both parties have resumed the discussion of campaign costs and expenditures—those incurred, needless to say, by the other party. For example, agents for the FBI have begun to review finance reports of twenty Nixon-Agnew fund-raising committees which, inexplicably, were filed with the Clerk of the House well after the legal deadline set by the Federal Corrupt Practices Act. Since the investigation is not likely to be concluded before the new administration takes over, it is a fair inference that nothing further will be heard of this apparent violation of the law.

In the same spirit in which this belated investigation was ordered, Sen. Hugh Scott, from the Republican side, has demanded that the Democratic National Committee explain a $100,000 campaign contribution from the Seafarers' International Union, made shortly after Secretary of State Dean Rusk had denied Canada's request for extradition of Harold C. Banks, who jumped $25,000 bail and fled to this country after conviction on a conspiracy charge involving the beating of a rival Great Lakes union leader. An extraordinary array of labor's top brass intervened to induce Dean Rusk to overrule his legal adviser and refuse extradition. As a matter of fact, as George Lardner, Jr., reports in The Washington Post, the Seafarers spent money on "deserving" Democrats in this campaign, including Mr. Humphrey. "like sailors on shore leave." But the beneficences of the Seafarers are no more likely to be investigated than those belated Nixon-Agnew reports. There is something gently comic about the bipartisan comity that is observed on such delicate issues.

Action vs. Apathy

"The cowboy from Marlboro Country," comments The Wall Street Journal, "may be taking his last ride on television." If so, a young lawyer named John F. Banzhaf III will be entitled to much of the credit. Mr. Banzhaf, head of Action on Smoking and Health, a citizens' anti-smoking group in Washington, asked the Columbia Broadcasting System for free time on WCBS-TV, the network's New York outlet, to combat cigarette commercials. C.B.S. declined. Banzhaf then appealed to the FCC under the "Fairness Doctrine." The FCC ruled in his favor in June, 1967, in an advisory opinion that required broadcasters to devote "significant" time to the case against smoking—say one anti-smoking message to every three cigarette commercials.

The Tobacco Institute and the National Association of Broadcasters went to court. In a 2-to-1 decision, a federal appeals court has upheld Banzhaf. "Cigarette advertising inherently promotes cigarette smoking as a very desirable habit," the majority opinion said. "Very substantial medical and scientific authority regard this habit as highly dangerous to health and therefore undesirable. In view of the volume of cigarette advertising, existing sources are inadequate to inform the public of the nature and extent of the danger. . . ." The case is now headed for the Supreme Court. If the decision goes against them there, the tobacco companies are likely to discontinue cigarette advertising on TV.

Reams have been written about the power elites, the impotence of the individual, how the cards are stacked against the virtuous, etc. Yet when a shrewd, bold and energetic antagonist like Ralph Nader or John Banzhaf comes along, the Goliaths are found to be not so formidable after all. In some situations, as power grows bigger and more highly structured, it also becomes more vulnerable. Resistance to corporate and governmental wrongdoing is never easy, but if there were less hand wringing and more resolute action, the country would be better off.

'A Little Torture'

Despite repeated expressions of hurt innocence, the Greek colonels have not been able to counter the impression that they employ torture as a means of implementing policy. Recently, they sent four political prisoners under guard to a meeting of the European Human Rights Commission in Strasbourg, to testify that they had been properly treated in jail. Two of these men slipped their leashes (with the help of Andreas Papandreu's Pan-Hellenic Liberation Movement) and told reporters that they had been tortured.

After a recent visit to Greece, Christopher Janus, a Chicago businessman, son of Greek parents, who helped organize Greek war relief, gave the Toronto Star an account of what he had observed and discovered. He reports that Greece today is a perfectly organized police state, watched over by an army that may be merely a hollow shell so far as NATO defenses are concerned, but which is entirely adequate for internal repression. The army's Sherman tanks "clank up at the drop of a leaflet," and an enormous counterespionage apparatus has been instituted by the Greek Central Intelligence—which was originally organized and financed by our own Central Intelligence Agency.

On the other hand the resistance has little money and almost no arms. Spokesmen told Mr. Janus that two developments had undercut the movement: Secretary of Defense Clark Clifford's May 17th statement announcing the resumption of military aid to Greece and the Russian intervention in Czechoslovakia.

While in Athens, Mr. Janus spoke with three victims of police torture—two former members of parliament and a 24-year-old daughter of prominent Greek parents. This young lady had been taken to a military camp between Athens and Marathon, and while a motorcycle was kept running to stifle her screams, among other indignities she had been stripped naked and beaten with a wire whip by soldiers. She was finally released when her father paid a ransom of $25,000. Later Mr. Janus discussed her case with a lieutenant colonel—"an attractive, affable, well-educated fellow"—with whom he was having drinks in the bar of the Grand Bretagne Hotel, across Constitution Square from the Parliament buildings. While he conceded that the young lady's experience had been "unfortunate," the officer added: "It's all a question of survival . . . Besides a little torture is necessary to preserve civilization."

Senator Morse

An institution uprooted—such was the valedictory of Malcolm Bauer, reporting the defeat of Sen. Wayne Morse for The Christian Science Monitor. Together with the defeat of Senator Gruening, it represents the worst setback of the 1968 election insofar as the Senate and House races are concerned—a setback not only because of Morse's splendid record on foreign and domestic affairs, but equally for his personal qualities, which during his four terms in the Senate were unique and invaluable. The American people have suffered a grievous loss; it is not made less by the fact that as of now only the thoughtful minority is aware of it.

In times past we have had real scrappers on the progressive side in the Senate—men like Senator Norris and Senator Borah. The miasma of the cold war discouraged the survival of such types, but Morse remained. What made him great was precisely his willingness to be unpleasant in a good cause, regardless of the station of those who opposed him. He lambasted, in succession, Presidents Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson. When he thought they were wrong, he let them have it—without malice but equally without qualms. He was "the tiger in the Senate" on all issues that needed a tough, head-on, no-holds-barred approach. In this respect he has no successor.

Pugnacity by itself does not even begin to make an outstanding Senator. In Morse it was combined with immense industry, brilliance and matchless experience. His outstanding record in the Senate has eclipsed his earlier achievements as dean of the University of Oregon law school, his prominence in the affairs of that state, and his chairmanship of the wartime President's Emergency Board and the War Labor Board. While President Johnson could scarcely have loved him, he respected him, and perhaps now regrets that he did not follow his advice on Vietnam. When it came to a labor impasse, Johnson was glad to avail himself of Morse's services. He is now lost to the Senate, but if his detractors think they have seen the last of him on the national scene, they are mistaken.

Our Spanish Friends

The Nation has sought to keep a measure of public attention focused on the negotiations which have been going on in Washington and now in Madrid over the renewal of the "security agreement" governing the air and naval bases in Spain. Our efforts have not been appreciated at the Spanish Embassy in Washington. Recently we received an indignant letter from Jaime de Urzaiz, the "counselor of information," demanding to know how we ever got the notion that Spain's asking price for a renewal of the agreement was about $1 billion in military equipment over a five-year period and complaining, most bitterly, that we had used the ugly word "blackmail" to describe some of the tactics being used by Franco's negotiators (see Letters column, The Nation, November 25).

We replied that the $1 billion figure had been taken from stories appearing in the Washington papers and which we assumed to be correct. More recent stories from Madrid, discussing the negotiations between Generalissimo Franco, Secretary of State Dean Rusk, and Foreign Minister Fernando Maria Castiella, specifically refer to Spain's asking price as "$1.2 billion over the next five years." Since these dispatches originate in Madrid, either the figure must be correct or the Spanish censors are falling down on the job. As to "blackmail," these same dispatches speak of a "rift" that has developed over Franco's insistence that Spain may be compelled to "reorient her foreign policy" and adopt a nonaligned position unless, of course, it gets what it wants.

U.S. spokesmen are reported to be quite upset by the suggestion of Spain's Foreign Minister that this country and Russia should both withdraw their naval forces from the Mediterranean. This suggestion, Richard Eder reports to The New York Times from Madrid, is regarded as a move by the Foreign Ministry to "stiffen its terms for the current negotiations." All this may not constitute "blackmail" as defined by the criminal code, but Dean Rusk and Gen. Earle G. Wheeler might well feel that it does. However, Washington is not averse to using a little blackmail itself, and has threatened to shift certain of the bases to Portugal unless Franco becomes more reasonable. But what's a little blackmail among friends?

RHETORIC OF AMBIVALENCE

EDWARD WITTEN

Mr. Witten is an undergraduate at Brandeis University.

The American Left suffers from a curious ambivalence. Its central constituents—the students and young radicals, the suburban liberals and the black militants—are united only in a loose coalition of disaffiliation; they differ so sharply in the sources and depth of their commitment that even the night sticks of Chicago forged merely a momentary union. And each of these groups has failed to create a plausible or even a consistent model for the new vision of society that is presumably its object. Because of that failure, it is impossible for the elements to join in a serious coalition or even for any one of them to establish a coherent focus for its efforts.

The young radicals face a poverty both of personal and of political alternatives. They have met personal questions such as the draft and career selection by attempting to transform individual into collective decisions, a maneuver which clumsily veils the inability to create real choices. Thus the rhetoric of “resistance” and “confronting the war makers” undertakes to transform draft resistance from an act of personal morality to a collective strategy. The radicals tell us that personal morality lacks political content; but the apocalyptic quality of the rhetoric only obscures the fact that resistance and confrontation are not devices for organizing the uncommitted but only for the dramatic expression of a powerless minority that will remain so. Thus the rhetoric also lacks political content. Failing to create the possibility of even potentially effective collective action, it leaves the radical trapped between personal defiance and jail, or personal acquiescence and betrayal.

Similarly, although the most elementary pledge of the student movement is to create alternatives to the meaningless and mechanically determined life patterns offered by middle-class society, the radical lacks plausible options for himself, much less for those he would convert. The frequent contention that radicals as they grow older will grow conservative is basically a reflection of this fact.

The rhetoric of community—expressed most clearly in “sanctuaries” at Boston University, New York University, M.I.T. and elsewhere—attempts to provide collective alternatives in the absence of personal ones. Sometimes sanctuary has meant playing games with the feds. At best it means an effort to fledge a medieval legal concept, modern religious values and political solidarity and militancy into an idyllic paradise. But that unreal and ephemeral paradise merely removes from the personal to the collective level the incapacity of the radicals to offer anything but withdrawal as an alternative life pattern.

Because the radicals are largely limited to the campus, they have also been unable to create serious alternatives to the established forms of political action. A few years ago SDS was content to claim that the power base of the two major parties was illegitimate; now it claims that the election process through which the parties retain control is itself illegitimate. The latter conclusion originated from the conviction that power ought to flow from community and not from national sources. People should control institutions (schools, factories, planning agencies) directly, rather than maintain the phantom of control through a centralized mechanism dominated by a militarist-corporatist elite. This analysis was a response to the collapse of efforts by the students to organize the community on national issues. When it became obvious that the campuses could not form the core of a genuinely national movement, student radicals began to view their movement as the prototype for a loose coalition of local movements to seize control of local institutions.

According to this strategy, as the students struggle to gain control of the universities, blacks will struggle to gain control of the ghetto economies; parents, of the public school systems; industrial workers, of the factories. And when institutions are controlled at the local level by the people they are designed to serve, imperial and exploitative power will dissolve on a national scale. This prospectus begs the question of how radical movements will come into existence in the factories, the public schools, and elsewhere, when the one radicalized segment of society—the students—abandons as misconceived the attempt to organize them. It implies that students cannot expect to be effective beyond their own constituency of the university except indirectly, by providing a model for blacks, blue-collar workers and others who will undertake to organize themselves. But this program does not present students with options for political action; it rationalizes the failure to develop such options.

The effort to create personal and political alternatives outside existing structures—which is, after all, the essence of radicalism—has thus created a deadlock of radical ideology. The suburban liberals obviously escape that particular trap, but their position involves a very serious ambiguity. Suburban activists have tended to avoid the question of just what “activism” and “commitment” mean; they seem never quite sure whether their activism reflects transient issues or enduring grievances. At one extreme, if the war is a temporary, isolated aberration in American policy, if poverty and racism are vestigial problems from the New Deal (as President Johnson seemed to believe until the Great Society exploded in his face), then four or eight years of humane Democratic rule would resolve the divisive issues of the past few years. In that case commitment in suburbia is momentary and will not form the basis for permanent political organization. At the other extreme, if militarism and racism are deeply rooted in the structure of our society, if that society can sustain opulent but not meaningful lives, then the success of suburban activism will require a lasting movement with a solid issue-oriented base.

The suburban activists, adrift between these suppositions, remain uncertain whether they are contriving a temporary coalition or building a movement. The fate of Vietnam Summer, an anti-war project that flourished sporadically in mid-1967, illustrates how this uncertainty undercuts political strategy. Vietnam Summer concentrated on a canvassing program to influence opinion on a few narrowly defined issues. Its agents set out to prove to communities that the bombing of North Vietnam was unnecessary, or inconvenient, or perhaps unsuccessful—and above all that one could have short hair and still oppose it. They did not argue that the bombing was unjust or immoral or fundamentally wrong, or that it served the interests of a reactionary coalition in South Vietnam, although these beliefs were at the foundation of their own sentiments. They succeeded in momentarily persuading many of the housewives to whom they spoke that the bombing should be stopped on this or that ground of expediency; but this persuasion relied on no arguments likely to survive the slightest change in the circumstances surrounding the bombing, certainly on no arguments that would militate against a later bombing campaign in Thailand or Guatemala. Vietnam Summer built on shifting sands. The narrow issues around which it mobilized ceased to be issues long before such local organizing efforts could be powerful enough to alter the outcome, and its pitifully small achievements evaporated.

If Vietnam Summer was attempting to build a movement, it should have organized around issues of durable content, around questions of values and not of expediency; this would have created a smaller political base but a solid one. If it was attempting to effect a temporary coalition, then the concept of local organizing was itself badly judged. The confusion of goals that beset Vietnam Summer also characterizes many electoral efforts, where the choice is between the Clean-for-Gene, nice-guy image that wins votes without speaking to issues; or the issue-oriented campaign that does not necessarily produce the maximum support for this candidate in this election, but does create a continuing constituency capable of electing sympathetic men over the long term, when the candidates and the surface issues will change but the underlying values will remain. The choice, in other words, is between a temporary and a permanent conception of activism.

The black militants lack not a decisive commitment but a political program. In the name of political analysis they present a strange amalgam of Frantz Fanon on the liberating content of violence for an oppressed people; of Nkrumah and the Cuban, Chinese, Algerian, Kenyan and Vietnamese revolutions on imperial warfare; of Malcolm X on the energy of the black community after centuries of deprivation. There are fragments of meaningful analysis in this medley. For example, the capital outflow from Harlem and Roxbury to the white community, caused by external ownership of businesses and housing, is roughly analogous to the economic drainage of colonized countries. Or again, the incredible success of Malcolm X's efforts to reclaim and convert drug addicts vindicates his belief that the internal destructiveness of Harlem is a potential source of strength—a belief similar to Fanon's contention that for the colonized people, random, internal violence is a necessary first stage toward ultimate redemption.

Such loose comparisons as these, however, do not form the kernel of an analysis of domestic imperialism that could provide a program of political action toward liberation. When the Black Panthers parade with their guns in the streets of Oakland and the halls of the state capitol, they claim that by demonstrating their will to defend their communities from the power of a racist society they will establish black self-confidence and self-reliance. This contention divorces revolutionary rhetoric from substance; it does not claim the gun as the tool for a revolution (indeed, the Black Panthers are implausible as revolutionaries; the white society is bigger and stronger and, probably, meaner than they are) but as the symbol. Indeed, revolution itself becomes a symbol, not a program; the gun is not a means to seize power but a token of determination to do so. Even as the Black Panthers develop a revolutionary analysis of society and a theory of liberation through violence, they abandon the political and revolutionary content of violence. Power does not flow from the barrel of a symbol.

As the various components of the Left grope, respectively, toward the development of new options, toward a clear definition of the meaning of commitment and toward a relevant concept of black revolution, there is a common cause of their failures. The Left has reached a dead end which is, in fact, the dead end of Western ideology. The West has evolved, fundamentally, only two social and political ethics, liberal capitalism and utopian socialism. Both of these ethics lost meaning for the United States when the New Deal destroyed the blue-collar Socialist constituency at about the same time that the myth of progress, dominant in the West since the Enlightenment, collapsed in the technological carnage of the World Wars. Edith Hamilton believes that "progress" destroyed classical Greek civilization; perhaps a future historian will conclude that Western civilization has contained the seeds of its own destruction ever since the vision of common

Waite, The Sun (London)

"Fools—That's Next Week's Protest!"

salvation through technological and scientific progress ended in the nightmare of Kafka's Metamorphosis and In the Penal Colony. After World War II, the liberals, in reaction to the breakdown of political theory, retreated behind the end-to-ideology school of a latter-day era of good feelings, and thrust forward production as a new social ethic, a process which Galbraith dissected nicely in The Affluent Society. The radicals, in turn, retreated behind the barricades of the tattered ideologies of the depression years.

But ours is the decade of Vietnam, Selma and Watts; and today those responses are discredited fantasies. Yet political discussion on the Left remains weighted down by the dead controversies of the 1930s. The Left has failed to counter the disintegration of Western ideology by devising a new social and political ethic. It has not even tried to generate a new system of social values to meet the needs of a society of saturation and overconsumption that was not anticipated by Keynes or Marx or any of the men who evolved the ideologies under which we function. Since none of the elements of the Left has formulated a new vision of society, they are all directionless, all trapped in the politics of the moment. The Black Panthers reject liberal humanism and can offer instead only symbols and rhetoric. The suburban liberals dissolve into bitter divisions on such issues as supporting Humphrey or organizing a fourth party. The campus radicals rationalize their isolation and act out fictional options. None can form alliances; none has any notion of where an ally might be found. For example, it is currently fashionable in radical circles to advocate a worker-student alliance, as if the New Deal had not happened. Above all, the Left lacks a political strategy. And until it can develop a new vision, a new social and political ethic, it will continue to lack one.

WALKING OUT ON NEW YORK

City Schools & Albany Politics

JEROME WILSON

Mr. Wilson covers Albany as a legislative correspondent for WCBS-TV.

A lot of time was spent during the New York City school strike looking for villains. In fact, the city was almost literally divided between those who blamed the teachers for going out on strike in the first place, and those who blamed Rhody McCoy and the blacks for purportedly forcing the teachers to do so. Not just because it's their beat, many Albany observers are blaming the government of the state of New York for the whole mess. It was, after all, the New York State government (and more particularly the legislature) that ordered the city to produce a sweeping decentralization plan. It was the state government that then compromised grievously on granting the powers to implement that plan. Finally it was the state government (this time the state education hierarchy) that somewhat tardily worked out the ultimate settlement which ended the strike.

Taking the last point first, the settlement is essentially an agreement between the state Commissioner of Education, Dr. James Allen, and the city's teachers' union, with Mayor Lindsay and the City Board of Education relegated to little more than spectator roles. The state Education Commissioner and not the city is charged with appointing the trustee to run the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district. (The first state trustee, Dr. Herbert F. Johnson, has now retired because he is "worn out," and Allen has named a second, Dr. William D. Firman.) He is to decide whether or not to continue or renew the suspension of the district superintendent and the district board; he was responsible for appointing the three-member grievance committee for teacher complaints. Significantly, Dr. Allen cleared his appointees to this committee in advance with United Federation of Teachers president Albert Shanker.

But the state's involvement began well before its role of peacemaker. It really started with the New York State legislature. There is a body of opinion that holds that if the legislature had passed a meaningful school decentralization law at the 1968 session, the agonies of the fall would have been avoided. By this reasoning, if the legislature had adopted a self-executing procedure which did indeed create thirty independently functioning community school boards, with the power to hire their own district superintendents and their own new teachers, and even to set curriculum within a broad state framework, the union simply would not have had the power to pull the teachers out on strike. With these boards in full operation, it is felt, the chain of job security would have run between the district board and the teachers in the community, and not as has been the case in the past several years, between the city-wide teachers' union and the teachers in all the communities.

But the legislature passed no such law. A mere vestige of the broad decentralization plan prevailed—to pack the central city board with sufficient new seats to produce a pro-decentralization majority. As for a permanent decentralization plan, the legislature effectively put the matter over for a year, if not forever.

True, under the Marchi Bill (the law that passed) the central Board of Education was permitted to delegate certain powers to district boards; power to hire district school superintendents, for example, and even the power to hire teachers. Power could also be delegated to continue the three experimental districts. But permission to exercise these powers expires at midnight on June 30, 1969. Unless the legislature passes a new law before then, nothing will be left of the experiment.

The effect of the Marchi Bill, with its cut-off feature, was both to preserve the city-wide strike capability of the union, and to accentuate the dangers of excesses in local experiments. The result was an ugly confrontation that paralyzed education in the city for weeks.

The legislature at Albany accepted a procedure that merely postponed the whole question because it is habitually shy of new ideas. There is political safety in standing pat, and that was certainly a prime obstacle to the adoption of any broad plan of decentralization.

But the United Federation of Teachers also fought the regents' plan to decentralize the city schools. Not that the union can be charged with wanting to scuttle completely experiments in school decentralization—as some have charged. But the union obviously wants to go slowly. Even though the UFT had in the past enjoyed a good civil rights reputation, and had generally lined up on the side of progressive causes, it had its members' rights to think about, and it had its power of city-wide collective bargaining to preserve. The union was in a painful and honest dilemma, and so it backed a measure putting the matter over for a year.

And whereas the state education structure operates as a somewhat remote regency, able to put forward a proposal only on its own merits, the union has some high cards to play when it deals with the legislature. Getting the legislators to go along with its position required only gentle reminders of past attentiveness, reminders that were particularly effective in the Democrat-controlled, and New York City-oriented, state Assembly. Letters of union endorsement sent out just before Election Day to every teacher in a district meant something to city Democrats. On occasion, the UFT has also printed campaign fliers for individual legislators and, although the union is hardly a big spender, there have been instances of direct financial contributions to legislators' re-election campaigns.

Thus when the far more conservative, Republican-controlled state Senate indicated that it was ready to approve the broad school decentralization plan offered by the regents, the Democratic state Assembly balked. The liberal city Democrats in particular, the men who in the past had been most outspoken for civil rights legislation, sat quiet as stones to the inplorings of their Negro colleagues.

In a final pro forma amendment to adopt the sweeping decentralization plan, only two white liberals, Albert Blumenthal and Jerome Kretchmer, joined a united Negro delegation in voting aye. Having decided that the Democratic Assembly was "playing games," the Senate Republicans then withdrew their support for school decentralization.

This withdrawal of support was abetted by state Sen. John Marchi of Staten Island. Marchi is the ranking Republican from the city in the upper House, and in recent years has sponsored a series of UFT-drafted measures to increase city teachers' pensions by state mandate. The city protests these mandated increases, because the state allocates no parallel state aid to pay for them.

When signs of Democratic dissent to the regents' proposal became evident, Marchi suggested that one small aspect of the plan be changed. The original regents' bill would have eliminated the city Board of Education outright, replacing it with a full-time, professional three-member commission, appointed by the Mayor. Marchi's proposal was to require the City Council to consent to the Mayor's appointments. This meant politics in education to the regents, and they said no.

Marchi then came forward with his own decentralization plan, one that the teachers' union said it could live with. Although there were a number of close calls, with Albert Shanker personally appearing in Albany to make explicit in the law guarantees for teachers' tenure, the Marchi Bill became law. Mr. Shanker and a number of his union colleagues were in the Senate balcony when the final vote was taken. The regents were out of town.

After passing the Marchi Bill, which the Governor signed into law, the state government removed itself from the scene. Only when the city's education structure was in chaos, the following fall, did the state reappear. First to come in was State Education Commissioner James Allen. He is appointed by the regents and naturally sided with the Mayor, offering a plan that preserved the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district. But the union, having already beaten Allen and the regents at the 1968 legislative session, chose to ignore the plan, and Allen retired to Albany. The Commissioner said he was concerned about violating the principle of home rule in education and, in effect, wouldn't go where he wasn't wanted by all parties. He probably would have maintained this position but for political pressure on two fronts. First, the public was beginning to hound the Governor to call a special legislative session. (Local reporters were continually pestering him on this point as he campaigned the state for Nixon.) And individual state legislators, all running for re-election, were being beset by the same request. Not that they had the power to call such a session, but it became necessary for many campaigning legislators to join the chorus. If Allen had one main function in the eyes of the Governor and the legislators, it was to serve as a buffer to keep them out of the politically hurtful school crisis. With the public clamoring for a special session, or for direct Rockefeller involvement as in the sanitation crisis, it was obvious that the Commissioner and the regents were failing to fulfill this sensitive political role. Thus, the Commissioner and the regents came back in, this time for good.

Mel Weinstein

Another Allen plan was put forward to the disputants in the controversy, and again the union objected. Preservation of the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district was fundamental to Allen's position. He felt that dissolution of the experimental district would doom the community-control concept for all time. He also feared a racial conflict, if the experimental district was dissolved.

Allen and the regents maintained this position, even when legislative leaders summoned them to Albany and threatened radical changes in the state educational structure. The substance of the threat was that if the regents and Allen did not eliminate the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district and directly run these local schools, the legislative leaders had the power to reduce the regents to an advisory role and make the Education Commissioner a humble appointee of the Governor, with the job security of, say, the Motor Vehicles Commissioner. This would have ended the careful separation in state government of education authorities from elected officials. Nevertheless, the regents and Allen held fast. At the same time, Allen extracted from the Governor a public statement that he would not call a special session.

Before the election, the union's position had been that it would take a special session to resolve the controversy. But when the Democrats lost control of the Assembly, that idea lost much of its appeal. For a special session might not only mean dissolution of the Ocean Hill-Brownsville district, which may or may not have been a union objective; it might also mean considerable pressure to pass stronger anti-strike legislation in the area of public employee unions—higher fines for striking unions, penalties for striking workers and longer jail sentences for union leaders. Senate Majority Leader Earl Brydges suggested on a television broadcast that, had the legislature adopted the penalties originally proposed by the Taylor Commission, the UFT could have been fined $3 million for going out on strike. A special session of legislators in a punitive mood was to be avoided, and the union got down to hard bargaining with the parties at hand. The party with the most power was Dr. Allen.

The strike was ended, the schools are open, at least for the time being. The remaining question is the future of city school decentralization, which as with the remote and recent past of this awful controversy, rests with state government, and specifically with the 1969 session of the state legislature.

Even though the session doesn't convene until January, the leadership of the legislature has virtually decided to adopt a law that will split the city school system not into thirty community school districts but into five borough-wide districts. This would mean that, rather than a single city-wide board of education, there would be a Manhattan board of education, a Bronx board of education, and so on. Critics of the borough plan say that it will create five centralized evils in place of the one we have at present, that such a proposal demonstrates an almost total lack of comprehension of the principle of community control. They have a strong case, with this exception.

If the borough boards are elected, there is a distinct possibility that a pro-decentralization majority would be won in the Borough of Manhattan. This majority could decide in turn to continue experiments in community control of local school districts. Since this is at least some progress, many decentralization advocates are not rejecting borough control of schools out of hand. As a matter of fact, Dr. Allen has admitted privately that if pressed he could concur in this plan. And that is where matters now stand, with New York City again waiting for what New York State decides to do next with its teachers—and its children.

Emancipating the Mental Wards

MAX GORDON

Mr. Gordon, a former newspaper man and at present a director of technical research, has been for years closely associated with an organization of relatives and friends of patients in one of the New York State hospitals.

The recent strike at New York State's mental institutions was at least in part another manifestation of the many-sided drive by America's blacks to overcome the effects of their historic oppression. If the walkout at the hospitals did not develop the racial bitterness of the city's school strike, it was because the material sacrifice required of whites—primarily in the area of budget and taxes—is not as direct, tangible and individualized as the teachers perceived it to be; and because the form of the strike was that of a traditional labor struggle, with both sides striving for the support of all workers, black and white.

The New York State conflict contained some elements of the black rebellion developing generally within established national labor organizations, and aimed at breaking the monopoly of a white leadership that does not represent an expanding Negro membership. But the particular conditions in the state's mental hospitals, and their history, gave the struggle there its own importance.

Most nonprofessional employees in the state's mental institutions are ward personnel, the attendants and nurses who care for the patients around the clock. The work is tough, tense, at times dangerous—and low paid for the responsible, relatively sophisticated services performed. In the 1968 scale, an attendant's starting gross salary is somewhat less than $90 a week; after fifteen years it reaches a top of $120.

For this, the ward attendants act in loco parentis to the mentally ill, administer potent and varied drugs on schedule by injection or by mouth, take blood pressures, are alert to signs of physical reaction to drugs or to the onset of acute psychotic episodes, and generally minister to the needs of a few dozen patients at a time.

Until a quarter century ago, the custodial staffs in these state institutions were almost exclusively white. Located for the most part beyond the large population centers, the hospitals provided work for the local population. The pay was low, but better opportunities were hard to find. With World War II, and the postwar expansion and dispersal of large-scale industry, white workers could get away from these low-paying, thankless jobs.

As whites left, the state faced the alternative of drastically increasing pay scales or locating supplies of cheap labor to replace them. It chose the latter, sending recruiting teams into the Northern ghettos and the South to tap the sources provided by society's oppression of the blacks. By 1950, perhaps half the ward personnel in the hospitals of the metropolitan area was Negro and Puerto Rican. About a decade ago, when the rest of the whites who had sought economic refuge in these jobs during the depression began to retire, the proportion of Negroes and Puerto Ricans rose again. It is now between 70 and 80 per cent in the institutions of the New York City area.

As Msgr. James Cox, Catholic chaplain at Rockland State Hospital, describes the process, the black workers initially adapted to the paternalism of the hospitals' employee practices. But with the coming of the "black revolution," they rebelled against what they saw as exploitation forced upon them by their status in society. Since the existing Civil Service Employees Association (CSEA) did not seem an adequate channel for this rebellion, many joined the State, County and Municipal Employees of the AFL-CIO. Others, however, did begin to exert pressures within the CSEA. Both processes were accelerated by the 1967 Taylor Law, which both outlawed strikes and provided for collective bargaining by public employees.

The CSEA has been in existence for more than half a century. Although people join it almost automatically when they enter the state service, partly for its group insurance features and partly because the state hierarchy encourages membership, workers have participated little in its affairs. It has been generally controlled by upper echelons of the state government who from time to time "bargained" with the governor on an informal, fraternal basis. With the spread of unionism to public workers and the development of an AFL-CIO drive among state employees, the CSEA has recently solicited the participation of a wider membership. It has remained, nevertheless, a "respectable" organization within the civil service establishment, eschewing such "disruptive" tactics as picket lines and strikes.

The Taylor Law's guarantee of collective bargaining both stimulated growth of the rival AFL-CIO union, and generated internal pressures on the part of low-paid workers who had joined the CSEA almost automatically. Black workers, in the main those who through long service had taken on some of the conservative characteristics typical of civil servants, began to press for more active roles in the association, and they have assumed leading posts in a few chapters in the metropolitan area. But CSEA covers all departments and classifications in the state, and as a whole it continues to be dominated by a white elite.

CSEA does, however, carry 80 per cent of the state's employees on its books, and it claims that well over half of the AFL-CIO membership is also enrolled in the association. The union, on the other hand, has signed up some 9,000 to 10,000 employees in the state's mental institutions, or only about 30 per cent of the nonprofessional staffs. Thus the CSEA insists that it properly represents the majority and should be the sole bargaining agent, though the customary election for such an agent has not been held. As union spokesmen are quick to point out, however, in a recent collective bargaining election among state police, CSEA received only 8 per cent of the vote, though virtually all the police were association members. The union received a shade less than 50 per cent and the Policemen's Benevolent Association got about 42 per cent. In a later run-off, the union was beaten by the PBA. CSEA spokesmen explain their poor showing by saying that, naturally, the police would rather have a specifically police organization to represent them. This hardly explains why the police gave the union almost a majority in the initial balloting, as against the negligible vote received by CSEA. Nor is it clear why state hospital workers should not with equal naturalness want an organization specifically their own to represent them.

CSEA spokesmen are somewhat embarrassed to explain why so many of their members have chosen to fight for better conditions through a rival group. They attribute this to the affinity of workers in the metropolitan area for AFL-CIO organization—an association based on past or family union loyalty. This might be a factor among white workers, but it could scarcely weigh heavily with black workers, who are becoming increasingly hostile to the AFL-CIO bureaucracies.

The union claims organization in thirty-one of the state's thirty-four mental institutions. Membership in the various chapters naturally reflects the ethnic composition of the nonprofessional personnel in the respective institutions, and since organization is strongest in the metropolitan area, where the work force is overwhelmingly black, the union's membership and leadership has a large black component that is strongly influenced by the militant Negro movement. The union's goal in the recent strike was a collective bargaining election among workers in mental institutions, which its leaders appear to believe it will win, but the underlying purpose, of course, is to elevate pay levels and job status sharply. The union has projected the demand for a $6,000 minimum for ward attendants, with commensurate increases all along the line; and for a re-evaluation of jobs to reflect more accurately the nature of services rendered and to provide greater opportunities for career advancement. The militancy of the black workers has fired essentially conservative white workers in the same jobs upstate to a display of unwonted boldness in support of the union's position.

Before passage of the Taylor Law, Governor Rockefeller had bargained—informally and sporadically—with the CSEA. The law now requires him to negotiate formally. A Public Employment Relations Board (PERB) accordingly was set up to propose the division of state employees into appropriate bargaining units, with negotiating agencies to be elected within each unit. The PERB was to submit its report by November 15 of this year. Meanwhile the Governor, overriding the PERB's opposition, negotiated exclusively in 1967 with the CSEA as representative of a general unit consisting of 124,000 state workers (all except the state police and educational personnel). In 1968 he again initiated exclusive bargaining with the CSEA in the context of next year's state budget. When on November 15 the PERB had not yet presented a final plan for permanent bargaining units, and the Governor continued to talk exclusively with CSEA, the union decided it had to act. It began with the tactic of striking one or two hospitals at a time. Both the union and CSEA, and undoubtedly the Governor as well, were acutely aware of the likelihood that another year of exclusive contractual agreement between the CSEA and the Governor could break the union drive. Had the union not struck, the CSEA and the Governor would probably have signed a hasty contract before the PERB produced its bargaining unit plan. This was the stated goal of the CSEA, and Rockefeller's preference for that group was no secret.

In August, Paul E. Klein, director of representation for the PERB, had recommended that his board designate six separate bargaining units for the 124,000 workers then represented by the CSEA. Employees in state hospitals were to be included in a health service unit. The CSEA and the Governor reacted so violently that the PERB hastily dropped the idea, and called for additional study and public hearings. On November 27, ten days after initiation of the strike and with no further public hearings, the PERB presented a new plan dividing the state's workers into five bargaining units. This proposal was anything but an improvement from the Governor's viewpoint, but the strike was on, and Mr. Rockefeller immediately announced that he would abide by the plan; he broke off negotiations with the CSEA. The latter, however, has gone into court in an effort to retain its position as sole negotiator for all employees. This move is expected to hold up election of bargaining agents for the five units by perhaps a couple of months. If so, the results will come at about the time when the legislature is debating the Governor's budget, including salary schedules, thereby creating another tense situation in the state service.

Except for the delay, the union appears generally happy about the results of the strike. The current PERB plan places state hospital workers in a bargaining unit consisting of nonprofessional employees in state institutions. There are said to be forty such institutions in the unit—comprising, presumably, those in the Mental Hygiene Department and the reform schools for youthful delinquents. From the union's viewpoint, this is a considerable improvement even over Klein's proposals of late August. Its leaders are convinced that their strike action stopped the Governor from entering into a contractual agreement with the CSEA, compelled him to discontinue his negotiations with that body, and transformed his hostility to the August representation plan into acceptance of the November plan. These were, in fact, the union's precise goals when it called the strike.

Union spokesmen, however, are angered by efforts to punish strike leaders and strikers following the return to work. They note that, while Teachers union president Albert Shanker and Sanitation union head John De Lury received fifteen-day jail sentences for shutting down the entire city school system and stopping all garbage collection, two black leaders of a strike of little more than 1,000 workers in four state institutions were given lower court sentences of thirty and twenty days. Appeal is pending.

The state administration, operating through Mental Hygiene director Dr. Alan Miller, has also announced plans to punish the strikers as provided in the Taylor Law. Union spokesmen see that as a reflection of Governor Rockefeller's resentment at having been compelled to retreat from his insistence upon bargaining exclusively with CSEA, and possibly as a "grandstand play" necessitated by his criticism of Mayor Lindsay's supposedly "weak" handling of strikes by city workers. They doubt that the threat can be carried through in the light of existing employee shortages in the hospitals. There are substantial indications, however, that the imbalance in punishment of white and black union leaders, and the threat of mass disciplining of predominantly black strikers, is not unnoticed in New York's black communities.

Dr. Miller opposed the walkout but throughout the strike he made plain his belief that the dispute could be settled "only when the workers themselves are convinced that they will have an opportunity for an election." The director is apparently planning to overhaul the entire system of job classifications and career opportunity in the state hospitals. He has set up an apparatus to study the situation, an act which the union applauds. But Miller does not control appropriations; the Governor and the legislature do.

What about the 110,000 patients in the state's mental institutions? Those in hospitals which were affected or threatened by strike were undoubtedly subjected to broken routines and disrupted therapy. Many had to be returned to homes which were in no position to give them proper care, with resultant hardship for both patients and their families. But, more permanently the lives of hospital patients have suffered profoundly from the consequences of low pay for ward staffs. They need an adequate, stable and dedicated corps of workers to whom they can relate and who can get to know them. To date, job conditions have militated against the development of such a corps, at least in the metropolitan area. The turnover of ward personnel averages about 30 per cent annually. Since attendants go through a three-week training period in the classroom and ten weeks under supervision in the wards, this turnover represents a substantial waste of training time and money, and prevents staff stability.

In the matter of numbers, the customary vacancy ratio is about 15 per cent for staffs which would not be adequate even at capacity. A Congressionally established federal commission recommended in 1961 that state hospitals be modeled after those in the Veterans Administration, which operate on a 1-to-1 ratio of ward staff to patients. This does not mean that at any time there is an attendant on the wards for each patient. Three shifts, the five-day week, vacations, holidays and absenteeism reduce the actual proportion to an average of one attendant or nurse for every five or six patients. In New York State hospitals, however, the budgeted ratio of ward staff to patients is about 1 to 3. Hence, even with a full complement, the actual number of attendants and nurses on the wards at any time would average one for every fifteen or twenty patients. Vacancies, plus a substantial absenteeism stemming from the fact that ward workers must often hold down other jobs, have reduced actual attendance to an average of one ward worker for every twenty-five or thirty patients in most hospitals in the metropolitan area. In practice, many more attendants and nurses are needed on the day shifts, so that it is not unusual for one attendant to be responsible for sixty or seventy patients during the night. This staff pressure also prevents the weeding out of those who are temperamentally or otherwise unfit for the delicate job of administering to the mentally ill with compassion, fidelity and patience.

Thus while the form of the labor conflict in the state's mental institutions is that of a jurisdictional struggle, a good deal more is involved. The black majority of non-professional workers in the institutions in the metropolitan area is leading a rebellion against the low status into which it has been forced by oppression. To the extent that it succeeds in elevating pay and status, whether directly through the union or through union and internal pressures on the CSEA, it will confer as a side effect considerable benefits upon the mentally ill and retarded who are compelled to spend some or all of their lives in the state institutions.

THE BRAMBLE OF POWER

RONALD V. SAMPSON

Mr. Sampson is a lecturer in politics at the University of Bristol (England). His most recent book is The Psychology of Power (Pantheon).

Every age flatters itself on its uniqueness, but it is difficult not to believe that our own age is peculiar for the extent of the breakdown of its established beliefs. Certainly, in retrospect, periods of cultural transition do stand out. Somewhere, for instance, between the burning of Joan of Arc and the death of Copernicus, the fixed certitudes of a unified, feudal Catholic Christendom perished, and out of the ruins emerged the modern world. It began with the belief in Progress, it proceeded to spawn a belief in Democracy, and came finally to rest or rather unrest on the faith of Socialism. Today, this world, with its trinity of Progress, Democracy, Socialism, is itself visibly perishing before our eyes. It is true that the words still evoke a positive response in the minds of many men, but there is a deep and widespread sense of disillusionment and frustration.

It may be objected that this is an unreal way of focusing the map of our cultural universe, since it ignores the deep fissure which is thought to divide existing culture into two warring halves, the great 20th-century chasm between liberalism and communism. Socialism is an unquestioned axiom in one-half of the world, a term of abuse in the other; while democracy, if a universally hallowed term, is translated in contradictory fashion—we are told—by its liberal and Communist adherents. I wish to suggest, nevertheless, that an ethos common to all of mid-20th-century culture transcends the lesser differences within it, that it can be summed up in the trinity of animating beliefs, Progress, Democracy, Socialism. Further, that this ethos, which has shaped the thinking of intellectuals throughout the world on both sides of the ideological curtain, is itself now being challenged at its roots and increasingly found wanting.

First, consider Progress. Insofar as the concept is concerned with securing the moral improvement of mankind, it is beyond criticism; but there is a quite different meaning attached to the idea of progress, and it has done much to shape the world in which we live. The medieval world was static in that the map of knowledge was fixed by the authority of the ancients, the Scriptures, and insofar as these required authoritative exegesis, the Church, one and indivisible. The Copernican revolution toppled all those authorities at a single blow; the new method as elaborated by Bacon, Descartes and Pascal insured that the theory of knowledge itself was henceforth dynamic, self-correcting and self-perpetuating, grounded not in authority but in experience and reason, common to all men. The reason why this revolution soon swept everything before it, why the authority of religion came to be superseded by the authority of science, was simply that knowledge, as Bacon explained, was power. The scientists themselves, Copernicus, Tycho Brahe, Kepler, even Galileo Galilei, may have been animated largely by the love of knowledge and the inimitable satisfaction that comes from enlarging the understanding; but lesser men were excited by the unlimited prospects for power over nature opened to them by the mastery of such controlling keys. In short, although science was destined to be an easy victor in its battle with religion by virtue of its claim to have an unrivaled means to advance human riches and material well-being, the reason for the increasingly uncritical worship of progress lay in its immense emotional appeal to the root human appetite for power—power first over nature and through that, power over other men.

The theory of Democracy was implicit both in the scientific revolution and in the Reformation, for in each case the appeal was against authority to the common stock of reason available in every man. The appeal to reason was implicitly an appeal to the equality of the individual insofar as no class, church, state or any other group could claim to have any monopoly of reason. But how was the reason of large numbers of individuals to be translated into effective political action; how were the wills of feudal aristocrats to be supplanted by the wills of common people? There seemed only one solution in logic that could meet the problem, and representation based on suffrage became the legitimizing principle of state sovereignty.

Although Rousseau had long since stated the obvious—that will cannot be represented—people in the 19th century had an overwhelming need to deceive themselves that it could, and the logic of representative government carried everything before it. It was tacitly agreed to ignore Rousseau's tactless insistence on the illusion of supposing that a few could take decisions involving large numbers without doing violence to their essential liberties, no matter how intricate or sophisticated the balloting arrangements of the electoral process. Henceforth, every state was required to prove its legitimacy by becoming democratic. That is, the people, generally defined as all adults of sound mind over the age of 21, were to have the right to say yea or nay at fairly regular intervals to certain political groups who sought the right to govern. The purpose of government naturally remained what it had always been, the exercise of power. So democracy like progress harnessed to its chariot the enormous energy of the human appetite for power.

The demand for Socialism originally was no more than the application by people living in a capitalist society of the democratic principle of equality to the economic life of the community. It is impossible to defend capitalism as a rational and just mode of organizing economic activity. Belloc, who loathed it, defined capitalism briefly as "the planned exploitation of the majority of non-owners by the minority who are owners." Keynes, who defended it, had this to say: "For modern capitalism is absolutely irreligious, without internal union, without much public spirit, often though not always, a mere congeries of possessors and pursuers." Socialism, as so far practiced, consists of transferring either by expropriation or compensation the ownership of capital and the instruments of production from private hands to public agencies. The intent was to abolish the profit motive and, by removing immense sums of unearned wealth from private control, to re-establish on behalf of the community the right to manage its own economic life. Though there was much else in the Socialist aspiration, that is what has resulted so far—almost completely in the Eastern countries of the Communist world, and partially so in the "mixed" (capitalist-dominated) economies of the West. All public ownership in both East and West has taken the form of nationalization (except for a very small degree of municipal ownership of local utilities). And a nationalized industry is neither owned nor directed by the workers, consumers or any other members of the public at large; it is controlled, directly or indirectly, by the government.

Socialism may have been responsible for raising the material standard of life of the workers, it may have brought about a more just distribution of income—and these are important gains—but one indisputable consequence of "socialism," as so far experienced everywhere, has been to add enormously to the existing power of the minority who wield political sovereignty, a power which has become, if not greater than under capitalism, certainly not less. (It is very difficult to separate the variables in order to make a judgment. Obviously there is less overt dissent in the USSR than in the United States or in Britain, but this disparity cannot by any means be attributed simply to the differences of economic system.) In short, "socialism" also has served to give an immense boost to the concentration of power.

Taken together, these interacting aggrandizements of power in the scientific and technical, the political and economic spheres have been instrumental in promoting a staggering world-wide increase of military power, or power in its purest form. The demands of this military power have in turn become insatiable, and are now so great that they cannot be met except by continent-wide superpowers, which alone command the necessary resources. The United States, the USSR and China are already in the category, and Europe is striving toward unification in order not to be excluded outright from big-power status in the League of the Giants.

I hold that the culture of modern man is profoundly secular, empirical, pragmatic, even (in a manner of speaking) egalitarian, resting on the three pillars of Progress, Democracy and Socialism; that this culture is bankrupt and is leading us to total disaster because it has consistently turned a blind eye to the fact that its apparent idealism has in fact masked that source of all evil, the love of power. The charge is sweeping but can be sustained, I believe, by a closer look at the pass to which we have been brought by a misguided faith in Progress, Democracy and Socialism.

Many in the 18th and 19th centuries believed that all the world needed was to rid itself of the residual traces of superstition, scholasticism, authoritarian ecclesiasticism. Knowledge and reason, thus unfettered, would then lead man to ever-increasing prosperity and happiness. The spirits of Voltaire, Comte and Mill, the embodiments of liberal optimism and rationalism, live on in our midst, yet observe some of the "blessings" of latter-day progress. In what is still called "defense," the engines of destruction and their means of delivery in speed, accuracy and length of trajectory have developed to incredible lengths. Not only is it possible to exterminate whole cities in a matter of seconds; but the machinery, a vast labyrinthine organization, is already in being throughout the world to carry out such a project, immediately the alleged deterrent should fail to work.

The Tribune (London)

In addition to the threats of "defense," we have learned to accept as normal a mode of transport which in Britain alone kills more than 7,000 persons a year and injures up to 400,000. In the air the British and the French are competing with the United States and Russia for the "honor" of pioneering supersonic aircraft—which "achievement," if ever permitted, would at grotesque cost become an unprecedented scourge to the hundreds of millions living beneath the supersonic boom carpet. Even the less thoughtful are beginning to realize that new knowledge of potential benefit to mankind, far from representing inevitable gain, may only too probably become a curse, once the possibilities of its prostitution have been grasped by the impulses to power and profit, and with those impulses determining the priorities. Tolstoy lived long enough to be shown the motorcar. He commented: "Motorcars, in our Russian world! There are people who have no shoes, and here are motorcars costing twelve thousand rubles."

A television set in every home has already gone far to transform both our politics and our culture. Whatever the merit of the programs, the inevitable effect is to increase enormously the power and revenues of the controlling few, whose overriding interest is to maintain their own power. And we are only at the beginning of this disastrous revolution. The electronics industry has not yet invaded the schools on an extensive scale, but the attempt is under way. The educational public will of course at first resist, but they will be subjected to the usual barrage of plausible commercial arguments to overcome their basic instincts and better judgment. The emphasis will be on efficiency, economy, the indisputable value of some technological aids in education; while the central corroding evil, that the entire project is being inspired by the will to power and profit, will be ignored. Tolstoy was taken to see that new marvel, the motion picture. "What a wonderful instrument this could be in the schools," he said, "for studying geography and the way people live. But it will be prostituted. Like everything else."

"Within the next two decades, life on our planet will be showing the first signs of succumbing to industrial pollution. The atmosphere will become unbreathable for men and animals; all life will cease in rivers and lakes; plants will wither from poisoning." This is not an extract from a novel by H. G. Wells but a summary by The Guardian (September 16) of a report from a UNESCO Conference of Conservation experts. Of the havoc being caused to the balance of nature by the indiscriminate use of toxic chemicals as pesticides in agriculture, we have been warned at length by Rachel Carson and others. From the world of "pure" science, more and more reports filter through to suggest that human beings are actually engaged in experiments to mutate and reconstruct artificially the very genes which make us into human beings, further than which it is not possible for perversion to go. These terrible dangers arise directly from the fact that the huge numbers of scientists and technologists, East and West, have been reared from earliest childhood in a false metaphysic by which they either delude themselves that they have no responsibility as scientists for the ultimate purpose of their researches, or alternatively that they are pragmatists manipulating matter according to the dialectical principles animating nature.

It is not easy to decide how much space to devote to the issue of contemporary democracy. To tens of millions the ritual of voting is a cornerstone of civilization; the habit has become a reflex action, like making sure that everything is locked up before going to bed (the ultimate reason for government itself, as Hobbes pointed out). Nevertheless, inexorable fact rules here, as among other sacred customs, and the facts have now become so clear as to be increasingly visible even to people conditioned by intensive indoctrination.

While the phenomena of Executive government, machine politics, managerial administration and public relations manipulation are to be found in all "democratic" industrialized states, nowhere has the fraud of the democratic façade become more crudely evident than in Britain. The reason for this is that nowhere else has a serious attempt been made on a nation-wide scale to achieve disarmament through the accepted constitutional channels. The machinery of democracy was invoked by the biggest grass-roots political movement of modern times to legislate nuclear disarmament. When a majority was finally won for this policy in the Labour Party, the party at present governing Britain, the ruling clique was wholly undeterred by its minority status and simply declared its defiance of the majority, knowing that it had the power to do so. The methods included all the techniques of the professional politician: rigid control of key candidate selections, expulsion threats, actual expulsions, ambiguous resolutions, contradictory resolutions, silencing of opponents, the traditional methods of deceit and intimidation that have marked the struggle for power through the ages.

How could such things happen in a country with any experience of democracy? Because where supreme military power is at stake, the press is as much a puppet of the circles ruling a so-called democracy as it is of those in the most totalitarian states. The result is that the electoral choice available to the voter in Britain, the United States, France and West Germany is illusory. Consider briefly the "alternatives" in the United States and Britain on the record of the recent past. When one recalls the more glaring examples of direct imperial intervention by the United States in the domestic affairs of small nations since the last World War, the Democrats and Republicans share the dishonors about equally. If the Republicans are formally responsible for toppling the authorized governments of Iran (Mossadegh) and Guatemala, the Democrats must take the blame for Greece, Santo Domingo and Cuba. Vietnam, a crime sui generis, is a responsibility fully shared by both parties. Whoever occupies the White House, the CIA remains. Britain under the Tories witnessed the abortive buccaneering exploit of Suez, the war in Cyprus, the atrocities of the Hola camp in Kenya, the setting up of the Central African Federation in the teeth of united African protest, and at home fiscal concessions to the rich in a framework of economic inflation. The Labour Party, elected to office in the name of socialism, has been Lyndon Johnson's most servile ally in Vietnam, has gassed people in Aden, betrayed the Africans in Rhodesia, supplied arms to slaughter and starve the people of Biafra despite the disgust of the entire nation, and recognized the Greek colonels in Athens. At home, it has introduced apartheid into the Commonwealth Immigration Act, abolished the principle of a free health service, drastically cut back the education program, increased unemployment by deflationary measures, and threatened to make strikes illegal. Such choices as these constitute the democratic freedoms of the common man.

Socialism, in practice as distinct from theory, has come to be equated with the principle of public ownership or nationalization. In the West, it has been carried out on only a limited scale, and is therefore difficult to evaluate. All one can say is that the structure of command, the morale of the workers, the quality of human relations are not markedly different in the public and private sectors.

Certainly there is no longer any disposition to embrace public ownership as a panacea for social and economic problems.

Of the Communist countries, where public ownership is total or virtually so, it must be observed that, since no individuals can make profit out of the ownership of the means of production, great private fortunes have been eliminated and the power of money as such has been drastically shorn; but that inequality of remuneration for labor remains the basic distributive principle as in the West. Moreover, the Socialist structure of military power, the volume of "defense" expenditure, the astronomical sums spent on the lunacy of the space race, are parallel to those of the West—and the economic burden on a society not so far advanced industrially is correspondingly greater.

Both the Hungarians and the Czechs have experienced direct and brutal external intervention in their internal affairs. Internally throughout the Communist countries, the private individual has even less ability to dissent from or protest against public policy than he does in the West. There was a certain irony (in which we can take no pleasure) in the fact that during the May days, many of the radical dissenters in Paris looked ideologically to Marx, while dissent in Czechoslovakia looked enviously on the possibilities for protest open to Western students and workers. The other important point to note about "Socialist" experience is that people in Communist countries feel the same hunger for consumer goods and urban amenities as do those in the West. The disastrous 20th-century movement from the countryside to the town, with the resultant concentration of populations in megalopolis, and the denuding of the rural areas, is not a malaise peculiar to capitalist-dominated economies but is a world-wide phenomenon.

The culture of the entire modern world—both in the collectivist, materialist half and in the individualist, materialist half—is governed by the three principles of Progress, Democracy and Socialism, with consequences that by any sane human values are now intolerable and that must inevitably become worse. What went wrong? There was nothing but excellence in the principles themselves. Why then is it such a sterile, disillusioning experience to read now the zealous reformers of yesterday, the writings of progressive intellectuals of the 18th century, of the Victorians and even—I had almost said especially—of the 1930s? The writings, that is, of Wells, Cole, Laski, Strachey, the Webbs, Tawney, Keynes. The only exception is Russell, and the exception is significant. Russell is the only one who has had any real grasp of the true nature of power.

The trouble with all the other progressives, democrats and Socialists, was that they not only failed to diagnose the true evil of power but actually depended on it as the indispensable means of implementing their ideals and reforms. A ritualistic genuflection was felt to be obligatory from time to time in the direction of Acton's hackneyed dictum, but the general assumption was that it hung there as a warning to us lest we should stray from the strict path of liberal parliamentarianism and fall into the kind of military junta despotism associated with the Balkans, the Middle East or Latin America. Power was never analyzed psychologically or ethically, since it was accepted as an inescapable political necessity, as natural to homo politicus as procreation was to homo libidinis. The result was that the harder good men worked to achieve progress, democracy, socialism, the more grievous their situation became. What occurred in reality was a steady, unbroken growth in the quantum of power—fewer and fewer men came to control the lives of more and more men. At a time when the truth of human equality had never been so widely grasped, we experienced in 1962 the humiliation of Cuba week when the fate of all mankind appeared to rest in the hands of two men, Khrushchev and Kennedy, exceptional only for the intensity of their love of power.

To diagnose a disease so galloping and so obvious is not difficult. To prescribe the remedy is also not difficult. To carry out that remedy is very difficult indeed. Our culture still takes its name from the remarkable Palestinian of 2,000 years ago; the epoch itself is called Christian, and the year of His birth marks our largest division of historic time. Therefore it makes sense to begin with the record of the origins of the religion by which most of the Western Hemisphere has lived through two millennia.

The significance of the New Testament lies not in its recommendation of any political program or policy. Had it done so, it would have perished in a season, for nowhere is the smell of death so sharp as over yesterday's politics. Its significance rests in its discussion of how the individual ought to conduct himself in this world. It concerns itself with the religious problem of the meaning of human life, in order to elucidate the nature of a man's obligation to God and to his neighbor. At the same time, the Gospels cannot in any sense be described as apolitical. They not only abound with references to the state, the military, the tax gatherers, the rich, the clergy; they provide us with the classic confrontation of Caesar and the religious dissenter. Jesus was judicially murdered by crucifixion not because he attacked the state directly. He did not do so, nor did he urge his friends to do so. But he did insist that a man's obligation to God necessitated that he should behave toward his neighbor in a manner that ran directly counter to the way in which the authorities in church and state conducted their relations with those who allegedly owed them allegiance.

Moreover, Jesus taught that, while a man should always return good for evil and give even more than was expected or asked of him, he should under no circumstances obey an evil will in order to avoid conflict, he should not forfeit his own right to refrain at all times from coercing others. But if all men followed such a nostrum, it would totally destroy state power; even a few brave men who were beyond the reach of intimidation could constitute a serious threat to that power. Such individuals were accordingly put to death: Jesus, Peter, Paul, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, Maximilianus, Marcellus the centurion, to name but a few.

Their courage inspired many others; but with the growth in numbers the extraordinary quality of the response diminished, and various compromises were introduced to enable the less heroic to avoid paying penalties they very naturally felt unable to meet. Moreover, their own leaders acquired a taste for leadership and organization. The most obvious compromise was to acquiesce in the minimum demands of the state, to concede legitimacy to a purely political sphere of human activity, and that is what (with recurring exceptions of small "heretic" minorities) the vast majority of "Christians" have been doing ever since. We have been doing it for so long that over wide areas understanding has been lost of the fact that power and conscience must inevitably clash. When men have set out on this slippery slope, there is no logical place to draw the line beyond which not another inch will be yielded to state power. Step by step, we are led onward, until we reach the ultimate betrayal where reside the Machiavellis and the de Maistres to claim moral legitimacy for Kratos, power, Caesar, the state in its own right, spinning its own self-authentication out of the logic of its own requirements. The safety of the people is the supreme law, and by the safety of the people is meant the preservation of the existing power structures. When men begin to listen respectfully to such views, it is only a matter of time before they pay the price of Auschwitz and Hiroshima, and all the horrors of totalitarian power.

Donato, Toronto Telegram (Canada)

However, in contemporary political thought, insofar as there can be said to be any, we have to deal with a defense of politics in more muted terms. The specifically political arena seeks our rational support in the guise of a quasi-judicial, democratic arbitrator, the alleged thermometer of "consensus." According to this analysis, the "virtuous" or "legitimate" power is the one which recognizes that in a human world the quest for power is an inescapable reality, accepts the struggle and seeks itself to hold the ropes and play the part of honest broker. The ferocity of the struggle for power is mitigated by liberal parliament-tary discussion and debate, aided by a multiplicity of pressure groups and voluntary associations designed to elucidate the lowest common multiple of general agreement. Once this consensus has been obtained, the democratic solution is benevolently imposed by the government as a good, impartial judge, eager only to command the widest possible area of consent.

This analysis is specious and dishonest in that it fails entirely to look into the question of the nature of power itself. It studiously ignores the fact that virtue cannot by any conceivable logic dwell together with power; that the power arena is necessarily confined exclusively to the big battalions, access to which is neither desired by nor permitted to virtue; that the so-called consensus makers, if not themselves the voices of enormously wealthy vested interests must take those interests into account in order that they should be seen to speak "realistically."

From the standpoint of mending our existing grievous situation, "realistic" recommendations—that is, those which reflect the existing distribution of power and prejudice—are quite futile. It is they that have caused our troubles, and an answer in terms of realistic politics is therefore not possible. The politicians are demonstrably impotent, except to go on doing more damage. True values can realize themselves in the life of the individual only by nonpower means. Without intending to do so, individuals who govern their lives by love of truth, and who are consequently possessed of conviction and integrity, cannot but encourage and strengthen the rest of us in a similar quest. For one thing, they are seen to be both disinterested and consistent, as well as free from the circumlocutions, ambiguities and equivocations which inevitably characterize the utterances of those who are bound not by truth but by the demands of the political market.

No power figure, no officeholder can in the nature of things afford corresponding convictions. He is obliged by the requirements of his position, by consideration of how much truth the public will bear, to make vacillatory, opinion-poll-veering pronouncements. That is the price of office, of "responsibility." If the process is sustained long enough, and depending on how close the particular officeholder draws to the apex of power, the inner fortress of the soul must itself be threatened. At the height of their power, a Caesar, a Charlemagne, a Napoleon, a Hitler and their pocket contemporaries pay a terrible price. They are simulacra, power puppets. All power corrupts absolutely.

Only by appealing to the private individual can we give meaning to the legitimate ideals of Progress, Democracy and Socialism. We shall do so not by fashioning yet another political party, inscribing new slogans and policies on its masthead, in order to strive by power means—that is, external coercive means—to legislate men into goodness. That is like setting out to square the circle or to make hot ice. The effect of substituting true values for false ones must ultimately be reflected in the external behavior of the individuals concerned. True progress consists not of learning to be more acquisitive or faster moving but of learning to renounce powerfully felt desires. True democracy consists not of joining a party or caucus and manipulating a mass public of passive voters but of striving to learn the genuine needs of one's immediate neighbor and attempting to meet them on an egalitarian basis. True socialism consists not of an externally imposed collectivism but of co-operation with one's fellow workers to produce for use, not profit.

The mere statement of abstract principle sounds both sentimental and impractical, but that is because we are so deeply conditioned to equate practical politics with power politics. Even radicals who protest sincerely their attachment to nonviolence often think and speak in terms of externally imposed political solutions. The reason is that the condoning of some violence (politely termed, "force") is a prerequisite of any hitherto imaginable form of government, and that to be thought responsible one must work from a policy that has at least a prospect of being imposed through some form of governmental institution or agency in a foreseeable future. To go outside these tacitly agreed limits of respectable discussion, limits which desperately need to be enlarged, is to condemn oneself to the isolation of the utopian Ishmaelite. But when all political discussion is restricted to what can realistically be prescribed for the population as a whole in the light of our existent fears and ambitions, the medicine that is urgently necessary, namely, true analysis of the fundamental causes of our present discontents, is never seriously considered.

The fundamental mistake of all political discussion is its assumption that some men must rule if the rest are to enjoy the indispensable blessings of law and order within and protection from external aggression without. In this way power, the basic cause of the threat of "anarchy" and war, is neatly side-stepped. The magnitude of the problem is impossible to exaggerate, but that is not a reason for evading it. Long-term action needs to be undertaken at the level of psychotherapy, family mores, child nurture and an education, cooperative and not competitive, that is devoted to rearing the whole creative potential of man through the work of his hands and his brain in a life that is not divorced from nature.

The will to power and the disposition to submit are alike products of a lack of genuine creativity and emotional deprivation at the hands of those whose task it was to love us. To seek power is a mark of inner moral sterility and loss of spiritual tranquility. And this must have been understood from the earliest times, or Jotham could never have conceived of his parable of the trees, as related in the Book of Judges. Neither the olive nor the fig nor the vine was willing to be promoted over the other trees in order to rule over them, because each in the way appointed for it was productive of precious fruit. The trees therefore elected as their king the bramble who was uncreative and clutched at the scepter of office that was proffered him, as a compensation for his deficiencies on other fronts.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Undoing of the World of Things

THE DEMANDS OF ART. By Max Raphael. With an Introduction by Herbert Read. Translated by Norbert Guterman. Princeton University Press (Bollingen Series). 258 pp. $15.

JOHN BERGER

Mr. Berger is a regular contributor to New Society (London). His Art and Revolution, a new work on the role of the artist in the USSR, will be published by Pantheon in the spring.

Some fight because they hate what confronts them; others because they have taken the measure of their lives and wish to give meaning to their existence. The latter are likely to struggle more persistently. Max Raphael was a very pure example of the second type.

He was born near the Polish-German border in 1889. He studied philosophy, political economy and the history of art in Berlin and Munich. His first work was published in 1913. He died in New York in 1952. In the intervening forty years he thought and wrote incessantly. Only a fraction of his work has been published and most of that is out of print. He left thousands of pages of manuscript which his widow and friends are ordering and hoping to publish. Their subject matter ranges from paleontology to classical architecture, from Gothic sculpture to Flaubert, from modern city planning to epistemology.

For five years I tried to interest European publishers in his work. In vain. A fact which I mention only because in a few decades it may be hard to remember how unknown and unrecognized Max Raphael still was in 1968.

His life was austere. He held no official academic post. He was forced several times to emigrate. He earned very little money. He wrote and noted without cease. As he traveled, small groups of friends and unofficial students collected around him. By the cultural hierarchies he was dismissed as an unintelligible but dangerous Marxist; by the party Communists as a Trotskyist.

To appreciate the possible role of the book under review demands a clarity about the present situation of the arts. (Nobody who is not prepared to grapple with fundamentals should approach the book.) It is a situation of extreme crisis. The validity of art, itself is in question. Many significant artists in the world question whether art is justified—not on account of the quality of a particular talent but on account of the relevance of art to the demands of the time in which we live.

Raphael quotes a remark by Cézanne (in the context of a quite different analysis):

I paint my still lifes, these natures mortes, for my coachman who does not want them. I paint them so that children on the knees of their grandfathers may look at them while they eat their soup and chatter. I do not paint them for the pride of the Emperor of Germany or the vanity of the oil merchants of Chicago. I may get ten thousand francs for one of these dirty things, but I'd rather have the wall of a church, a hospital, or a municipal building.

Since 1848, artists unable to be mere paid entertainers have tried to resist the embourgeoisement of their finished work, the transformation of the spiritual value of their work into property value. This regardless of individual political opinions as such. In the years after Cézanne, the resistance of artists became more active and more violent—in that it was built into their work. What Constructivism, Dadaism, Surrealism, etc., all shared was their opposition to art as a cultural alibi for existing society. In the last decade the tactics of resistance have changed. Less frontal confrontation. Instead, infiltration. Irony and philosophic skepticism. The consequences in Tachism, Pop Art, Minimal Art, Neo-Dada, etc. But art is still transformed into the property of the property-owning class. In the case of the visual arts the property involved is physical; in the case of the other arts it is moral property.

Art historians with a social or Marxist formation have interpreted the art of the past in terms of class ideology. They have shown that a class, or groups in a class, tended to support and patronize art which to some degree reflected or furthered their own class values and views. It now appears that in the later stages of capitalism this has ceased to be generally true. Art is treated as a commodity whose meaning lies only in its rarity value and in its functional value as a stimulant of sensation. Works of art become objects whose essential character is like that of diamonds or sun-tan lamps. The determining factors of this development—internationalism of monopoly, powers of mass-media communication, level of alienation in consumer societies—need not concern us here. But the consequence does. Art can no longer oppose what is. The faculty of proposing an alternative reality has been reduced to the faculty of designing—more or less well—an object. Hence the imaginative doubt in all artists worthy of their category. Hence the fact that the militant young begin to use "art" as a cover for more direct action.

One might argue that artists should continue, regardless of society's immediate treatment of their work: that they should address themselves to the future, as all imaginative artists after 1848 have had to do. But this is to ignore the world-historical moment at which we have arrived. Imperialism, European hegemony, the moralities of capitalist-Christianity and state-communism, the practice of constructing "humanist" cultures on a basis of monstrous exploitation—this entire interlocking system is now being challenged; a world struggle is being mounted against it. Those who envisage a different future are obliged to define their position toward this struggle, obliged to choose. Such a choice tends to lead them to impotent despair or to the conclusion that world liberation is the pre-condition for any new valid cultural achievement. (I simplify and somewhat exaggerate the positions for the sake of brevity.) Either way their doubts about the value of art are increased.

In this present crisis, is it any longer possible to speak of the revolutionary meaning of art? This is the fundamental question. It is the question that Max Raphael begins to answer in The Demands of Art.

The book is based on some lectures that Raphael gave in the early thirties to a modest adult education class in Switzerland under the title "How Should One Approach a Work of Art." He chose five works and devoted a chapter of extremely thorough and varied analysis to each. The works are: Cézanne's "Mont Sainte-Victoire" of 1904-06 (the one in the Philadelphia Museum), Degas' etching of "Madame X Leaving Her Bath," Giotto's "Lamentation over the Dead Christ" (Padua) compared with his later "Death of Saint Francis" (Florence), a drawing by Rembrandt of "Joseph Interpreting Pharaoh's Dreams," and Picasso's "Guernica." (The chapter on Guernica was of course written later.) These are followed by a general chapter on "The Struggle to Understand Art," and by an appendix consisting of an unfinished but extremely important essay entitled "Towards an Empirical Theory of Art," written in 1941. The editing, production and translating of the present volume—under the direction of two of Raphael's friends—are a model of an efficient labor of love.

I shall not discuss Raphael's analyses of the five individual works. They are brilliant, long, highly particularized and dense. The most I can do is attempt a crude outline of his general theory.

A question which Marx posed but could not answer: If art, in the last analysis, is a superstructure of the economic base, why does its power to move us endure long after the base has been transformed? Why, asked Marx, do we still look toward Greek art as an ideal? He began to answer by speaking about the "charm" of "young children" (the young Greek civilization), and then broke off the manuscript and was far too occupied ever to return to the question.

"A transitional epoch," writes Raphael, "always implies uncertainty: Marx's struggle to understand his own epoch testifies to this. In such a period two attitudes are possible. One is to take advantage of the emergent forces of the new order with a view to undermining it, to affirm it in order to drive it beyond itself; this is the active, militant, revolutionary attitude. The other clings to the past, is retrospective and romantic, bewails or acknowledges the decline, asserts that the will to live is gone—in short, it is the passive attitude. Where economic, social and political questions were at stake Marx took the first attitude; in questions of art he took neither." He merely reflected his epoch.

Just as Marx's taste in art—the classical ideal excluding the extraordinary achievements of paleolithic, Mexican, African art—reflected the ignorance and prejudice of art appreciation in his period, so his failure to create (though he saw the need to do so) a theory of art larger than that of the superstructure theory was the consequence of the continual, overwhelming primacy of economic power in the society around him. In view of this lacuna in Marxist theory, Raphael sets out to develop a theory of art that he calls empirical "because it is based on a study of works of art from all periods and nations. I am convinced that mathematics, which has traveled a long way since Euclid, will some day provide us with the means of formulating the results of such a study in mathematical terms." And he reminds the skeptical reader that before infinitesimal calculus was discovered even nature could not be studied mathematically:

Art is an Interplay, an equation of three factors—the artist, the world and the means of figuration.

Raphael's understanding of the third factor, the means or process of figuration, is crucial. For it is this process which permits him to consider the finished work of art as possessing a specific reality of its own:

Even though there is no such thing as a single, uniquely beautiful proportion of the human body or a single scientifically correct method of representing space, or one method only of artistic figuration, whatever form art may assume in the course of history, it is always a synthesis between nature (or history) and the mind, and as such it acquires a certain autonomy vis-à-vis both these elements. This independence seems to be created by man and hence to possess a psychic reality; but in point of fact the process of creation can become an existent only because it is embodied in some concrete material.

The artist chooses his material—stone, glass, pigment or a mixture of several. He then chooses a way of working it—smoothly, roughly, in order to preserve its own character, in order to destroy or transcend it. What is represented is materialized in the worked, raw material; whereas the worked raw material acquires an immaterial character through its representations and the unnatural unity which connects and binds them together. "Artistic" material, so defined, a substance half physical and half spiritual, is an ingredient of the material of figuration.

The two processes which produce the material of figuration (the process of transforming raw material into artistic material and that of transforming the matter of sensation into means of representation) are continually interrelated. Together they constitute what might be called the matter of art.

Figuration begins with the separate long drawn-out births of ideas and motif, and is complete when the two are born and indistinguishable from each other.

"The characteristics of the individual idea are: (1) It is simultaneously an idea and a feeling. (2) It contains the contrasts between the particular and the general, the individual and the universal, the original and the banal. (3) It is a progression toward ever deeper meanings. (4) It is the nodal point from which secondary ideas and feelings develop."

"The motif is the sum total of line, color and light by means of which the conception is realized." The motif begins to be born apart from, but at the same time as the idea, because "only in the act of creation does the content become fully conscious of itself."

What is the relation between the pictorial (individual) idea and nature? "The pictorial idea separates usable from unusable elements of natural appearances and, conversely, study of natural appearances chooses from among all possible manifestations of the pictorial idea the one that is most adequate. The difficulty of the method comes down to proving what one believes—proof here consisting in this, that the opposed methodological starting points (experience and theory) are unified, brought together in a reality of a special kind, different from either, and that this reality owes its pictorial life to a motif adequate to the conception and developed compositionally."

What are the methods of figuration? (1) The structuring of space. (2) The rendering of forms within that space effective. The structuring of space has nothing to do with perspective: its tasks are to dislocate space so that it ceases to be static (the simplest example is that of the forward-coming relaxed leg in standing Greek figures) and to divide space into quanta so that we become conscious of its divisibility and thus cease to be the creatures of its continuity (e.g., the receding planes parallel to the picture surface in late Cézannes).

"To create pictorial space is to penetrate not only into the depths of the picture but also into the depths of our intellectual system of coordinates (which matches that of the world). Depth of space is depth of essence or else it is nothing but appearance and illusion."

The distinction between actual form and effective form is as follows:

"Actual form is descriptive; effective form is suggestive, i.e., through it the artist, instead of trying to convey the contents and feelings to the viewer by fully describing them, provides him only with as many clues as he needs to produce these contents and feelings within himself. To achieve this the artist must act not upon individual sense organs but upon the whole man, i.e., he must make the viewer live in the work's own mode of reality."

What does figuration with its special material (see above) achieve?

"Intensity of figuration is not display of the artist's strength; not vitality, which animates the outer world with the personal energies of the creative artist; not logical or emotional consistency, with which a limited problem is thought through or felt through to its ultimate consequences. What it does denote is the degree to which the very essence of art has been realized: the undoing of the world of things, the construction of the world of values, and hence the constitution of a new world. The originality of this constitution provides us with a general criterion by which we can measure intensity of figuration. Originality of constitution is not the urge to be different from others, to produce something entirely new; it is (in the etymological sense) the grasping of the origin, the roots of both ourselves and things."

One must distinguish here between Raphael's "world of values" and the idealist view of art as a depository of transcendental values. For Raphael the values lie in the activity revealed by the work. The function of the work of art is to lead us from the work to the process of creation which it contains. This process is determined by the material of figuration and it is within this material, which Raphael discloses and analyzes with genius, that mathematics may one day be able to discover precise principles. The process is directed toward creating within the work a synthesis of the subjective and objective, of the conditional and the absolute within a totality governed by its own laws of necessity. Thus the world of things is replaced within the work by a hierarchy of values created by the process it contains.

I can give no indication here of the detailed, specific and unabstract way in which Raphael applies his understanding to the five works he studies. I can only state that his eye and sensuous awareness were as developed as his mind. Reading him one has the impression, however difficult the thought, of a man of unusual and stable balance:

Since we cannot know ourselves directly, but only through our actions, it remains more than doubtful whether our idea of ourselves accords with our real motives. But we must strive unremittently to achieve this congruence. For only self-knowledge can lead to self-determination, and false self-determination would ruin our lives and be the most immoral action we could commit.

To return now to our original question: what is the revolutionary meaning of art? Raphael shows that the revolutionary meaning of a work of art has nothing to do with its subject matter in itself, or with the functional use to which the work is put, but is a meaning continually awaiting discovery and release.

"However strong a given historical tendency may be, man can and has the duty to resist it when it runs counter to his creative powers. There is no fate which decrees that we must be victims of technology or that art must be shelved as an anachronism: the 'fate' is merely misuse of technology by the ruling class to suppress the people's power to make its own history. To a certain extent it is up to every individual, by his participation in social and political life, to decide whether art shall or shall not become obsolete. The understanding of art helps raise this decision to its highest level. As a vessel formed by the creative forces which it preserves, the work of art keeps alive and enhances every urge to come to terms with the world."

"We have said that art leads us from the work to the process of creation. This reversion, outside the theory of art, will eventually generate universal doubt about the world as given, the natural as well as the social. Instead of accepting things as they are, of taking them for granted, we learn, thanks to art, to measure them by the standard of perfection. The greater the unavoidable gulf between the ideal and the real, the more inescapable is the question: Why is the existing world the way it is? How has the world come to be what it is? De omnibus rebus dubitandum est! Quid certum? We must doubt all things! What is certain? (Descartes). It is the nature of the creative mind to dissolve seemingly solid things and to transform the world as it is into a world in process of becoming and creating. This is how we are liberated from the multiplicity of things and come to realize what it is that all conditional things ultimately possess in common. Thus, instead of being creatures isolated among other isolated creatures we become part of the power that creates all things."

Raphael did not, could not, make our choices for us. Everyone must resolve for himself the conflicting demands of his historical situation. But Raphael does show, as no other writer has ever done, the revolutionary meaning of the works inherited from the past—and of the works that will be eventually created in the future. And this he shows without rhetoric, without exhortation, modestly and with reason. His was the greatest mind yet applied to the subject.

ART BOOKS / Lawrence Alloway

The sumptuary law which used to divide luxurious picture books from seriously argued texts is breaking, or has broken, down. Though André Malraux's Les Voix du Silence (1951) combined original text and glamorous photographs, visual and verbal elements have come apart since then. For close to twenty years picture books have exploited ever familiar subjects and the publishers have cannibalized one another's successes. Docile writers have obliged with suitably unauthoritative texts. There are signs now that the banal subjects have been used up (or, at least, that fresh areas are scheduled for future banalization).

A problem: once you have enough Van Gogh and Picasso picture books, once you have Masterpieces of Primitive Art and Treasures from the Jeu de Paume, what next? The answer is pretty clearly visible this year in terms of a more specialized subdivision of the history of art and a wider selection of artists as the subjects of monographs. Previously, such work was confined to modest formats. Now, however, instead of The Impressionists and Their World, say, there is Piero della Francesca and the Early Renaissance (my emphasis); instead of another book on Renoir, there is the first full-length study of the little-known but important Russian constructivist, El Lissitzky. This is not to say that publishers are now displaying a sustained scholarly zeal. At a time when there is no book on Mark Rothko or Barnett Newman, on Adolph Gottlieb or Robert Motherwell, it is pointless to bring out a big book with a trivial text on Arshile Gorky who is already satisfactorily covered by Ethel Schwabacher (1951) and William Seitz (1962). Also there are still publishers who try not to state too clearly when a book is a reprint (for example, Pevsner's Sources of Modern Architecture and Design) or a translation (such as Oertel's Early Italian Painting, a fact conceded only on the jacket).

What is happening is that more precise systems of calibration are being applied to art, even in the books that used to be intended for the coffee tables of non-specialists. The Renaissance, for instance, is not only separated now into Early and Late phases but into Northern and Southern. Early Christian art and late Byzantine painting are the subjects of serious scholarship and good reproductions.

The supposed antagonism of art history (as a tool of dead knowledge) and the instinctive enjoyment of art (as something creative) is not supported by the good new books. It is pleasant to record the absence of conflict between accuracy and illumination. An art historian who figures out an artist's chronology for the first time, or who defines a group of works of art in a fresh relationship, is animating the body of art more than a fulsome docent or a rapt art critic. Acts of classification and contextualizing clarify the highly esteemed creative process; they do not destroy it. The approach of the nonspecialized book toward more precise classification could well redeem the colorful dross, the bright beads for the natives, of Christmas past.

THE POET ASSASSINATED. By Guillaume Apollinaire. Translated by Ron Padgett. Illustrated by Jim Dine. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 128 pp. $9.95.

Dine's illustrations are a witty remake of the novel in terms of post-Pop Art realism. Not only an entertaining gloss on Apollinaire but a key to Dine's future imagery.

ART NEWS ANNUAL. Edited by John Ashbery and Thomas B. Hess. Newsweek. Color and black-and-white illustrations. 150 pp. $6.95.

The subject this year is "The Avant-Garde"; good essays by Linda Nochlin, Meyer Schapiro and Libby Tannenbaum.

GREAT DRAWINGS OF THE LOUVRE MUSEUM. 3 Vols. "The Italian Drawings." By Roseline Bacou. "The French Drawings." By Maurice Sérullaz. "The German, Flemish and Dutch Drawings." By Roseline Bacou. George Braziller. Copious color illustrations. 672 pp. Pre-Christmas $45; thereafter $60.

Brief preliminary essays on the collection, followed by detailed notes on the provenance and significance of the drawings, which are reproduced with an accuracy that simulates even vaguenesses in the originals.

THE HISTORY OF WORLD SCULPTURE. By Germain Bazin. New York Graphic Society. 1,000 color illustrations. 460 pp. Pre-Christmas $29.95; thereafter $35.

A group of summarizing essays prepares for a long all-color section with detailed captions. If there must be all-in-one books, this duplex approach (cultural generalizations and the specific description of objects) is workable.

TAHITIAN JOURNAL. By George Biddle. University of Minnesota Press. Black-and-white illustrations. 208 pp. $8.95.

Biddle, better known as a Federal Arts Project organizer, is seen here in Gauguinesque poses in a 1917-22 diary. Interesting.

AUGURIES OF INNOCENCE. By William Blake. Illustrated by Leonard Baskin. Grossman. (Unpaginated.) $5.

Blake's "World in a Grain of Sand" poem crudely interrupted by Baskin's gross, and non-Blakean, graphics.

HOGARTH: THE COMPLETE ENGRAVINGS. By Joseph Burke and Colin Caldwell, Harry N. Abrams. 267 black-and-white illustrations. 312 pp. $18.50.

Admirable volume to go with Burke's own edition of Hogarth's Analysis of Beauty. Beckett's catalogue of the paintings and Oppé's of the drawings.

BEYOND MODERN SCULPTURE. By Jack Burnham. Braziller. Black-and-white illustrations. 402 pp. $15.

Despite a meretricious title, this book is an exceptional, serious attempt to relate art to science without loss of art's evasive identity or science's methodological sophistication. Recommended.

ADVERTISING: Its Cultural and Political Effects. By Giancarlo Buzzi. Translated by B. David Garmize, University of Minnesota Press. 148 pp. $5.50.

A welcome step toward the introduction of data and nuances into a topic that calls forth the dullist PTA clichés.

ART IN THE AGE OF RISK. By Nicolas Calas. Introduction by Gregory Battcock. E. P. Dutton. 238 pp. $5.

Brilliant essays by independent critic; keyed to the current scene, but deeply connected to the recurring issues of culture and its crises. Recommended.

REMBRANDT AND THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE. By Kenneth Clark. W. W. Norton. 181 black-and-white illustrations. 226 pp. $1.95 paper.

Reprint of an excellent 1966 study.

WAYNE THIEBAUD. By John Coplans. Pasadena Art Museum. Exhibition catalogue. 12 color, and black-and-white illustrations. 66 pp.

Notes on the artist's development and a useful interview.

NORTHERN PAINTING: From Pucelle to Brueghel. By Charles D. Cuttler. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 32 color, 682 black-and-white illustrations. 500 pp. $17.95.

An admirable survey with intricate detail cogently bound to a firm historical framework.

TURNER'S SKETCHES AND DRAWINGS. By A. J. Finberg. Introduction by Lawrence Gowing. Schocken Books. 100 black-and-white illustrations. 164 pp. $2.95 paper.

Reprint of the 1910 study, set in a context of the art criticism of the period by Gowing's interesting new introduction.

POP ART: Object and Image. By Christopher Finch. E. P. Dutton. Black-and-white illustrations. 168 pp. $2.45 paper.

The title is a bit grand; the essays are really about aspects of British Pop Art (including Jim Dine in London) and, as such, are interesting.

JOSEF ALBERS. By Eugen Gomringer and others. George Wittenborn. Color and black-and-white illustrations. 200 pp. $25.50.

A text as neat and clear as Swiss typography by concrete poet Gomringer. Fine color reproductions.

THE CLIMAX OF ROME. By Michael Grant. Little, Brown & Co. 100 black-and-white illustrations. 300 pp. $8.95.

Incisive survey of second to fourth century A.D., with art located in its cultural setting.

EUROPEAN FOLK ART. Edited by H. J. Hansen. Introduction by Robert Wildhaber. McGraw-Hill. 492 black-and-white illustrations. 288 pp. Pre-Christmas $22.50; thereafter $25.

Panoramic and scholarly survey of an understudied field. Sober and unsentimental. Recommended.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE AND ITS TREASURES. By John Harris, Geoffrey de Belliquae and Oliver Millar. Introduction by John Russell. Viking Press. 79 color, 218 black-and-white illustrations. 320 pp. $25.

The least known of the British Royal houses documented both by lavish illustration and heavily footnoted scholarship. A treat.

DAWN OF THE GODS. By Jacquetta Hawkes. Random House. 45 color, and black-and-white illustrations. 304 pp. $17.95.

As popular books increase, every period receives attention. This one is on Minoan and Mycenaean art and culture, evoked a bit fancifully.

PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA AND THE EARLY RENAISSANCE. By Philip Hendy. Macmillan. 34 color, 67 black-and-white illustrations. 248 pp. $12.50.

Agreeably dignified and pro-Mediterranean account of Piero's art and cultural context.

THE MACHINE AS SEEN AT THE END OF THE MECHANICAL AGE. By K. G. Pontus Hultén. Museum of Modern Art. (Exhibition catalogue.) Distributed by the New York Graphic Society. 200 black-and-white illustrations. 216 pp. $6.95.

Museum catalogues are often among the best art publications. Here is an excellent set of witty and discursive reflections on the relations of art and technology.

THE POSTER: An Illustrated History from 1860. By Harold F. Hutchison. Viking Press. 218 illustrations in color and black and white. 216 pp. $14.

Useful survey, but the author's "good taste" makes his selection of later posters too dainty.

NUMBERS. By Robert Indiana and Robert Creeley. Edition Domberger Stuttgart. Gotham Book Mart, New York. 10 color serigraphs. (Unpaginated.) $20.

Emblems by Indiana, poems (in English and German) by Creeley; an elegant collaboration.

THE IMPERIAL HOTEL. By Cary James, Charles E. Tuttle. Floor plans and elevations. 63 black-and-white illustrations. 48 pp. (text). $7.50.

Extraordinary details of Frank Lloyd Wright's hotel in Tokyo, recently demolished.

DEGAS MONOTYPES. By Eugenia Parry Janis, Fogg Museum. Distributed by the New York Graphic Society. 79 full-page, 321 catalogue illustrations in black and white. (Unpaginated.) $17.50.

Fascinating account of a neglected aspect of Degas' art.

FROM THE BEGINNING. By Karl Katz, P. P. Kahane, Magen Broshi. Introduction by Philip Hendy. Reynal & Co. 64 color and 150 black-and-white illustrations. 288 pp. Pre-Christmas $12.95; thereafter $15.

Using archaeological objects and art in the Israel Museum, Jerusalem, the writers sketch a history of Jewish culture.

VOYAGING. By Rockwell Kent. Grosset & Dunlap. Numerous black-and-white illustrations. 184 pp. $5.95.

First published in 1924, this travel story is ornamented by woodcuts that are an open-air version of Art Déco; a streamlined primitivism.

THE NEW SCULPTURE. By Udo Kultermann, Frederick A. Praeger. 12 color, 375 black-and-white illustrations. 236 pp. $20.

Well informed and thorough survey of avant-garde sculpture movements.

ARSHILE GORKY. By Julian Levy, Harry N. Abrams. 36 color, 172 black-and-white illustrations. 38 pp. (text). $25.

Excellent reproductions of paintings in color and related drawings; a flimsy text.

EL LISSITZKY. By Sophie Lissitzky-Kuppers. Introduction by Herbert Read. New York Graphic Society. 100 color, 178 black-and-white illustrations. 408 pp. $30.

Indispensable study of an artist more or less missing from 20th-century art history. Recommended.

FUTURIST ART AND THEORY 1909-1915. By Marianné W. Martin. Oxford University Press (Clarendon). 219 black-and-white illustrations. 228 pp. $17.75.

THE NATION/December 16, 1968

LOOK OUT, GENERAL! VIETCONG'S GONNA GET YOUR MOMMA!

Wilfred Burchett, long time GUARDIAN correspondent and western press officer for Hanoi at the Paris peace talks, has now finished his eighth book on revolutionary Asia: VIETNAM WILL WIN!

Thesis: the National Liberation Front (NLF) will lead the Vietnamese people to complete victory over the United States, regardless of Lyndon Johnson's "bombing halt."

Focus: the Front itself, its leaders, tactics, and strategies. What is the difference, for example, between the military thinking of the NLF and the controversial theories of Regis Debray?

From the introduction by Dave Dellinger: "This book . . . will be read by thousands of bewildered experts in the U.S. military, diplomatic, and foreign subversion agencies. . ."

FREE!

244 PAGES!
NEW PHOTOS OF THE NLF!

Get Burchett's new book FREE with a subscription to the GUARDIAN, national independent radical newsweekly—act now and save a total of $4 over the regular combined price of $12.45.

Some of our recent and regular features: detailed interviews with Huey Newton, H. Rap Brown, Eldridge Cleaver □ Wilfred Burchett's on-the-scene Vietnam coverage □ a three-part interview with Herbert Marcuse □ regular reports from Cuba, Africa, Latin America □ Julius Lester's popular satire and political commentary □ labor and campus reports, analyses □ book, record, and film reviews □ much more in 20 to 24 pages weekly.

Herbert Marcuse writes, "The GUARDIAN is, in my view, by far the best radical paper in this country."

Enclosed is $_____ for a _____ regular one-year GUARDIAN sub PLUS a copy of VIETNAM WILL WIN! at the combination price of $8.45. _____ one-year student sub plus the book at $5.45. _____ one-year GI sub plus the book at $3.45. _____ the Burchett book alone (paper $2.45, cloth $7.50). _____ a student sub alone at $5. _____ a GI sub alone at $1. _____ a ten-week trial sub at $1. On all but the ten-week trial, please add $2 for Canada, Latin America, $3 elsewhere outside the United States.

N1268

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Mail to: Guardian, 197 E. 4th St., New York, N.Y. 10009

Successful conversion of a doctoral dissertation into a useful book, with information not in English before.

ROBERT INDIANA. By John W. McCoubrey. Institute of Contemporary Art of the University of Philadelphia. 4 color, and black-and-white illustrations. 64 pp.

Statements by the artist and much documentary material.

TO PAINT IS TO LOVE AGAIN. By Henry Miller. (With "Semblance of a Devoted Past," 1944.) Grossman. 20 color illustrations. 120 pp. $10.

Breezy commentary by Miller on his Love of Art. His art is sub-Chagall, post-Jawlensky, and dampened Klee.

INFORMATION THEORY AND AESTHETIC PERCEPTION. By Abraham Moles. Translated by Joel E. Cohen. University of Illinois Press. 222 pp. $2.45 paper.

Originally published in 1958, this application of "Information Theory" to esthetics is still apposite; ■ brilliant book. Recommended.

EARLY ITALIAN PAINTING TO

A defense of dissent and pacifism —
"Thoughtful, provocative."*

War, Conscience and Dissent by Gordon C. Zahn

Now at a new low price, ONLY $3.95 at bookstores or order direct from

70 Fifth Avenue, New York 10011

*Chicago Sun Times

1400. By Robert Oertel. Frederick A. Praeger. 12 color, 128 black-and-white illustrations. 376 pp. $18.50.

Fundamental book on painting before and after Giotto. An eloquent and detailed study.

IDEA. By Irwin Panovsky. Translated by Joseph J. C. Peake. University of South Carolina Press. 268 pp. $7.50.

First English translation of immensely influential history-of-an-idea book, published in 1924. A model of economical writing and capacious references.

THE SOURCES OF MODERN ARCHITECTURE AND DESIGN. By Nikolaus Pevsner. Frederick A. Praeger. 15 color, 198 black-and-white illustrations. 216 pp. $7.50.

A reprint from the commemorative volume of the Council of Europe's sources of the 20th-century exhibition. Familiar but cogent survey of late 19th, early 20th-century "pioneers."

SCIENCE, ART AND COMMUNICATION. By John R. Pierce. Clarkson N. Potter. 174 pp. $6.

Short, readable essays which, despite the author's occasional hard-nosed technologist's élan, will admirably introduce gallery-bound readers to the sciences impinging on art.

BYZANTINE PAINTING: The Last Phase. By Talbot Rice. Dial Press. Color and black-and-white illustrations. 224 pp. Pre-Christmas $17.50; thereafter $22.50.

Engrossing study of a specialized subject that will reward the attention of the general reader.

POSTERS OF THE FIRST WORLD WAR. By Maurice Rickards. Walker and Co. 243 illustrations in color and black and white. 32 pp. (text). $12.50.

Fascinating iconographical study from both sides, including an elegiac commemoration of the Lusitania and a German boast: "Through Our Army—the Freedom of the Seas."

GIOVANNI BELLINI. By Giles Robertson. Oxford University Press (Clarendon). 120 black-and-white illustrations. 172 pp. $16.

A penetrating study of Bellini, with the details of art history building up a coherent image of the artist.

CUBISM AND 20TH CENTURY ART. By Robert Rosenblum. Harry N. Abrams. 40 color, 248 black-and-white illustrations. 332 pp. $9.95 paper.

A reprint of a handy guide to cubism.

246 LITTLE CLOUDS. By Dieter Rot. Introduction by Emmett Williams. Something Else Press. (Unpaginated.) $5.95.

Notes and queries, speculations and signs, in an original word-and-picture book by a key European avant-gardist. Fancy production. Recommended.

DADA, SURREALISM AND THEIR HERITAGE. By William S. Rubin. Museum of Modern Art. Exhibition catalogue. Distributed by the New York Graphic Society. 6 color, 294 black-and-white illustrations. 252 pp. $9.95.

Clear and resourceful study of Dada and Surrealism, welcome in a clouded area of study; the "heritage," however, in the United States chiefly, is less convincing.

DAVID SMITH ON DAVID SMITH. Edited by Cleve Gray. Holt, Rinehart, & Winston. Color and black-and-white illustrations. 176 pp. $22.95.

Absorbing collection of texts and notes by the artist, with his own photographs of his sculpture. Exceptionally well edited. Recommended.

RUBENS AND THE CLASSICAL TRADITION. By Wolfgang Stechow. (Martin Classical Lectures, XXII.) Harvard University Press. 68 black-and-white illustrations. 136 pp. $6.

The persistence of the art of antiquity in the Baroque, a fashionable theme of recent art history, is powerfully demonstrated here. The baroque/classical antithesis is crumbling before holistic studies.

JEAN ARP: Sculpture—His Last Ten Years. By Eduard Trier. Harry N. Abrams. 105 full-page black-and-white illustrations and 156 catalogue illustrations. 168 pp. $20.

Continuation of the catalogue raisonné and updating of the bibliography published in 1957.

EARLY CHRISTIAN ART. By F. van der Meer. Translated by Peter and Friedl Brown. University of Chicago Press. 48 black-and-white illustrations. 150 pp. $8.50.

Excellent account and interpretation of a diffuse and unfamiliar area.

THE NATIONAL MUSEUM OF ANTHROPOLOGY, MEXICO. By Pedro Ramirez Vazquez, and others. Introduction by Ignacio Bernal. Harry N. Abrams. 54 color, 231 black-and-white illustrations. 258 pp. $25.

This handsome book doubles as a guide to the museum, opened in 1964, and as an introduction to Mexican art, anthropology and ethnology.

STYLE AND DESIGN, 1909-1929. By Giulia Veronesi. George Braziller. 10 color, 248 black-and-white illustrations. 372 pp. $15.

Excellent close study of the form sense underlying the art, decoration and entertainment of the recent past. Acute and anti-camp.

A. By Andy Warhol. Grove Press. 452 pp. $10.

Transcribed tapes of Andy's clan. More of the nitty-gritty Warhol continuum. Question: who figured out the style of transcription? No credit given.

EARLY FLEMISH PAINTING. By Margaret Whinnery. Frederick A. Praeger. 3 color, 96 black-and-white illustrations. 168 pp. $12.50.

Compact survey of 15th and early 16th century Flemish art: sober, but old-fashioned in its plodding and respectful expressions of appreciation.

(Further listings next issue.)

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

A swarm of small plays by young writers, most of whom have previously been produced Off-Broadway, buzzed into town during the latter half of November. There are to be many more—these plays now proliferate more rapidly than any other kind—and their influence will soon be visible on the "main stem" itself.

Of the recent ones, Terrence McNally's duo, Sweet Eros and Witness are to be seen at the Gramercy Arts Theatre, 138 East 27 Street; Anne Burr's Huui, Huui is at Joseph Papp's Public Theatre on Lafayette Street, and the triple bill, Morning by Israel Horowitz, Noon by Terrence McNally, and Night by Leonard Melfi, are at the Henry Miller.

McNally's Sweet Eros is an idyll of perpetual cohabitation. Its point is that while love matches rarely lead to anything more than eventual frustration, sexual intercourse between a physically compatible couple without metaphysical solemnities or avowals of adoration is likely to prove more satisfactory as it is more honest. People, McNally implies, don't desire or like love: it is too burdensome. It is not entirely clear whether this is the author's diagnosis of the contemporary situation or his "platform."

What is clear is the plot. A Young Man, bruised by previous amatory encounters, forces a girl to come back with him to his country retreat. He trusses her up, describing his earlier misadventures with women as the cause of his present action, feeds her, photographs her, verbally abuses her a little so that no suspicion of romantic endearment may enter what follows, undresses her and, when she has overcome her fear of possible injury, takes her to bed. She seems never to need to clothe herself again and appears altogether gratified by the arrangement. Since he has enough money to carry it on indefinitely, the "experiment" is a success.

The writing of the play is literate enough. As to its thought and feeling you may judge for yourself if you can determine exactly what they are; as I have suggested there is a certain ambiguity. The kick in this sketch is the total nudity of the couple, as well as the direct image and sounds of the act of love. The set by Peter Harvey and the lighting by Roger Morgan are fine. Robert Drivas and Sally Kirkland both carry off their assignments handsomely. The effect of the whole is not, unless you are neurotically inflammable, erotic. I laughed when the Young Man, to avoid ecstatic exclamation of pleasure or declarations of deep commitment, talked "politics" as he made love.

Though somewhat overextended, McNally's second play, Witness, struck me as having greater dramatic validity. A Man—we are given little information about him—prepares to assassinate the President. He gags and ties a hapless encyclopedia salesman to a chair to witness the action. A window cleaner who is also invited in represents the disaffected and totally muddled worker who has come to hate everything: the war, blacks, rebellious youth, the government and most of his fellow citizens. He talks of what he would do if he had a chance to shoot the President. There is also a girl radio interviewer who gushes over the prospective Presidential parade. When the President's car passes, the assassin's plan is frustrated because the President is murdered by concerted gunfire from other sources. Everyone is horrified and the man who vowed to kill the President crumples in grief and waves a little American flag as a sign of contrition or as a conditioned reflex of patriotism. Here again there is a certain satirical ambivalence.

There is some good acting in this "allegory" by James Coco as the window cleaner and by Richard Marr as the Man.

Huui, Huui is a first play by a young woman married to a university professor in the Midwest. She shows promise. Though her play is slight, there is health in it; it justifies its inclusion in Papp's program.

The form is a sort of portrait in collage of a thoroughly disengaged youth, Feisel, who is trying to write poetry in a bare loft without electric light. He fears the eye of the sun; he listens to records of long-hair music in the almost non-existent toilet; he makes love desultorily to a little innocent whom he picks up and to his neighbor's cool girl friend. He is inwardly too turbulent to enjoy an improvised house party with the vicinity's youngsters. He emits little inexplicable sounds like "huui, huui." His trouble initially was caused by his long separation from his father who comes at last to visit him. Due to a bad heart the father doesn't eat the little delicatessen meal his son had prepared for him. In desperation the boy jumps from the window but lands on a pile of refuse—from which the landlady thinks she hears him laughing.

All this is told—and played—with nice touches of wry humor and unstrained sensibility. The boy is seen sympathetically but without pathos. In fact, only when his odd behavior is explained in the scene with the father—in itself laconically written—does the play seem a bit conventional. The modest portrait is sufficient: Feisel is both particular and representative.

The play is well directed by Joseph Papp, well handled scenically by Douglas Schmidt, in lighting by Martin Aronstein, and admirably performed by Barry Primus as Feisel, by Margaret Linn as the sweet girl, by Sharon Laughlin (with voice of ingratiating timbre) as the attractive free-for-all girl next door, by Charles Durning as Feisel's Daddy and by Eda Reiss Merin as the funny milk and acid landlady.

A cast of five—Sorrell Booke, Robert Klein, John Heffernan, Charlotte Rae, Jane Marla Robbins, all good—play the three one acts Morning, Noon and Night. The first by Israel Horowitz (whose The Indian Wants the Bronx I liked) is an extravagant piece about blacks who swallow some "magic pills" and lose their pigment, with presumably hilarious consequences when a "cracker" comes to kill the black father whose son has knocked up his teen-age daughter, and finds that the family he threatens is white. In the end we learn that the white avenger has also taken the pill and is really a black.

Laughter is provoked by the explosive use of (by now) customary four-letter words. I doubt that a black audience would appreciate the play's fun or approve its liberalism. For my part, I am bone tired of this sort of jape in regard to racism. And I am inclined to feel that with very few exceptions I prefer to see American plays on the subject by blacks only.

McNally's Noon is a sick joke in which a tease advertiser invites a group of assorted individuals to indulge in some special sex shenanigans and perhaps a tutti-frutti orgy. A queer, a timid young man, an unappeased housewife whose husband talks and reads more than he does, a flagellant married couple turn up.

It is entirely possible that this play was written with scalding aversion for its characters and situation, and was then transformed into all-out farce by the director, Theodore Mann. In any case, the results for me are some scattered trivial chortles, funny only to the degree that any surprise allusion to sex is risible (the dirty end of the Puritan stick).

I believe Melfi's Night is about death and the emptiness of our "official" attitude toward it, or perhaps it is about the equivalence of our mourning whether a burial be that of a man or a dog. If I am not correct in these surmises—the play is "symbolic"—I don't think it matters.

To those who welcome these plays—a few cried "Bravo!" on opening night—I must point out that at best they are notions: symptomatic perhaps but inherently of little artistic value. To applaud all manifestations of the tendency they represent betrays a juvenile fear of not being "with it," a callow snobism. To encourage these playwrights indiscriminately is to do them a disservice.

They should learn that a gimmick is not sufficient for a satisfying theatre event. A short play must have the same substantive quality as one of full length. They write too "soon" and too hastily; they should discipline themselves in self-criticism. They must think and work after their first inspired impulse. They should understand that every shudder of fury, horror, derision or violent dissent must be as carefully calculated and articulated as the most ambitious drama.

A word should be added about the desire to be open, bold, utterly permissive about sexual matters on the stage. The plays of some of those one reviewer ingenuously referred to as our "modernists" are rarely "warm." The obsession with sex today is not like that of the twenties. That was a rebellion against Calvinist repressiveness. Today we reach out lyrically, hysterically, or callously toward some concrete reality. Belief in the older ideas has for the most part proved hypocritical deception. For this reason we grab at what still remains specifically tangible and stirring: sexual connection. It seems to be all that's left.

There is no villain in this situation, and some good has come of it. In several instances, I suspect a certain guilt feeling, a self-punitive strain projected as social castigation in the outrage expressed by our dramatic wild men. But there is another aspect to this trend. We find a statement in two or three of Tennessee Williams' plays which in turn appear to echo D.H. Lawrence's pan-sexuality. This makes passionate sexual experience a total value beyond every other consideration. It represented Lawrence's effort to rid himself and his generation of the prudery, aridity and denial of the instinctual life from which he himself had suffered. It led to wrongheadedness and distortion in several other phases of his thinking. Taken literally, the Lawrence "doctrine" is false. Except in bad art, as in bad biology, sex is not a separate "department" of existence. Isolated from the broad context of life it ends in being ludicrous, unpleasant and destructive.

If what I have suggested is also what our new dramatists have in mind, they must learn to say so with lucid cogency, hold court on themselves, deliberate their way to become artists rather than just clever foundation fellows.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Beneath the mad, mod acrylic of Michael Sarne's Joanna there beats the heart of Little Nell. The film offers the proposition—sustained by nobody's observation of life—that a girl (Genevieve Waite) who is amoral to the point of catalepsy can be brought to the grace of responsive and responsible maturity by a series of jarring blows induced by her compulsive self-indulgence. It also presents Donald Sutherland in the role of a stammering lord of great wealth, who knows himself to be dying and who is dedicating his final months to having a grand time and playing fairy godfather to all comers. His philosophic rhapsody on the occasion of a North African sunset is a tearful tour de force of the sort I thought had gone out of fashion with lace-edged cambric.

However, it is somewhat beside the point to snarl at Joanna on these grounds, because it is a picture less about people and their ways than about film and its possibilities. When you take a walk, it is pleasant to have a destination; and when you put a camera through its paces, it is convenient to have a story line and some actors for it to focus upon. Thus scenes in this film do not develop and characters do not relate through any inherent logic or volition; they are established and joined by the style of the photography. And since this is elliptical, chromatically strident and episodically syncretized, the effect is stimulating and optimistically high-spirited—though if one took some of the incidents at their human, rather than their cinematic, value, they would be appalling, and the overall moralizing, if one believed in its sincerity, would be intolerably shallow.

Furthermore, this ingratiating style, which tries so hard to be infectious, rather quickly reveals itself as a kind of salesmanship. It is close kin to the fashion layouts of the opulent magazines and the Sunday supplements, with high-style manikins striking extravagant gestures devoid of plausible motivation and displaying costumes that do more to advance the notoriety of their creators than to flatter the bodies of their wearers. So modish is Joanna that it includes a Negro couple in this assemblage.

Indeed, the handling of these two—Calvin Lockhart and Glenna Forster-Jones—is the most interesting aspect of the picture. They are admitted on terms of absolute equality—the picture is colorblind; it exploits the picturesque possibilities of one and all with an equal hand. This means that Lockhart and Miss Forster-Jones can be brought on as a pair of jungle cats without anyone crying prejudice—the whites are similarly stereotyped for maximum visibility. At the same time, the blacks are not made into recruits to middle-class conformity, which seems the depressing best that the screen has been able to do thus far for race relations. Joanna is a conspicuously erotic movie, but it is eroticism with the blank face of a brassiere-counter display. At that depersonalized level, interracial sexuality flows across the screen without triggering any atavistic twitches. It is a cop-out, no doubt, but it is also a kind of progress. The mass media never break taboos, they always sidle past.

I would not advise Milwaukee to export beer to Czechoslovakia and I doubt that Prague is wise to send musical comedy to us. Lady on the Tracks, which might also be called a people's operetta, is a sad attempt at lyric revels in the absence of talent. No one implicated in the picture can write a song or sing one, there is no dancing, the costumes are bargain basement, and the satire is leaden. The book is an attack on the double standard, presented with indignant lack of humor. However, I was interested to discover that Socialist society is still so much exercised by a state of sexual affairs that has become a quaint memory in the West. It fits in with the celebrated Marxist prudery.

If there is a disposition in this country to shift public interest away from a preoccupation with violence, it has not yet reached American International Pictures. Three press releases recently received in one envelope from that firm carry headlines as follows: "They'll Do Anything . . . or Dare Anything!! They Run in Packs (Born Wild): "The Massacre Men . . . They Carry Their Hate in their Holsters and a Name on Every Bullet in Their Belts!!! (The Brute and the Beast): "They Mixed Their Kisses with Cold-Blooded Murder!!! Before the Picnic Was Over, 37 People Were Dead!!!" (Killers Three).

FRED J. COOK. What So Proudly We Hailed. Prentice-Hall. $5.95.

STANLEY COOPERMAN. The Day of the Parrot. University of Nebraska Press. $3.50. Paper $1.65.

The Owl Behind The Door. McClelland & Stewart (Canada). $3.95.

Books by Nation Contributors

We list below books published in 1968 by writers who contributed to The Nation during the past year. This compilation—a regular year-end feature—includes books published in England, showing equivalent prices in dollars, available on special order from most booksellers.

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY. The Venice Biennale 1895-1968. New York Graphic Society. $7.50.

HERBERT APTHEKER. Nat Turner's Slave Rebellion (reprint). Grove Press, 95c paper.

Be Free: Studies in Negro History (reprint). International. $5.95. Paper $2.25.

Marxism & Christianity (editor). Humanities Press. $6.

Autobiography of W.E.B. Du Bois (editor). International. $10.

JOHN ARTHOS. Milton and the Italian Cities. Bowes & Bowes (England). $4.20.

WENDELL BERRY. Openings. Harcourt, Brace & World. $4.50.

VERA BLACKWELL. The Memorandum. (by Vaclav Havel), translator. Grove Press. $1.50 paper.

ROBERT BLY. Twenty Poems of Pablo Neruda (translator with James Wright). Sixties Press. $2 paper.

Hunger (by Knut Hamsun), translator (reprint). Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $1.95 paper.

JOAN V. BONDURANT. Conquest of Violence: The Gandhian Philosophy of Conflict (revised edition). University of California Press. $6. Paper $1.75.

GEORGE BOWERING. Two Police Poems. Talon Books (Canada). $1.50 paper.

J. BRONOWSKI. The Face of Violence (enlarged edition). Meridian Books. $2.25 paper.

CHANDLER BROSSARD. The Spanish Scene. Viking Press. $3.95.

We Did the Strangest Things. Belmont Books, 75c paper.

The Bold Saboteurs. Lancer Books. 95c paper.

Who Walk in Darkness. Lancer Books. 95c paper.

ANTHONY BURGESS. Enderby. W. W. Norton. $5.95.

JEAN CARPER (with Sen. Warren G. Magnuson). The Dark Side of the Marketplace. Prentice-Hall. $5.95.

ELLIOT COLEMAN (editor). Poems of Byron, Keats and Shelley. Doubleday. $6.95.

ROBERT COLES. Dead End School. Atlantic-Little, Brown. $3.95.

MALCOLM COWLEY. Blue Juniata: Collected Poems. Viking. $5.75.

RAYMOND F. DASMANN. A Different Kind of Country. Macmillan. $5.95. Environmental Conservation (2d edition). John Wiley. $6.95.

G. WILLIAM DOMHOFF (co-editor with Hoyt Ballard). C. Wright Mills and the Power Elite. Beacon Press. $7.50.

JOHN DORNBERG. The Other Germany. Doubleday. $6.95.

RICHARD EBERHART. Shifts of Being. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

DOUGLAS EICHORN. Rituals: A Book of Poems. The Salt Mound Press. $1.25 paper.

BEHIND THE HEADLINES

William Woods
POLAND
Eagle in the East

To know Poland in 1968, to understand why she joined Russia in the recent invasion of Czechoslovakia, one must begin with World War II. Thus, this brilliant study ranges from the events of 1939 to the present and, in doing so, gets close to the heart of this enigmatic country. The Warsaw Ghetto uprising, the remarkable postwar recovery, the resurgence of the arts, the postwar political scene, current attitudes, the March student riots (to which Mr. Woods was a witness)—all are thoroughly discussed. Mr. Woods interviewed hundreds of Poles in all walks of life and he lets them speak for themselves; the result is a book filled with excitement, vivid impressions, and surprising revelations. 16 pages of photographs, maps, Index. $6.50

HILL & WANG

For the real conversation piece on your gift list, pick either one...

Live armadillo, pedigreed
and registered.
$96 per copy, without leash.

The NATION, always unleashed
and uninhibited.
20.8c per copy, $10 for the year.

The NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

Please process my gift order as indicated below, to the recipients shown. ☐ Send gift card.

☐ Have Neiman-Marcus rush the armadillo. I enclose $96.

☐ Send The NATION for one year (48 issues) to the name(s) listed. I enclose $10 for each subscription.

To _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

To _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

(Use extra paper for additional names)

From (your name) _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

N 12-16

If your friend or loved one ventures out for a stroll with his armadillo, he won't be ignored. We join Neiman-Marcus in guaranteeing it.

But when you give him (or her) a year of The NATION, you can be even surer of the talk it'll generate—and the kind of talk it'll be. Talk that inquires, challenges, inspires, angers, demolishes old biases, builds new understandings, blasts apart fallacies, strengthens convictions. The kind of talk that comes only from the open, informed and forever inquiring mind.

Either choice is a flattering gift. Why not use the coupon today?

GEORGE P. ELLIOTT. An Hour of Last Things. Harper & Row. $5.95.

MARY ELLMANN. Thinking About Women. Harcourt, Brace & World. $4.95.

JOHN ENGELS. The Homer Mitchell Place. University of Pittsburgh Press. $4.20. Paper $2.25.

DONALD FANGER. Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism. University of Chicago Press. $2.45 paper.

LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI. A Coney Island of the Mind. New Directions. Boxed $5. Paper $1.

C. P. FITZGERALD. The Empress Wu (reprint with Epilogue). Cheshires (Australia) and UBC Press (Vancouver).

D. F. FLEMING. The Origins and Legacies of World War I. Doubleday. $6.95. The Cold War and Its Origins, 1917-1960 (reprint). Doubleday. 2 vols. $17.50.

The United States and the League of Nations, 1918-1920 (revised reprint). Russell & Russell. $15.

The United States and World Organization, 1920-1933 (reprint). AMS Press. $10.

The United States and the World Court (revised reprint). Russell & Russell. $8.50.

The Treaty Veto of the American Senate (reprint). AMS Press. $6.50.

E. Z. FRIEDENBERG. The Vanishing Adolescent. Dell. $1.75 paper.

GENE FRUMKIN. The Rainbow-Walker. Grasshopper Press. $1.50 paper.

JOHN GABREE. The World of Rock. Gold Medal. 75c paper.

JAMES GUTMANN. Marcus Aurelius (reprint). Washington Square Press. 60c paper.

DONALD HALL. The Modern Stylists. Free Press. $4.50. Paper $2.50. Man & Boy. Franklin Watts. $5.95.

MICHAEL HAMBURGER. Feeding the Chickadees. Turret (England). $8.40 (limited edition). Twenty Prose Poems of Baudelaire (translator). Cape (England). Reprint. $1.80 paper.

Günter Eich: Journeys (translator). Cape (England). $2.15 paper.

Günter Grass: New Poems (translator). Harcourt, Brace & World. $4.50.

Poems for People Who Don't Read Poems (by Hans Magnus Enzensberger) co-translator. Atheneum. $5.95. Paper $2.95.

TIMOTHY F. HARDING. The University, Politics and Development in Contemporary Latin-America. Latin American Research Center (University of California). $1 paper.

MARVIN HARRIS. The Rise of Anthropological Theory. Crowell. $16.50.

CROOKED CAROL

Mary had a baby:
good news!
Red as a ruby,
but no layette, no shoes.

Who's to be godfather?
Joseph, maybe.
Solemn, he nods
his step-paternity

over the rude crib.
How refuse?
Mary had a baby:
Sing Whose, Whose!

NORMA FARBER

NAT HENTOFF. A Doctor Among the Addicts. Rand-McNally. $4.50.

Onwards! Simon & Schuster. $3.95. I'm Really Dragged But Nothing Gets Me Down. Simon & Schuster. $3.95. Journey Into Jazz. Coward-McCann. $4.50.

GEORGE HITCHCOCK. The Dolphin with a Revolver in its Teeth. Unicorn. $2.50 paper. A Ship of Bells. Kayak. $1.50 paper.

ANSELM HOLLO (editor and translator). Selected Poems by Paavo Haavikko. Grossman. $2 paper.

The Coherences. Trigram (England). $2 paper. Tumbleweed. weed/flower press (Canada). $1 paper.

DAVID IGNATOW. Rescue the Dead. Wesleyan University Press. $4. Paper $2. Earth Hard. Rapp & Whiting (England). $2.50 paper.

GABRIEL JACKSON. The Spanish Republic and the Civil War (reprint). Princeton University Press. $3.45 paper.

LOUIS KAMPF. On Modernism: The Prospects for Literature and Freedom (reprint). M.I.T. Press. $2.95 paper.

KENNETH KENISTON. Young Radicals: Notes on Committed Youth. Harcourt, Brace & World. $5.95.

MILTON KESSLER. Called Home. The Black Bird Press. Limited edition of 25 (with etchings by Robert E. Marx). $125.

GEORGE G. KIRSTEIN. The Rich: Are They Different? Houghton Mifflin. $5.95.

CURT LEVIANT. (translator). Some Laughter, Some Tears by Sholom Aleichem. Putnam. $5.95.

JOEL LIEBER. Move! David McKay. $4.95.

America the Beautiful (editor). David White. $4.95.

Deep Blue (How the Fishes Live) reprint. Dell. 95c paper.

Israel and the Holy Land on $5 & $10 a Day (1968-69 edition). Arthur Frommer. $2.50 paper.

ARNO J. MAYER. Politics and Diplomacy of Peacemaking: Containment and Counterrevolution at Versailles, 1918-1919. Knopf. $15.

Political Origins of the New Diplomacy (reprint). Howard Fertig. $10.50.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS. North from Mexico: The Spanish-Speaking People of the United States (reissue with a new introduction). Greenwood Press. $11.25.

The California Revolution (editor). Grossman. $6.50.

EVE MERRIAM. Independent Voices. Atheneum. $4.25.

Man and Woman: The Human Condition. Research Center on Woman, Loretto Heights College (Denver). $1 paper.

W. S. MERWIN. Selected Translations 1948-1968. Atheneum. $5.95. Paper $2.95.

JOSEPHINE MILES. Kinds of Affection. Wesleyan University Press. $3.95. Fields of Learning. Oyez. 75c paper.

ALBERTO MORAVIA. The Red Book and the Great Wall. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. $4.95.

ROBERT MORGAN. Zircosta Poems. Lillabulero Press. 75c paper.

ROBERT K. MORRIS. The Novels of Anthony Powell. University of Pittsburgh Press. $2.95 paper.

JIRI MUCHA. Living and Partly Living. McGraw-Hill. $5.95.

LEONARD NATHAN (with prints by Leonard Baskin). The Matchmaker's Lament and Other Astonishments. Gehenna Press. 200 copies @ $35; 50 copies with an original etching @ $125.

TRUMAN NELSON. The Rights of Revolution. Beacon. $4.95. Paper $1.75. The Torture of Mothers (reprint). Beacon. $1 paper.

ANTHONY NETBOY. The Atlantic Salmon: A Vanishing Species? Houghton Mifflin. $6.95.

J. P. NETTL. The Soviet Achievement 1917-1967. Harcourt, Brace & World. $6.95. International Systems and the Modernization of Societies. Basic Books. $5.95.

JULIUS NOVICK. Beyond Broadway: The

Quest for Permanent Theatres. Hill & Wang. $7.95.

SHERMAN PAUL. The Music of Survival: A Biography of a Poem by William Carlos Williams. University of Illinois Press. $5.95.

DAVID RAY. Dragging the Main. Cornell University Press. $3.95.

KENNETH REXROTH. The Classics Revisited. Quadrangle. $6.50. The Collected Longer Poems. New Directions. $7.50. The Spark in the Tinder of Knowing. Pym-Randall. $5.

G. SCOTT REYNOLDS. The Mortality Merchants. David McKay. $4.95.

MORDECAI RICHLER. Cocksure. Simon & Schuster. $4.95. The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz (reissue). Paperback Library. 95c. Son of a Smaller Hero (reissue). Paperback Library. 95c.

PAUL ROAZEN. Freud: Political and Social Thought. Knopf. $6.95.

RAYMOND ROSENTHAL. McLuhan: Pro & Con. Funk & Wagnalls. $5.95. Metello by Vasco Pratolini (translator). Atlantic-Little, Brown. $5.95. The Broken Tower. By Piero Sanavio (translator). Bobbs-Merrill. $6.95. A Soldier of Humor: Selected Writings of Wyndham Lewis (editor). Signet. 95c paper.

SHERWOOD ROSS. Gruening of Alaska. Best Books. 95c paper.

THEODORE ROSZAK (editor). The Dismissing Academy. Pantheon. $6.95. Vintage. Paper $1.95.

JEROME ROTHENBERG. Technicians of the Sacred: A Range of Poetries from Africa, America, Asia & Oceania. Doubleday. $6.95. Poems 1964-1967. Black Sparrow. $5. Conversations. Black Sparrow. $6. Poems for People Who Don't Read Poems. By Hans Magnus Enzensberger (co-translator). Atheneum. $5.95. Paper $2.95. The Book of Hours and Constellations, or Gomringer by Rothenberg. Something Else Press. $4.50. Sightings I-IX (with silkscreen prints by Ian Tyson). Circle Press (England). $15.

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL. Business Logis- tics in American Industry. Stanford (Calif.) Graduate School of Business. $7.95.

ROBERT G. SHERRILL. The Drugstore Liberal. Grossman. $4.95. Gothic Politics in the Deep South. Grossman. $6.95. The Accidental President (reprint). Pyramid. 95c paper.

EDWARD JOSEPH SHOBN, JR. Learning and the Professors. Ohio University Press. $1.70 paper.

TONI STABILE. Cosmetics: Trick or Treat? Arco. $4.95.

DANIEL STERN. The Suicide Academy. McGraw-Hill. $5.95.

WILLIAM STYRON. The Confessions of Nat Turner (reprint). New American Library. $1.25 paper.

MARTIN TUCKER. The Critical Temper. Frederick Ungar. 3 vols. $45.

LEWIS TURCO. Awaken, Bells Falling: Poems 1959-1967. University of Missouri Press. $1.50 paper. The Book of Forms: A Handbook of Poetics. E. P. Dutton. $1.65 paper.

RICHARD J. WALTON. The Remnants of Power: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson. Coward-McCann. $5.95.

RUTH WHITMAN. The Marriage Wig. Harcourt, Brace & World. $4.50.

STANLEY WOLPERT. The Expedition. Little, Brown. $6.95.

JAMES A. WRIGHT. Shall We Gather at the River. Wesleyan University Press. $4. Paper $2.

JOSE YGLESIAS. In the Fist of the Revolution: Life in a Cuban Country Town. Pantheon. $5.95. An Orderly Life. Pantheon. $5.95.

MARILYN B. YOUNG. The Rhetoric of Empire: American China Policy, 1895-1901. Harvard University Press. $7.50.

HOWARD ZINN. Disobedience and Democracy. Random. $3.95. Paper $1.45.

PAUL ZWIG. The Heresy of Self-Love. Basic Books. $6.50. The Selected Poems of Yvan Goll (editor and translator). Kayak. $2 paper.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALSON-QUIN 3-1100 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

12-16-68

111 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $18

☐ Two Years, $38

☐ 6 Months, $8

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

Zip No.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1276

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Study straight in hand, as a result. (11)
- 10 and 9 No long trial implied for the paper carrier. (5,4)
- 11 and 30 One is mad to be so overstocked with weapons. (2,2,4)
- 12 Give prominence to the nose, perhaps. (7)
- 13 You could have this debit be transferred, since it implies an out-go. (3,4)
- 15 The way to the sea in the country, perhaps. (8)
- 16 They might try to find one who makes his. (6)
- 18 Decorated as the worker might be. (6)
- 21 and 19 down It could lead to daybreak. (3,5,2,4)
- 24 Abuts. (7)
- 26 Summary sounds like a good equivalent! (7)
- 28 The sound of poetry? The sound of dew! (4)
- 29 See 25 down.
- 30 See 11 across
- 31 In favor of having a label on? It's peculiar, but then it's also just like a leading man! (11)

DOWN

- 2 Possibly shocking to the Victorian lady, unless made by such as Von Suppe. (9)
- 3 So move to the left, already! You're not so tipsy! (7)
- 4 and 23 One loses interest with them!

- 5 Having an utter possibility? (7)
- 6 See 25 down
- 7 It should command a prospect, and provide a way to look at the stock-loser's beginning. (6)
- 8 What the coward gets at the finish? (4,2)
- 14 A game alternative to 1 across. (5)
- 17 One or two from St. Louis, as well as nine? (9)
- 19 See 21 across
- 20 Filling his job? At least he lets you take the chair. (7)
- 22 In a way, the nearest oriental. (7)
- 23 See 4 down
- 25, 29 across and 6 down The royal line of succession? (In case one might call for it?) (5,2,3,5)
- 27 Certainly such a creature would never be a drag! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1275

ACROSS: 1 and 18 All for the better; 6 Lower; 9 Rotates; 10 Stealth; 11 War; 12 Lieges; 13 Herat; 16 Blasts; 23 Erne; 24 Wealth; 25 Gum; 28 Awakens; 29 Tournay; 30 Knell; 31 Westerner. DOWN: 1 Arrow; 2 Literal; 3 Outclassed; 4 Tasteful; 5 Easter; 6 Lees; 7 Welters; 8 Rehearsal; 14 Blackhouse; 15 Table talk; 17 Affluat; 19 Tonnage; 21 Organon; 22 Seasaw; 26 Mayor; 27, 15 across and 20 Tell tales out of school.

PUBLICATIONS

PAPERBACK PICK-NICI You're invited! Free lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harce, Box 124, Carmel, Indiana 46032

"THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES"

Books 1 and 2
Still available as Xmas gifts!
$2.25 for both—132 puzzles in all.
Address: Frank W. Lewis
119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md. 20770

APPLE's first two issues contain poems by Ammons, Enslin, Leverton, Tagliabue, Wade and others known and unknown. Sample copy, $1. Four-issue subscription, $3.50. APPLE, Box 1271, Springfield, Illinois 62705

GUATEMALA PERSPECTIVE. 80-page critique of U.S. involvement in Latin America's potential Vietnam. Includes papers on Guatemalan Economic Development and International Politics; The Violent Polarization of Left and Right in Guatemala; Peasant and Worker Organization; map; profile, annotated bibliography. Send $2.00 with order to N.Y. COMMITTEE OF RETURNED VOLUNTEERS, 63 Irving Place, New York, N.Y. 10003.

"AT KHE SANH, when the mortar rounds had hushed, and we moved out, I saw upon a bush/the burned and dangling genitals of a Cong./Or did I see? We moved as in a dream,/a dream that paced our lives to marching-songs, and bundled flaming children in their screams." From The War Lesson by William Childress, in 192-page The Smith/10. Order now, $2.50. Special offer: one year subscription, $4. From The Smith, 5 Beekman St., N.Y.C. 10038.

PERSONALS

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low-cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC. Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 559 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team" For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

MAM CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE. He also needs love. Support free birth control everywhere. Box 4069, Grand Central Sta., New York City 10017.

CUSTOM-MADE BUTTONS, BALLOONS, BUMPER STRIPS, DECALS. Union made. Send $1 (refundable) for price list and samples. Estimates on request. Larry Fox, Box 581-T, Hempstead, N.Y., 11551 (516) 295-0034.

KENNEDY '72 bumper sticker—3/$1.00. Buttons 4/$1.00. Drum, Box 609N, Fairfield, Conn. 06430.

FREE, The Inner Man Series No. 1. Write H. G., 303 Lafayette Street, New York 12305.

DANIEL DE LEON LEAGUE

READERS, sympathetic to or interested in a newly forming democratic organization, promoting a program of Socialism as enunciated by the American Socialists. Daniel De Leon should write for further information to: P.O. Box 352, New York, N.Y. 10002

The Up Your Tenth Anniversary Issue Of The Realist Editorial Giggy Trip

In 1958 a new magazine of satirical journalism was born with 600 gullible subscribers. Its circulation has since reached 100,000. But ringleader Paul Krassner, after a decade of personal and professional decadence, still edits The Realist as if he wanted to offend only those original 600 readers. You are invited to become a subscriber beginning with the special 10th Anniversary issue, which includes the following features:

- The Decline and Fall of the Yippie Empire
- I was a Judge in a Transvestite Beauty Contest and Witnessed the Corruption ■ Terry Southern
- Did Adolf Eichmann Practice Transcendental Meditation?
- How I Took an LSD Trip with Hugh Hefner and discovered the Message of Marshall McLuhan
- The Rise of Sirhan Sirhan in the Scientology Hierarchy
- The Night Columbia Students Didn't Take Over A Radio Station But the Cops Came Anyway
- An Example of Norman Mailer's Incurable Megalomania
- Why Lenny Bruce Started Using Dirty Words on Stage And What Was His Sex Life Really Like?
- Rosemerica's Baby—a comic strip on political witchcraft
- The Living Bra Is Dead in Atlantic City—or, Tomorrow Miss World
- Inside the House UnAmerican Activities Circus
- The Foreplay and Rape of Fillmore East Under The Anarchist Direction of the Living Theatre

The Realist

The Realist, Dept. N, 595 Broadway, N.Y., N.Y. 10012

Please enter a subscription to The Realist, beginning with the 10th anniversary issue.

Enclosed is:

☐ $3 for 10 issues

☐ $5 for 20 issues

(Add $1 for Canadian or foreign)

Name Apt.

Address

City State Zip

BURLINGAME
DEC 24 1968
LIBRARY

ROBERT SHERRILL: PENTAGON LOOT

BURLINGAME
DEC 24 1968
LIBRARY

THE NATION

DECEMBER 23, 1968 35 cents

STAIR P-3337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

NEWSPAPER

SHALE OIL:

The Dormant Bomb

CHRIS WELLES

ATLANTA IN SUSPENSE

Crisis of The Constitution

ARLIE SCHARDT

THE HOLIDAYS PART TWO

Michael Folsom on Illuminated Manuscripts

Harold Clurman on Picasso Theatre

Records of the Year — David Hamilton

LETTERS

Sinclair as novelist

Piney Flats, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: In an editorial appearing in the December 9th issue, you remark, "Sinclair was not a great novelist or social critic. . . ." By whose and what standard? Robert Morss Lovett in his book Preface to Fiction considers a half dozen great novels for study among which appears Upton Sinclair's Boston. An Italian once raved to me about the masterful job Sinclair did in painting the characters of Sacco and Vanzetti—great art and great writing, he said. A famous American sexologist once chose Sinclair's novel Oil! as one of a dozen great contemporary novels. Whatever the literary critics may think of The Jungle, the common people of the world think it great.

As for his being a social critic, what's wrong with The Brass Check for example? Not great? Do you know anything like it in American literature? Have the college students discovered his book The Goose Step or are they just rebelling and proving its thesis?

Literary fashions go in cycles. The trend now seeks to run to fornication: begin the story in the bedroom and end it there, saturate it with all the four-letter words that can be thought of, borrow descriptions from a volume of psychopathia sexualis until the reader is either satiated or disgusted. If the country ever sobers up from its war-drunkness, perhaps there will be a place for an old-fashioned Puritan like Upton Sinclair and proper recognition given him as a great novelist and social critic.

Melville Kress

southern courtesy

Alexandria, Va.

DEAR SIR: Am amazed and shocked by the treatment of Benedict Kiely and his lady friend by the city of Atlanta (Nov. 25).

As a Southerner whose grandpappy fit and bled with the Confederate cavalry, and myself served as a GI for four years in WW II, it saddens me to learn that a Southern city could show such poor manners to two strangers.

A native Southerner assured me that Jackson, Mississippi and Atlanta, Georgia, were completely in control of the Yankees and we might expect modern Yankee hospitality. It is good to learn that the Yankees in Atlanta are now gracious Southerners in their treatment of strangers.

John C. Rogers

does work pay?

Oak Park, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I was much interested in the article on New York City's welfare wage supplementation program. It appears that New York uses much the same system as Chicago. I disagree, however, that the system encourages people to work. Calculating net income by taking into consideration certain wage-related expenses is all very well, but a man who is not employed does not have to pay carfare or buy lunch out, and nothing is deducted from his (welfare) income for social security or income tax. Welfare covers the family's medical expenses, too, whether he works or not. It seems to me that the only direct benefit a man receives from working is the "flat allowance of $20 per month for other work-related expenses" (the allowance is probably insufficient anyway). In other words, he is $20 per month better off if he works, or $240 per year—not $280 or $960—and I don't think that's much incentive.

Judith L. Inskeep

(Continued on page 692)

EDITORIALS

Nixon's Men

President-elect Nixon's choices constitute not so much a Cabinet in the traditional sense as a "team" or "task force." The appointees are Nixon men, close associates. Not one of them has an independent national political base; the Cabinet contains no potential rivals. The men named are rather gray figures, pragmatists (there is a refreshing absence of ideologues), "generalists," largely uncommitted, flexible. The Republican South was ignored, as was the Goldwater wing, but this is not surprising. Once elected, Presidents usually move toward the Center; if they are Democrats, they try to placate the Right, if Republicans they take a half-step toward the Left by moving a little closer to the Center.

The absence of liberal-moderate Republicans is noticeable: passed over were Rockefeller, Percy, Hatfield, Chafee, Lindsay, Gardner, Cooper. Fortunately it is a partisan Cabinet; the two major parties are enough alike as it is without confusing responsibility further through so-called coalition Cabinets. There are no political pay-offs reflected in the appointments. It is apparent that the President-elect gave the problem of Cabinet selection his close study; he knew the kind of men he wanted, and he knew why he wanted them.

The same careful political planning is reflected in the selection of Presidential aides. Bryce Harlow, for example, is a fine appointment. (The notices about him neglected to mention that he wrote President Eisenhower's famous "farewell address" on the military-industrial complex.) Although a hawk, Henry Kissinger is more flexible than Walt Whitman Rostow, soon to join the faculty of the University of Texas. More important, Richard Allen, who advised Nixon during the campaign, was given second rank. Mr. Allen comes from the Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace at Stanford, which has been overrun of recent years with Hungarian "freedom fighters" and right-wing extremists; it should be rechristened the Hoover Institution on the Cold War.

Dr. Paul W. McCracken is a good appointment, Dr. Lee A. DuBridge an excellent one. Herbert Klein, though a mediocrity as an editor, may turn out to be an acceptable press aide. Sargent Shriver should be a first-rate Ambassador at the UN. Daniel P. Moynihan is a classic opportunist, whose reputation as an "idea man" has been vastly inflated. Although both men are, in a sense, "defectors" from the liberal wing of the Democratic Party, the probability is that they were named, first of all, as a gesture to the liberal Democrats and independents, but also with the cynical thought in mind that, given the nature of their assignments, they will be cut up in due course. (Better that Democrats should be sacrificed than Republicans.)

In general, Nixon's handling of the always delicate problem of Cabinet selection shows the political skill that might be expected. The gesture to Sen. Henry Jackson was shrewd politics: it was highly pleasing to the hawks of both parties and to the big wheels of the aerospace industry. The fact this gesture was made probably insures Nixon the cooperation, for the time being at least, of the key committees on defense spending. Actually, Melvin Laird is less hawkish than Jackson, and the generals may find him to be a rather tough man to deal with.

Also, by skillful staging, the President-elect managed to make it appear that he wanted to give a top appointment to Governor Rockefeller, when there is not the slightest reason to think that he did. While the appointment of Gov. Walter J. Hickel will cause some concern among conservationists, it was politically astute, since Hickel is not publicly committed on some of the key issues with which the Secretary of the Interior must deal.

The President-elect owes nothing to George Meany; at the same time organized labor will find it difficult to object to Dr. George Shultz as Secretary of Labor. Similarly, the warring factions on farm policy cannot take umbrage at the appointment of Dr. Clifford Hardin as Secretary of Agriculture, and he is more likely to turn in a good performance than, say, a farm state Senator, Governor or Representative.

David Kennedy is a better appointment for the Treasury than Maurice Stans who was first proposed, but Stans will probably be an effective Secretary of Commerce. It is true that William Rogers has had scant experience in international affairs, but Dean Rusk did—and we know what kind of Secretary of State he turned out to be.

The most obvious apparent weaknesses are to be found, first, in John Mitchell's appointment to the critically important post of Attorney General (although this weakness may be remedied by the selection of the right kind of person to head the Civil Rights Division); and, generally, in the posts related to urban affairs.

Frankly we are surprised at the "surprise" which has been widely expressed over the selections; it is much the kind of Cabinet we expected Nixon would name. He succeeded in getting the kind of Cabinet and staff he wanted, not necessarily the kind the country needs. We doubt that any of the men named will turn out to possess that "extra dimension" of greatness which the President-elect stressed. If any of them do, that indeed will be surprising. For it should be obvious that the selections reflect a retreat from the concept of greatness; these are not "great" men, they are operators, hopefully good "team" men.

But in these times—and with Nixon in the White House—one must be grateful for competence and moderation. The members of the new Cabinet will not provide leadership. That must come, if it comes at all, from the President-elect. Competence and moderation in Cabinet and staff will be of little avail unless there is real leadership in the White House. In the past, strong Presidential leadership has reflected qualities of personal greatness which we have never been able to detect in Mr. Nixon.

As a postscript, "the great presentation" ceremony struck us as being very much in the spirit and style of the kind of "presentation" an insecure Madison Avenue pitchman might make in trying to land a new account. The attempts at humor were not exactly hilarious, and the star performer had memorized his lines so thoroughly that, as will happen in such circumstances, he forgot to name the new Secretary of Commerce. The ceremony, so prim and proper, was inelegant if not downright amateurish. It was

IN THIS ISSUE

December 23, 1968

EDITORIALS

674

ARTICLES

- 679 Atlanta in Suspense: Crisis of the Constitution Arlie Schardt
 684 More Disclosures: Pentagon Loot Robert G. Sherrill
 686 China In Out of the Cold? John Gittings
 688 Shale Oil: The Dormant Bomb Chris Welles
 691 Ghetto and Suburban Schools 'The Quality of Inequality' Thomas P. Wilbur
 692 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 693 Illuminated Manuscripts Michael B. Folsom
 694 Welsh Christmas (poem) Eric Barker
 695 $35 Worth of Hubris Nathan Silver
 697 Picasso Images Harold Clurman
 698 The Poem in Large Type Jerome Mazzaro
 698 Timing (poem) A. R. Ammons
 699 Looking Backward D'Arcy McNickle
 699 All Day All Night New York (poem) Shirley Kaufman
 700 Art Books II Lawrence Alloway
 701 Records 1968 David Hamilton
 703 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher	Associate Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.	GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor	Associate Editor
CAREY MCWILLIAMS	PHIL KERRY
Executive Editor	Literary Editor
ROBERT HATCH	HELEN WELESIA

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission in four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $1 for foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207
No. 22

clearly an embarrassment to the participants if not the viewing audience. The men blinked not an eyelash and the wives looked straight ahead, not knowing whether to smile, not knowing quite what was expected of them. Mrs. Nixon, as usual, looked slightly dazed. Give him high marks for effort but the unhappy fact is that the President-elect, on such occasions, tries too hard.

Cultural Freedom's New Image

Credit the International Association for Cultural Freedom with an earnest effort to clean up its somewhat tarnished image by staging a marathon talkfest at Princeton University, where an assembly of carefully screened and selected intellectuals offered a wealth of unsolicited advice to the incoming Nixon administration on how to carry on at home and abroad. The association has been reorganized since it was revealed to have been the recipient of funds from the CIA—a charge which spokesmen for the association vehemently and righteously denied (they once threatened this publication with all sorts of dire consequences for having stated the fact).

The Princeton seminars represent the first significant surfacing of the association since the unfortunate disclosure. Image changing required, of course, a few changes in the cast. Reported as not being present, for example, were Mr. Melvin J. Lasky and Mr. Michael Josselson who, for so many years, held high the torch of cultural freedom. At the same time, the scope of the dialogue was slightly broadened, though kept well within the accepted areas.

The presence of Andreas Papandreou, however, added a definite zip to the proceedings. Mr. William F. Buckley, Jr., in a column on the assembly, illogically lamented the presence of one "sometime fellow traveller"—raising again the old query, "how free is cultural freedom?"—but commented, quite logically, on the failure to invite "such leaders in the founding of their association as Sidney Hook, Irving Kristol and Lionel Trilling." In the same spirit, might not the presence of such intellectuals as William A. Williams, Christopher Lasch, Howard Zinn, Eugene Genovese, Gar Alperowitz, I. F. Stone and Andrew Kopkind have added a dimension of interest and relevance to the proceedings?

A high point of this first session since the association's rebirth was an interview with Alastair Buchan of London's Institute of Strategic Studies. In the course of this interview, Mr. Buchan observed that the institute never had received any money, directly or indirectly, from the Central Intelligence Agency, noting: "I would perfectly recognize CIA money if I saw it, because I know a lot about it." We know nothing about it, but have always assumed that it would be fairly easy to recognize, since we have yet to hear of a case in which the CIA has managed to slip funds into the exchequer of an organization without someone's knowing about it. But the former Cultural Freedom officials apparently lacked Mr. Buchan's sharp eye for subsidy. In any case, the association has taken a small step in the direction of real cultural freedom and the CIA has been able to reduce its budget, a mite, without its original "seed money" having as yet born bitter fruit.

The Money's in the Hardware

Some time back (October 14, p. 357), we commented on Defense Secretary Clark Clifford's address to the National Security Industrial Association in which he opened up delightful vistas of what might be accomplished if the know-how of the military-industrial teams were to be applied to some of the country's more urgent social problems. Much earlier we had occasion to comment on former Gov. Edmund G. Brown's laudable efforts to get California's huge aerospace companies interested in such programs. At various times—as when it seemed that the war in Vietnam might be terminated sooner than expected, or when it appeared likely that NASA's budget might be cut substantially—the aerospace empire builders have talked as though they really might be interested in using their accumulated technical skills in some such effort. But the election of Richard M. Nixon, who takes what the industry regards as a "very positive" stand on large-scale defense spending, is putting an end to all that sort of idle chatter.

Recently Bernard D. Nossiter of The Washington Post interviewed major aerospace industrial leaders in Dallas, Fort Worth, San Diego and Los Angeles. He concludes that the aerospace industry has only a marginal interest in nondefense work of any kind; what interests them is "the long term threat" which produces military contracts, and just now that threat looms larger than it has for some years. An unnamed official in the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency agrees: "We are now at the edge of a precipice where we can escalate sharply. The industry thinks that agreements to limit arms are unlikely and will go all out to realize their expectations. We are at the threshold of another round in the arms race, just as we were eight years ago when we went all out for long range missiles."

One indiscreet executive gave Mr. Nossiter a graphic briefing on the advantages of selling "security." "It's basic. Its selling appeal is defense of the home. This is one of the greatest appeals the politicians have in adjusting the system. If you're the President and you need a control factor in the economy, and you need to sell this factor, you can't sell Harlem and Watts but you can sell self-preservation. We are going to increase defense budgets as long as those bastards in Russia are ahead of us."

True, systems analysis can define and help solve some social problems, but the rate and magnitude of profit taking is what determines how the aerospace industry applies its technical skills (see article p. 684). The big money is not in the design but in the hardware, in what is made. Even if such practical difficulties as finding a customer with funds to spend were removed, social problem solving would not yield a sufficient rate of return to be of interest to the industry. "The industry figures," writes Mr. Nossiter, "as a rule of thumb, that if it earns $20 million from research on a device, it will pick up $200 million for developing and testing it and $2 billion in production. That is why everybody says that the money is in the hardware." Not only are profits high but defense contracting is a form of "risk free" enterprise; the Pentagon underwrites unexpected costs.

In a speech in New York last week, Sen. George McGovern pointed out that "the mounting influence of the military-industrial complex" has become "the most serious internal threat facing the United States on the eve of the Nixon administration." This is the real threat on which the nation's attention should now be unremittingly concentrated.

Gunter and the Two Germanys

On November 25 a teen-age boy was discovered writhing and screaming for help in an East German mine field. After his cries had ceased, the East Germans carried him away on a stretcher. Two days later the West German tabloid Bild Zeitung carried a banner headline, "Refugee Bleeds To Death." The West German Government officially condemned the Communist leaders of East Germany as "barbaric and inhuman." (This is the standard West German reaction whenever an East German is killed or injured in trying to escape to the West.)

The next day the East Germans, "with obvious relish" (The New York Times, December 9) announced that the victim was not an East German at all but a West German, Günter Opperman, 16 years old, and that he was alive in an East German hospital. Both his legs had been badly mutilated when he stumbled into the mine field and his right leg had to be amputated, but he was recovering.

What had happened, it turned out, was that the boy's parents were separated and the mother, 42, was living with a 19-year-old lover. Günter and the lover quarreled and Günter was sent to a children's home, where he alleges he was beaten. He escaped and jumped the barbed wire into the East German mine field, thinking it was a deer preserve. The East Germans, uncertain of the mapping of the mine field, blew mines from the entrance side until three doctors were able to get to the youth and carry him out.

The boy's father visited him in the hospital and found the room full of flowers and piles of chocolate, oranges and cigarettes on his bedside table—a star patient, obviously. The father, who is unemployed and living on a $13-a-month West German war pension, was given an indefinitely valid entry permit and assured that the East German Government would take care of all hospital costs and provide an artificial leg for his son. On his return to West Germany, Mr. Opperman said that he had not found the East Germans barbaric.

Both Germanys could learn a lesson from this incident. But will they?

Nuclear Power—Not So Fast

In 1966 the boom in nuclear power plants reached such heights that by October Westinghouse and General Electric were booked up for plants to go into operation in 1970, and were nearing manufacturing capacity for 1971. Sustained through 1967, the boom slackened off in 1968. In March of this year, Philip Sporn, the highly respected retired president of the American Electric Power Company, reported to the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy that nuclear power's spectacular upsurge in 1966-67 occurred despite "remarkably little" progress in nuclear economics, as compared with fossil-fuel generating costs. Consequently orders for nuclear plants could be expected to decline "significantly" from the 1966-67 levels.

However unwelcome this forecast may be to those interests which, in the good old free enterprise way, are intent on getting theirs here and now, it is actually in the interest of the healthy, long-term growth of nuclear power. That factors of uncertainty and insecurity exist in the current situation is clear from warnings by experts in the field, including Admiral Hyman Rickover, as well as incidents reported in Nuclear Industry, the informative monthly magazine of the Atomic Industrial Forum.

Consider first the case of the Enrico Fermi atomic plant at Monroe, Mich., about 30 miles south of Detroit. Fermi is a small (61 megawatt) experimental plant of the fast breeder type, which ultimately is expected to supersede the existing commercial nuclear plants, most of which are in the 400-1,100 megawatt class and use boiling or pressurized water for heat transfer. Though small in electrical output (since it was conceived as a research project), Fermi was not small in cost—$124 million, of which $70 million came from Detroit Edison. In October, 1966, the Fermi installation suffered a serious accident—a reactor core meltdown—which, while it did not injure operating personnel or spread radiation outside the reactor building, necessitated a complete shutdown. Operators hope the shutdown will end by April, 1969, but this would make the down period two years and four months, with no guarantee that it will not last even longer or that further accidents will not occur when experimental operation is resumed.

With an experimental reactor it may be argued that accidents are instructive, but the Fermi accident was perhaps too instructive. Diagnosis alone took over a year and then turned out to be wrong. A piece of sheet metal found lying below the reactor was declared to be something left behind in construction, and was believed to have obstructed the flow of coolant. While the meltdown was indeed caused in this way, the piece of sheet metal was later found to be part of a flow guide which had been added toward the end of the construction period and never recorded in the construction drawings. When this loose procedure was criticized by Rep. Craig Hosmer of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, Milton Shaw, the AEC's reactor development director, conceded that it was "inexcusable" but explained: "When you are under a tight budgetary situation, people don't feel it is important to document things and they pass that up in favor of doing other things. This is characteristic of any engineering business." To which one can only reply that it had better not be characteristic of commercial nuclear engineering, with power that may be twenty times that of the experimental Fermi reactor.

From an economic standpoint, there are two instances of technical and economic troubles encountered in commercial reactor planning and construction which are relevant. One is the Southern California Bolsa Island combined electric generating and water desalting plant, a co-operative venture of the federal government, the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California, the Los Angeles Department of Water & Power, Southern California Edison, and San Diego Gas & Electric. In three years, while the planners were planning, the cost rose from $434 million to $765 million, so that the future of the whole project is now in doubt. The other is the Oyster Bay No. 1 project of Jersey Central Power & Light, a 640-megawatt plant for which General Electric is the prime contractor. After assurances that the plant could go on line October 1, 1967, various delays necessitated a change of date to July 1, 1968. However, numerous small welding cracks were discovered in October, 1967, in the pressure vessel, built by a GE subcontractor. GE thought that repairs should not delay construction more than two weeks, but at last advices the plant was not scheduled to go on line until May, 1969, or about twenty months behind the promised delivery date.

The fact is that at the 1966-67 contract pace nuclear power was going too far, too fast. The number of skilled, experienced nuclear power engineers is inadequate for such a rate of design, manufacture and checking. A single accident involving casualties could set nuclear power back for years. In one of his last speeches in the Senate, Thurston Morton called for a "most comprehensive" review of the federal government's participation in the atomic power program, with primary emphasis on safety factors. Sharp dissent was evoked in industry circles by Senator Morton's remarks, but a sober re-evaluation would seem to be in order.

Two-way Diplomacy

What looks like sabotage of a possible relaxation of tensions between the U.S. and USSR was perpetrated in the declining weeks of the Johnson Administration. It could have been the work of Dean Rusk, whose skill in the art of posturing as a man of peace while simultaneously stoking the fires of U.S.-Soviet discord has been one of his prime accomplishments.

The most recent instance of doublespeak—or, more accurately, speech and action tending in opposite directions—was in connection with the proposed missile talks between the two superpowers. Peter Grose reported in The New York Times on December 3 that Soviet diplomats in Washington, and even Premier Kosygin himself, had passed specific word that the Soviet leadership remained interested in opening the missile talks. Mr. Kosygin raised the matter with former Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara on the latter's visit to Moscow in November and also with two visiting Senators, Claiborne Pell of Rhode Island and Albert Gore of Tennessee, both Democrats. "The irony is," according to Grose, "that the United States, which has been pressing for the talks for the last two years, is now holding them up."

The Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia ruled out any discussion for the time being, the more so as Richard Nixon, then a candidate for the Presidency, had expressed opposition, and as President-elect had to be consulted on future moves. Next, since the invasion had injected new life into NATO, the members of the alliance had to be assured that any U.S.-USSR talks would not jeopardize NATO plans for a fast-reaction fleet of fifty warships and other plans for rejuvenating the Grand Alliance.

Yet on television (C.B.S., December 1) Mr. Rusk indicated that the proposed talks were getting close study: "We do believe it is important to grapple with this problem of offensive and defensive strategic missiles. We are working on that very hard. . . ." There were no plans for a summit meeting, Mr. Rusk went on, but "I would not want to rule out the possibility."

Despite qualifications necessitated by the transition of administrations and other adverse factors, Washington correspondents "understood" on December 6 that the United States had informed the Soviets that it was ready to begin the long-postponed talks. Simply on the basis of what he had told the television audience on December 1, Mr. Rusk might reasonably have been expected to refrain from twisting the Russian bear's tail at this particular juncture. But that was precisely what he then proceeded to do.

On December 6 Reuters quoted an announcement of the U.S. Sixth Fleet from Naples that two destroyers would enter the Black Sea in the next few days for "routine operations" in international waters. The Black Sea is bordered by Turkey, Romania and Bulgaria, in addition to the Soviet Union, but though its waters are technically international it is difficult to see what urgent mission American men of war would have in this area at this time. Moreover, the 1936 Montreux convention places definite limitations on warships of non-Black Sea powers entering these waters. The destroyers designated, the Dyess and Turner, easily came within the displacement limit, but guns of a caliber exceeding 8 inches, or 203 mm, are excluded. In a previous incident, in September, 1966, the Soviet Union had asked Turkey, which controls the straits between the Mediterranean and the Black Sea, to bar the destroyer William C. Pratt, on the ground that she was equipped with ASROC rockets. Turkey acceded to the Soviet request, and the visit of the Pratt was canceled.

The Dyess is equipped with a 9-missile ASROC launcher, which is a computer controlled anti-submarine weapon 305 mm in diameter, and therefore exceeding the gun caliber specified in the convention. The Soviets objected to her entrance, complaining also that she was equipped to carry nuclear weapons. A Sixth Fleet spokesman refused either to confirm or deny that nuclear weapons were aboard the destroyers. The Dyess and Turner passed through the Dardanelles on December 8 and were due to cruise in the Black Sea for five days.

The incursion was denounced by the Soviets as a "provocation." Provocation or no, what could it accomplish except to interfere with the pending negotiations, which Mr. Rusk had said he favored (and presumably the President and the President-elect likewise)? The purpose seems to have been to preface negotiations on missiles with a demonstration that we are as tough as ever. Another probable objective was to counter Soviet naval strength in the Mediterranean, now and in the foreseeable future grossly inferior to ours, with threatening moves in the vicinity of the Russian homeland. This comes about as close to a recipe for failure (assuming the negotiations take place) as can well be imagined.

Sensitive Subject

A footnote (no. 9) to Commissioner Nicholas Johnson's intensely interesting dissenting opinion (September 11) in the matter of the FCC's rebuke to N.B.C. over the Chet Huntley incident adds a dimension of special interest to Chris Welles's article in this issue (p. 688):

If it is difficult to detect the presence of news serving economic interests, it is virtually impossible to detect the omission of legitimate news items to serve economic interests. . . . A revealing example of the difficulty involves a recent story prepared for Life magazine. Life's business editor, Chris Welles, did an investigative piece on the oil industry's fear of competition and attempts to suppress the use of shale oil. Life's editor was quoted as saying about the article, in the course of making some minor editorial suggestions prior to publication, "In general, I think there's a good story here and some good reporting. . . ." The story was set in type, and scheduled for the March 1, 1968, issue. It never appeared.

The author, Mr. Welles, is reported as saying, "I'm almost positive" it was killed because of oil company-advertiser pressure; and that "it was an open secret around Life's editorial offices that salesmen feared vigorous reaction from oil company advertisers." Life's managing editor, George P. Hunt, is reported as saying, "Oil shale obviously is a sensitive subject that could have an effect on advertising revenue. . . . But that had nothing to do with our pulling out the story."

After the story was pulled, Mr. Welles was given a $2,000 raise and made entertainment editor. When he subsequently sold the oil shale story to Harper's he was fired. . . . Now, Life maintains, the story was killed because, as Mr. Hunt says, "It didn't turn out to be the definitive piece on oil shale that we wanted to do . . . (it) required a kind of sophistication that just does not come through."

(See The Wall Street Journal, July 30, p. 13, col. 2.)

The Big Economy Size

With the annual buying spree in memory of our Lord Jesus Christ in full swing, it becomes increasingly difficult to choose any particular offering for the grand prize. But deserving at least of honorable mention is the full page (less one column) New York Times advertisement: "MAKE A REALLY GRAND GESTURE . . . GIVE HER BONWIT'S THOUSAND-DOLLAR BOTTLE OF NORELL PERFUME."

Bonwit Teller is known to all as a center of metropolitan fashion, and Norell is sufficiently described in the text of the ad: "Every woman on earth longs to wear a Norman Norell original." Naturally, such being Norell's repute as a gown designer, every woman will also long to douse herself with the perfume bearing the magic name—which the famed designer no doubt blended with his own hands. Furthermore, the man who is in a position to ravish his wife (or mistress) with $1,000 worth of elixir, can secure this "most magnificent masterpiece of all" in a hand-cut bottle, "fashioned with the flawless Norell cut and etched across the back with the designer's personal signature."

For pickers, the "masterpiece" perfume is also available in the 2 oz. size ($80), 1 oz. ($50), down to 1/5 oz. ($13.50). Bonwit Teller has evidently heeded the frequently voiced criticism that the economy size in toothpaste, etc., isn't really economical. A quarter ounce of Norell at $15 figures out to $60 an ounce, which diminishes in steps to $31.25 an ounce for the 32-ounce (1 quart) size.

It's a steal—and gift wrapped too, without charge.

ATLANTA IN SUSPENSE

CRISIS OF THE CONSTITUTION

ARLIE SCHARDT

Mr. Schardt has been based in Atlanta for the past four years as Southeastern correspondent for Time.

Atlanta

Herman Talmadge, Richard Russell, George Wallace and Lester Maddox have all scored recent major political victories in Georgia. That foursome is enough to demonstrate that the Peach State is not exactly sprinting toward the 21st century, but more significant is the fact that while Wallace was sweeping Georgia last month, citizens of greater Atlanta defeated the Congressional hopes of progressive Democrats Charles Weltner and James Mackay in favor of GOP Congressmen Fletcher Thompson and Ben Blackburn, who were among the nation's highest scorers in the annual ratings of the arch-conservative Americans for Constitutional Action. Until that election it had been a standard comfort that, even though Georgia still clung to the regressive attitudes of pre-civil rights Dixie, hustling Atlanta was an oasis whose shining example would eventually prove irresistible to even the most die-hard reactionary.

Atlanta—"the city too busy to hate"—opened up racially before the rest of the South, and the move paid off in prosperity. It was good business to be the good guy. National corporations, convinced that Atlanta would avoid the ugly confrontations that have scarred so many Southern cities, flocked in. Restaurants thrived, hotels and office buildings sprang up, artists quit going North, big-time entertainers paid visits and major league sports came to stay.

But Atlanta—fat, proud, bustling and affluent though

It is, and blessed in Ivan Allen, Jr., with one of the nation's outstanding mayors—nevertheless faces the same mean and complex problems that confront the rest of America's great cities. They will not be solved by the inward-turning tendency that apparently stems from affluence. It is no time for voters to think they can take their winnings and quit the game.

The community needs a conscience. In the past, it was provided, as it should be in every city, by the newspapers. But today that nettle is gone. The Atlanta Constitution and the Atlanta Journal, wedded since 1950 into a corporation called Atlanta Newspapers, Inc. (ANI), are also content to take their winnings, getting fatter as the city sails ahead on its recent momentum. The rapid physical growth of Atlanta means more ads and more income to report to ANI's parent, Cox Enterprises of Dayton, Ohio. The fact that news coverage has been shrinking as profits have soared is of no apparent concern to owner James Cox, Jr., son of the three-time Ohio governor or to Jack Tarver, president of ANI.

Indeed, the journalistic attrition was proceeding peacefully until two months ago when Eugene Patterson, 1967 Pulitzer Prize-winning editor of the Constitution, quit in discouragement over the management's refusal to spend more of the newspapers' considerable income on the job newspapers are supposed to do. The last straw came for Patterson when the resignation of a young columnist triggered a dispute between Patterson and Tarver over editorial autonomy.

First-rate journalists had been fleeing the papers for years, but Patterson's fame was such that his departure provoked national comment. Many thought that such an embarrassing indication of the papers' deficiencies would shame management into needed reform. But not at all: the budget continues to rule the press at profitable ANI.

Despite its stingy news coverage, the Constitution held on for a time to its reputation as one of the country's best papers, thanks to the strength of its editorial writers, who consistently and articulately called for moderation during the South's agonizing years of open racial strife. But with the departure of Patterson, management has apparently decided that controversial editorial pages do not pay. The new editorial purview seems to be to make friends with all sides on every issue, as a good businessman should. One of the paper's top staffers mentions with frustration the "constant problems of lawyers interfering with the news. The resulting caution has severely hampered our ability to do the kind of public-service muckraking a good newspaper is supposed to do."

A telling example of the new editorial prudence comes out of the recent elections. The name of an important county official, Brince Manning, became linked with a scurrilous attempt to discredit his opponent through distribution of a bogus edition of the local underground newspaper. Manning had earlier filed a blanket suit against the news media, charging conspiracy to defeat him. A Constitution editorial was written, mentioning Manning's name, and calling for investigation by the post office and the grand jury. It never ran. "This means from now on we can be intimidated by any politician waving a nuisance suit at us," says one staff member.

The sudden editorial softness has not been lost on the Atlanta readers. "What can we do? Isn't there something we can do?" asks a young lawyer. "It's the story of a great paper losing its guts," says a graduate student. "I see Jack Tarver has taken over the editorial page," says an executive.

No area needs strong newspapers more than the South, the most rapidly changing section of the nation, and Atlanta, undeniably the capital of the South, is the logical home for a great sectional newspaper. ANI not only ducks this responsibility; it actually supplies less regional coverage than papers in Charlotte, Memphis, Charleston, and even Birmingham. Unlike these others, the Atlanta papers have no regional bureaus, although the Journal motto says that it "covers Dixie like the dew" and the Constitution calls itself "the South's standard newspaper."

Each paper has only one man in Washington, where the assignment consists primarily of chronicling the mundane doings of Georgia's Congressional delegation. Not only do Atlanta-based reporters rarely cover stories out of state, they seldom even venture far into Georgia. Unless, that is, they are on the sports staff. While neither paper bothered to send a man on the short trip to cover the march on Selma, the biggest story of 1965, a sports writer that fall was dispatched all the way to Evanston, Ill., for a first-hand report on the Florida-Northwestern football game.

Every football weekend the two papers proudly scatter crews of a dozen writers and half as many photographers—billed in front-page boxes as the “Big Team”—to games all over the Southeast, and sometimes farther.

This unique sense of values lends weight to a suspicion held by a number of the reporters that there has been a deliberate but unstated policy to play down race news, especially during the middle 1960s. “Sports cause no flak,” says one ANI veteran. “You go out and cover ‘niggers’ and you’re in trouble. If you cover Selma you upset both the rednecks and the Piedmont Driving Club.” (The latter is an Atlanta synonym for The Establishment.)

One of the most shocking failures of the papers occurred, also in 1965, when Atlantans gave a huge banquet to honor Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., for winning the Nobel Peace Prize. Not only did the papers fail to report any of the pulling and hauling that went on between those favoring and those opposing the banquet but the Journal’s managing editor William Fields (since promoted to executive editor of both papers) declined even to assign anyone to cover the occasion itself. Finally a young reporter got permission to do the story on his own time. The evening, one of the milestones in Atlanta history, was covered by all the national media, but both the Constitution and the Journal dismissed it with brief stories buried deep inside.

The zany 1966 gubernatorial race also produced some strange news decisions. When agents of Democratic candidate James Gray were charged with trying to pay Lester Maddox to drop out of the governor’s race, the Constitution had the story but did not use it for fear of libel. The Journal likewise balked when the story came in on its Los Angeles Times-Washington Post wire, although other papers across the country gave it strong play.

When dissatisfaction with the winners of both party primaries spurred a write-in movement for former Gov. Ellis Arnall, backers of Write-In Georgia (WIG) were thrashed by the Journal’s political editor Charles Pou, who referred to them in his news stories as the “backbite vote.” The Journal endorsed right-wing Republican Howard Callaway and buried WIG news, virtually ignoring a state-wide WIG convention which drew 1,000 party workers to Macon. When Arnall’s supporters held a fund-raising rally one night in Atlanta, some 850 persons paid up to $100 each to see such stars as Theodore Bikel, Rev. Malcolm Boyd and Peter, Paul & Mary. Both the turnout and the attraction were unusual for Atlanta, but the Journal covered the event with a 4-inch story on page 100.

The Atlanta papers have also left to other journals the most significant single continuing Southern story of recent years—the phenomenon of next-door neighbor George Wallace. ANI had staff covering only a few days of the 1966 Lurleen-George campaign. There was no further direct coverage of Wallace until a Constitution man was sent to follow the closing weeks of this year’s Presidential bid.

Both papers do an earnest job of reporting local developments and both fill reams of space with Georgia political news, but reporters are frequently dismayed by the need to cope with ANI’s penny-pinching expense policies. Taxis and long-distance phones are to be used sparingly. Company cars, equipped with the barest essentials and often well worn, are standard transportation for trips around Georgia, although at least one Journal reporter successfully refused to ride in them on the ground that they are unsafe. Two former ANI reporters tell of going to an Atlanta motel for a press conference with former Teamster boss Jimmy Hoffa, then slipping off to use bus tokens provided by ANI while the other newsmen hailed cabs or drove cars. “Hell, we were embarrassed and didn’t want the other guys to see us,” says one of the reporters.

Worst of all, salaries are so low that ANI has often seemed a training school for reporters moving on to other jobs. Most leave reluctantly. They love the life in Atlanta and they also feel a special sense of tradition, left over from the papers’ pasts, that keeps many of them around long after good sense has told them to leave. But leave they eventually do.

Alumni of recent years include the Los Angeles Times’s Jack Nelson, a 1960 Pulitzer Prize-winner who was earning less than $200 a week after twelve years at the Constitution; Ted Lippman, who quit the ANI Washington bureau to join the Baltimore Sun; Walter Rugaber and Fred Powlledge, both of whom went to The New York Times; Constitution education editor Hal Gulliver and reporter Ted Simmons, both of whom stayed in Atlanta by joining the Associated Press; Douglas Kiker of N.B.C.-TV; Constitution editorial columnist Marvin Wall and Journal city editor Pat Watters, who joined the staff of the Southern Regional Council; Paul Valentine, who went to The Washington Post after earning $125 per week in his third year on the Journal; Walker Lundy of the Detroit Free Press; capitol reporter Joe Brown, who took a job with the state; Bill Shipp, the Constitution’s top reporter when he left his $170-a-week job two years ago for Newsday, then returned to Atlanta to take a federal job; and Reuben Smith, who joined the Knoxville papers but quickly returned to Atlanta as a correspondent for Business Week.

When these and other excellent newsmen have left ANI in recent years, management has almost never tried to change their minds. The talent drain has not bothered Tarver. He replaces the losses with inexperienced young personnel who usually start at less than $100 a week. ANI management has always known how to handle labor problems. In 1947, when the Newspaper Guild made a determined effort to organize the Constitution, management began encouraging formation of a company union instead. The Guild lost by a single vote. The reporter who headed the drive for the union never joined it himself.

Back in those days Tarver himself was on the news staff. He joined the Constitution in 1943 and soon became known as a hard-hitting journalist whose polished writing contained considerable wit. “He had the poison-est pen of all,” chuckles one ANI veteran. “He could do more damage with one sentence than most people can with a whole page.” But Tarver switched to the business side and rose rapidly to succeed George Biggers as ANI president in 1958. “I was put here to make money,” Biggers said of his job (he had often tried to fire the controversial Ralph McGill). Tarver was apparently determined to show owner James Cox, Jr., that he could enrich Cox Enterprises even faster. "What's really sad," says one long-time staff member, "is that Tarver in his day was a really good newsmen."

The Constitution's company union, Atlanta News Associates, maintained a suitably docile stance until 1961, when it balked at a management offer of a $5-a-week raise. The company called for outside arbitrators, who promptly recommended a $9 raise, plus $2 more at the end of one year (contract negotiations are held biennially. The next one takes place this March).

The extra several thousand dollars must have been too much for ANI to bear, because Tarver warned the greedy writers that if they forced an unreasonable rate on ANI, there would have to be a "numerical reduction." Sure enough, he did fire three staffers. The union president that year was Bruce Galphin, a bright young writer who applied later in the year for a Nieman Fellowship. Galphin won the Nieman although managing editor William Fields refused to approve his application. In fact, added Fields, he would fire Galphin if he could, but refrained because he knew the NLRB would only reinstate him.

A strong effort to organize a similar company union at the Journal brought some fascinating developments in 1967, when management scored a clear victory despite some remarkably clumsy tactics. Management's first shot took the form of "advice" from one top editor to the writers on the editorial page that they avoid the union or seek other jobs. Tarver easily topped this with a letter to each Journal employee likely to vote on the union question. Tarver told them he opposed the union, then made the startling statement that "the average Journal pay check has run considerably higher than the Constitution for the past sixteen years." The letter added that a round of wage increases which had just been approved for the Journal "would have widened even further the gap between the two papers, but following receipt of NLRB notification of the union's organization attempt, they were held up on advice of legal counsel." The letter naturally made interesting reading on the bulletin board of the Constitution.

As pre-vote activities continued, a rumor spread through the sports departments that if a Journal union was created, the sports staffs of the two papers would be merged and numerous jobs eliminated. Journal reporter Robert Coram, who had initiated the union drive, received a disciplinary slip charging him with "missing the lead" on a story. Coram explained the lead had been cut by the desk, and management later admitted at an NLRB hearing that disciplinary slips are not commonly used.

When an NLRB hearing was held to determine whether editorial writers are part of management—and therefore ineligible to vote in the union election—editorial writer Neal Brogdon spoiled management's case by testifying that editorial writers have no connection with the business interests of the paper. Two days later Brogdon, who had also signed the election petition despite the warning to editorial writers, was fired. A Phi Beta Kappa, Brogdon was charged with being weak on grammar (although he had at times been assigned to correct grammar) and with showing too little interest in local affairs, although his primary responsibility was in foreign affairs. Brogdon was earning $131 a week after nearly five years at the paper.

Despite all this provocation, Journal staffers obediently rejected the union by a margin of 49 to 21. This meekness embittered some Constitution reporters. Describing Journal reporters as "lamepreys," one Constitution reporter said: "Every time the Constitution gets raises, the Journal gets raises too. They get nice and fat and healthy off of us while we're getting our heads bloodied."

As soon as the Journal staff rejected the company union, Coram announced that he had no intention of pursuing any future union efforts. But six months later, Coram was fired on charges of unethical conduct. Managing editor Fields said Coram had "embarrassed" ANI by misrepresenting himself in order to get information from sources at the state Revenue Department. Coram later lost an appeal to the NLRB.

ANI has been indifferent to reporters' careers in other ways as well. When he won the 1947 Pulitzer Prize for uncovering vote fraud in the gubernatorial election of Herman Tammadge, George Goodwin had been nominated not by the papers but by a journalism professor at Emory University. When Jack Nelson won the 1960 Pulitzer Prize for an exposé of the state mental hospital, the largest mental institution in the world, management got the Georgia Press Association to nominate the paper, rather than Nelson. But Nelson himself was nominated by the Medical Association of Georgia, and the Pulitzer went to him.

Despite its unwillingness to become a regional leader, to cover the news adequately, to pay decent wages, or to respect its staff, ANI continues to thrive in its monopoly market. But if money is ANI's only interest it could do even better by improving its products. For the fact is that while Atlanta's population has recently been increasing at the rate of more than 150,000 every five years, daily circulation of both papers has actually decreased. Constitution circulation was 202,635 in 1963; last year it was 200,603. Journal circulation was 259,003 in 1963; last year it was 251,203. Only the combined Sunday edition has gained, from 504,755 to 523,581.

The failure of ANI circulation to grow with its market illustrates a remark by Ed Guthman, national news editor of the Los Angeles Times, about the general state of newspapers throughout the country: "If only management could realize it's good business to have a good paper." His own paper has spent increasingly large sums on news, with a commensurate financial gain.

The loss of Patterson was costly for ANI. While he was on it, the Constitution published a provocative, diligently researched editorial section. Besides the front-page column of the legendary Ralph McGill and outstanding cartoons by Cliff ("Baldy") Baldowski, there were signed columns by Patterson, Jim Rankin, Bruce Galphin and B. J. Phillips, a bright young girl whom Patterson had discovered while she was still at the University of Georgia.

Miss Phillips filled a lively corner of the page with short, sharply written columns about the youth rebellion, the generation gap, hippies, police and the war in Vietnam. But last September she stepped on some very special toes when she wrote a column about a request by the Georgia Power Company for a rate increase to offset the 10 per cent federal income tax surcharge. "I don't quite understand," she wrote, "why I've got to pay for their increased income taxes. If they can't afford it, what makes them think I can? After all, the government is getting that 10 per cent from me. And you. Why not Georgia Power?"

It is assumed around Atlanta that the effective rulers of the city do not have to talk to one another in an emergency. When the need arises, each knows what he must do. Hours after her column appeared in the first edition, B. J. learned that Tarver felt her column should be limited to "topics she's qualified to write about." She resigned. Patterson, already disturbed over previous examples of encroachment on a page that had traditionally been absolutely autonomous (a situation for which Tarver deserved much of the credit) held a heated conference with Tarver. When he could get no firm assurance that there would be no similar interference in the future, Patterson quit (B. J. Phillips was soon hired as a reporter by The Washington Post. When Post managing editor Ben Bradlee was promoted two days later, Patterson was hired to replace him).

Patterson had been at odds with Tarver for years. One insider chose to call it "healthy disagreement" over news coverage, the authority of the editor and, increasingly, editorial autonomy. But another charged that "Tarver sought to treat him like an office boy, not an editor. Tarver deals with people through fear and not through love. He runs the paper by keeping people off-balance. He wanted a compliant editor. No more arguing."

The loss of Patterson, whom many persons thought would some day succeed Ralph McGill, caused considerable distress to McGill himself. But although he carries the title of publisher, McGill's authority is essentially limited to his column, and there was little he could do except urge Patterson to reconsider.

With Patterson's departure, management decided to change the concept of the post he had held. The title was changed from editor to editor of the editorial page. One official explained that ANI wanted someone who would be "deeply involved in community life," and would "sit in on the events" of a fast-growing city. But a leading staff writer countered that management had simply "downgraded the job" by reducing the range of editorial authority.

The man Tarver hired is Reg Murphy, 34, former Constitution political editor, who himself quit the paper three years ago, expressing bitterness over its low salaries and limited news budget. He then worked in public relations, as managing editor of Atlanta Magazine, and as a freelance writer before returning to ANI. It may well be that Murphy is simply fulfilling management's new concept of the job; in any case, he is not asserting the editor's prerogative to be a critic. "Reg doesn't think much differently from the establishment. He's at ease with their ideas," says one of his friends on the paper. "That's not a mark against him. It just happens to be him."

Through its editorial page, the Constitution seems not to be seeking the role of pacifier, closing the "credibility gap" created in the days when the paper spoke out forcefully for moderation amid a sea of white segregationist sentiment. Today, it levels attacks only on such generalized targets as bad government, or such safe ones as Lester Maddox. Oddly, it is partly because of the paper's past outspokenness that Atlanta became the progressive and prosperous city it is today.

Murphy, who has a solid knowledge of politics and a wide acquaintance in Georgia, has always been a serious and hard-working journalist. But in his new role as chief editorial spokesman, his columns have been careful and qualified, his conclusions hedged. When one recent column seemed headed unavoidably toward a conclusion deploring the regressive influence of Herman Talmadge on the state and the region, saying Talmadge's critics are right when they charge he has not responded to racial issues or urban needs, the final two sentences reversed the entire thrust: "But isn't that criticism true of Georgia as a whole?" Murphy concluded. "And doesn't the Senator represent moderately well the people he is elected to represent?"

"It was almost as if to say that makes it O.K.," one reporter complained. "If McGill or Patterson had written that column there would have been one more paragraph, saying that even though Talmadge reflects the majority feeling, it's still wrong."

His peers have not given up hope that Murphy may start adding that "one more paragraph." They recall that Patterson himself was not always the most outspoken of writers. Indeed, Patterson recently stated that he had been "late" coming around in support of such historic movements as the bus boycotts, sit-ins and freedom rides. The Constitution, for that matter, supported segregation into the late 1950s, although it called for moderation in the face of wild emotionalism.

The immediate future will be critical for the long-range direction of the Atlanta papers. Their younger ranks are currently left with only two biting editorial writers—

Reese Cleghorn at the Journal and Galphin at the Constitution—and both appear ready to leave if drastic changes are not made. Luckily for ANI, the best members of the news room staffs are taking a wait-and-see attitude. No Constitution reporters have left in the wake of Patterson, to whom many of them looked for inspiration. They stay partly because of that Constitution aura from the past, but also because of rumors that "things might get better" on the news side. Some believe that Cox and Tarver genuinely feared a major walkout when Patterson quit, and they see small but hopeful signs. Tarver, for example, has long had a reputation for being insulting to his reporters, consistently failing to acknowledge good work to the point they felt was deliberate. Many were angered through the years by his habit of walking up to a reporter in the news room, asking a question, then walking away while the reporter was in mid-sentence.

Lately, however, "Tarver often comes into the city room and asks how things are going," says one staffer wonderingly, adding: "There's been talk of beefing up the news-room budget. News-room morale is pretty good." Still, he retains the wait-and-see stance, because "You don't know whether it's a courtship or a wedding."

One of the papers' best reporters summarizes the outlook this way: "You just can't work for a paper you're not proud of. If we're going to stay, things are going to have to get better for all of us. When one goes, the rest are going to have to go, and all the paper will be able to get will be real sluggards. What happens in the next few months is going to be pretty decisive."

MORE DISCLOSURES

PENTAGON LOOT

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

Defense industries have moved so far away from being viewed as "merchants of death," as many in the 1920s and 1930s saw them, and have become such a welcome and apparently necessary part of our life that the idea of regulating them—except in the most perfunctory pro forma fashion, as the FCC "regulates" radio and television—is no longer considered seriously. In fact, it is not considered at all.

Government procurement of all items, civilian and military, comes to $50 billion a year; of that, defense alone accounts for $43 billion (procurement does not include, of course, such items as payment to personnel, the cost of running the Pentagon, general administrative expenses, etc.). If the federal government were at all serious about controlling profiteering, obviously defense purchasing would be the place to begin.

To control profiteering, a uniform accounting standard would have to be set up. That is, all government auditors would have to use the same system for measuring costs and profits. But as Admiral H. G. Rickover and some others have been stating publicly for at least five years, there are a dozen methods used by the government to measure the costs and profits of the same contracts, with the result that in some cases estimates of these costs and profits differ as much as 50 per cent.

This problem, then, can be used as a test of the government's sincerity in saying that it wants to block excessive profits.

Last spring the House Banking Committee inserted an amendment into the Defense Production Act requiring the Government Accounting Office to establish uniform accounting standards for all noncompetitive contracts of more than $100,000, and to do so—not to think about it, but to do it—within one year. The amendment passed the House. But in the Senate Banking Committee it ran aground, and by the time the compromises had ended between the two houses, the GAO had only been ordered to do a feasibility study, within eighteen months, to see if uniform accounting standards could possibly be set up.

So far the GAO has hardly moved in its study, but that is really of little consequence since no matter what it reports in a year and a half, the fight for accurate accounting from the defense industry will be exactly where it is today.

It is necessary to give that brief background by way of saying that the following rundown on the recent hearings of the Senate Subcommittee on Economy in Government of the Joint Economic Committee is like reporting a dress parade: you will see some flashing of swords, and you will hear some loud exclamations, and you may even become a bit disturbed or excited by one revelation or another. But bear in mind that nothing that happened in Sen. William Proxmire's subcommittee has any likeness to actual conflict between evenly matched forces. These were the highlights:

Between 1965 and 1967, Lockheed Aircraft's net income dropped 21 per cent (while income for other top Pentagon contractors went up: General Dynamics rose 22 per cent, General Electric 21 per cent, United Aircraft 56 per cent and Boeing 65 per cent), so to help Lockheed along, the company was allowed to pad its costs for building the monster freight airship, the C-5. The job of padding has been so accomplished that it now appears costs will run at least 100 per cent ahead of estimates—an extra $2 billion. The argument for building the C-5 was that more cargo space is necessary, but this argument sagged at the Proxmire hearings when it was disclosed that a check of airplanes leaving Travis Air Force Base—the main hopping-off point for Vietnam—had unused space that could have accommodated about 60 million additional pounds of cargo. Annually, this wasted space would be valued at about $45 million.

The government is being played for the wildest kind of sucker by the defense realtors. Defense industrialists who own their property can only charge the government for depreciation, but if they rent they can charge the government 100 per cent of the cost. Many of the arms merchants are building plants, selling them to friends, then leasing them back at princely rates—which is charged to the government and goes into the pockets of their pals (with kickbacks a possibility). It is believed that the government loses about $1 billion a year in this way, as the difference in what it would pay for depreciation and what it pays for rent.

Many of the defense industrialists risk nothing; they use government money for their payrolls and they use federal plants and equipment for their work (sometimes at no cost, sometimes for 1 or 2 per cent of sales). Last year it was discovered that inventories of federal property were so haphazard that the government does not know who is using much of its equipment. It was also discovered that some of the government machinery was being used by private industries to do civilian commercial work. When these things were found out, the Pentagon said it was going to cut down on the amount of government equipment used by private industry. But in questioning Pentagon witnesses, Proxmire learned that since last year the amount of government equipment in private hands has actually increased by $100 million.

In 1963 the Pentagon quit releasing information about how the prime contracts were being subcontracted. Asked why, John M. Malloy, deputy assistant secretary of defense for procurement—in typical unconscious humor—explained that he had simply wanted to “eliminate a lot of excess reporting.”

There is a great deal of other reporting that the Pentagon considers excess. For instance, during fiscal 1968 firm-fixed-price contracts made up 53 per cent (about $25 billion worth) of defense procurement—but on this type of contract the Pentagon does not obtain any profit information whatsoever.

ABU Tribune London

Furthermore, the Truth in Negotiations Act—which the Pentagon claims is such a splendid tool—does not permit defense officials to inspect company books on roughly 70 per cent of the work done.

Perhaps the phoniest front put up by the Pentagon is that pious organization, the Logistics Management Institute. It was the brain child of former Defense Secretary Robert McNamara—who, history will doubtless record, was as clean-faced a con man as ever hit Washington. LMI is supposed to be the Pentagon's profiteering policeman. It keeps the industrialists in line. That, at least, is the theory.

So far it has found that the defense industrialists are not profiteering at all; in fact, they are barely getting by. It would be indeed startling if LMI came to any other conclusion, seeing as how it is supported almost entirely by the defense establishment and that its officers and staff are alumni of such outfits as the Institute for Defense Analysis, Atlas Chemical, Boeing, Honeywell Inc., the U.S. Air Force, General Precision Inc., and Center for Naval Analyses.

A really objective crowd.

At one point Proxmire asked Malloy: “What I am trying to get is whether or not this is a group that has made recommendations that would reduce procurement costs. Can you cite any example of their making a recommendation of the kind that could be construed as adverse to the interests of contractors, in the sense of reducing their profits?”

MALLOY: "Well, I am unable to answer just quickly a question of that kind."

It is not uncommon to find defense contractors earning more than 40 per cent on investments, before taxes. Prof. Murray L. Weidenbaum of Washington University, St. Louis—probably the most relentless student of military spending—found that on the average, large defense companies make 17.5 per cent return on their net worth compared to 10.6 per cent for similar size nondefense companies. Another measuring stick was supplied by Admiral Rickover, who said that profits on defense contracts are, on the average, 25 per cent higher today than five years ago.

For the big items that account for most of the defense budget—aircraft engines, combat vehicles, airframes, missile and space systems—the concentration of the market is overwhelming. Eight companies knock down more than half of the market.

Only in such items as ammunition, services, textiles and clothing, and subsistence do the smaller companies really have a whack at the money—and these are the markets that will slump first with the halt in hostilities. The big markets are standard—war or no war.

Although it has been proved that advertising for competitive bids cuts prices by at least 12 per cent, the Pentagon buys competitively only 11.5 per cent of the time—the lowest amount in five years.

On the other hand, the Pentagon not only fails to encourage competition but actually refuses to consider more than one seller in 58 per cent of its purchases—the highest level in five years.

As for the purchases which the Pentagon makes on a supposedly competitive basis, Weidenbaum remarked, "It is a little difficult for me to keep a straight face when reporting that only since May, 1967, does there have to be more than one bidder before an award is classified as competitive."

The Pentagon lout has been going to the same big companies for years. It takes so much money to gear up for the big contracts that only a few corporations can do it; and once established at the long-term contract level, it would take an inconceivable amount of bungling to be pushed out. So it is not surprising to find that eighteen of the companies which ranked among the top twenty-five defense earners last year were already in the top twenty-five a decade ago.

So much for the last round of fighting the Pentagon. Much of the evidence had been laid out in previous hearings in other years, without the slightest retarding effect on defense profiteering, and there is no reason to think that the results this time will be any different. There is not likely to be embarrassment even among officials of the Defense Department or the industry they so capably lobby for. Except for the disclosure that the C-5 transport may cost twice as much as it was supposed to cost, the press gave the hearings little coverage.

And yet, strangely enough, Defense officials showed in one episode that they are frightened by even the feeblest investigation. When Senator Proxmire wrote to A. E. Fitzgerald, Air Force Deputy for management systems, asking that he make an appearance and bring along a prepared statement, somebody at the Pentagon intercepted the letter and ordered Fitzgerald not to make a prepared statement. In fact, he would have been kept from appearing except that Proxmire got wind of what was happening and began to make threatening sounds. To prevent a fuss, Fitzgerald was permitted to show up. He was the one who told about the extra costs of the C-5, but his testimony was weakened by the fact that he had not been permitted to bring substantiating documents.

CHINA IN OUT OF THE COLD?

JOHN GITTINGS

Mr. Gittings is an assistant editor of Far Eastern Economic Review in Hong Kong.

Hong Kong

When China's Foreign Minister Chen Yi was confronted by a crowd of Red Guards, demanding that he make a self-criticism, and chanting quotations from Chairman Mao, he held up his own little red book and called for silence. "Thank you for reminding me of the Thoughts of our great leader," said the Minister, "but I too have a quotation from the Chairman for you, and it reads as follows: 'Chen Yi is a good comrade.'"

Or so the story goes. Certainly Mao's words have been freely used during the cultural revolution, in or out of context, to bolster a variety of partisan arguments. The latest instance of this should give Chen Yi himself, and those within and outside China who hope for a return by Peking to a more rational foreign policy, considerable grounds for satisfaction. In a nineteen-year-old speech by Mao Tse-tung, recently republished in the Chinese press with a fanfare of publicity, the following words may be found:

We should not refuse to enter into negotiations because we are afraid of trouble and want to avoid complications, nor should we enter into negotiations with our minds in a haze. We should be firm in principle; we should also have all the flexibility permissible and necessary for carrying out our principles.

Reissuing of this speech at the end of November has important domestic implications, since it contains Mao's endorsement of many aspects of internal economic policy for which Liu Shao-chi has been hauled over the coals in the cultural revolution. Some cynics even suggest that the speech might well have been ghost-written for Mao by Liu himself back in 1949. And it dovetails very neatly with the general drift toward greater moderation in China which has been evident since the summer of 1968. As far as foreign policy is concerned, signs of a more flexible attitude have also become apparent, although most of them still need to be located with a Pekinological magnifying glass.

The most remarkable example of this tentative thaw has been China's invitation to the United States "to conclude an agreement on the five principles of peaceful co-existence" conveyed in an official foreign ministry statement of November 26 on the Sino-U.S. ambassadorial talks in Warsaw. These talks had been unproductive since the cultural revolution began, with several postponements by the Chinese side, who failed to turn up for the latest session scheduled for November. But the foreign ministry statement, while attempting to shift blame for the cancellation of this meeting onto American shoulders, also expressed a willingness to meet on February 20 of next year, thus continuing this Sino-U.S. dialogue, which has been maintained intermittently since it began in November, 1955.

The Chinese offer of a treaty of peaceful coexistence, contained in this statement, has been seized upon by Moscow as further proof of Peking's tacit "collusion" with Washington (the mirror image of the Chinese claim that the United States and the Soviet Union are "collaborating to divide up the world"). The Russians have cried wolf for too long to be taken seriously, but this time they might conceivably have a point.

Admittedly the Chinese proposal is linked to a demand that the United States should undertake to "immediately withdraw all its armed forces from China's territory Taiwan Province and the Taiwan Straits area and dismantle all its military installations in Taiwan Province," which is unlikely to cut much ice in Washington. But it does mean that the Chinese, after the interregnum of the cultural revolution, have once again adopted a coherent negotiating position for the ambassadorial talks. Even if it is far from being acceptable to the other side, it at least provides a basis for further discussion.

During the cultural revolution, we may ironically note, China's head of state Liu Shao-chi was criticized for advocating almost exactly the same principles which the foreign ministry statement now sets forth. Thus in the People's Daily of October 16, 1967, Liu was denounced for having uttered this "nonsensical" opinion: "Even in the case of the United States, we also hope to improve relations with it. . . . If the United States withdraws its troops from Taiwan, then the bone of contention will disappear and we may develop friendly relations with it." How dare he suggest, exclaimed the People's Daily, that Taiwan was the only stumbling block to better relations, or that one could ever be "friendly" with the imperialist robbers!

Yet Liu was merely restating what had been official policy in the ambassadorial talks since 1960, and which has now been substantially readopted (with the difference that, so far as one knows, China has never in the past explicitly proposed a formal agreement based on the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence). In the mid-1950s when the talks first began, it is worth recalling, Peking had adopted a much more flexible position, suggesting a variety of limited areas for negotiation, all of which were scornfully rejected by the American side. Those who speak of Chinese foreign policy as if it has always been "inflexible" or "dogmatic" in its hostility toward the United States would do well to remember that there was a time when the boot was on the other foot.

Is there any hope, therefore, that the Chinese position will lead to any more fruitful negotiations than were possible before the cultural revolution if it is simply a return to the status quo ante? There would appear to be an insoluble conflict of principle involved, between China's insistence that the Taiwan problem must be settled, on its own terms, before progress can be made elsewhere, and the American refusal to regard the status of Taiwan as negotiable. But it is still arguable that both sides are now prepared to indulge in a greater freedom of maneuver behind their entrenched principles, as they were before the cultural revolution.

In the first place, the Chinese have previously made it clear (notably in an interview of Edgar Snow's with Premier Chou En-lai in August, 1960, that they require a commitment in principle from the United States to withdraw from Taiwan before other issues can be considered, but not a physical withdrawal of support. Once the United States has acknowledged that a viable settlement of Taiwan must involve its departure from the area, Peking implies, then the details can be negotiated. Conversely, there have been occasional hints from the American side that it might contemplate some limited gesture in this direction—the removal, for instance, of the Seventh Fleet from the Taiwan Straits has apparently been mooted in the past in administration circles.

Second, both sides must be well aware that a settlement in Vietnam will create a different pattern of power relations in the Asian theatre. Just as the end of the Korean War was linked, in 1954, to the first settlement of the Vietnamese question, so an end to the Vietnamese War today could conceivably involve the beginnings of a package deal on Taiwan. This may sound a fanciful idea, but it is one which is being actively discussed by some observers in Southeast Asia, and especially by those who are watching China.

One obvious stumbling block would be a refusal by China to honor a settlement on Vietnam for a start. Until recently, this was a distinct possibility, since Peking made little effort to conceal its hostility toward the Paris peace talks, which it described as a U.S.-Soviet "peace hoax to sell out the people of Vietnam." Mao and his colleagues frequently bestowed their gratuitous advice upon Hanoi, to the effect that "perseverance means victory," and that the Vietnamese should struggle to a bitter but glorious end.

But the bombing halt over North Vietnam, and the prospect of enlarged talks in which the National Liberation Front—which is after all the very embodiment of the Vietnamese people in Chinese eyes—would take part, seems to have prompted second thoughts in Peking (and perhaps it is fortunate that these developments have coincided with the resurgence of the "moderates" in China's domestic politics).

Since November 1, the Chinese press has rigorously excluded almost all unfavorable references to the "peace plot" from its columns, and for that matter virtually all news about Vietnam. But in an unusual break with precedent, they have published, in toto and without comment, not only the major statements issued by Hanoi and the NLF but also President Johnson's address in which he announced the bombing halt—an unfamiliar and bizarre sight in the pages of the People's Daily. "We have suspended judgment on the peace talks," China seems to be saying: "We are prepared to wait and see whether our prophecies of doom are justified or not," thus opening up the possibility that China will, after all, concur in a settlement if one is reached. The Chinese foreign ministry's statement on the Sino-U.S. ambassadorial talks also implies a softer attitude toward the Paris talks, for if China can negotiate with the imperialists, why should the same right be denied to the Vietnamese?

A third reason for guarded optimism as to the future of the Peking-Washington dialogue lies in the new—and distinctly less attractive—look of Soviet foreign policy, which must be as evident to China as it is to the United States. Since the invasion of Czechoslovakia, senior Chinese leaders have more than once drawn attention to the "threat" posed against them by a Soviet military build-up in the Soviet Far East and Outer Mongolia. Western military sources have confirmed that significant deployments of Soviet troops and equipment have been made, including Soviet missiles which are said to be targeted upon Peking and other vital targets. The Chinese military leadership, in particular, is known to have been concerned for some time at the way in which the cultural revolution had depleted China's border defenses and weakened its defensive capabilities.

It is an axiom of the tripartite relationship among Moscow, Peking and Washington, that no one likes to be left out in the cold. In the early 1950s, American intervention in the Far East was largely based upon the assumed existence (which turned out to be illusory) of a state of monolithic unity" between the two great Communist powers. Later on, the growing rapprochement between the United States and the Soviet Union was neatly matched by the growing discord between the latter and China, and it was Peking which stood on its own. Although this state of isolation was welcomed by the Maoists, it is clear that some influential leaders in the Chinese administration were pressing for a degree of realignment toward the Soviet side, especially after the Americans began to escalate the Vietnamese War. (Disagreement in 1965 over whether or not to embark upon "united action" with the Soviet Union in order to present a joint front in Vietnam was one of the background causes of the cultural revolution.)

Today, as more moderate voices are heard again in Peking, it is highly unlikely that they will urge a rapprochement with the Soviet Union, although they may well advocate a new attempt to win friends in Eastern Europe, among those nations of the Socialist bloc for whom Czechoslovakia has been a bitter blow. It would be foolish to leap to the opposite conclusion—that Peking may execute an about-turn in the direction of the United States—but for tactical reasons alone it might be tempted toward demonstrating slightly greater flexibility, if for no other reason than to keep the Russians on edge—and at bay.

Perhaps this is why Soviet anti-Chinese propaganda, in private as well as public, has lately acquired a note almost of desperation. "We want the Americans to stay in Asia," says the man from Moscow who takes you aside in London, Paris or Phnom Penh, adding almost as an afterthought "except of course in Vietnam." And the myth of the yellow peril, otherwise known in Moscow News as "Mao Tse-tung's great-power ambitions for Asian hegemony," finds its warmest adherents in the Soviet Union, at a time when it has been—one hopes—virtually abandoned in the West. The implications of this paradox are no doubt being given serious consideration in the State Department, just as we may surmise that they are in Peking.

SHALE OIL

THE DORMANT BOMB

CHRIS WELLES

Mr. Welles, business editor of The Saturday Evening Post, is currently at work on a book about oil shale.

On the morning of December 20, the Department of the Interior will open bids it has received for the leasing of three tracts of government land containing perhaps $1 billion worth of oil shale. The event will probably receive little attention in the press, but it could have an incalculable effect on the disposition of the country's richest natural resource. In all, there are 16,000 acres of shale land in Colorado, Utah and Wyoming, 80 per cent of it federally owned. It is estimated to contain as many as 5 trillion barrels of oil—400 times the annual world consumption and worth $10 trillion. Unless government policy is changed soon, December 20 could be the start of handing over control of the federal shale land to the major oil companies. It would mean the loss of an opportunity to introduce strong domestic competition into one of the nation's most concentrated and monopolistic industries.

Historically, the Interior Department has tended to regard the shale deposits as a kind of dormant bomb which, if left undisturbed, might not go off and hurt somebody. Not only is the Department always sensitive to the charges of "giveaway" and "Teapot Dome" which invariably arise when anybody gets hold of a valuable piece of government property but it is also extremely reluctant to offend powerful oil interests which have never been in favor of shale development.

The overt reason for the industry's lack of interest is that, though many experts have estimated that oil could be produced from shale at a cost below that of domestic crude, no commercially viable process has actually been developed and tested. Even a small commercial plant, it is pointed out, would require millions of dollars in capital expenditures. Thus, through a nice bit of a priori reasoning, most oil companies have conducted only the most meager shale research programs.

However, the need to spend money does not usually stop the oil industry's pursuit of profit, and one may wonder why shale is so neglected at the very time when dollars are being showered with abandon upon the frigid, remote northern coast of Alaska.

The answer is that shale is potentially a very serious threat to the industry as now organized. Oil men in their nightmares see the following scenario: somebody—an oil company or a government research team—develops a production process that yields shale oil at costs far below those for conventional crude; the commercial attractiveness of the process is such that the government is compelled to sell or lease some of its shale land to private businesses, not necessarily friendly to the future welfare of the oil companies; large amounts of shale oil begin coming onto the market, undercutting the price of conventional crude which is carefully supported by state and federal legislation; the price of conventional crude is forced down, cutting gasoline and fuel oil prices; lowering U. S. dependence on foreign oil, assisting the balance of payments—but severely damaging the oil industry's profits and perhaps even its existence. A March, 1968, report of the National Economics Research Associates, while emphasizing the many obstacles to shale development, asserts that "it is well within the realm of the possible for the petroleum industry to find itself unintentionally the godfather of a fledgling shale oil industry, which once started could begin the function of supplanting its predecessor." One respected Washington energy analyst says a cheap method of shale oil production "could make Texas and Oklahoma look like another Appalachia."

To guard against such a calamity, however remote, the industry has bought up most of the privately owned shale land and has acted to deter such small-scale development work as has been conducted by private research teams. The Department of the Interior has cooperated by doing almost nothing to promote shale development and, at least in one case, has actually shut down a government research facility when its progress toward a commercial shale process began to worry oil men.

For several years after he became Secretary, Stewart Udall did little to alter this negative policy. Recently, however, Congressional pressure for development—especially from the Westerners who dominate the committees that must approve most Interior legislation—has increased. (Former Senator Paul Douglas raised many eyebrows when he estimated during Congressional hearings that royalties from shale development could pay off the national debt.) Udall therefore undertook to clear away some of the dense tangle of legal conflicts which obscure much of the shale land. Finally he announced a series of proposals which had the virtue at least of mollifying the increasingly varied array of interested parties.

The initial proposals, involving leases with tight federal control over technological developments, were attractive enough to appease the development forces while restrictive enough to stave off those concerned about "give-aways." For their part, the oil men were happy because the provisions were so stiff that nobody could expect them to do anything but turn the proposals down. But the recent formal invitation to bid for test leases (published the day before Election Day) is, if not exactly irresistible, considerably more attractive than any of Udall's past efforts. It concerns three plots—ranging from 1,255 to 5,120 acres—of federal land in the Piceance Creek Basin of northwestern Colorado, the richest section of the shale land. The three sections are estimated to contain 450 million barrels of oil; in one of them, the shale is more than 1,000 feet thick.

Leases will be let under a "competitive bonus bidding" arrangement similar to that used by Interior in leasing offshore oil lands. Under this scheme, royalty rates on eventual production are set in advance, and the bidders compete by offering to pay one-time bonuses over and above those continuing fees. In this case the royalties are intended to approximate the 12½ per cent rate charged by the government on other Western oil and gas lands. (The program's terms do not alter current law which provides that the federal government will get only a 10 per cent share of these royalties. A 37½ per cent share will go to the state in which the resource lies and 52½ per cent will go to the Reclamation Fund, a huge pork barrel organization that builds dams and other public works in seventeen Western states. "If shale really gets going," a Western legislator told me not long ago, "we'll be able to build a dam in every gulch in the West. The governor of Colorado will be able to declare quarterly dividends.")

While opening the program up to the highest bidders may seem fair, it almost guarantees that only the large oil companies will participate. The oil business in this country is a tight little family. Through an interlocking network, the industry controls all of its operations from drilling to pumping to refining to transportation through pipe lines to retail selling. Udall has often indicated his preference for a "broad participation" in shale development which would allow "smaller companies" to get into the development, but the provisions of the present bid will allow only the largest companies to participate. There are, of course, non-oil companies with substantial capital resources but they would probably be reluctant to become involved. For them suddenly to go into the oil business would be a little like Vladimir Horowitz trying to play guard for the Los Angeles Rams—the talent may be great but it is not relevant. There are many easier ways to make money than fighting the $50 billion oil industry.

Interior has ignored perhaps the only way, under this competitive bidding system, to avoid monopoly oil domination. That would have been to encourage large mining and chemical companies—some like Kaiser Aluminum have already shown interest—to develop the vast amounts of aluminum and sodium minerals which are intermixed with much of the shale. Udall himself, at 1967 hearings before the Senate Interior committee, stated: "It is likely, as we all know, that the largest, by far the largest deposits of aluminum minerals in the nation, in a nation that is short of aluminum, is present in these oil shale deposits." Yet the Secretary's recent program barely mentions these other minerals.

It is difficult to predict what the response of the big oil companies will be on December 20. Executives from several large companies told me last year that they wouldn't participate in a federal development program even if they were handed a few thousand acres outright. Since then, however, the oil industry has become more sensitive to charges that it opposes shale development, and more aware that, with all the commotion about the need for development, it should perhaps take the initiative and make sure that things go its way. (One provision of Udall's program should prove alluring to even the most wary oil man: lessees will be allowed to sit on the land for seven years, without paying the first penny in either bonuses or royalties.)

The possibility that a cheap production method will be found still vexes the oil men. The policy of Interior as reflected in the leasing program is apparently to do little research of its own, but two private studies are under way. A firm called CER Geonuclear Corp. is working with Interior and the Atomic Energy Commission to investigate the possibility that an underground nuclear explosion might be used to crush the shale so that it could be heated in place, the oil thus being released to be pumped to the surface. After some delay, a test explosion is scheduled to be fired next fall. Allied with CER, however, is a private-industry consortium dominated by most of the large oil companies. A second research operation is being conducted by a small company called The Oil Shale Corporation (TOSCO), which despite repeated promises has yet to come up with a commercial method. Though TOSCO is backed by money apparently unrelated to the oil industry, it has reportedly been negotiating with a few oil companies—Atlantic Richfield is said to be one of them—to undertake some kind of cooperative arrangement.

Thus it seems unlikely that persons unconnected with the oil industry will challenge its apparent control of the situation. Even if the oil companies deem it in their interest to develop the shale (there is always the possibility that the United States will run short of crude, or that nuclear power will prove prohibitively expensive or dangerous, or that coal, a potential major source of hydrocarbons will prove unattractive), it is improbable that the consumer will enjoy cheaper gas or oil. Shale oil would simply be slowly and nondisruptively eased into the market while the price-support legislation was being appropriately modified.

A number of Congressmen, notably Michigan Sen. Philip A. Hart, feel that in shale oil the country has a rare opportunity to develop an economic force strong enough to challenge established oil concerns, whose profit rates, thanks to tax breaks and other preferential benefits, are the highest of any industry in the country. There are two main possibilities. One would be to restrict development of federal shale to non-oil companies, while making leasing provisions so enticing and potentially lucrative that the outsiders would be willing to battle the industry's giants. Another widely recommended proposal is creation of a government-owned TVA-type corporation to produce shale oil.

Either idea would be politically most difficult to realize, even under a Democratic President and a Democratic Congress. With Richard Nixon coming into the White House, the oil industry does not appear to be seriously concerned. The Wall Street Journal reported, after making a survey of executives attending a recent meeting of the American Petroleum Institute, that "Oil men are generally jubilant over Mr. Nixon's victory." It was pointed out, for example, that Nixon is actually on record as favoring the 27½ per cent depletion allowance. "The oil men," the story went on, "rate Mr. Nixon more favorably to their industry than even President Johnson, whose native Texas is the nation's No. 1 oil-producing state."

'THE QUALITY OF INEQUALITY'

THOMAS P. WILBUR

Since completing his doctoral work at Teachers College, Columbia, Mr. Wilbur has been serving on the research staff of the Michigan Dept. of Education, with special attention to the Detroit education suit.

As every ghetto parent knows, Dewey's dictum—"What the best and wisest parent wants for his own child, that must the community want for all its children"—has been studied and discussed in schools of education, but rarely obeyed by politicians. Quality public education, at least insofar as that elusive concept can be defined by relative expenditure levels, has traditionally been determined by community socio-economic levels and political power, rather than being determined by the educational needs of children.

Public schools are financed from two primary sources: local property taxes and state grants. Neither source has been egalitarian. The strength of a community's property-tax base is usually closely related to the socio-economic status of its citizenry; state aid appropriations (which are typically given according to so-called "equalization formulas") tend to locate money in politically powerful areas. Thus the amount spent on a child's education depends very much upon his place of residence. For example, the National Education Association estimated last year that Mississippi's school districts spent an average of $346 per pupil while New York's spent $982. Within-state differences, moreover, are approximately as great. New York's poorer districts spend less than $600, while its wealthy areas spend upward of two and a half times as much.

Opposition to these inequities is now becoming more intense, largely because the educational position of the great cities has been declining steadily by comparison with that of the suburbs. There is a double reason for the relative decline. In the first place, education is more expensive in the cities because the urban clientele, drawn increasingly from the disadvantaged, is more difficult to educate. It is also more expensive, however, because the cities try to do more for handicapped children, because school sites and construction cost more in the cities, and because of the demands of powerful teachers' unions. Second, the cities have relatively less money to apply to their educational problems than do the wealthy suburbs. "Municipal overburden," which puts a proportionately greater amount of the cities' municipal budget into such non-school items as police and fire protection, welfare, transportation, etc., and a decline in taxable wealth (again relative to the suburbs) have prevented urban education from keeping pace with the needs of disadvantaged children. In addition, state legislatures have not been receptive to city needs. A recent study of thirty-five metropolitan areas by Alan K. Campbell of Syracuse University revealed that, in 1962, suburbs were spending, on the average, $145 more per pupil than the cities—and receiving $40 more per student than the cities in state aid appropriations.

Hence two cities, Detroit and Chicago, despairing of providing quality education within the present financial context, have attacked the problem in the courts by arguing that their children have been denied their rights under the equal protection clause of the Constitution's Fourteenth Amendment. Detroit's case may be considered the archetype. Plaintiffs are the Detroit Board of Education and "next friends" of several Detroit school children; defendant is Michigan's treasurer. In outline, the brief prepared for the plaintiffs reasons that: (1) "The State of Michigan has assumed and is charged with the responsibility of maintaining and supporting a system of free public elementary and secondary school for all the children of the State of Michigan"; (2) the state, having undertaken this responsibility, is required by the equal protection clause "to discharge this responsibility on an equal basis for all children of the State, without favoritism or discrimination"; (3) as a result of the method adopted by the state for the apportionment of funds, plaintiff children are "denied educational opportunities which are substantially equal to those enjoyed by children attending public schools in many other districts of the State"; and (4) therefore, the state's apportionment formula is considered to be repugnant to the fundamental law of the United States."

If the courts find the above reasoning persuasive, their decisions will have far-reaching influence on American education. Not only would state educational apportionment formulas have to be revised to favor the cities, they would also have to be revised to equalize educational opportunity in the many rural areas of most states that are often poor even in comparison with the cities. It is doubtful that the present school finance structure could accommodate such a change, and the states would probably have to levy some sort of state-wide school tax on property. In addition, it is likely that the states could mandate a considerable consolidation of small school districts, so that state funds could be allocated efficiently. In short, the Detroit case has potentially greater significance for the structure and administration of public education than any case in American educational history—including, probably, the historic 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education decision.

The Supreme Court will probably hear the Detroit case, or one very much like it, in the next few years. How it will decide is a matter of guesswork, but participants in a recent conference on "The Quality of Inequality: Urban and Suburban Public Schools," held at the University of Chicago, were generally hopeful of eventual success. The conference, however, was held while the country still had a Warren Supreme Court. What a "Nixon Court" might decide is another matter.

HARRY GOLDEN

North Carolina has the reputation of being a progressive Southern state. That reputation is somewhat accidental. There was no plantation or slave culture to speak of in North Carolina because the slavers could not dock any place along the Carolina coast. Cape Hatteras makes this part of the ocean the graveyard of the Atlantic. There were plantations and slaves in the counties down from Norfolk, Va., and some in those up from Charleston, but the rest of the state was populated by yeomen.

The state was also lucky in that it produced Governor Aycock around the turn of the century. Aycock was known as the "Education Governor" because he built the first widespread complex of public schools. It was lucky that after Aycock, Frank P. Graham became the president of the University of North Carolina and established a tradition of liberalism on which the state still trades. In 1960, Terry Sanford won election as governor and completely revamped the outmoded school system.

But that's about it for the state. With the exception of these three men and the historical fact that North Carolina almost declared for the Union, the state is not more liberal than Alabama or Mississippi. When the Supreme Court ordered an end to school segregation with all "deliberate speed," the Tar Heels concentrated on "deliberate" rather than "speed." It has never been their intention to accord full rights to the Negroes. Tar Heels figure there is some way to circumvent, delay or avoid every court directive. "Interposition," invented by Virginia, was adopted by North Carolina in the late 1950s. School desegregation has been a technique of gradualism and tokenism. Given ten years to desegregate by its own devices, North Carolina has failed miserably.

Because of this sort of thing in North Carolina, and elsewhere in the South, Congress in the 1964 Civil Rights Act directed that no federal funds be appropriated to any school which discriminates on the basis of race. This law resulted in the desegregation guidelines established by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. State officials, however, place their faith in "freedom of choice" plans, which means only that the state fails again because the school districts fail.

Dr. Charles F. Carroll, North Carolina State Superintendent of Public Instruction, revealed recently that only 22 per cent of colored children attended school with whites last year. Chairman D. S. Coltrane of the North Carolina Good Neighbor Council criticized the "freedom of choice" plans. "They must be true freedom of choice plans without interference on the part of school boards, school officials, citizens of the community or extremist groups of either race."

A progressive state is one that can realize that the process of school integration cannot be reversed or arrested. Would that Aycock, Graham and Sanford were with us now!

LETTERS (Continued from page 674)

Thomas Eakins

New York, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: I am writing a book on the American painter, Thomas Eakins (1844-1916), which will include a catalogue raisonné of his works. I would appreciate it if anyone who owns work by Eakins, with whom I have not already been in communication, would be kind enough to write me at the following address: Whitney Museum of American Art, 945 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10021. This would be of great help in completing the record of this leading American artist.

Lloyd Goodrich, Advisory Director

moral idiosyncrasy

Ephraim, Utah

DEAR SIR: In stating that "there is something morally wrong in breaking duly constituted laws" (December 2, 1968), Mr. Cohen mistakenly attempts to equate morality with legality. While it is true that men can, and often do, substitute morality for legality, the two are not one and the same. Morality is individual and idiosyncratic, whereas legality is societal. Moral codes require the individual's agreement. The law, on the contrary, does not require one's agreement, but only his obedience. It does not ask whether one's moral sense is outraged by this or that statute. It simply says obey. This being true, it follows that there is something legally wrong (not morally) in breaking duly constituted laws. If this were not so, one could never break a law, however evil, except at the expense of morality. Whether the preservation of society depends more upon laws that are binding on all men than it does upon idiosyncratic moral codes is, of course, an open question now in the deciding. But so long as one man's moral sense is outraged by a single law, there can be no question that disobedience to that law is a legal issue to be decided on legal grounds. Hence, until legality and morality become one, it is not necessarily true that "there is something morally wrong in breaking duly constituted laws."

John Hendrickson

Division of Humanities, Snow College

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Illuminated Manuscripts

THE FLOWERING OF THE MIDDLE AGES. Edited by Joan Evans. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 360 pp. $30.

THE HORIZON BOOK OF THE MIDDLE AGES. By Morris Bishop. Norman Korker, Editor in charge. American Heritage Publishing Co. Distributed by Houghton Mifflin. 416 pp. $22.50 regular. $25.50 de luxe.

MICHAEL B. FOLSON

Mr. Folson teaches literature at M.I.T. He is writing a popular study of Middle English literature, and editing the memoirs of Michael Gold.

Joan Evans, D Litt, D Lit, Hon VPSA, prefaces her conclusion of The Flowering of the Middle Ages with the opinion that "the invention of printing, more decisively than any other single event," marks the end of the medieval era and the beginning of the modern. As editor of a sumptuous and splendid example of the recent crop of intellectually pretentious, illustrated, popular gift books, she is concerned with the wider diffusion of knowledge among "ordinary" readers, and she is convinced that the latest flower of printing technology—the development of sophisticated and relatively inexpensive four-color photo-offset lithography—makes possible "a new kind of historical book," one in which "rich illustration" makes the social background "live." In effect, she argues that there is feedback from the new media of this "post-literate" society which makes the best that printing can do all the more appreciable: "Though education remains astonishingly bookish, our recreations have trained our eyes. . . . The cinema and the television set have trained us in visual nimbleness. . . ."

But exactly because the latest abilities of the printing press have so much to offer in the way of education and can be so splendid to the eye, the books under review are a disappointment. Opposite the beginning of Joan Evans' essay on "The End of the Middle Ages," is a full-page, full-color reproduction of the first kind of printed page, a leaf of a "block book" with a striking woodcut of St. Christopher, hand colored, and two lines of subscribed black-letter Latin in caption carved into the block. We have come full circle; that is about the same relation between picture and text to be found in these examples of the very most modern printing.

A book in which any static image may be reproduced with startling fidelity is virtually a new medium, but these books bear an old message. They do not diffuse knowledge so much as they entertain the eye. Gift books and received opinions. What we get from the most sophisticated engineers of the printing industry is a modern version of the pious purpose of medieval visual art: "literature for the illiterate." Joan Evans affirms it: "Since the [medieval] documents are difficult, the visible picture over-rides the documentation. . . ."

Yet there are, perhaps atavistically, a lot of words in these books. Although the obvious appeal is to the eye, the McGraw-Hill and Horizon productions remain overgrown, but not grown up, school texts in which, formally, the graphics are meant to illustrate the text, or window dress it for the laggards. There is no effective integration of image with narrative or analysis.

The first failure is that the writing is dull, tedious, simple-minded, stodgy or dry. When I took on this review, I planned to make a point by boasting that I was probably the only fellow around who had actually read these books from cover to cover. They defeated my presumptuousness. (The editors of Horizon attempted to prevent reviewers from suffering a bad conscience by sending along a synopsis of the text covering 5½ single-spaced, legal-size pages, which I also did not finish reading.) But such costly books are not marketed for their intellectual content. The gift-book business decks the parlor, not the mind.

The McGraw-Hill book, the more dazzling of the two in its visual appeal, is a terribly British affair. The eight gentlemen whom the editor chose to write about their medieval specialties enjoy the loftiest of connections with the most conservative institutions of the Anglo-Saxon cultural establishment. One is keeper of Western manuscripts at the Bodleian and fellow of Balliol; another is deputy keeper of textiles at the Victoria and Albert; and so forth. Among them they share twenty-one alphabetical distinctions: FSA, FRSL, Hon DCL, FBA, FR Hist S, etc. Joan Evans hopes that the extravaganza she edits is "a new kind of historical book that is more concerned with the social background than with political events. . . ." But, of course, this kind of chatty, heavily researched, anecdotal, Protestant English, social historiography (specializing in the bawdy and pecculation of popish churchmen, but respectful of the awesome power of an established religion in the maintenance of social order) is about as new as Skeat and Coulton and that whole host of genial Victorian pedant medievalists.

The Horizon book is concocted by a peculiarly American version of the same institution. Morris Bishop, Kappa Alpha professor of Romance Literature Emeritus at Cornell University, gets credit for the text, but we are informed that The Middle Ages is "by the editors of Horizon Magazine," and Norman Kotker, "Editor in Charge," has equal and prior billing to "Author" on the title page. Thus authorized, the text has the homogenized quality of a Time/Life feature and the enthusiasm and profundity of Walt Disney in his "educational" moods.

On both sides of the Atlantic, it is agreed that, for instance, in the Dark Ages "the monks held the Western world together," that "the Middle Ages achieved an extraordinarily coherent and integrated civilization," that social stability was its chief virtue, that "the keyword to our conception of history is civilization." Civilization was, to be sure, what it is: Western and Christian. The Slavic, Islamic and Magyar peoples (among others) achieved nothing during "our" Middle Ages, except insofar as they impinged on the "Western" consciousness. Very old and ordinary stuff for the "ordinary reader."

The second disappointment is that the illustrative material, for all its glory, fails to illustrate. The pictures do not expand upon the understanding of the text partly because they are not properly exploited, and partly because they are inscrutable. Engaging, magnificent—and pretty, too—but, in large measure, inscrutable. Joan Evans is entirely too facile in her assumption that our new media have trained the modern eye to catch the meaning of a densely illustrated historical work. Our familiarity with the vitiated "realism" of mass-production movies and television has, if anything, rendered us less able to comprehend the formulaic, formalistic, symbolical, iconographic visual art of the Middle Ages—except as "quaint" and other.

Take the block-book illustration of St. Christopher already mentioned. Missing here is some basic information which neither text nor caption supplies. A good many literate post-Christians might like to know why the saint is represented with the baby Jesus on his shoulders wading through water and what that has to do with his name. We would appreciate a translation of the caption which, in black letter, is dark even to one who knows the rudiments of Latin. But this is not the point.

What we absolutely require is some help with learning how to see. To begin with, some suggestions about how the wood-block medium helped shape or limit the image. Then some commentary on the mixture of rudimentary "naturalistic" impulses with forms symbolic and formulaic. What is the modern eye to do with the characteristically medieval blunt, blank, perspectiveless background to a dramatically conceived landscape which seems struggling to represent depth? How can we respond to the assumption that the natural thing to do, if you wanted to identify the most important figure in the scene, was to make him four or five times as large as the others? And what have these observations to do with, say, Breughel who, 100 years later, was driving his vast landscapes into the distance and dwarfing even Jesus under awesome escarpments of nature?

Or take another of the most striking of the reproductions in these books, one of the many manuscript illuminations. If the modern eye is accustomed to anything in medieval art it is manuscript illumination, which we take for cute and decorative. But what are we to do with the first page of John in the 12th-century "Stephen Harding Bible" ("In principio erat verbum, . . ."): "In the beginning was the word. . .")? The massive initial I with its embellishments is worked elaborately into the body of the text. Complicatedly grotesque, the letter rests upon the back of a nondescript but fetching beast which looks sublime and silly as it swallows the head of a rather greasy-looking, featherless red and blue bird. But what is really going on in this serious jeu d'esprit of piety is John himself in Cistercian habit sitting toward the top, signifying the law of his letters. While he teaches from a stylized scroll, an eagle (John's emblem, also stylized, with no attempt at verisimilitude) rests one foot on his head and, as the caption indicates, "digs its talons into his eyes, nose, mouth and ears, symbolizing the word of God being imprinted upon his senses." Now, this way of conceiving the communication of meaning in a graphic mode must boggle the modern visual understanding, for what can only mean torture to us, who are trained to

WELSH CHRISTMAS

It approaches, rustling like Birnam, Moving ahead of the footprints

*Blueblack in the snow.
A pilgrimage of trees.*

*The trail leads away from the pinewood
Where the amputations bleed.*

*In zero weather the axes
Rang sharp and clear,*

*The chips flew out like finches.
Merrily we confess the annual wounds*

*Nailing them crosswise to the floor
In the narrow firelit rooms.*

*Night comes early helped by clouds
Colored like the mouths of siege guns.*

*One by one the windows darken,
An owl hoots from the pinewood.*

*The village sleeps, postponing
Its proclamations of death and grief—*

*The beast-shape of the slag mountain
Softens under the falling snow.*

ERIC BARKER

accept an image as literal, was meant to signify ecstasy. We do not understand. Such exotic qualities of medieval art are greatly exaggerated by our ignorance. Some words of preparation and explanation are necessary.

Both the Horizon and McGraw-Hill books do include chapters on the art of the Middle Ages, but neither is much help in educating the understanding of its readers. Andrew Martindale, who is Joan Evans' expert on the subject, is interested in the sociology of the artist, and writes an essay on "The Changing Status of the Craftsman." He mainly characterizes and documents the development of the anonymous feudal court mechanic and decorator into the proto-Renaissance individual with an ego stake in the product of his genius. The essay is a work of that earnestly researched, substantial, meat-and-potatoes social historiography at which the English are so adept. It does have the virtue of ignoring another more pretentious indulgence of medieval art historians: the asocialization and mystification of art according to the metaphysics of Jung and Barfield and such. But Martindale doesn't even start to speculate about the effect of the changing status of the artist on the changing nature of the art, and has almost nothing at all to say about the visual imagination.

Morris Bishop's chapter on art (in the Horizon book) at least talks about the subject; and Bishop or his editors begin to exploit their rather more flexible format actually to illustrate a point, in one case, by juxtaposing four statues of the Madonna and Child in order to talk about the "development of realism." (The McGraw-Hill book includes one of these same pieces in a display of art objects traded internationally, and notes only that it is Parisian, 14th century.) But most of what Professor Bishop has to say is elementary and emulates the character of his opening remark: "The pictorial art of the Middle Ages is the product of the creative impulse. . . ." Hardly more than Martindale does he try to educate our reactions and, for instance, help us understand what it means when we come upon one of the late medieval bourgeois "realistic" paintings reproduced grandly in these volumes and feel a distinct relaxation, a relief to be among familiar things again.

The basic problem is that pictorial art cannot be a subject in books of this kind. It must be, in a sense, the subject. It is the obvious focus of attention in the consideration of all the other subjects, and is the one thing before the eye which demands explication at the turn of every page. But the introduction into such a book of more and better visual education for the lay spectator is not really the point either. At stake is respect for and full exploitation of the uses of art.

It should be possible to create a kind of pictorial history in which the visual art (not to mention the literary art) of the past is not merely supporting material and sales appeal but properly the starting point of the telling of social as well as aesthetic history, a prime medium of communication, a definition of the meaning of history, with attendant words explicating the medium and analyzing the message, and supplying whatever the graphic material cannot accomplish. And there is much else to be supplied.

Words will not die. Among other things, serious, sustained, complex inquiry into the past requires them. (And the words of the past, the high literature of the Middle Ages, for instance, has as much to offer as the visual art, though it is perhaps more difficult to approach. The McGraw-Hill book ignores the literary imagination altogether, and the Horizon book pays it but perfunctory attention with a mini-anthology selected on perverse and doubtful principles.) In response to a qualitative advance in printing technique, the historian should discover a new relation between his words and the splendors he can marshal before the eye. And, it seems to me that the medieval historian might respond to the necessity of illuminating the significantly alien ways of medieval art by conveying something new about the world so strangely replicated in that art.

The authors of these books, like others who write popularly about the European Middle Ages, complacently assume that we are all eager to know of this past because it is our past, our heritage, into which our roots sink and in which we have a born stake. But the pictures insist that this was a world starkly different even from that of the ethnocentric social and intellectual elite who identify the Western Christian tradition as the received culture of the race. Not only the institutions, mores, and styles of life were essentially different but also the very mind of man, to whom what we think bizarre might look commonplace and natural—what we consider reasonable, quite incredible.

Even more important, we have got to scotch the elitism of historiography which survives nowhere more comfortably than among the medievalists. Almost every other period of history has had its liberal and radical commentators to do battle with the crusty guardians of the dead, but not the Middle Ages. There have been a few Whiggish Protestants who have written about that period of British darkness before 1537 which was brightened only by Wyclif. A few English Marxists have dealt with aspects of the period or surveyed it briefly, A.L. Morton and Eric Hobsbawm mainly. There is a chapter or so of Arnold Hauser. But there is no body of sustained and scholarly argument.

The West is a much smaller bailiwick now. The racially alien and upstart peoples who have, in the last twenty years, wrested their independence from, and dismembered, piecemeal, the Western empires, have also called the culture of the West into question. The traditions of the men who ruled the West during the Middle Ages are only one cultural inheritance of man among many, and one which has been chiefly distinguished by the fact that it has been the culture of the oppressors of most of the rest of the world.

To be sure, the arts and accomplishments of oppressors are still the overwhelming portion of man's glory, his fittest inheritance—among the Slavs and Mongols, the Hindus and Mohammedans, and in black Africa, as well as here in the Christian West. We should be tough enough of mind to be able to enjoy the splendor of an age's art and, at the same time, detest the venality and brutishness of the men who ruled the age and bought the art. Art and the telling of history go well together. History tells us how different we once were and what we are now, and thus puts us in mind of what we might yet become.

$35 Worth of Hubris

EKISTICS: An Introduction to the Science of Human Settlements. By Constantinos A. Doxiadis. Oxford University Press. 527 pp. Illus. $35.

NATHAN SILVER

Mr. Silver is an American architect practicing in England. He is architectural critic of the New Statesman, author of Lost New York (Houghton Mifflin), and is at work on a new book with a grant from the Guggenheim Foundation.

When I was teaching at the Columbia School of Architecture I once tried to get Prof. Margaret Mead to attend a discussion on urban configurations, arranged as a class study. "I'm not sure whether or not I can make it," she explained obscurely, "it all depends on canoe schedules . . . but I'm most interested in the design of cities. I participated in the Doxiadis symposium at Delos last summer, you know."

That was the first I had heard of the Delos symposia though not of Doxiadis. The man had rather an odd reputation. He seemed quite famous in lay groups, in some glossy magazines, with some politicians; but among professional planners and architects he was mainly considered a lightweight, a publicist, even (as he played the familiar role of charismatic culture genius) a charlatan. Yet Doxiadis, a rich and well-connected Greek, had gone on from town and regional planning in his own country to work for the UN and do international consultation. He had founded his own periodical (Ekistics), and his own institute. Then, inviting famous scholars like Margaret Mead from all over the world on expense-paid visits to the beautiful Aegean, he presided over four symposia at Delos annually from 1963 to 1966.

As I reflect on it now, one of the most exasperating things about Doxiadis was his weakness for neologisms, naturally from the Greek. A city that works, to him, is Entopia; a changing city is Dynapolis, Dynametropolis or—coinage over coinage—Dynamegalopolis. He supports the establishment of a total science of man which he calls Anthropics. A future world-city will be Ecumenopolis. Then, of course, he refers to the practice of urban and regional planning as Ekistics, "the science of human settlements." From 1942 on Doxiadis has been discussing his own planning work through these Ekistic principles in various and variously titled lectures, articles and books. Now at last he takes us home to mama with Ekistics ($35).

Ekistics is the mother lode; mother science (as Doxiadis sees it) if perhaps not quite Mother of the Arts. Through much of its girth this fat book champions scientific process in studying and prescribing for human settlements. The argument—quarreling with nobody—goes on for so long, illustrated with scores of maps and charts, that one finally becomes critical rather than reinforced in one's prior convictions. It's symptomatic of another fundamental difficulty Doxiadis has with his critics: he so belabors the obvious, so claims credit for it, that even his siding with the angels at last seems sheer hubris.

But this question about science deserves further examination if only because Doxiadis wants it that way. Should urban and regional planning become Ekistics, the science, no less, of human settlements? First of all the professional's preparation for his job would

LAW AND DISORDER.

What really happened in Chicago this summer?

Huntley, Brinkley, Cronkite, Algren, Arthur Miller, Styron, Morse, Mauldin, and others tell it like it was.

Law and Disorder. A modern historical document.

At your local bookstore. Or send $1.25 to Law and Disorder, American Civil Liberties Union, 6 South Clark, Chicago, Illinois 60603.

Enclosed is $_____ for _____ copies of Law and Disorder. (Make check or money order payable to American Civil Liberties Union.)

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip _____

Please allow 14 days for delivery be staggering. According to Doxiadis an Ekistician has to know plenty about nature, man, society, shells (structures) and networks (roads, water supply, electricity, etc.). Doxiadis decries specialists, praises scientific generalists; he quotes Bronowski, Vannevar Bush, Medawar, Huxley, Eiseley and others to show how the philosophy of science accommodates even prescriptive science. And so it does, to be sure. But (1), where are all these well-rounded, also scientifically oriented, also talented planners—sorry, Ekisticians—to be found? Nowhere. I can't think of one, certainly not Doxiadis (but that's getting ahead of the story). (2) Planning generalists are fine, and they belong in politics. (3) Perhaps "overspecialization" is what is required now to adapt scientists to multiple sockets in new, complicated systems of collaborative study (a mathematician concerned with probabilities can tell us about shipping, where people want to live, stylistic change in art; a mathematical topologist or morphologist is a useful man to have in research on material efficiency or land use). Certainly planners should work scientifically—though Sir Peter Medawar's description of the process of scientific investigation is far hairier than Doxiadis seems to realize—but, planning itself a science? It sounds like a gambit, as Jane Jacobs has long suspected of planners, designed to make unpopular policies respectable.

Doxiadis turns this suspicion into an apparent certainty when he finally begins to describe his method of Ekistic analysis. Of course a planning procedure must come to grips with an enormous quantity of information before reaching even indeterminable conclusions. (Dealing with indeterminate situations is quite within the scope of scientific procedure, but that isn't the procedure outlined here.) Yet self-awareness about what he is doing seems wanting; amid all his quotation, notation and pontification on the loveliness of science, Doxiadis must be in a state of self-hypnosis when he gets out the meat cleaver for his "synthesis." Though you have to have a certain sympathy for the meat-cleaver approach to help find a design in the corpus of Ekistic facts.

When the Ekistician gets finished taking account of nature, man, society, shells, networks; how they interrelate and also correlate with residence, commerce, industry, administration, defense; how these are affected by money, labor, materials, land, and so on, it's no surprise that 49 million alternatives appeared in a Doxiadis study of the urban Detroit area. So Doxiadis hit upon his I.D.E.A. method (Isolation of Dimensions and Elimination of Alternatives—no procedural explanation) augmented by his C.I.D. method. Fifteen arbitrary whacks later he's down to one "alternative." Logic wins again, as that character in "Li'l Abner" says when he socks somebody on the nose.

A scientist in a laboratory is within his civil rights to play a wild hunch; but what about a planner who deals with thousands of lives over several generations? A few American planners are now beginning to see their work very differently. They believe that planners who pose as sheer scientists or pure professionals are simply disguising their prejudices, which at best are after all usually for the existing structure and values. They think the only chance for improved living in human settlements will come from precisely the opposite of what Doxiadis suggests: that planners should abandon mock neutrality and become instead politicians, blatant advocates of particular policies. From the practical point of view this means the public doesn't have to expect or depend on their being omniscient geniuses. And as a matter of rational democratic government, it means that fundamental decisions which will affect the lives of all are argued in public. Planners contribute their best analyses and their designs, but they aren't "authorities," just advocates (and rival groups may hire contesting planners). This idea about planning contains its own I.D.E.A., but the result should be fair: planning is politics, not Ekistics.

If planning isn't Ekistics, is Ekistics at least a good study procedure? I have my doubts about this too, though such seems to be the purpose intended. This book—unlike others recently published from Le Corbusier, Victor Gruen, Edmund Bacon and Sybil Moholy-Nagy—is not strictly an apologia of work done or explication of a field of endeavor. I think Ekistics is really supposed to be a textbook, and it is indeed written in textbook language (though the author himself seems to have a funny prominence, and the work of what must be scores of people is always denoted by "I"). Many suggestions are made about design procedure, but let's take only the principal one, which should suffice for a demonstration of merit.

Doxiadis lays down fifty-four "Laws" representing his Ekistic theory, many of which are trivial or disputable. Law 34 however is certainly not trivial:

All communities, and therefore, all Ekistic units tend to be connected to each other in a hierarchical manner. Every community of a higher order serves a certain number of communities of a lower order, and the same is true of specific functions within Ekistic units.

Now "hierarchy" is one of the great totem principles of planning and architecture. It refers to the indisputable fact that, for example, you can read in your room but you need to go to a small library for some books, a regional library for more arcane ones; many other people will do the same so, in programmatic terms, the regional library is hierarchically different from the small library or the home bookcase.

But a striking difficulty emerges when a planner tries to design, or even program, a city along strict hierarchical lines. This was beautifully explained in a classic paper published by Christopher

I. Existence

D. Modal Existence

7. State

8. Circumstance

Alexander in 1965, titled "A City Is Not a Tree," in which Alexander showed that planners' cities are invariably hierarchical, based on a system of branching relationships (a tree), whereas the pattern of successful cities that have grown spontaneously is very different. The branches of neighborhoods and districts in the latter are not isolated from other branches, but short-circuit at many points where people seek amusements or markets or whatever, in adjacent districts, rather than in their own. These seemingly accidental "desire lines" enrich the urban fabric; there is a general overlap which represents exciting accidents of contact or situation. The alternative built into planned cities is dissociation and compartmentalization.

And paternalism. Doxiadis' plans, printed here, for Islamabad, Pakistan; Tema, Ghana; Khartoum and other cities, demonstrate not only hierarchical rigidity but authoritarianism that would be retrograde even among the most stringent controls granted planners in the urban West. Like W.W. Rostow's book, The Stages of Economic Growth, Doxiadis' cities suggest that new nations plod through weary stages to meet free choice in a retreating future, instead of leaping ahead now . . . but the issue here is the total well-being of urban society, not just riches.

Law 34 is the most grotesque bit of didacticism; others are less harmful or are irrelevant. Doxiadis argues that cities will grow into a future world city (Eumenopolis) of some 35 billion; also that growth in cities should be uni-directional—these notions tend to cancel each other out. There is a section on abstract form studies that resembles the enthusiasms of a Beaux Arts studio. Doxiadis' frequent quotations from Aristotle remind me of Robert Moses' scholarly allusions. And come to think of it, the comparison is rather apt, opprobrious though it may sound. If Robert Moses were as well-meaning as Levitt and talked like Buckminster Fuller, he would be Doxiadis.

bravery; not only the marvel of their skill but the ultimate prospect of their downfall. The clowns and players of all descriptions (including those of the bullfight) will be fated and forgotten. Life will use them shabbily, waste them. They know this and yet they persevere. They struggle gallantly only to be defeated in the end; yet they are prepared to accept their fate. The game itself is its own justification and reward.

Picasso himself is a player. He courts peril: he achieves elegance. Like the vagrant mimmers who come to Elsinore he can eat everything: "tragedy, comedy, history . . . scene indivisible, or poem unlimited." His career is a constant prancing, he excels in movement; its rapidity is his pre-eminent trait. He is astonishing, especially in the combination of power and splendor. He is wholly modern and yet his work always gives evidence of his deep roots in tradition. Notes of a bygone grace are often struck.

Players "are the abstract and brief chronicles of the time." Picasso has chronicled our time more vividly than almost any other artist. His chronicle begins with the hectic and sullied closing years of the 19th century, it moves to the scientific intuitions of the early 20th, goes on to the sardonically jazzy arabesques which followed the First World War, retreats for a moment in an attempted return to order to allay the holocaust which was to ensue. Soon he confronts the horror of fascism and the occupation, and finally returns to civilization's erratic and uncertain recovery.

Picasso is supremely fecund, and "superabundance," I. A. Richards once said, "is a common characteristic of great art. . . ." Picasso is incessantly productive; for this reason he has his flops. But what we remember in the main is his enormous vitality, his basic virility, his joy and his unfailing sense of drama.

The dancing madness of the twenties, its profusion of talent, its flushed autointoxication, its grinning defiance

Picasso Images

PICASSO THEATRE. By Douglas Cooper. Harry N. Abrams. $60 pp. $25.

HAROLD CLURMAN

I found this book beautifully exciting. But as I read it and stopped to look at its more than 447 plates (some of them in color) at the back of the volume, and also examined the numerous illustrations in the text, I began to wonder whether the excitement I was experiencing was not simply nostalgia. As a student I had lived in Paris and saw many of the ballets and shows for which a large number of the pictures in the book served as settings. They brought back memories.

What I recalled was the great theatrical and artistic occasions of the time. Were they as fascinating as I once thought? The answer is Yes, they were part of a wonderful epoch, and Douglas Cooper has made a first-rate record of an aspect of the period which concerns Picasso's ventures into the theatre.

As designer of the décors and of many of the costumes, Picasso collaborated with Serge de Diaghilev's Russian Ballet Company from 1917 to 1924. He also provided the setting for Cocteau's Antigone in 1924 and for Sophocles' Oedipus Rex as produced in 1947, as well as designing curtains for a play by Romain Rolland in 1936, a curtain and a setting for a ballet by Serge Lifar as late as 1962.

These forays onto the stage constitute not only one aspect of Picasso's genius but also offer a clue to the character of his entire work. They are emblems of the man.

He painted clowns, acrobats, circus personnel as early as 1900. His paintings of cafés, dance halls, actresses, singers, so reminiscent of Toulouse-Lautrec, all proclaim his essential theatricality, his appetite for the adventure, the danger, the grandeur and misery, the bravura and the distortions of the "entertainment" world. There is an element of play in everything Picasso has done. The play is bold, extravagant, forceful and, not infrequently, angry and tragic.

In his clowns and circus riders Picasso sees not only their glamour (even in poverty and near despair) but their

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" —LIFE

PARAMOUNT PICTURES presents
A LEE HAYES Production
FRANCO ZEFFIRELLI
Production of
ROMEO & JULIET
No ordinary love story...

TECHNICOLOR® A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

5th Avenue & 58th Street - MU 8-213

and scorn, its flamboyant social pageantry, all leave their traces in Douglas Cooper's book. We note them even in the descriptions of Picasso's relations with Diaghilev, Cocteau, Gertrude Stein, Satie, Stravinsky and the surrealists.

Cooper writes simply and effectively. He perceives the lines of Picasso's development with a natural receptivity to the nuances of artistic creation. Thus, to cite a single example, he recognizes that Picasso's venture into classicism was "a reaction against the brutality and destruction of the war, as well as against the violence and mockery of Dada . . . musicians and writers were all tending to substitute calm for violence, regular and generalized forms for the shattered forms which had prevailed for ten years or more."

This makes one reflect on the present moment and question the possibility of such an eventuality tomorrow. The very fact that the book arouses these immediate considerations, and offers reminders of past pleasures, indicates the measure of its value.

psychic fulfillment. One might argue that this "nonpartisan" politics merely transfers to psychology the hopes he once assigned to religion, but it is fortunate that he should develop such a politics and choose an election year to tell his readers to reread the Baudelaire. Read in the deliberate echoes and metaphors of psychology, and in the contexts of his interviews and Near the Ocean, the poems force upon one a more complex view of the contemporary social condition than the oversimplifications of politicians.

And in such a politics—since a reconciliation with the shadow figure is individually important for psychic growth and an integrated self—the continued opposition on a collective scale of rational self and sinister shadow leads Lowell to believe that the lack of definition and growth in American culture might have compensating social and aesthetic advantages. It forestalls a possible anomie resulting when a rapidly changing technology forces the imagination to outdistance more slowly moving, rigidly defined social institutions. New York City's lack of past produces a "sheer feeling of utter freedom," as opposed to more constrictive Boston which "is all history and recollections." In addition, it permits a poetry which, like the culture, has a built-in tension and energy of man's contradictory political stances. This last is particularly important for Lowell, for as he confessed to Stanley Kunitz in another interview: "One side of me . . . is a conventional liberal, concerned with causes, agitated about peace and justice and equality, as so many people are. My other side is deeply conservative, wanting to get at the root of things, wanting to slow down the whole modern process of mechanization and dehumanization, knowing that liberalism can be a form of death too." "In the writing of a poem," he goes on to say, "all our compulsions and biases should get in, so that finally we don't know what we mean."

But the ultimate impression of settling with these "advantages" of an unrecalled self individually and collectively is "fragmentation," for one basic function of an integrated self is the seeing of things wholly and simply and the lending to objects thereby a consistent pattern. This "fragmentation" characterizes Lowell's recent work, especially in the area of voice. His lines purposely skitter from slang to formal diction without transition or reason as the accompanying art work of Nolan skitters, too, from graffiti, comic strip, and Saturday Evening Post illustration to Picasso, Klee and Redon. One shocks, for example, at the diction in "To the Reader" pairing "defecate and fuck," or rhyming the euphemistic "counterfeits" (whores) with a not so subtle "tits." This "fragmentation" carries even to the fourteen poems which Lowell image—but if you stared at the painting long enough, the image would eventually wait up." As it waits up, this image shares in the irrational, buried instinctual life of the viewer.

Nolan's statement is important. Since For the Union Dead and The Old Glory, Lowell has been trying in his poetry to approximate the same "total disappearance" of the image into environment and its eventual recovery. In fact, his reemergence as a "political" poet has involved precisely his moving more deeply into the recesses of the imagination so that the "camouflage" of Nolan's style could merge with both the "double" of Baudelaire's "Au Lecteur" and the shadow figures of depth psychology. For Lowell, these shadow figures which are metaphors of man's irrationality, the secularized Devil, and fragmented egos, account somehow for the violence and idealism which he finds in America. As he remarked in an interview shortly after the assassination of John F. Kennedy, "We have a thing for the Western movie: some sort of faith that the man who can draw most quickly is the real hero. He's proved himself."

The concern for these tendencies which began in the political jingoism of Land of Unlikeness was transformed in Lord Weary's Castle and The Mills of the Kavanagh's into dramatic structures where politics became part of the characters and surfaced only in their terms. Now, as psychological analogues, it manifests itself again more generally to explain the present political mood and to insist that American society must be so reconstructed as to permit individual

TIMING

*The year's run out to the tip
blossom on the snapdragon stalk*

A. R. AMMONS

The Poem in Large Type

THE VOYAGE: And Other Versions of Poems by Baudelaire. By Robert Lowell. Illustrations by Sidney Nolan. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 60 pp. $15.

JEROME MAZZARO

Mr. Mazzaro is in the English Department at the State University at Buffalo. He is the author of a book of poems, Changing the Windows (Ohio University Press), and of The Poetic Themes of Robert Lowell (University of Michigan Press).

Robert Lowell has presented his readers with an expensive Christmas gift book in The Voyage and Other Versions of Poems by Baudelaire. The poems, all of which appeared in Imitations, are here placed in new surroundings provided by Sidney Nolan, who illustrated the American edition of Near the Ocean, and also the Time magazine puff for the Yale opening of Lowell's Prometheus Bound last year. For those who remember the cover with its three-quarter view of Lowell's face emerging from a light, grayish wash and crowned by the laurel of an unofficial laureateship, the eclecticism of Nolan's "no-painting" technique has not improved much with time, color and enlargement.

Like Near the Ocean, the new book is designed in children's-book format: heavily leaded, large, clear type; lots of white space; and captioned illustrations on almost every other page. But the illustrations are not as simple or representational as those which woo children into self-consciousness. Impastos, washes, mixtures of oil and water color alert the reader to a sophistication and psychological subtlety underneath. For Baudelaire, there are dark backgrounds, suggestive of the vague, obscure pasts out of which the French poet worked; but a statement Nolan made in 1962 after his journey to Africa equally obtains: "I feel there's a kind of painting to be done with animals and natural camouflage that would be, in a sense, a no-painting; there would be a total disappearance of the chooses to make up the volume and high concern themselves with dual views of life. It is clear from their selection that Lowell means for America to resolve its unconscious double culture by coming to grips consciously with "the two great symbolic figures that stand behind American ambition and culture"—Milton's Lucifer and Melville's Captain Ahab. "These two sublime ambitions," according to Lowell, "are doomed and ready, for their idealism, to face any amount of violence."

That Lowell should use the vehicle of translation to free himself from the past is not strange. Translation has most consistently evinced his rejection of historicity. As Edmund Wilson remarked on the appearance of Imitations, the poems are not a legacy but "a volume of verse which consists of variations on themes provided by . . . other poets and which is really an original sequence by Robert Lowell of Boston." The book begins and ends with "mania," as if all history rose out of and descended into it, and what appears to have permanence in between decays and disappears. The model for such a presentation is Ezra Pound's "Homage to Sextus Propertius," which takes parts of the "Carmina" and reweaves them into a unified modern sequence.

The technique is not a device for negative capability: Lowell is not trying to get out of himself. He is consciously using other poets to widen the range and deepen the effects of his own poetic personality, and rather than finding a way out of extreme subjectivity through translation, he is, in fact, subjecting the originals to the same subjectivism of his own poetic materials. Thus when he takes a line like the devil-scientist "hissing" in "To the Reader" and makes it echo the devil-peddler's "groaning" in "After the Surprising Conversions" and the "ill-spirit sob" of "Skunk Hour," he does so because he can best understand and convey the meaning of the original by translating it into his own sphere. To compare the English versions atomistically to the original as if Lowell had nothing better to do than provide trots will only be confusing and unfair. The poems which form the book are deeply moving. They were greatly and rightly praised when Imitations appeared, but they are more Lowell than Baudelaire and more contemporary than past, and should be read in that context.

ALL DAY ALL NIGHT NEW YORK

1

In the middle of a cultivated lake I wake up on the second floor of the Museum of Modern Art surrounded by water-light flowing through flowers strokes of light blue green rose they tremble against my eyes.

2

*Gulls hang tight
in their own wings.
Over the rail cold
runs in my face like tears where one girl poet rode back and forth
all night on the ferry past the great lady with her green spiked hair.*

3

*The trees are bare.
They are serious and moral like worn-out lovers.
There's a hospital with fake
Greek columns where we wait.
Classic as minor temples. Light drains off them. The bus is late.*

*Look how that iron branch
bends to the sky, springs with small lights,
flies out to Brooklyn
between two spires!
And as we cross
the red sun gives off sparks.*

5

*The skin of your throat is paler than mine.
All night they breathe, those frail blue flowers, promising only what we reach for.
Handles of light,
our wrists through water.
Silk I step out of green rose.*

SHIRLEY KAUFMAN

Looking Backward

THE INDIAN HERITAGE OF AMERICA. By Alvin M. Josephy, Jr. Alfred A. Knopf. 398 pp. 60 photographs. 11 maps. $10.

D'ARCY McNICKLE

Mr. McNickle is a member of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai tribes of Montana. He is a professor of anthropology at the University of Saskatchewan, Regina campus.

It is a remarkable fact that, after having lived as physical neighbors for four and a half centuries, only within recent years have the European-derived peoples who settled in the New World begun to acquire even elementary knowledge and understanding of the Indians who settled here before them.

There are of course explanations for this. It is only within recent times that men have shed some of their parochialism and moved toward an accommodation with others than those of their own kind—a movement of glacial velocity. A more persuasive explanation perhaps can be ascribed to the numerous studies of Indian societies published by competent observers within the past half century, so that those who are interested can read. Earlier writings about Indians were often no more than compilations extracted from the journals, reports, etc., of badly informed and even hostile sojourners in the Indian country.

From these modern studies have come, still more recently, serious attempts to reconstruct the history of the original settlement in the New World. One of the most creditable of these efforts is the present volume by Alvin Josephy. In scant 398 pages, he has compressed a possible 30,000 years of New World development encompassing both continents, up to and including a swift survey of conditions under which contemporary Indians live. The book is illustrated with an excellent selection of maps, drawings, paintings and modern photographs, and offers a good working bibliography. Even with these aids to visualization, the casual reader may find the book heavy going because of the massive detail which Mr. Josephy has felt compelled to include. This is of course an indication of the wealth of material now available in published form, much of it, regretably, sequestered in scholarly journals. For the reader who conscientiously desires to extend his knowledge of American history beyond his own mental backyard and cannot get to the scholarly publications, the Josephy volume is an excellent introduction to the subject.

The writer working in a field as fluid and as subject to ongoing discoveries as New World prehistory, selects from among various possible sequences of events or interpretations of events in order to put together a logical and readable narrative. He must do that if he wants to avoid wandering all over the landscape and leaving the reader in a welter of confusion. But once he makes his choices, he can expect to be challenged or at least questioned by those who favor a different interpretation or who prefer to keep the option open. The Josephy book makes such inevitable choices, two of which might be examined briefly.

In organizing his material, Josephy has related it to culture areas as a convenient and, within limits, a logical arrangement. A culture area as usually defined is a geographic region (i.e., the Plains, the Southwest), within which tribes more or less resemble one another in their style of life, and are markedly different from tribes of other culture areas. These differences arise essentially out of the kinds of adaptation called for by differing physical environments. The value of the culture area as a descriptive device is to emphasize the diversity which in fact existed in native America. There was no one Indian language, no one Indian culture. Beyond that, the concept heads into difficulty. Boundaries between such areas tend to be indeterminate. There may be groups within the area which do not fit the definition. But the most serious difficulty is that culture area is a static term; it allows for no dimension in time. It suggests to the unwary reader that the people inhabiting the open plains were always foot-loose hunters running buffalo to earth, or that the southwestern tribes were always village farmers. If the chronology of New World settlement could be sliced like a bologna at 1,000-year intervals beginning at, say, 10,000 B.C., it is probable that no two cross sections would match up. Environmental adaptation is an ongoing process, giving rise to variations in time as well as in space.

The other point to be mentioned involves a question for which there is no clear answer at present. It has to do with the climate that prevailed over western North America after the glaciers retreated from mid-continent about 12,000 years ago. Some students of the subject have insisted that the moist, cool climate which immediately followed the withdrawal of the northern ice fields was succeeded by a dry, hot period that prevailed during 6000-5000 B.C., or thereabouts. Such a climate, presumably, was accompanied by prolonged droughts and the disappearance of much vegetation, which in turn brought about the extinction of most of the big-game animals which early man hunted—several species of elephant, an early horse, camels, a giant-size buffalo, a four-horned artelope, and many lesser species. Man himself, according to this view, withdrew from the High Plains and sought better watered grasslands toward the north and east.

The countering view accepts the evidence for higher temperatures than prevail today, but finds no relationship between the disappearance of the large mammals and the increased aridity of that 1,000-year period. These animals, it is contended, had already become extinct before the drought struck. No one has yet explained why this happened, though there is a suspicion that man, the efficient predator, was at least partly responsible.

In accepting the prior interpretation, Josephy has the support of the known archaeological record, which is lacking in dated occupation sites from approximately 7,000 to 4,500 years ago. But this, according to the countering view, means only that the sites have not been discovered, not that they do not exist. It is further contended that Western weather and Western plant life have not appreciably altered during the last 12,000 years. And there the matter stands.

When experts disagree, it is advisable to stand aside and offer to hold somebody's coat.

ALLEN GINSBERG PLANET NEWS

Old Howl, Kaddish, Reality Sandwiches—3 City Lights Books covered poems written 1954-1960. NOW all new poems by ALLEN GINSBERG from beginning of this decade, just published, called PLANET NEWS: Poems 1961-1967, including 150 pages of vocal intelligence & ecstasy: "TV Baby" a messianic rhapsody, "The Change" high on a train coming back from burning grounds of Asia, "Kral Majales" prophecies & lamentations of the first postwar Prague King of May, "Who Be Kind To" annihilating myriad holes of Albert Hall with tears, "Wichita Vortex Sutra" appeal to Heavenly Gods to end War—White Magic breaks through—total Rhetoric, "Wales Visitation" the first XX Century pantheistic nature poem composed on Acid—white magic identical with human kind-ness, "Pentagon Exorcism" Om Raksha Raksha Hum Hum Hum Phat Svaha! Apokatastasis! Transformation of Satanic Forces to Heavenly Energy! . . . High Intellect! Exquisite prosody! Celestial vulgar humor! Solemn Experience! Blake & Whitman ride again! All here on Earth! Planet News! Hare Krishna! Waves of Queer Bliss! An ecological thrill! READ ALL ABOUT IT while you still can & Ginsberg still on the planet! Blessings on rural flower Children & Madison Avenue Warmakers!

PLANET NEWS $2.00

CITY LIGHTS BOOKS, 261 Columbus Ave., San Francisco, Calif. 94133.

ART BOOKS II/Lawrence Alloway

DOSSO AND BATTISTA DOSSI: Court Painters at Ferrara. By Felton Gibbons. Princeton University Press. 237 black-and-white illustrations. 320 pp. $30.

The reconstruction and interpretation of the enigmatic Dossi will satisfy the author's peers, and the account of 16th-century court culture is vivid and absorbing. Recommended.

GREECE, GODS, AND ART. By Alexander Liberman. Introduction by Robert Graves. Text and captions by Iris C. Love. Viking Press. 121 illustrations, color and black and white. 64 pp. (text). Pre-Christmas $19.95; thereafter $22.50.

The problem of picture books is the verbal accompaniment. Categories like "Great Earth Mother" and "Apollo" confer unneeded symbolic overtones on the groups of images. However, Liberman's photographs are ravishing; Childe Harold with color film.

THE GREAT AGE OF FRESCO: Giotto to Pontormo. Introduction by Ugo Procacci. Metropolitan Museum of Art. Color and black-and-white illustrations. 234 pp. $4 paper.

The catalogue of the recent giant show at the Met, now touring Europe. Well illustrated, but especially interesting for technical and artistic information about the frescoes not available in English before.

GREAT MUSEUMS OF THE WORLD. Carlo Ludovico Ragghianti, editorial director of the series. Newsweek. Distributed by Simon & Schuster. $10 each. "Louvre, Paris." Introduction by René Huyghe. 131 color illustrations.

"British Museum, London." Preface by S. Leigh-Browne. 134 color illustrations.

"Vatican Museums, Rome." Preface by Deoclécio Redig de Campos. 124 color illustrations.

"National Gallery, Washington." Introduction by John Walker. 131 color illustrations.

"Prado, Madrid." By F. J. Sánchez Cantón. 125 color illustrations.

Introductory essays on each collection, followed by deplorable art appreciation-type blurbs about the generally wretched color reproductions.

THE PARADE'S GONE BY . . . By Kevin Brownlow. Alfred A. Knopf. 300 black-and-white illustrations. 596 pp. $13.95.

Discursive, detailed and illuminating information about the early movies, based on interviews. Ugly design, but otherwise recommended.

CINEMA WORLD. Penelope Houston, Tom Milne and Peter Wollen, editors of the series. Doubleday & Co. Black-and-white illustrations. $4.95 each, $2.95 paper.

"The New Wave." Edited by Peter Graham. 184 pp.

Scrappy and inconclusive choice of recent French film criticisms.

"Alain Resnais, or the Theme of Time." By John Ward. 168 pp.

"Howard Hawks." By Robin Wood. 200 pp.

In both studies, the techniques of literary criticism are applied to directors' themes, scrupulously in Ward's case, ineptly in Wood's.

JEAN-LUC GODARD. Edited by Toby Mussman. E. P. Dutton. Black-and-white illustrations. 320 pp. $2.95 paper.

Critical anthology of articles on, and statements by, Godard. Recommended.

CHARLIE CHAPLIN: Early Comedies. By Isabel Quigly. E. P. Dutton. Black-and-white illustrations. 160 pp. $1.95 paper.

Detailed survey of 1914-19. Enlightening.

HITCHCOCK. By François Truffaut. Helen G. Scott, collaborator. Simon & Schuster. 472 black-and-white illustrations. 256 pp. $10.

Elaborate, and on the whole rewarding, interviews; but a dialogue is only as good as both participants, and Truffaut's expertise is often too conventional to trigger Hitchcock's conversation significantly. (Reviewed in The Nation, March 4.)

MATRIX OF MAN: An Illustrated History of the Urban Environment. By Sibyl Moholy-Nagy. Frederick A. Praeger. 300 black-and-white illustrations. 317 pp. $15.

Useful survey of urbanism, but the subject is bruised by generalizations about cyclic culture and such.

PLANNING AND CITIES. George R. Collins, editor of the series. George Braziller. Numerous black-and-white illustrations. 128 pp. $5.95 each.

"Village Planning in the Primitive World." By Douglas Fraser.

"Urban Planning in Pre-Columbian America." By Jorge Harding.

"Cities and Planning in the Ancient Near East." By Paul Lampl.

"Medieval Cities." By Howard Saalman.

Admirable series, which gets away from the study of architecture as monuments and single buildings and considers building as systems of human use in time.

(See also Art Booklist in issue of December 16.)

BRAHMS: Magelone Romances. Ernst Häfliger, tenor; Paul Ulanowsky, piano. Epic BC 1371. $5.79.

CARTER: Double Concerto. Paul Jacobs, harpsichord; Charles Rosen, piano; English Chamber Orchestra; Frederik Prausnitz, cond. Variations for Orchestra New Philharmonic Orchestra; Frederik Prausnitz, cond. Columbia MS 7191. $5.79.

DEBUSSY: La Mer; Jeux; Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune. New Philharmonia Orchestra; Pierre Boulez, cond. CBS 32 11 0056. $5.79.

LISZT: Hungarian Rhapsodies 2, 3, 8, 13, 15, 17; Csárdás obstiné. Alfred Brendel, piano. Vanguard VCS 10035. $3.50.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. New York Philharmonic; Leonard Bernstein, cond. Columbia M3S 776. $17.37 (with Symphony No. 9).

SCHUMANN: Etudes Symphoniques; Fantasia in C. Alfred Brendel, piano. Vanguard VCS 10020. $3.50.

II. LITERATURE OF SPECIAL INTEREST

BERG: Lulu. Evelyn Lear, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, et al.; Orchestra of the German Opera, Berlin; Karl Böhm, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139 273/5. $17.37.

BUSONI: Six Elegies. David Bean, piano. RCA Victorla VICS 1379. $2.50.

Piano Concerto. John Ogdon; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; Daniel Revenaugh, cond. Angel S-3719. $11.58.

CARTER: Piano Concerto. Jacob Lateiner; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LSC 3001. $5.79.

CRUMB: Night Music I. Louise Toth, soprano; Paul Parmelee, piano and celesta; David Burge, Thomas McCluskey, percussion; George Crumb, cond.; CRI S-218. $5.95.

GERHARD: Symphony No. 1: Dances from Don Quixote. BBC Symphony Orchestra; Antal Dorati, cond. Seraphim. S-60071. $2.49.

IVES: Complete piano works. Alan Mandel. Desto DST 6458/61. $23.92.

MONTEVERDI: Madrigals and Scherzi musicali. Soloists; members of the English Chamber Orchestra; Raymond Leppard, cond. Oiseau-Lyre SOL 299. $5.95.

Records 1968 / David Hamilton

In addition to the category "Records of the Year," this compilation includes sections devoted to "Repertory of Special Interest" (first recordings, or significantly better recordings than have been previously available), and "Performances of Special Interest" (unusual readings of more standard literature). A final section lists "Significant Reissues" of historical recordings. Except in this last category, all records listed are in stereo.

THE NATION/December 23, 1968

I. RECORDS OF THE YEAR

BACH: Cantata No. 198. Soloists, Hamburg Monteverdi Chorus; Concerto Amsterdam; Jürgen Jürgens, cond. Telefunken SAWT 9496. $5.95.

BERG: Violin Concerto. Josef Suk; Czech Philharmonic Orchestra; Karel Ancerl, cond. Crossroads 22 16 0172. $2.49.

PERSONALS

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects, Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, INC., Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63129.

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 225 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 101st St., New York, N.Y. 10016.

MANUSCRIPT IN TROUBLE? Skilled editor, published writer, aids authors in revising manuscripts. (In French and English.) Box #619, c/o The Nation.

HIGHLY educated, interesting, do-gooder wants to meet female. Write Mr. L., 522 Van Duzer, Staten Island, New York 10301

RENTAL—February through August; four bedroom, completely furnished house; beautiful neighborhood Flatbush; fireplace; washer-dryer, $325—monthly. References. Box No. 620, c/o The Nation.

HOW COULD CROQUET BECOME THE NATIONAL PASTIME? Solve the riddle of Master of the Courts in The Smith/10, and send us your answer. Correct ones win free subscriptions. 192 pages—$2.50 from The Smith, 5 Beekman St., N.Y.C. 10038

WHAT is The Anti-Civilization League? For the first revelation, read The Smith/10. 192 pages—$2.50 from The Smith, 5 Beekman St., N.Y.C. 10038

SALE OF ORIGINAL DRAWINGS from THE NATION and elsewhere by BARNELL. $5.00 and up. MO-3-7625

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

12-23-68

111 11th Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $4

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

MOZART: La Clemenza da Tito. Soloists: Vienna State Opera Chorus and Orchestra; Istvan Kertesz, cond. London OSA 1387. $17.37.

SCHOENBERG: String Trio; Ode to Napoleon; other works. Juilliard String Quartet; John Horton, speaker; Glenn Gould, piano. Columbia M2S 767. $11.58.

Von Heute auf Morgen; Choral Music. Various performers; Robert Craft, cond. Columbia M2S 780. $11.58.

SESSIONS: Violin Concerto. Paul Zukofsky; RTF Orchestra; Gunther Schuller, cond. CRI S-220. $5.95.

SZYMANOWSKI: Violin Concerto No. 1. Wanda Wilkomirska; Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra; Witold Rowicki, cond. Heliodor S-25087. $2.49.

VERDI: Ernani. Soloists; RCA Italiana Chorus & Orchestra; Thomas Schippers, cond. RCA Victor LSC 6183. $17.37.

WEBER: String Quartet. SCHOENBERG: Ode to Napoleon. STRAVINSKY: Three Pieces; Concertino. Claremont Quartet; Bernard Jacobson, speaker; Joanna Nickrenz, piano. Nonesuch H 71186. $2.50.

WOLF: Spanisches Liederbuch. Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Gerald Moore, Deutsche Grammophon 139 329/30. $11.58.

WUORINEN: Chamber Concerto for Flute and Ten Players. Harvey Sollerberger; Group for Contemporary Music at Columbia University; Charles Wuorinen, cond. MARTINÓ: Concerto for Wind Quintet. Contemporary Chamber Ensemble; Arthur Weisberg, cond. CRI S-230. $5.95.

III. PERFORMANCES OF SPECIAL INTEREST

BEETHOVEN: Piano Sonata in C minor, Op. 111; Bagatelles, Op. 126. Jacob Lateiner. RCA Victor LSC 3016. $5.79.

BERLIOZ: Symphonie Fantastique; Lelio. Soloists; London Symphony Orchestra and Chorus; Pierre Boulez, cond. CBS 32 B1 0010. $7.79.

DEBUSSY: Chansons de Bilitis. Régine Crespin, soprano; John Wustman, piano. London OS 26043. $5.79.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 8. Soloists;

Vienna State Opera Chorus, Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; Dimitri Mitropoulos, cond. Everest 3189/2. $9.96.

STRAVINSKY: Sacré du Printemps; Fireworks. Chicago Symphony Orchestra; Seiji Ozawa, cond. RCA Victor LSC 3026. $5.79.

VERDI: Arias from early operas. Montserrat Caballé, soprano; RCA Italiana Chorus and Orchestra; Anton Guadagno, cond. RCA Victor LSC 2995. $5.79.

IV. SIGNIFICANT REISSUES

BEETHOVEN: Quartets in C-sharp minor Op. 131, and A minor, Op. 132. Busch Quartet. Odeon E 80968/9. $4.79 each.

DVORAK: Symphony No. 7. London Symphony Orchestra; Pierre Monteux, cond. RCA Victor LSC 1310 (stereo). $2.50.

MAHLER: Das Lied von der Erde. Grace Hoffman, Helmut Melcher; SWDR Orchestra; Hans Rosbaud, cond. Turnabout TV 34420 (stereo). $2.50.

SCHUBERT: Symphony No. 9. Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Wilhelm Furtwängler, cond. Heliodor 25074. $2.49.

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 4. HAYDN: Symphony No. 88. Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Wilhelm Furtwängler, cond. Heliodor 25073. $2.49.

VERDI: Operatic arias. Zinka Milanov, soprano. RCA Victor LSC 1336. $2.50.

Te Deum. Robert Shaw Chorus; NBC Symphony Orchestra; Arturo Toscanini, cond. RCA Victor LSC 1331. $2.50.

WAGNER: Orchestral selections. Berlin and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras; Wilhelm Furtwängler, cond. Seraphim IB 6024. $4.98.

RECITAL: Songs of Brahms, Loewe, Wolf. Hans Hotter, baritone; Gerald Moore, piano. Seraphim 60065. $2.49.

RECITAL: Songs and opera arias. Alexander Kipnis, bass. Seraphim 60076. $2.49.

Operatic Arias; songs by Wolf. Tiana Lemnitz, soprano. Odeon E 73398. $4.79.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1277

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 and 10 Abstruse drama? The coy ingenuite might! (4,4,2,3)
- 5 Steady and good man, fully qualified. (6)
- 10 See 1 across
- 11 and 25 down Does it imply one shouldn't be right on the edge of the paper? (6,3,5)
- 12 What's left of the seminar, anyway? (7)
- 13 Plant having a fish tail, sometimes used with salad. (7)
- 14 Implies how a girl might like to be seen, it sounds. (6)
- 15 Art must change its basic structure. (7)
- 16 Marked advance, perhaps the result of pumping. (7)
- 21 Is not up and around just to repudiate something! (6)
- 22 Union get-together. (7)
- 26 Each art has its difficulty with this passage. (7)
- 27 This famous fighter didn't get title consideration, despite his many victories. (9)
- 28 Where 2 are often 17. (5)
- 29 One employed to carry beer? (6)
- 30 If you insist, it's how a lover of Cucurbito Pepo kept his wife! (4,4)

DOWN

- 1 More than one gentleman referred to in 30 gets exhausted! (6)
- 2 Anger must change their appearance, but probably weakens their case. (9)

- 3 Reserved for emergencies when the lion gets loose? (3,4)
- 4 A forceful driver, but sees poorly for a king! (7)
- 6 More spare paint is mixed with it! (7)
- 7 Ask about the rising of a way to confuse things. (5)
- 8 One hears with them a murder's solved! (8)
- 9 Compulsions useful in golf and tennis. (6)
- 16 She won out, but had difficulty in finding a place to stay. (4,5)
- 17 Strangely enough, figures are only when one checks them, usually. (6,2)
- 19 Flatter sincerely, as they say. (7)
- 20 Non-U form of judging? (6)
- 21 Relaxing of tension. (7)
- 22 A visual problem about the most important description of some fattening foods. (7)
- 23 The color of some petals? (6)
- 25 See 11 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1276

ACROSS: 1 Consequence; 10 and 9 Brief case; 11 and 30 Up in arms; 12 Feature; 13 Ebb tide; 15 Corridor; 16 Escape; 18 Bessed; 21 and 19 down The crack of dawn; 24 Adjoints; 26 Estival; 28 Owed; 31 Protagonist. DOWN: 2 Overtures; 3 Sobered; 4 and 23 Quiltclaims; 5 Effable; 7 Gazebo; 8 Wind-up; 14 Truth; 17 Cardinals; 20 Dentist; 22 Eastern; 25, 29 and 6 Order in the court; 27 Stag.

PUBLICATIONS

PAPERBACK PICK-NIC! You're invited! From lists used bargains. Hard backs too. Harco, Box 52-NA, Carmel, Indiana 46031.

OVER 2,000,000 Back Dailies! Magazines! Reasonable prices. Fast service. Send needs. MID-TOWN, Box 917-N, Maywood, N.J. 07067.

"THE NATION'S BEST PUZZLES"

Books 1 and 2
Still available as Xmas gifts!
$2.25 for both—132 puzzles in all.
Address: Frank W. Lewis
119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md. 20770.

KENNEDY '72 bumper sticker—3/$1.00. Buttons 4/$1.00. Drum, Box 609N, Fairfield, Conn. 06430.

APPLE's first two issues contain poems by Ammons, Enslin, Leverov, Tagliabue, Wade and others known and unknown. Sample copy, $1. Four-issue subscription, $3.50. APPLE, Box 2271, Springfield, Illinois 62705.

GUATEMALA PERSPECTIVE. 80-page critique of U.S. involvement in Latin America's potential Vietnam. Includes papers on Guatemalan Economic Development and International Politics; The Violent Polarization of Left and Right in Guatemala; Peasant and Worker Organization; map, profile, annotated bibliography. Send $2.00 with order to N.Y. COMMITTEE OF RETURNED VOLUNTEERS, 41 Irving Place, New York, N.Y. 10003.

EDUCATIONAL

QUAKER STUDY CENTER—Suburban Philadelphia. Special program for study in social change, non-violence and radical living. Also year's seminar on man's search for meaning, confirmation and dialogue. Write: L. W. Lewis, Pendle Hill, Wallingford, Pa. 19086.

The Nation

BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY
by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.10
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zeligs (Viking, $8.95) $7.10
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAND by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $4.45

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 333 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

12-23-68

*'I never thought I'd be caught reading
The NATION'*

You may have friends who you know will enjoy a gift subscription to The NATION this year. You know they will be challenged and stimulated by The NATION's broad coverage of topics and events.

But what about your other friends—those who are “just not interested”? Perhaps they don't read liberal journals of opinion or even take much interest in today's happenings.

Why not introduce them to The NATION too? Maybe they are looking for new interests or would like to know another point of view.

We aren't guaranteeing results. But who knows? When you're sending gift subscriptions to your friends this Christmas, why not include the ones you'd never expect

clip & mail

THE NATION

333 Fifth Avenue

New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME
STREET
CITY STATE ZIP

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free PAX AMERICANA by Ronald Steel. Please send gift subscriptions to the following:

NAME
ADDRESS
zip

NAME
ADDRESS
zip

NAME
ADDRESS
zip

NAME
ADDRESS
zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N12-23

BURLINGAME

DEC 31 1968

LIBRARY

THE HEART MARKET DESMOND SMITH

THE

NATION

DECEMBER 30, 1968 35 cents

5-658 PLS-337
BURLINGAME PUBLIC
LIBRARY
BURLINGAME CA 94010

The Backwash of Prague

ALEXANDER WERTH

The Children of Rainbow

THRUST OF THE UNDERCULTURE

KINGSLEY WIDMER

Youngstown Shuts Its Schools GENE I. MAEROFF

REVIEWS D. J. ENRIGHT on SAUL BELLOW / HARRY MAGDOFF on SERVAN-SCHREIBER / STUDS TERKEL on JAMES CAMERON / GEORGE STADE on WALTER BENJAMIN /
JOHN GLIEDMAN on JOHN LE CARRE

LETTERS

Teamsters and the poor

New York City

DEAR SIR: The charges and insinuations made by Cloward-Piven are really too absurd to require refutation but just as dangerous to ignore.

First, they offer a great deal of employer propaganda, but no objective "evidence, to suggest that lower-paid workers are hurt when minimum wage levels are raised."

More seriously, Cloward-Piven dismiss as both inconsequential and hostile to unorganized workers the revolutionary demand for a $5 per week children's allowance put forward by Teamsters Local 237 in the negotiations now going on with the New York City Housing Authority.

The first objection is that for workers at the $1.60 per hour statutory minimum, $260 per year per child will be far less than could be obtained by the same worker as a welfare supplement. But the entry wage in the Housing Authority today is not that statutory minimum of $3,120 per year but $4,500, and after January 1, it will be considerably more than that.

The second argument that the "main consequence" of the children's allowance breakthrough "would merely be to enlarge the difference between . . . unorganized and organized workers" can be used against each and every economic gain registered by unions.

Nicholas Kisburg, Legislative & Research Dir.
Teamsters Joint Council 16

the draft: a correction

Rochester, N.Y.

DEAR SIR: While I am pleased by your summary and approval of my address to the American Legion urging immediate and complete abolition of the draft ("Why Mercenaries?," editorial, The Nation, Dec. 9), I am distressed at one error. You say that my "attack on the draft system was therefore not on the ground that it is immoral in principle and inequitable in practice, but that its inefficiency menaces national security." What I actually said was: "My objections to the draft are of two kinds. First, it is immutably immoral in principle and inevitably inequitable in practice. Second, it is ineffective, inefficient, and detrimental to national security." I gave priority to the immorality and inequity, devoting eight paragraphs to that and only a single paragraph to its ineffectiveness.

A less central error: what I dismiss on the ground that everyone will be equally mistreated is universal national service, not "universal military service," as you say. . . .

W. Allen Wallis
President, University of Rochester

An error in transcription, which the editors very much regret, caused the misrepresentation of President Wallis' views as to the morality of the draft.

witness of Sinclair

Portland, Ore.

DEAR SIR: Upton Sinclair may not have had an analytical mind, but his factual revelations and indignation inspired many of us and set our sights realistically on the society in which we live. Not much has changed since the 1920s, except that the incongruities, social and economic, have increased, and the racketeering has become more sophisticated—on the political and economic level. Anthony Netboy

correction

The price of Josef Albers by Eugen Gomringer and others, published by George Wittenborn, was incorrectly listed in our issue of December 16. It should have read $27.50.

EDITORIALS

The Wily Old Men

Despite the change in administrations, little will be new about the House of Representatives; in that continuity lies the possibility of real crisis. The standing committee chairmen, whose massive powers repeatedly blocked Executive requests during the 90th Congress, were overwhelmingly returned to "lead" in the 91st Congress.

The House assigns all proposed legislation to its twenty standing committees. No less than nineteen of the twenty chairmen in the 90th Congress stood for re-election and all nineteen won, most of them by crushing margins. In seven Southern districts, so disorganized and demoralized was the opposition that no challenger bothered to file. Included among the seven Representatives who thus had no need to conduct even a token campaign are the chairmen of the most important committees of the House: Appropriations, Rules, and Ways and Means.

Rep. George Mahon (D., Tex.) was, by Southern standards, sympathetic to the Great Society. Though chairman of Appropriations, his stature in the House was often inadequate to the task of stopping economy drives at the expense of the politically weak and powerless. Rep. Wilbur Mills (D., Ark.) used his formidable powers as head of Ways and Means to advance his conviction of the necessity for full examination of national priorities. What he had in mind became clearer in the anti-welfare amendments he pressed through. Rep. William Colmer (D., Miss.), of the Rules Committee, learned most of the tricks of obstruction from wily Judge Smith, with whom he was allied through the last three Presidencies.

L. Mendel Rivers (D., S.C.), the super-hawk chairman of Armed Services, also had no competition. Apparently the extensive military construction assigned to his Charleston, S.C., seigniority dissuaded both Wallaceites and Republicans from contending.

Even the twelve chairmen who were opposed needed for the most part to make but token campaigns; in only one case was there what might be called a serious challenge. Wayne Aspinall (D., Colo.), head of Interior and Insular Affairs, won by "only" 54.9 per cent of the popular vote. In every other election the chairman's vote exceeded 60 per cent and some reached pluralities above 80 per cent. Mayor Daley's machine could not muster enough votes to carry Illinois for his national ticket, but the Mayor's one standing committee chairman, William Dawson of Government Operations, won by near acclamation in his South Chicago district.

Winds of change and rebellion may have blown through Chicago, Miami and even Birmingham, but the quiet of Pascagoula, Miss., and College Station, Tex., were undisturbed by 1968.

As the country grows younger, the men whose voices are heaviest in Congress grow older. The remarkable fact is that more than a third of the new House chairmen were born in the 19th century. Two of the nineteen returning chairmen entered the House before Franklin Roosevelt entered the White House; ten more took the oath of office while Roosevelt served as Chief Executive. Just two chairmen are younger than 60 years of age; the rest range up to 80 years.

The clash of Congressional elders with activist youth is only probable, not necessary. But such a clash does seem to be approaching on a wide range of issues. Communication between those who have held power for a generation or more and those who would inherit and redirect power has never been more strained. The lawmaker who cut his political teeth in fighting the makers of the New Deal is well experienced in the tools of standpatism. Declining competition in the districts back home has removed even the spur to action of hard-fought elections.

Many rank-and-file members of the House believe something more sensible than seniority should be used to determine the leadership of vital committees. But if there is no break with the seniority system, control over the events of the last third of the 20th century will in large measure be in the hands of men born in the last third of the 19th century. A fight to break seniority is likely in the Democratic caucus during the first week of January. The stakes at issue for representative government would seem substantial.

JOHN E. CROW

The Job for Rockefeller

In recent decades the state of New York has been fortunate in its governors. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Herbert H. Lehman, Alfred E. Smith come to mind, and Nelson Rockefeller, now the nation's senior governor in length of service (ten years) has every right to be included in that galaxy. It is good news for the state—and for the country as well—that he plans to seek a fourth term in 1970.

Had the Republican Party nominated Rockefeller for the Presidency, it is as certain as anything can be in politics that he would have defeated Hubert Humphrey, and the country would then have been governed on a more statesmanlike level than present prognostications would seem to indicate. Failing that, it is far better for Rockefeller to remain in the governorship than to serve in any capacity, however exalted, under President Nixon. As for the reports that Rockefeller had been sounded out for the post of U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, these, if true, border on the grotesque. There was a time when this job could have been worthy of a statesman of the highest capability, but it has been allowed to deteriorate to the level of a high-powered corporation lawyer using the standard tricks of the trade exclusively to further his client's interests.

If the problems of the cities cannot be solved in New York, it is doubtful that they can be solved anywhere; in that event the country will be headed for disruption on a scale that is terrifying to envision. While the difficulties in New York may be greater than elsewhere, the means to cope with them, if not yet adequate, at least approach adequacy, and can be supplemented with further appropriations from the federal government and the resources of the state itself. The Urban Development Corporation will have $6 billion available for slum rebuilding. The

IN THIS ISSUE

December 30, 1968

EDITORIALS

706

ARTICLES

710 The Backwash of Prague

Alexander Werth

713 No Trust and No Money:
Youngstown Shuts Its Schools

Gene I. Maeroff

716 The Children of Rimbaud:
Thrust of the Underculture

Kingsley Widmer

719 The Heart Market:
Someone Playing God

Desmond Smith

721 Stripping Kentucky:
The "Subversive" Poor

Gene L. Mason

BOOKS & THE ARTS

725 Bellow's Stories:
Dehydrated Novels

D. J. Enright

726 One-Dimensional Analysis

Harry Magdoff

727 Two Poems

David Ray

728 Walter Benjamin:
A Special Case

George Stade

730 Detachment De-Mythified

Studs Terkel

731 Knowing (poem)

Isabella Gardner

730 Popular Art Into Good Art

John Gliedman

732 Music

David Hamilton

732 Stanford Street Poem:
Albuquerque

Gene Frumkin

733 Art

Lawrence Alloway

735 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PATLICK

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN TOLSON

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; ART, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; Paris, ALEXANDER WERTH; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; United Nations, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published weekly (except for omission of four summer issues) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1968 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office (for editorial correspondence only): 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing offices.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 for foreign.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is Indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 207

No. 23

state has a $1 billion program to combat water pollution, $2 billion for the Housing Finance Agency, a $2.5-billion transportation bond issue, a $700-million hospital construction program, and other plans for welfare and modernization. "For me to leave these things with their full potential as yet unused could jeopardize the fulfillment of the programs," the Governor said in an interview with Sydney H. Schanberg of The New York Times (December 10). "The potentials are too exciting. And they might never be realized if I don't follow them through."

This is not vanity; it is a realistic view based on past experience. Money alone cannot heal America's ills. In addition the task calls for the gusto and buoyancy with which Mr. Rockefeller is amply endowed. And if he succeeds in New York, he will be setting an example that politicians, up to and including the President, will not be able to ignore.

Unjust and Unequal

This brief season of mercy is an appropriate time to call attention to the perennial problem of excessive sentences for criminal offenders. The outstanding spokesman against sentences which are both unjust and unequal is James V. Bennett who, until he retired in 1964, had been director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons for twenty-seven years. Mr. Bennett made a convert of Robert F. Kennedy when he became Attorney General, but even so the two men were unable to accomplish any reform in the present system. Now, with a new Attorney General coming in, Mr. Bennett will try again to talk sense and reason on his favorite subject to the Department of Justice and the Congress.

Here are a few choice items from Mr. Bennett's bountiful collection of horror stories (all, of course, federal cases). A former Army officer, a first offender, convicted of passing several bad checks, was sentenced to eighteen years. About the same time, a young man with a record of sex offenses, convicted of robbing a bank of $5,000, was sentenced to ninety days.

These are not isolated cases. The average sentences for auto theft vary from eleven months in the western district of New York to forty-six months in Wyoming. Federal judges hand out terms for forgery that range from nine months in Maine to sixty-three months in Oklahoma and fifty-eight months in Arkansas. And the average time actually spent in federal prisons varies nearly as much as the sentences; in northern New York the average is eleven months, in Massachusetts twenty-five months, in Iowa fifty-two months. A lawyer with no criminal record, a war veteran, married and with a family, was convicted of conspiring to smuggle parrots into the country from Mexico and was sentenced to eleven years, for parrot smuggling. When his case finally came to Mr. Bennett's attention the man had already served three years; because of an excellent prison record, Bennett was able to get the sentence cut to five years.

Judge Simon E. Sobeloff of the Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit is an ally of Mr. Bennett in the campaign to secure a measure of consistency and sense in the matter of federal sentences. He cites two cases in Fort Worth. One man was convicted of fraudulently cashing a check for $58.40. He had no prior record, he was out of work, his wife was ill, and he needed money for rent, food and medical bills. At about the same time, another defendant, who had been previously convicted of drunken driving and nonsupport, and who was also out of work and in desperate financial straits, fraudulently cashed a check for $35.20. The first man was sentenced to fifteen years in prison, the second to thirty days.

In March, 1966, a subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee held hearings on a proposed bill which would have made excessive sentences subject to appeal and review. The bill passed the Senate but the House failed to act. It has been endorsed by the American Bar Association and the Judicial Conference of the United States.

Judges should have a large discretion in sentencing, and no doubt a case can be made for some variation in circumstances from district to district (stealing a car in Wyoming may have more serious consequences than a similar theft in Boston). Still the federal courts are part of a single judicial system and the record overwhelmingly supports Mr. Bennett's case for reform. But it is the obvious social reforms that always seem the most difficult to achieve. It is to be hoped that Mr. Bennett's proposal may, in 1969, prove an exception to this perverse maxim.

The Representational Gap

A reading of two recent polls, one by Louis Harris, the other by George Gallup, measures the present extent of political disaffection. The Gallup poll indicates that 15 million Americans, who were registered, "sat out" the 1968 Presidential election, either from lack of interest in politics or from dissatisfaction with the three candidates. (A much larger number of those of voting age failed to register or did not vote because of illness, absence, change of residence, etc.). A majority of 54 per cent of voters in this latest post-election survey said that they had "split" their ticket and voted for candidates of different parties.

The Harris poll indicates that in a time of unprecedented material affluence, 28 per cent of the adult population—more than 33 million Americans—feel substantially alienated from the mainstream of society. Conspicuously represented among the alienated are the poor, the old, the blacks, and the people who never went to school beyond the eighth grade. Those who voted for George Wallace also express a high sense of isolation from "the American power structure."

Mr. Harris sums up his survey: "In adult America, blacks are now an estimated 12 per cent of the population, whites over 65 are 17 per cent, whites earning under $3,000 a year are 10 per cent, whites with no more than a grade school education are 17 per cent and the Wallace supporters come to just over 13 per cent of the 1968 election. Taken together and eliminating overlap, these groups come close to 50 per cent of the adult population." With 15 million voters so disaffected that they sat out the Presidential election and with perhaps 50 per cent of the adult population alienated from the mainstream of American society, it is apparent that the representational gap has become dangerously extended. This is, perhaps, the "gap" that should concern Mr. Nixon more than the others that he and his associates have mentioned.

Cayuga's Waters

An important utility, the New York State Electric & Gas Corporation, owns and operates a coal-fueled electric generating station on the east shore of Cayuga Lake, about 16 miles north of Ithaca. With the demand for electric power in the United States doubling every six to ten years, the northeastern part of the country is no exception. Consequently NYSEG is planning to build an 830-megawatt nuclear-fueled station adjacent to the coal-fueled one; it would use the lake water for cooling purposes.

This plan has come under scrutiny by a group of specialists, all of them Cornell staff members but not acting on behalf of the university. One reason for their interest is the fact that nuclear-fueled plants require more cooling water per unit of output than plants burning coal, oil or gas. Another is that Cayuga, together with other Finger Lakes in west-central New York, is an unusual and precious natural resource, whose ecology may be upset by a rise in water temperature. The findings of these residents of the area are contained in a pamphlet, "Thermal Pollution of Cayuga Lake by a Proposed Power Plant."

The proposed NYSEG plant is a large one, both in electrical output and demand for cooling water. Every twenty-four hours, year round, some 100 million cubic feet of water drawn from the cool lower layer would be discharged into the upper layer at 65 to 70 degrees Fahrenheit. The production of algae and other plankton organisms would increase, while oxygen would be depleted at greater depths, to the disadvantage of fish species such as lake trout. In addition to this thermal pollution, chemical pollution might result from the flushing of pipes in the plant with compounds containing chlorine, hydrochloric acid, corrosion inhibitors, etc. Still other risks would be entailed.

These deleterious effects—some certain, some conjectural—are none of them technologically unavoidable. While the use of water from a lake or river for cooling is the least expensive method, a number of alternatives are available. One design would use evaporating towers for closed-circuit cooling, a technique similar to that of a display fountain which circulates the same water over and over again. In such a system, water losses can be made up by drawing from the lake, but without thermal pollution of the source.

The Cayuga Lake discussion may be one harbinger, among many, of the emergence of a more enlightened social attitude to replace the outworn Puritan-Protestant primacy-of-profit attitude, which has served as cover for so much spoliation and exploitation. Nowadays a utility, especially one going nuclear, cannot afford to antagonize the community or to take the compliance of the Atomic Energy Commission and other public bodies for granted. In any form, pollution is no longer a God-given right of corporations; with few exceptions corporate leaders know it. The AEC does not concern itself with thermal effects on bodies of water, but the New York State Department of Health does have that responsibility. In the present case, the utility officers, no less than the conservationists, will probably come around to the realization that the purity of Cayuga Lake is more important than a slight decrease in the cost of generating power.

Tijerina Acquitted

After deliberating for four hours, a jury in Albuquerque, N. Mex., unanimously voted to acquit Reies Lopez Tijerina of three charges resulting from a celebrated courthouse raid that took place some eighteen months ago (see "Guerillas of Rio Arriba: The New Mexican Land War" by Clark Knowlton, The Nation, June 17). News of the verdict threw Tijerina's grass-roots followers into "joyful tears," but New Mexico officialdom was stunned.

The movement of social protest that Tijerina has been leading in the Rio Arriba section of northern New Mexico has its roots in the long and complicated history of what happened to Spanish land grants after the U.S. war with Mexico. It is an old story indeed and one with painful overtones. But the present protest is something new, stemming from the "land war" but much broader. What it reflects is a body of grievances which have been aggravated, and made more difficult of solution, by a century of neglect and inattention.

Officials in Santa Fe and Washington should read the meaning of the verdict with care; the new protest movement can be expected to intensify if the grievances on which it is based are permitted to fester. The recent hearings by the Civil Rights Commission in San Antonio should remind officials, state and federal, of the new ferment and unrest that is stirring among the country's approximately 6 million Spanish-speaking citizens, most of whom live in the states of the old Spanish borderlands.

Buried At Last

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals has just handed down a unanimous ruling that the ashes of Robert G. Thompson, a veteran of World War II, must be accepted for burial in Arlington National Cemetery. A member of the Communist Party, Thompson had been convicted of violating the Smith Act, but he held an honorable discharge from the Army and had been awarded the Distinguished Service Cross for heroism in action (see "Banned from Valhalla," The Nation, February 14, 1966). Now, three years after his death, the federal government has been formally instructed to honor its commitment to a dead soldier.

Nothing so demeaned the administration of the Department of Justice under Nicholas Katzenbach as his decision that Thompson could not be buried in Arlington Cemetery—the more so as he ruled in response to right-wing pressure. It is humiliating that a court order was needed to compel the federal authorities to act honorably in a matter of this sort, but the decision will, to some extent, erase the unpleasant memory of Katzenbach's vindictive ruling.

THE BACKWASH OF PRAGUE

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

On August 20, when the Soviet tanks rolled into Prague, it all seemed a horrible tragedy for Czechoslovakia. One foresaw concentration camps of the Ivan Denisovich type (or worse) being set up near Prague and Bratislava; one expected a censorship in Czechoslovakia as brutal as that of the Moscow Glavlit; one guessed that a new Soviet-type "Socialist legality" would be enforced in Prague—whereas the Soviet leadership (or rather, the Hawks of the Kremlin) had just violated every international undertaking of the Soviet Union since World War II, including the Resolution on the Definition of the Aggressor, adopted by the UN at the instigation of the Soviet Union itself, and all the sanctimonious assurances about noninterference in the affairs of foreign countries and foreign Communist parties, and the recognition of "polycentrism."

The fact of polycentrism was first established by Tito in 1948, and the word was coined by Palmiro Togliatti, that very remarkable man and thinker who, until his death in 1964, had for many years headed the Italian Communist Party. Under Togliatti's influence, not only the Italian CP but many others started an "Away from Moscow" movement. One of the slowest in the West to accept "polycentrism" was the French Communist Party which, under the leadership of Maurice Thorez, remained firmly subservient to the Kremlin. But Thorez died in 1964, and his successor, Waldeck-Rochet, has moved the French party (second in size only to the Italian in the countries of the capitalist West) more and more toward polycentrism. It may now be regarded not only as a French National Communist party, but as the only French party on the left of any consequence whatever. During "the events" of May-June, the Communists acted according to a realistic understanding of the situation, firmly refusing to approach the "revolutionary abyss" into which the crazier of the students tried to drag the French working class. In these same weeks, Mitterrand, Mendès-France and Guy Mollet of the "moderate" or old-time "social-democratic" Left, reeking of Fourth- and even Third-Republic mothballs, merely made themselves ludicrous. Mitterrand at the end of May declared, in effect, that in a few days he would be President of the Republic (in place of de Gaulle) and that Mendès-France would be Prime Minister (in place of Pompidou). The French Communist Party behaved with much greater political wisdom, becoming, as it were, "His Majesty's Loyal Opposition"—the French equivalent of the Labour Party—while the various brands of Gaullists (from near Fascists like Alexandre Sanguinetti to true liberals like the new Minister of Education, Edgar Faure) took on approximately the role of the British Tories.

The wreckage of the Third and Fourth Republics counts for less today (and is much more disreputable) than does even the small group of Liberals in the British House of Commons. De Gaulle may well live for another fifteen years. At 77, he not only showed last spring the most amazing cunning in solving an (in fact) artificial "crisis"

[See "Students, Workers and the General" by Alexander Werth, The Nation, June 24], but, more recently, abated if he did not solve the international monetary crisis by announcing that there would be no devaluation of the franc—and that barely twelve hours after Le Monde had intimated that a Cabinet meeting, with de Gaulle presiding, had decided on a "less than 10 per cent devaluation." De Gaulle has been hated by most of the foreign press, and by a large part of France (as the 1965 Presidential election showed) for all kinds of reasons, most of them wrong: for decolonizing the vast French possessions in Africa, for granting independence to Algeria and terminating the senseless war started there by Mendès-France, Guy Mollet and the other "Socialists" and "left wingers." The "Socialist" Robert Lacoste, Resident Minister of Algeria, personally authorized the torture of Algerian prisoners.

One of the great private satisfactions I derived from the Gaullist sweep of the general election last June was the defeat of "my" two "Left" deputies in the Dordogne department by two Gaullists, whose names I don't even remember. The important thing is that in the Dordogne we get rid of two phony leftists. One of them was the just mentioned Robert Lacoste; the other was the 80-year-old Georges Bonnet, the French Foreign Minister of the Munich days. We know now that when, two months after Munich, Bonnet received Hitler's Foreign Minister, Joachim von Ribbentrop, he not only refused to invite the two Jewish ministers in the Daladier government to the official receptions (these were Georges Mandel and Jean Zey, both later to be murdered by the Vichy Milice), but he even expressed (as we have since learned from German archives of 1938-39) "enormous interest" in Hitler's way of dealing with the "Jewish problem." At that time, the super-extinction camps with gas chambers, on the scale of Auschwitz and Majdanek, had not been opened, but there were smaller camps like Dachau, most of whose inmates were Jews. Bonnet told Ribbentrop that there would be too much opposition in France even to a Dachau type of camp on French territory, but said he was determined to make a start on the "problem" as soon as possible by deporting, say, 10,000 Jews to the Saharan regions of French North Africa. In contrast to this kind of Third Republic "liberalism," de Gaulle has never been anti-Semitic, though his warning to the "hawks" of Israel was pointed to by some as an example of his racial prejudice. This interpretation was wholly wrong, as the Chief Rabbi of France realized after a long talk with the President during the 1968 New Year's reception at the Elysée Palace. The Chief Rabbi declared afterward that he had been "perfectly satisfied" by what de Gaulle said to him.

The May riots confirmed a prophecy made many years ago by André Malraux, that in the end only two forces in France would really matter: the French Communist Labor Party and the French Gaullist Tory Party. In short, France seems to be moving toward a two-party system, with a little wreckage from the Third and Fourth Republics floating about in the middle.

Illingworth, Punch

Mother Love

Even in the period of their greatest subservience to Moscow, the French Communists were not happy about Russian cultural and especially literary controls. I remember talking in 1948, at the height of the cold war, to Pierre Courtade, one of the finest Communist journalists in France (he died recently at the tragically early age of about 45). Courtade's position in those days was one of "unconditional obedience," but nevertheless he said to me of the 1946-48 Zhdanov purge in literature and the other arts: "These people are ridiculous. By and large, the Russians are right in both their domestic and foreign policies, but this persecution of writers in the land of Pushkin and Gogol, of Tolstoy and Dostoevsky, is both odious and totally destructive." He added, "That is the way all we responsible French Communists feel, but we can't make a fuss at the height of the cold war, with its Truman Doctrine, Marshall Plan and 'Bomb Moscow Now' hysteria." It is logical, thus, that the first great official expression of the French party's emancipation should have come in 1966 with Louis Aragon's sharp condemnation of the Siniavsky-Daniel trial and the savage sentences that resulted.

A few months after that trial, and after long, embarrassing delays caused by a strong nonconformist opposition, the Soviet Writers' Union, that fortress of Socialist-realist conformism, finally convened its Fourth Writers' Congress in Moscow on May 22, 1967. For several weeks before, I had been receiving pressing telegrams inviting me to attend (not that they offered to pay my fare), and I almost went. Indeed, I got my bags as far as the scales at Le Bourget, and then suddenly I thought to myself: What am I to do when I get there? What can I say? Nothing? But they will pester me until I do say something. And the choice is clear: either a lot of sweet nothings, which would be contemptible, or an all-out attack on their new system of sending writers to jails and camps. (It didn't exist under Khrushchev, or even under Stalin after about 1940—except for the Yiddish authors, and there the reasons, however bad, were political, not literary.) That would mean abandoning my plan to make a close two- or three-month study of the Soviet Union in the summer of 1967. So I quickly recovered my bags and called for a taxi. I then sent a cable saying I had suddenly fallen ill, but hoped to come "in a week," i.e., when the Writers' Congress would be over.

Lillian Hellman, C. P. Snow and other Western writers who attended the Congress were, indeed, pestered to speak and refused. The only Western writer to address the Congress was Armand Lanoux, a leading authority on de Maupassant, who spoke on behalf of the four-member French delegation—two Communists and two non-Communists. He advocated "cultural coexistence" (one of the worst crimes against ideology that a Soviet writer can commit), and then, referring to the Siniavsky-Daniel case, he declared: "There are certain measures you have taken in recent years that have filled your worst enemies with glee, and have caused nothing but grief and consternation to your best friends." Lanoux himself later told me:

Half the hall burst into frantic cheering, while the other half observed an icy silence. . . . And then, the answer to my speech came like a flash. Somebody had mounted the rostrum—somebody called Evgeni Surkov. I could scarcely believe my ears. He was doing me the honor of answering me immediately, of improvising his answer. This representative of the powers that be informed me very politely, but also very firmly, that he disagreed with me, and that there could be no such thing as ideological coexistence with the West. There was some vague little clapping here and there. The incident was closed. There was not a single allusion, right to the end of the Congress, to the other point I had raised.

The Soviet press gave a brief account of Lanoux's speech, but printed not a word of his plea for greater intellectual freedom, still less for Siniavsky and Daniel.*

There is not the slightest doubt that a fierce struggle is today in progress between the hawks and the doves of the Kremlin. It is impossible to tell who exactly on the Politburo voted for the invasion of Czechoslovakia and who opposed it, but the chief hawk is certainly Brezhnev. Ever since the fall of Khrushchev in October of 1964, Brezhnev (who assumed the title of General Secretary of the party, a title which only Stalin had used before him) has been reverting to Stalinism. Much to everybody's astonishment, he spoke of Stalin in the most laudatory terms as early as

* I quote this incident from the proofs of my new book, Russia: Hopes and Fears, to be published shortly by Penguin Books in Great Britain and by Simon & Schuster in the United States. The title is derived from a letter I received from a young Russian intellectual last September, a few weeks after the invasion of Czechoslovakia: "Since Prague, our last year's timid hopes of a liberalization of Russia have gone up in smoke, perhaps for a very, very long time, while our fears of a return to some particularly fiendish kind of Stalinism have grown immeasurably."

May, 1965, during the celebrations of the twentieth anniversary of the victory over Germany. Although nobody could prove it, everyone in Moscow assumed in 1966 and 1967 that it was Brezhnev who convinced a majority of the Politburo to approve the trial of Siniavsky and Daniel, and that the minority which opposed the trial was led by Kosygin. The 23rd Party Congress of 1966, besides re-establishing the Stalinist title of "General Secretary" for Brezhnev, also gave the Stalinist name of "Politburo" to what under Khrushchev was known as the "Presidium."

Khrushchev had been a complete opportunist, interested above all else in power for himself. In ideological and literary matters he blew hot and cold. At one time (1962), encouraging the "thaw," he even instructed Pravda to publish Yevushenko's famous poem, "The Heirs of Stalin," and Novy Mir (also in the fall of 1962) Solzhenitsyn's One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich. At other times his discourses on art and literature were as vile as any made by Zhdanov, Stalin's art and literary dictator in 1946-48. But when he ranted, Khrushchev's bark was worse than his bite, and except for the scandalous Pasternak affair of 1958—for which Khrushchev was scarcely to blame, it having been engineered by some of the top bureaucrats of the Writers' Union in Moscow—the Khrushchev period of 1953 to 1964 was marked, on balance, by a slow liberalization in literature and the other arts.

When Brezhnev became head of the party in October, 1964, there began a gradual return to some of the worst features of Stalinism—and without even Stalin's excuses. The great purges of 1937-38 could be explained, though not justified, by the tense international situation, with Hitler threatening invasion at any moment—not without some encouragement from the "free hand in the East" enthusiasts in Britain, France and elsewhere. And the later Zhdanovism, nasty though it was, was obviously a by-product of the cold war. Absolute discipline, total subservience to the state, on the part of everything in Russia, including literature, art and even music, could, to some degree, be justified. Not only was Stalin's Russia on the defensive during those postwar years but even what it had gained as a result of the war was in danger—as, for example, Yugoslavia, which unexpectedly broke away from Stalin's new East European empire in 1948.

In 1965 Russia was not threatened by anybody or anything and yet Brezhnev restored some of the harshest Stalinist methods. Many writers lost their lives in the Stalin-Yezhov purges of the 1930s, but after 1941, with the exception of the Yiddish authors, who were pretty well exterminated around 1950, no writer was shot, imprisoned or deported during the last fourteen or fifteen years of Stalin's rule. Akhmatova and Zoshchenko were expelled from the Writers' Union, and other writers, artists and composers were abused and insulted, but no one was actually imprisoned, let alone shot.

Nor is there a single case on record of any artist, writer or musician having suffered any kind of persecution (apart from occasional abusive speeches by Khrushchev and people like his propaganda chief L. F. Ilyichev) between the death of Stalin in 1953 and the Brezhnev regime which began to show its full wickedness in 1966. The chief examples of the "new spirit" of 1966 were the Siniavsky-Daniel trial, and certain particularly nasty speeches made at the 23rd Party Congress, notably by Mikhail Sholokhov—the self-appointed or Brezhnev-appointed Grand Inquisitor for literary matters—and by General Epichev, the head of the Political Department of the Armed Forces, who is now one of the best-hated men in Czechoslovakia. After the Siniavsky-Daniel trial came many more, often quasi-secret, trials of writers and poets.

I had a rather sinister experience earlier this year. I wrote an article for the Moscow Literary Gazette to show up the NTS, an American-subsidized, anti-Soviet propaganda organization in Munich, which pretended to its American backers that it had a powerful anti-Soviet underground inside Russia. But the Literary Gazette wrote to say that they could not publish my article, since it suggested that subversive activities were virtually nonexistent inside the Soviet Union, whereas, in reality, it was the duty of Soviet citizens to be extremely vigilant. That precisely was what happened in 1937-38 at the height of the Yezhov-Stalin purges, when anybody and everybody could be suspected and denounced as a German, British, American or Japanese spy.

It now begins to look as if some such "purging" has already begun in Russia. People there are already terribly scared to write to anybody living abroad. Except for one letter from a courageous young intellectual and another from an old wartime friend, very much a member of the Establishment but an intellectually honest man—who wrote that there was "something to be said" for the invasion of Czechoslovakia (he called the invasion euphemistically "the military operation"), but time alone would show whether he was right or I was right—the few letters I have received read like Pravda or Izvestia editorials. No personal friend has dared write anything to me since the Soviet tanks entered Prague.

On December 1, Le Monde published a remarkable editorial entitled simply "MVD"—initials identifying the Soviet Ministry of Internal Affairs, or what used to be called NKVD, the People's Commissariat of Internal Affairs, of unholy 1937-38 memory. Le Monde wrote:

While the Soviet leaders are trying to strengthen their military pressure against their allies, notably Romania, and seem, for the time being, satisfied with the "alignment," albeit very relative, of Prague, we are now witnessing a return to the "good old methods" of the Stalin days inside the Soviet Union itself. The Ministry of the Protection of Public Order, which Mr. Khrushchev had set up, has now been replaced by the MVD. On the face of it this change of name does not mean much, and should not, in principle, much affect the (already somewhat limited) individual freedoms enjoyed by Soviet citizens. The Soviet press stresses that the new ministry will "strictly observe Socialist legality," and that its jurisdiction will extend only to the municipal and communal police, and not to the state police, which will remain until further notice under the authority of the KGB, the Committee for State Security. . . . It should be remembered, however, that the new ministry, like its predecessor, will be in charge of prisons, labor camps and "forced residence areas," the population of all of which has obviously greatly increased lately. . . . All this, in any case, suggests a strengthening of party control over the police. And the revival of the MVD, a federal body which had been dissolved by Khrushchev in 1960, implies something ominous.

Even if the reform amounts to no more than a change of name, the very return to the MVD, successor to the all too famous NKVD, points to a total disregard by the Kremlin rulers of the psychological effect such a change is bound to have. If not yet the substance, at any rate the symbols of Stalinism are being openly revived.

I have the strong impression that, as long as Brezhnev enjoys a majority on the Politburo, he will work to set up a particularly savage police regime, whose principal victims will be countless Russian intellectuals, engineers and technicians, those who showed greatest sympathy for the Czechs, and for Dubcek in particular. A typical story is that of an old man sprinkling with a watering can a bit of lawn behind the Lenin Mausoleum and near Stalin's grave. When asked what he was doing, he says: "Well, I planted a little acorn here, and hope it will grow quickly into a little oak (a dubcek)."

The invasion of Czechoslovakia violated practically all the Soviet Union's international undertakings and treaties, and so discredited the Soviet Union in the eyes of the world that Brezhnev and company do not dare, for the present, to commit any further outrages against Czechoslovakia; accordingly, the ruling team there is growing ever bolder and more independent. But Brezhnev is, instead, taking it out on countless Soviet citizens whose sympathies have been with the Czechs. Brezhnev cannot, however, do this with impunity. His opposition within the Politburo must be growing, as many of those who voted for the invasion come to realize that its effects have been disastrous for Russia. To take just one example, what face does Mr. Gromyko, that arch-defender of the sanctity of international treaty obligations, put on as he enters the UN building in New York? And I can well imagine how Ambassador Valerian Zorin felt in Paris when hundreds of guests invited to the embassy reception "to celebrate the fifty-first anniversary of the Great October Revolution" answered as I did: "Thank you for your kind invitation, but my wife and I regret not to be able to attend the November 7 embassy reception this year."

Stalin's foreign policy may have been cynical, even wicked, but it was never stupid. He had the good sense to realize in 1948, for instance, that sending tanks into Belgrade would do infinitely more harm than good. Instead, he enforced an economic boycott on Yugoslavia, called "Tito and his clique" a bunch of "imperialist agents and traitors"—and left it at that. So it would not surprise me if, within three or four months, Brezhnev fell with a crash even greater than the toppling of Khrushchev. In that case, the public prosecutor would again be M. A. Suslov. He is far from being a liberal, but he has at heart the relative cohesion of the world Communist movement, and this has been killed, at least temporarily, by the invasion of Czechoslovakia. A. N. Kosygin, who as head of the government holds himself responsible for both home and foreign policy, and who realizes only too well what terrible harm the invasion has done the Soviet Union, would succeed Brezhnev; Soviet troops would be pulled out of Czechoslovakia, and Russia's international standing would be rehabilitated.

I rather think that the Czechs, too, will eventually see that they made some mistakes. They will not restore an absolute freedom of the press—for under such freedom there would be nothing, for instance, to prevent the CIA from flooding Czechoslovakia with anti-Russian and anti-Soviet literature. But as long as Brezhnev is boss, I am much more worried about the many thousands of pro-Czech Russians than I am about the Czechs themselves, who have played their hand with extraordinary skill.

NO TRUST AND NO MONEY

YOUNGSTOWN SHUTS ITS SCHOOLS

GENE I. MAEROFF

Mr. Maeroff is an editorial writer on the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Youngstown, Ohio

An indication of the fate that lay in store this fall for Youngstown's 12-mill school levy was the refusal of several of the art students at Chaney High School to draw promotion posters for the tax. "My parents told me you teachers have it made," some of the teen-agers told their art teacher. "They say you already make enough money." When the voters got a chance to express their feelings, the measure was defeated—the sixth straight time that a school levy has been turned down in Youngstown.

Today the 28,000 public school students in this city of 170,000 are in the midst of an extended winter vacation. The green and red heavy-duty tinsel is festooned above

Federal Street and shoppers hurry in and out of Strouss' and McKelvey's, but the doors of the city's forty-five schools have been closed since the day before Thanksgiving, November 27, and will not open again until January 2. Ohio law forbids deficit financing by school boards, and when he ran out of money, Superintendent Woodrow Wilson Zinser merely closed down.

Furthermore, the vacation that Youngstown's youngsters are now enjoying could be short compared to what may await them next fall. Unless the levy is passed in 1969, the money will run out very early in the school year and the next "holiday" could be the longest in the annals of American education.

Youngstown's plight arises from a combination of taxpayer resistance, deterioration of real estate values, shifting racial balance and union struggle. It may well be setting a pattern that will be encountered elsewhere before long. As the younger and more affluent residents of Youngstown have flocked to suburban Boardman, Austintown and Liberty Township, they have left behind the Negroes, the elderly who live on fixed incomes, and other less affluent citizens. At the same time, vast highway programs, urban renewal and the expansion of Youngstown State University have removed $9.6 million of real estate from the tax rolls in a single year. This represents a $200,000 loss to the Youngstown schools. Meanwhile, teachers are dividing into union and nonunion camps and squabbling in the open. The public is developing serious doubts about pouring more money into this acrimonious scene.

Youngstown is a steel town, and James P. Griffin, the shrewd bargaining expert who heads District 26 of the United Steelworkers of America, wields the power of labor in the city. Griffin wears dark, conservative suits, occupies a sleek, paneled office and looks more a steel executive than a former steelworker turned union leader. But it takes little time to discover that his sympathies are very much pro-labor and that he believes the Youngstown Federation of Teachers (YFT), local affiliate of the AFL-CIO American Federation of Teachers (AFT), has been given a runaround by the school board.

"The school board has failed to resolve on a fair and equitable basis the question of sole and exclusive bargaining rights," Griffin says in explaining his opposition to the board's recognition of the Youngstown Education Association (YEA), affiliate of the National Education Association (NEA), as bargaining agent for all the teachers. "I don't relish my position of not being able to support the school board, but I can't support an organization that's anti-labor in a labor town."

Thus, when it came time to endorse the 12-mill levy, a few of the smaller unions, including some of the building trades and the public employees, lent their support; but the giant Steelworkers with 30,000 members in Mahoning County, and the Greater Youngstown Council of the AFL-CIO, remained silent. In such a contest, not endorsing was as effective as being against.

Youngstown's battle between the union teachers and the nonunion teachers could be duplicated in almost any city in the land. In Ohio, the NEA had lost Cleveland and Toledo to the AFT and is fighting not to drop Youngstown or any of the remaining large Ohio cities. In Youngstown, only 140 of the 1,100 teachers and administrators belong to the YFT and more than 900, including about seventy administrators, are members of the YEA. But behind the tiny YFT is the power of the city's labor movement, and what might otherwise be no contest has turned into a real struggle.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

The YFT was already organized when the first of the six levies was defeated in December, 1966. It had struck for three days the month before—the first teachers' strike in Ohio—in demand of a representation election. In 1966, the board had arbitrarily named the YEA as the bargaining agent. Another levy defeat followed in May, 1967, and the measure went on the ballot again in November, 1967. Superintendent Zinser, who was to maintain an admirable impartiality on the question of representation, became superintendent in August, 1967. He went to Griffin before the November election to try to get his support:

[Griffin] told me he wouldn't support the levy because the school board was not representative of labor, because the school people had not helped him the previous year in getting a bond issue passed to provide funds for the establishment of a community college and because we hadn't had free elections to choose a bargaining agent for the teachers.

In that November election, four of the seven seats on the school board changed hands, three of them being won by persons sympathetic to labor. This was a vital step toward breaking the communications barrier that had arisen in the community. But the levy—for 6.1 mills at this point—went down to defeat, getting 44 per cent of the votes when more than half was needed for passage.

After that defeat, the YFT began pushing even harder for a representation election. The wounds that had been opened by the strike were exacerbated by what the YFT viewed as an anti-labor majority on the school board. A good deal of bitterness developed then between the two factions of teachers and it has shown no sign of abating.

"I might be friendly with a union teacher, but I'm not going to compromise with him," says YEA president Roy C. Fisher, a nineteen-year veteran of the Youngstown system who teaches high school French and English. "I'm dead set against what they stand for. I wouldn't give up my principles for them. You can't be a teacher by a clock as the Union would like. When you're working with people it's different than when you're working with bricks or steel."

Extensive cutbacks were made during the 1967-68 school year. There was no kindergarten for the city's 2,100 5-year-olds and the school board won no friends among their mothers. Extracurricular activities were curtailed and driver's training classes were ended. But what evoked the loudest public outcry was suspension of pay to varsity coaches, though a modified athletic schedule was pursued with coaches volunteering their time.

The voters must have been unimpressed by their own voices because they rejected a levy once again last May—the fourth consecutive defeat. Meanwhile, the school board had relented on the representation issue and promised the YFT that an election would be held. Because Zinser feared that too many teachers might quit the system during the summer if the levy still was not approved, he came right back at the voters in June—a step he now admits was a mistake because he did not have time to mount a fresh campaign. The levy went down again.

Ohio law permits a school district to submit levies only three times in a calendar year, so Zinser had just one shot left in 1968. He used a new strategy for the November election: months in advance he began announcing that the schools would close if the levy failed. Rather than cut back on the program and conserve money to finish the year, he ran a full program, restoring almost all the funds that had been withheld. He even yielded to the YEA in September when it threatened a strike unless salaries were improved. He granted teachers a $450 raise, bringing starting pay to $6,250. To some this "go for broke" policy was a kind of intimidation. Defeat number six came last month and now the schools are shut.

In Youngstown—and other cities may find the same thing happening—the public mistrusts the school board. Furthermore, the education upheaval, especially on the campuses, is making the public suspicious of teachers and the educational process in general. In Youngstown this fall, steelworkers were working four-day weeks because industry had built up large inventories. Workers who were taking home smaller checks than usual were not about to vote teachers—of all people—more money.

Evidence that the repeated failures of the levy reflect not only a general opposition to higher taxes but a specific dissatisfaction with the schools is the fact that the citizens of Youngstown were willing to vote an increase in their personal city income tax from 1 per cent to 1.5 per cent, which funds they knew were earmarked for raises to policemen and firemen.

And the prospects for an early improvement of the situation are not great. Union opposition to the school board stiffened before the election last month because of disputes over how a bargaining representative was to be chosen. Just before a special October election in which the teachers were to vote between the YEA and the YFT, the board granted that $450 raise—to the glory of the YEA. As far as the YFT was concerned, that was bad enough, but then the board insisted that supervisory personnel be permitted to vote in the election and be represented in the bargaining. The YFT thereupon announced that it could not go through with the election and requested not to be on the ballot. In October, the election was held as scheduled, with only the YEA on the ballot.

Another group not hitherto mentioned is Youngstown's Catholics. Already burdened by the expenses of supporting their own 12,000-student system—including two high schools that each cost $1 million a year to operate—they do not welcome higher taxes. Moreover, the pay of the lay teachers in the Catholic schools is maintained at 95 per cent of the going rate in the public schools.

Among the areas of the city where the tax levy was most soundly defeated were the fourth and seventh wards, both heavily Catholic. The Catholic hierarchy, however, endorsed the levy. Bishop James Malone even sent a pastoral letter in its support to parish priests to be read at masses.

And in the background is the seldom discussed racial issue. Youngstown's school enrollment is now almost 40 per cent Negro, although the Negro population is only 20 per cent. More and more whites are coming to the conclusion that the inner-city school system will eventually be predominantly Negro, and that taxes they impose on themselves now (once levied, a school tax is permanent in Ohio) will ultimately be used in behalf of the blacks.

All of Youngstown's Negro groups supported the levy, but thus far race has not figured prominently in attacks on the measure—perhaps because people have been able to find other persuasive grounds for opposition. But in Youngstown, as in every other city, the race question will become a larger issue in every future election.

Youngstown's experience is also proof that school financing needs to be renovated. Extensive reliance on property taxes may be an anachronism. This is not a situation where the wealthy landowners are throwing pittance to the peasants. In Youngstown, which has one of the highest percentages of home ownership in the nation, the peasants are the landowners. And they do not believe they should bear the onus for supporting the schools. One Ohio state legislator is considering the introduction of a bill calling for a 1 per cent personal income tax to support schools. He feels it would be more equitable, and he is winning support.

Furthermore, many school districts need a wider tax base than the district provides. Youngstown epitomizes this need. As the city's tax base has been shrinking, its educational needs have been growing. Youngstown's downtown (even the appellation is euphemistic) is sick. The newest high-rise structure was built decades ago. Store after store stands empty, and even the ornate, 2,800-seat Warner Theater, which played first-run films for thirty-seven years, is boarded up. Woolworth's, McCrory's and Lerner Shops went to the Ohio Supreme Court earlier this year in a futile effort to have their real estate taxes slashed. In a joint suit they pointed out that other downtown retailers had fled to the suburbs and that the impact upon their property values was "devastating." The city has become stagnant, and unlike some cities which have kept pace by expanding their boundaries and gobbling up suburbs, Youngstown has remained the same size for years.

Zinser, who is living through it, says there has to be a reappraisal of the method in which public education is financed. He suggests taxes on wages and salaries instead of on property. He wants increased federal support to the point that the local, state and federal government would each contribute one-third of the budget. The state now puts up 20 per cent of Youngstown's school budget, but if there are fewer than 180 days of classes during the school year the state will not contribute a penny.

Woodrow Wilson Zinser is up to his nose in one of the worst public education crises this side of Ocean Hill-Brownsville. And few of the taxpayers seem to appreciate just how dire the situation is.

THE CHILDREN OF RIMBAUD

THRUST OF THE UNDERCULTURE

KINGSLEY WIDMER

Mr. Widmer, professor of English at a California State College, is the author of The Literary Rebel (Southern Illinois University Press), and of books on D. H. Lawrence, Henry Miller and Herman Melville.

Recently, a former student who had been last year's archetypal hippy again confronted me. Still bearded and rebellious but now minus Indian regalia, and apparently on parole from a long term "high," he had a new thing: politics. His latest costuming included Neomarxist headgear and a good many decorative political gestures "to liven the scene in the streets of America." "You see," he concluded with a disingenuous smile, "you could turn on to me as living out the distinction you used to make between, first, a rebel who goes after a different life style, and, then, a radical who wants to fundamentally change the life of the system." He recited the lesson mockingly well; but, as with many another teacher who puts an abstract definition up against a hairy reality, I had for some time doubted my own text. Cultural rebelliousness and political radicalism come together.

From the underculture (the "marginals," the "dissident subcultures," the "generation in revolt," the "bohemian-beat-hippy tradition") comes much of the impetus for change in social values. But many intelligent people still disdain the rebels as "not authentically radical" and "not genuinely creative." So let me make the counterargument. It seems that the "reasonable liberal" is quicker to put down the rebels than is the raging reactionary. He charges them with a lack of politics, a drugged mindlessness, a self-indulgent sensuality, messy ways, a lack of high art and, in sum, for not being reasonable liberals. This comfortably dismisses our major social revolt as mere titillation and delinquency. Yet the custodians of the ideology of affluence, who almost had us thought-rinsed into believing that everyone was well washed and well subdued, seem alarmed by the rise of the inner barbarians. A Chicago cop, a Texas politician, or a California real estate broker violently defending American Civilization against underground poets and pacifists makes good farce. But in their righteous simplicity they may also rightly perceive the way their society is going under.

Is the rebellious underculture the radical force of major social change? No, insists the usual educated response, and snobbishly shrugs off the rebellious culture as offering nothing "new." True, but that should also suggest the relevant history. Take any of the major motifs of the rebellious, such as the ecstatic consciousness, the self-chosen alienation from the mainstream society, the syncretistic religiousness, the "action" arts, the polymorphous sexuality, the flamboyant costume, the utopian communalism, the tribal poetry-music, the "loving" anti-competitive personal code, and the outrageous life styles (including reversed "standards of living") as ways of protest. All repeatedly appear, with only secondary variations in manner, in the Beats of the 1950s, in their bohemian and utopian predecessors, and in a long tradition of rebellious modern culture. Any student of the more extreme literature of the last century, of Blake and Rimbaud, of Céline and Miller, of Nietzsche and Lawrence, knows where the ideas come from, though not all the young rebels do. What were once the solitary musings of the enraged poets and nihilistic critics now become the tangible style of the ten thousands who march up country from the mainline society. The small bohemian coteries of the past now become large ghettos of the dissident. The defiant styles of the outcast become the fancy uniforms of the fashionable in-class. In sum, the imaginative assault on middle-class life, a major effort of serious modern culture, becomes a literal social reality.

But are the effects of the rebellious culture really radical? Partly, of course, they get twisted by the exploitative society. Rebellion gets plagiarized for the amusement of the bored, commercialized for the solace of moral cripples, and neutralized into a mannered game for the protection of the powerful. I believe this process occurs less through a conspiracy by the custodians of our society than as an almost inevitable result of the emptiness of the mainline culture. Middle-class life produces many things, including commerce and efficiency and comfort, but it does not produce much significant art and thought, or new sensitivities and moral passions. Yet the society hungers for these, too, and the brokers of culture and manipulators of disguised ideology must come up with intriguing styles, both as protective coloration for their profit and power and as substitute gratifications for needed social changes.

From religion to footwear, from political revulsion to personal decoration, from erotic techniques to communal visions, the margins of the rebellious culture must be plundered for the sustenance of a disoriented and voracious society. It obtains not only much of its culture but also its moral sensitivity and social awareness from the rebels—peace and blackness as well as beads and rock. The cannibalizing of the rebellious may have accelerated, out of desperation, but the process is not new. Earlier in this century, reform movements drew heavily on bohemianism, as in past centuries moral and political awareness was strongly nourished by radical religious sectarians. The civil rights movement of the late fifties cannot fully be separated from the preceding Beat Generation's ethnic responsiveness and revulsion from the society's moral apathy. And anyone active in the anti-war and campus protests of the last four years must grant that the legions of dissent cannot be visualized apart from the beatnik-hippy-Yippy styles. Middle-class America seems aesthetically and morally unthinkable without its revitalization from outside and underneath. Hence the tolerance by way of guilt by many solid citizens for deviant behavior. Our social order inherently destroys aesthetic and moral sensibility, and so must repeatedly disguise and humanize itself by consuming the art and rebellion of subcultures.

Commonplace sophistication holds that the generations of revolt are mostly symptoms of social failures. In fact, they equally serve as agents of social change. The point needs stressing because it is a "liberal" rationalization—that minority culture is but another topical problem, like juvenile delinquency or the unemployment of the semi-skilled, to be cured by dosages of money, education, organization and intellectual hygiene. But these often exacerbate white cultural rebellion as much as they inflame black racial revolt. The rebellious culture, like blackness, is for real. Genuinely different, and subversive, it cannot be so easily ameliorated away. Dissident culture, like primitive Christianity, can become a self-generating social force and unreasonably powerful. As political and cultural extremity accelerate, co-opting partly defeats itself. Millions of Americans, for example, cannot stomach the underground styles which the culture brokers would peddle to them, and so start raging against the diet of "anarchists." That produces counter-revolutions, followed by punitive reactions which result in politicalization of the rebellious culture.

When one tries to weigh the significance for radical change of what develops out of the underculture, it appears that the most exalted offerings merit the least consideration. Such are drugs. Many of the recent studies of the hippy scene can see little else, mistaking a ritual for the total reality. Political militants may correctly judge the psychedelics as counterrevolutionary, the opiates of the elite. More importantly, and in spite of the glad tidings of the hallucinogenic gurus, drugs are not news. We have been there before, with the romantic and symbolist poets who ended testifying that drugs fail to maintain an intensified and enlarged awareness. Drugs but short-circuit what requires a whole way of life. Exoticism and defiance and desperation led to the exaggerated poetry and politics of pot until a minor indulgence was sometimes taken to be a revolutionary metaphysic. Ecstatic devices, chemical or mystical, might sometimes vault one into a different awareness and response, but to live there requires the more arduous creation of a different culture and society, which is what the drug scene finally demands.

Youth is another current opiate. Both Paul Goodman and J. Edgar Hoover indulge in this "generation hang-up," though from opposite sides. Any inherent correlation between age and radicalism seems dubious, though our Populist anti-intellectualism intentionally exaggerates the biology of discontent. Of course the young take major roles in the legions of the military. No doubt certain current conditions, including fatuous indoctrination disguised as education, totalitarian military conscription, and the exploitative meaninglessness of the corporate and public bureaucracies at whose gates they stand, fall especially heavy on the young and anger them. Then ideologues (such as those of the Peace and Freedom Party) borrow from an under-culture mystique and draft revolutionary programs for the exact date in the 1970s when 50 per cent, plus one, of the American population will be under 25. Charming, but the law of demographic radicalism doesn't seem to apply to a number of countries in the world more youthful than ours. Even if there were a political biology with a rule that the young join the legions of change, which legions and which changes would they be? Perhaps some demagogue can work up the youth religiosity into a nasty political reality. Until then, we should remain skeptical of the pathetic American cultism of adolescence. Generation gap ideology merely disguises a radical dissatisfaction in the whole of our society that is naturally more visible among the young.

To take up another charge against the rebellious: their marginal ways reveal no monopoly on messy lives and destructive ambivalences. The individual origins of rebellious choices may, of course, sometimes be located in psychic and social disorders, and certainly rebellious styles can be ritualized into obsessional conformity. What can't? But the rebellious attempts at tribal life contain a relevant protest against a widely painful and perhaps finally unviably social form: the small, competitive suburban family. Though continuing with psychiatric crutches, and relieved by serial polygamy, the narrow and anxious nuclear family is socially regressive, and cruel to many. The awareness of this is a staple of our intellectual culture, and novels about domesticity, from Flaubert to Roth, have long provided devastating attacks on the tightly predatory family. And sexual experimentation and efforts toward broader families, now endemic in marginal groups, may often be poignant or messy, but they criticize a basic social form and attempt to restructure it. This search for new groupings, and not the post-Puritan permissiveness that is usually trumpeted, point the current direction of the continuing sexual revolution. The turn to trivial relatedness may forecast the crucial community sense of the future. New social values, and their politics, require a changed libidinal and communal order.

Yardley Jones, Toronto Telegram (Canada)

"Bet You We Don't Even Get a 'Thank-You' Note"

Similarly, the culture from down under and outside does not aim at the competitive connoisseurship of the high art of bourgeois society. The posters, the newspapers, the beads, the lyrics, the tribal decorations, the free-form psychodramas and the rest, also point to the communal. The underground arts mostly demand group rather than private responsiveness. Such communion criticizes what we may now recognize as the elitist and aggrandizing roles of much accepted modern art. Not the "artistic career" but the group art-action becomes the essential focus. The predecessors of today's underculture still yoked rebellion with the unique role of the artist; the current self-sanctification of the dissident and declassified by "creativity" operates quite outside the traditional roles of the poet and the painter. Masterpieces, or the attempt at drastically individualized art, are largely irrelevant to working on a communal style.

Besides, traditional high culture competes quite inadequately with the high decibel and hallucinatory pseudoculture of technology, which empties most art and thought. The current underground may have created the best popular arts since the technological media smashed folk culture. They, too, may go to pieces in the processing and peddling—the present experience of rock musicians, now no longer local and communal but major product lines, rather sadly confirms this. But the deep longing for a culture of communal involvement remains. The drive toward more directly engaging arts includes considerable rejection of the debased culture-of-the-word, which now less serves intellectual and individualizing motives than technological and bureaucratic rationalization. The limited hippy interest in literature tended to fantasy (Tolkien, Heinlein, the sutras, science fiction, etc.). Perhaps the major novelist linked to the underculture, Ken Kesey, long ago gave up that middle-class form for more direct arts and rebellious-communal living. No doubt standards other than those of "high" literature and art and criticism need to be applied to this new neolithic culture. Most basically, the arts of the underculture should be recognized both as protest against the dominant culture and as ritual for subcommunities which symbolically enact dreams of a different society.

Increasingly, the cultural rebellions go beyond mere consciousness, and the private practice of art, to dress and ritual and family and community. Since our bankrupt humanism (and "liberal arts" education) depends on a nurtured distinction between learned culture and social existence, we are shocked when the underculture does not make the same separation. (The same alarm is expressed when "minorities" attack "pure" and "objective" institutions and students revolt against "scholarly disinterest" and "impersonal" education.) Generally in our society, "sophisticated" and "cultivated"—and even "educated"—are terms used to praise the ability to lead a schizophrenic life, to separate culture and politics, consciousness and social function. Much of the rebellion is about that forced and painful disparity between awareness and daily activity. Social necessity once seemed to mandate that fragmentation, the opposing styles of dress and morality and ideas in public and private. No more schizophrenia, say the cultural rebels, who thus simultaneously became social radicals.

Is this a way to make a revolution? It may not be the way that the traditional Left, usually quasi-Marxist or at least Jacobin, would choose to force transformations of economic and political power. But we must take the forces of change where we find them rather than fantasize rising proletariats or progressive bureaucracies. Today's rebels may be partly characterized by their refusal to compete directly for economic and political power. Instead, they attempt to withdraw from or circumvent power by resistant and contrasting ways of behavior. In our technically overpowered systems, this may be practical as well as principled. Compare the terrible pathos of most contemporary political revolutionaries caught up in their easily corruptible, and destructive, fantasies of the usurpation of power. Those from the underculture no more choose parliamentarianism, manipulating interests and structural repression—politics as legitimacy—than they do the revolutionary variants of movement organizing, ideological polemicizing and the break into sustained violence. The contemporary rebels do not elect to man the barricades or the bureaucracies; they insist instead upon a different consciousness, resistance, and alternate life styles as the way toward true change.

From the underculture comes the politics of "anti-politics" as both protest and communal creation. Their dancing in the streets may be a more significant public action than voting in elections devoid of alternatives. Their dissident manners may have more effect than a library of pedantic position papers. And their love games may create more vitality than the political games which reinforce the deadening current structures of response. It may even be more socially effective to attempt a lively different life style than to organize a variant political ideology. Yet, strangely, many who take pleasure in what they call politics rather vehemently resent any politics of pleasure. Given our actual cities, we must suspect the political dogmatists and pragmatists who become contemptuous about aspirations to the city of love.

And given the power of modern institutions and states, the rebellious styles of undermining and resisting and transforming just might lead to more effective as well as more humane ways of change than the expediency and bureaucratization of reform and the violence and authoritarianism of revolution. That, anyway, seems to be the inherent logic of the rebellious underculture and it seems to be widely, though not very clearly, adopted in increasing areas of society. Historically, these must be viewed as radical phenomena, proper offspring of the antinomian heretics and the enlightenment utopians and the modern literature of rage. Critically, the efforts toward new communities and life styles highlight our inadequacies. Morally, the sensuality, color and responsiveness, the anti-authoritarianism and almost violent pacifism, and the attempts to break out of the usual institutional labors and faiths—these are sufficient in and of themselves. Without further art or ideology or politics, they make authentic and radical demands on our culture and society. We may, of course, deplore the ritual drugs, the protective cultishness about youth, the Populist anti-intellectualism, and all sorts of other deviations from middle-class and middle-aged good sense. But such changes in ways of feeling and living and being, not just changes in doctrines and institutions and powers, are what change the world. The resonance of the underculture may carry much further than usually reported, and a truly liberal or radical politics must now relate to it.

THE HEART MARKET

SOMEONE PLAYING GOD

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is on the staff of C. B. S. News.

A few weeks ago, Maria Acosta, a 38-year-old Mexican woman suffering from a brain hemorrhage, was transferred from a sick bed in Yuma, Ariz., to St. Luke's Hospital in Houston. The arduous journey, involving a long ambulance ride from San Antonio to Houston, the patient's untimely end, the immediate transplant of her healthy heart, raise profound questions about the circumstances under which human beings may be used in scientific experiments. No one says that Mrs. Acosta was actually taken from her Yuma hospital to St. Luke's for the specific purpose of being a heart donor. But this is certain: there are at present more than thirty potential heart recipients in St. Luke's; and some have been waiting as long as three months for a donor. Was someone playing God with Mrs. Acosta's life?

What began a year ago in South Africa as a pioneering medical feat has turned into a shocking international heart transplant race. The United States has now taken the lead in this drastic and dramatic approach to cardiac therapy. But the spectacular publicity surrounding heart transplant surgery has distracted attention from the urgent need to take a sober look at the other side of the picture—the growing use of the near-dead, the allegedly moribund, as the source of human spare parts. It is a problem to be confronted most soberly by the medical profession, by Congress, by anyone who, in the future, will have a death in the family. At issue are the social and legal implications involved in research with human beings. This particular research field is still relatively small compared to its potential, but it is driving ahead because of the vast growth in government funds (most heart transplants in the United States are, in large measure, underwritten by the National Institutes of Health) as well as donations by private industry. The first Cape Town heart transplant carried the reputation of heart surgeons to heights never quite reached in the past, but to describe heart transplants as curative cardiac therapy is like describing a cobalt bomb as a cure for cancer; the case can be argued, but sensible men don't do it. The first and most shattering point about human heart transplants today is that, whether the recipient is seven years old or seventy, the prognosis for long-term survival is nil. No responsible heart surgeon—including the optimistic Dr. Barnard—has, in fact, described heart transplanting as a therapeutic process. It is occasionally described as a "clinical trial," but even this term is a misnomer. More exactly it is experimentation with human guinea pigs.

To understand why this is so it is only necessary to recognize that the focus of interest of the heart transplanters is not on the actual surgical techniques of the operation (the area of the public's greatest interest), but rather on the human research subject's post-operative history. During the era of animal experimentation, the surgeons perfected the transplant techniques. They then discovered that the major problems arose in the post-operative phase. Most animals died in the first few months following a heart transplant. A main reason for this is that little-understood biological factors cause the body to reject tissue-to-tissue transplants. The longest reported survival in heart-transplant experiments with dogs is fifteen months.

To avoid this reaction, the research doctors dosed the animals with drugs which suppress the body's rejection mechanism. Unfortunately, this also leaves the animal defenseless against any passing infection. Nevertheless, and despite the angry protests of anti-vivisectionists (see Reader's Digest, April, 1966, "Lost Pets That Stray To The Labs"), animals provided researchers with many of the clues about the heart transplant's rejection mechanism.

By the mid 1960s, the American heart transplanters—most of whom had been working for nearly twenty years with dogs—were eager to shift to human subjects. "You have to start somewhere," says Dr. Jesse E. Edwards, president of the American Heart Association. "The day has to come when somebody is the first person to whom it is done." Yet fearful that public opinion might be hostile, the transplanters hesitated. None of them wished to be compared to the Nazi doctors who experimented on human beings in the slave camps of the Third Reich. So it was an American-trained South African surgeon who took on world opinion. In an audacious five-hour operation, Dr. Christian Barnard cut away the diseased heart of Louis Washkansky and replaced it with the healthy heart of Denise Duvall, victim of a car accident.

More than any medical news since the discovery of the Salk vaccine, the Cape Town heart transplant stirred public imagination. In the surge of favorable publicity that engulfed Dr. Barnard, the death of his patient eighteen days later caused only a ripple of concern. On a triumphal tour of the United States, Dr. Barnard was feted like a second Pasteur; like Pasteur, he had greatly dared, not only risking his professional reputation, but to the extent that human heart transplant surgery was subject to public question, his moral reputation as well. He gambled successfully. The columnists and commentators extolled the vision and courage of his enterprise; a White House jet flew him to the LBJ Ranch, where he was the guest of an admiring President; and in a whirlwind tour of Europe he was lionized by crowned heads, everywhere besieged by crowds of eager autograph hunters.

There followed a heart transplant's field day. Medical centers around the world provided television, magazines and newspapers with a succession of heart transplant stories. There was also a succession of obituaries, but the parallel series of events did not get equal attention; all the stress over the twelve-month span has been on the spectacular success of the operations: here a retired fireman, Louis Block, whose steady news coverage is suddenly interrupted by his death eight hours after the operation; here a steelworker, Mike Kasperak, whose post-operative fight for life blossomed into a week of front-page stories as his doctors took "heroic measures" to keep him alive; here a cheery Arizona accountant, Everett Thomas, whose brief survival went unnoticed until his surgeon, Dr. Denton Cooley, recommended yet a second heart transplant—this event was worth a few columns of news space, but the patient's subsequent failure to survive a second heart transplant rated only a three-line wire service item.

Understandably the response of the general public to this kind of reporting has been a widespread belief that (a) the heart transplanters know what they are doing, and (b) that heart surgeons have now provided a "miracle" cure for chronic heart disease. As a result, every medical center that has performed heart transplants has today a pathetic waiting list of hopeful cardiac cases. A few months ago, Newsweek reported that a small town in Oregon had started a fund to raise $75,000 for a 7-year-old girl with an enlarged heart. The fund was for "Becky's new heart." The local Kiwanis sponsored an auction. "Local stores supplied cars, furniture and other merchandise; a rancher offered a steer that sold for $1,700; a woman auctioned off a chair she had given her late husband sixty-six years ago, and a young girl, who had once had open-heart surgery, volunteered $25 she planned to earn by baby-sitting."

Something is plainly wrong. There are some signs that the medical profession itself is taking a closer look at the free-wheeling heart transplanters. The Annals of Thoracic Surgery commented recently: "With 800,000 people dying annually in the United States of cardiac diseases, not one of the principals pointed out the limited therapeutic role that cardiac transplantation or mechanical hearts can ever play." In a letter to Sen. Walter F. Mondale, a physician observed caustically, "I would wager that . . . numerous intelligent lay individuals with chronic heart disease would submit to a heart transplant. But I doubt very much that a single doctor would have the operation. The medical profession knows the problem is a long way from solution—but fails to communicate this message to the public."

So far, most medical criticism has centered on the feasibility of heart transplants. But, for the longer term, a deeper question is what effect successful heart transplants—once the rejection process has been solved—may have on medical ethics. This question, and its looming legislative implications, is well understood by the heart transplanters. Senator Mondale raised some of the more pertinent issues in a letter distributed to some 200 doctors, deans of schools of medicine, theologians, and law school deans. He proposed to offer a resolution to establish a national commission to study these issues. In a reply, Dr. Adrian Kantrowitz, a New York surgeon, said he and his colleagues were not at present organized to deal with the legal and ethical questions involved. "Who would decide which of several dying heart patients should get the available organ and the chance to live?" Kantrowitz asked. In the absence of any kind of standards to deal with this troubling question, the blunt answer could very well be this: the patient who can afford the long and expensive surgery.

But the real heart transplant problem involves the forgotten half of the transplant equation—the donor. Contrary to the general impression, few doctors can predict the so-called "moment of death" with certainty. "Thousands of persons are pronounced dead," admits Dr. Kantrowitz, "even though many of their internal organs—often including the heart—remain viable." In the case of Maria Acosta, who decided that her brain damage was fatal? As her ambulance neared the open gates of Houston's St. Luke's Hospital, was she already marked "Heart donor,

Norris, Vancouver Sun (Canada)

do not resuscitate"? So far the majority of the ninety-four hearts that have been transplanted have come from brain damage victims. But the head-injury unit at England's Cambridge University counts 7,500 patients with post-traumatic amnesia every year. Four-fifths of the victims eventually survive and return to work. Moreover, of a group of 120 head-injury cases who were unconscious for more than a month, sixty-three survived. As the need for donors grows larger, the definition of death must be carefully redefined. When are you dead enough to be deprived of your heart? It's worth pointing out that the time of death is vital in heart transplants because the heart must be removed as soon as the doctor pronounces death; within the first half-hour is recommended.

STRIPPING KENTUCKY

THE 'SUBVERSIVE' POOR

GENE L. MASON

Mr. Mason is in the Department of Political Science, University of Kentucky.

Lexington

Eastern Kentucky is in the heartland of Appalachia and has all the attributes associated with that colonized poverty pocket. The state of Kentucky not only has 40 per cent of the nation's one-room schoolhouses but its children suffer the highest TB rate in the nation. Almost one-fourth of the east Kentucky population over 24 is illiterate.

During the Kennedy administration, numerous anti-poverty programs were pulled from the drawing tables. We all thought we had declared war on poverty and, to some extent, on the social system that perpetuates it. But aside from the fact that the national leadership gave the war in Vietnam priority over the war in Appalachia, other contradictions are inherent in any attempt by the federal government to destroy poverty.

In eastern Kentucky one of those contradictions is a reflection of the economic system. Coal is the basic industry, and the Tennessee Valley Authority is by far the single largest buyer. The poor people do not profit from the industry—they have been ruined by it. There is an estimated 35 billion tons of coal beneath the rocky, mountainous surface of eastern Kentucky, and only 2 billion tons of it have been mined in more than half a century. Yet ten of the twenty poorest counties in the nation are in eastern Kentucky. Pike County, the largest coal-producing county in this country, is among them. Last year, 18,267,200 tons of coal were mined in Pike County alone. Coal brings the mine owners from $3 to $15 per ton, depending on the grade. Even at the lowest rate, this one county produces $50 million worth of coal in one year.

That wealth has done almost nothing for the people of the county. In the words of Harry Caulliff of Whitesburg, Ky., attorney and author, "Today welfare, not mining, provides most of the money spent by families in the nation's

Early in December the AMA recognized the problem to the extent of offering what it called guidelines. The death of a potential donor must be confirmed, it said, by at least two independent doctors (that is, not themselves contemplating a heart-transplant operation), and the "fact of death must be demonstrated by adequate, current and acceptable scientific evidence in the opinion of the physicians making the determination." A layman reading that carefully worded statement may wonder whether death is that subtle a determination. It is if you need to seize a heart at the first possible moment after its work is done. For some time thoughtful men have been increasingly troubled by the present attitude in the medical profession: "You're dead when your doctor says you are."

coal fields." To understand how such poverty can exist amid such wealth one must recognize the relationship between the owners of coal companies and the county power structure—they are virtually the same. Poverty in eastern Kentucky is a political problem. None of the federally funded anti-poverty programs officially recognize it as such, but some come closer than others.

Eighteen months ago the Appalachian Volunteers (AVs) hired as its training director Alan McSurely, a 30-year-old anti-poverty worker with an M.A. in psychology. He was fired three weeks later for his alleged manipulative and Leninist beliefs. McSurely had proposed various structural changes within the AV organization and had advocated direct political action as the only means to end poverty. He urged the staff to prepare itself for the day when federal money would be cut off if poor people in the mountains really began to get organized.

McSurely and his wife Margaret were then hired by the Southern Conference Educational Fund (SCEF), a Louisville-based civil rights and anti-poverty organization, and remained in the mountains to organize. The AV staff began its work that summer sharply split among militants, moderates and a few genuine conservatives. However, the first issue in which they all joined forces was not long in coming. By mid-June, 1967, they were all working to organize poor people against strip mining—the most brutal and destructive aspect of the economic system. [See "Strip-Mine Morality: The Landscaping of Hell" by Wendell Berry, The Nation, January 24, 1966.]

Forty million tons of coal were stripped from Kentucky's pock-marked mountains last year—and most of that was purchased by the TVA. James Curry, Reclamation Director for TVA, apparently finds this a satisfactory relationship. "Strip mining is part of the American way," he said. He quickly rephrased his comment to "Strip mining is an integral aspect of the American economy."

Strip mining is certainly not desired, however, by the poor people who live on and around the land that is stripped. By a curious legal device known as the broad form deed, owners of the coal under the ground have rights superior to those who own the land above. In the early part of this century, the rights to this coal were purchased for a pittance from people who were completely ignorant of their potential value. The Kentucky Court of Appeals has upheld the rights of those who own the coal to destroy this land. A law setting limits on the degree of slope permissible for stripping, and providing for certain measures of land restoration, was passed during Democratic Gov. Edward Breathitt's administration three years ago. Strip miners declared that such regulations would destroy the industry—but the acreage under strip mining continues to grow.

Not everyone is content, however. Periodically, strip miners discover that their equipment has been dynamited in the fields. In the hot summer months of 1967, night raiders blew up a $50,000 diesel-powered shovel of the Kentucky Oak Coal Company at its stripping site in Knott County. In August, 1968, $800,000 worth of stripping equipment was blasted in Bell County. Across the line in Tennessee, several bulldozers, an auger and a railroad car were dynamited the first week of December, 1967. The total was more than $1 million of "creative" destruction. Mine guards go armed, and random shooting from both sides is not uncommon.

Even more dramatic was the action of an owner of land about to be stripped in the summer months of 1967. Jink Ray, supported by neighbors, AVs and SCEF workers, decided to stand in front of the bulldozer as it was pulling onto his land. He did, and refused to budge; the dozer went away. After a series of legal battles in which the local courts issued injunctions against Ray to prevent his interference with the stripping of his own land, Governor Breathitt came to his aid. He had the strip mine permit of the Puritan Coal Company revoked. Joe Mulloy, an AV and one of Ray's neighbors, said that "the Jink Ray victory had tremendous implications for the poor and working class in Appalachia. This was perhaps the first time since the heyday of the United Mine Workers that the operators had been challenged and defeated by the people. Ray's victory could serve as an inspiration to people all over the mountains to demand and take back what is theirs, the coal. The coal operators knew this all too well."

Meanwhile, the AVs were receiving threatening phone calls in the middle of the night. Then, during the last week of July, 1967, the Pike County sheriff, a representative of the Small Business Administration, and Robert Holcomb, president of the Pikeville Chamber of Commerce, visited the homes of McSurely and Mulloy. They questioned Mulloy generally about what he was doing in Pike County, and specifically about strip mining. Their stay was short but long enough to suggest subtly that he'd better be careful. That evening Holcomb called for a federal investigation of the AVs in Pike County.

Then, on August 11, 1967, eight days after the revocation of the Puritan Coal Company's strip mine permit, the power of the coal companies was brought to bear. Alan McSurely's home was invaded by Commonwealth Attorney Thomas Ratliff (former president of ICOA) and fifteen armed deputies. They combed every piece of printed or written material in the home for two hours—especially the research library on the coal industry that the McSurelys had collected—and confiscated all of it. When they discovered that Margaret McSurely had worked for SNCC in 1964, they arrested her as well as her husband. By midnight they had reached Mulloy's home and put him under arrest.

The following morning, these three anti-poverty workers were taken from their jail cells and arraigned. Bond was set at $5,000 for each of the two men. Margaret McSurely was six months pregnant; her bond was only $2,000. Southern Bell Telephone immediately disconnected the phones in both homes. Mulloy's auto insurance with a local agent was canceled, and he was unable to get insurance for the next six months.

The word began to spread that those arrested were Communists. Holcomb told reporters: "We know that these people are Communists. There are no ifs, ands or buts about it. . . . They intend to take over the county." Ratliff then arrested Carl Braden and his wife Ann, Executive Directors of SCEF, for attempting to overthrow the government of Pike County. Mrs. Braden had never set foot in the county, and her husband's only appearance there was to get McSurely and Mulloy out on bond.

Under the leadership of William Kunstler of Rutgers' Law Center for Constitutional Rights, the anti-poverty workers eventually managed to get the 1920 state sedition statute, which they had been charged with violating, declared unconstitutional. However, the local power structure had by then made plenty of political hay out of the matter.

Heavy pressure was put on Governor Breathitt to rid the state of AVs. Opposing the coal industry in Kentucky is risky politics. Breathitt succumbed and recommended to OEO Director Shriver that funds for AVs be cut off. On August, 18, 1967, Shriver acted. He cut off all funds without a hearing and without notifying the AV director. Some funds were later reinstated, but the AVs have received no new funds from OEO.

A confidential OEO report laid the arrests principally to "obvious political interests." This corroborated an FBI report which stated that Ratliff's prime objective was "ridding Pike County of the anti-poverty workers." It added, "Ratliff's reasons for attacking the program are economic and political: (1) he has made a fortune out of the coal industry and still had coal interests; and (2) he is running for Lt. Governor on the Republican ticket and thinks it is a good issue." But despite an agreement with the three-judge federal court not to act until the court could reach a decision on the constitutionality of the state sedition law, Ratliff proceeded with a Pike County grand jury investigation of the McSurelys and Mulloy. The people of Pike County were thereby sufficiently informed of how these outsiders were disrupting "legitimate" community interests.

Having now the declaration of unconstitutionality, the poverty workers (who had been forced to expend virtually all their energies defending themselves against personal attacks) thought they could return to organizing. However at that point the federal government decided to get involved. In October, 1967, the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations (the old Joe McCarthy committee), chaired by John McClellan, subpoenaed the McSurelys and the records Ratliff had seized on his midnight raid. The McClellan committee is at present charged with investigating the causes of urban riots, and McClellan has said that he has evidence that the SCEF workers were instrumental to the outbreak of riots in Nashville in April, 1967. (The SCEF staff had held its quarterly meeting there April 5 through 8. Stokely Carmichael had spoken at one of the sessions, probably providing the committee with the "evidence" it needed to link SCEF with the riots.)

The subpoenas were challenged in court as illegal, since they were the "fruit of a poison tree": the material had been taken illegally, under an unconstitutional law. The McClellan committee could not act until the material was returned to its rightful owners. (However, the committee's investigator had already made photostatic copies of all the material he wanted.)

After two trips had been made to the U.S. Supreme Court, the books and documents were finally returned last November. McClellan promptly served the McSurelys with new subpoenas, requiring that they appear in Washington with their material on January 14, 1969. The subpoena specifically requests any material pertaining to the Southern Students Organizing Committee (SSOC), the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), the National Conference for New Politics (NCNP), Vietnam Summer, the AVs, SCEF, and the United Planning Organization (UPO), an umbrella anti-poverty organization in Washington, D.C. The 1968 subpoena differed from the one issued in 1967 in only one respect: a request for materials relating to "all other Marxist-Leninist organizations" was deleted. It appears that the committee wishes to link in the public mind all of the very active civil rights and anti-poverty organizations with urban riots.

While the McSurelys were fighting the McClellan committee, Mulloy was fighting his draft board. (There was little time left to fight poverty.) Mulloy had attempted to apply for C.O. status after his 2-A classification had been revoked in the spring of 1967. His draft board in Louisville refused to reopen his case. In discussions with his board, he was questioned about his activities in eastern Kentucky, and the board kept a file of clippings on him and the AVs. (Somehow Mulloy's anti-poverty, anti-strip mining efforts seemed to be relevant to his draft status.) By refusing to reopen the file, the board in effect denied Mulloy the right to appeal. When it became apparent that he would be drafted, Mulloy decided to refuse induction. In April, 1968, he was given the maximum sentence. He spent six weeks in the county jail trying to get his bond lowered from $12,000. He is now free while his case is being appealed.

Between the time Mulloy informed the AVs of his decision to refuse induction and his trial, the AVs, by a vote of 20 to 19, decided to fire him. Mulloy had been told by other AVs that the draft and the war in Vietnam were not issues that concerned the poor, and that he had jeopardized their program by his actions. Mulloy and his wife Karen joined the McSurelys on the SCEF staff.

Despite this incredible series of redbaiting and riot-baiting tactics by the city, county and federal officials, the anti-poverty workers still hoped for success. They continued their efforts to organize the poor. And some of the AVs were beginning to sense just how political poverty is. Edith Easterling, a long-time local resident, an AV and director of the Marrowbone Folk School—a cinder-block center for organizing in Pike County—put it this way: "You should see the way some of those county officers treat the people in the hollers. A friend of mine went down to the high sheriff's office and wanted to make some complaints cause we hadn't been getting any law enforcement. One night a young guy got cut in a fight at a dance at the Folk School. My friend went to the high sheriff's office and asked for help. The deputy said she was just a Communist, and she works for the AVs; and as long as they were going to be Communist, then they couldn't have anybody from the sheriff's office coming out there."

As usual, the winter was difficult in the mountains of Kentucky. But, when the Kentucky legislature met in early 1968, things became still worse. Legislators swallowed what they were fed by the Pike County power structure. The Southern Conference Education Fund was surely a Communist front organization. So must be the AVs. The new Governor, Republican Louis B. Nunn, made a campaign promise to "run SCEF and organizations like it out of the state." He was to get ample help from Democratic and Republican state legislators. To implement his promise, a Kentucky Un-American Activities Committee (KUAC) was established. When a controversy arose as to the need and source of funds for this committee and its proposed staff of investigators, Nunn cleared the way. He generously provided $5,000 a month for KUAC (pronounced "Quack" by its opponents) from his contingency fund. The sum is greater than that received by all other committees of the state legislature combined.

The first KUAC hearings were held this summer in Frankfort and concerned the riot which erupted in Louisville during the spring. Only so-called friendly witnesses testified. The consequence of selective testimony was to blame the riots not on poverty and the racist conditions that produced them but on certain outside agitators and on Carl Braden, the executive director of SCEF. KUAC next met in October, this time to investigate un-American activities in Pikeville. The investigation was formally requested by Robert Holcomb, two students at Pikeville College who thought the college administration had become too liberal, and two residents of Marrowbone Creek, the area of Pike County where anti-poverty workers had concentrated their efforts.

The AVs, SCEF workers, and a group of students from Pikeville College, who called themselves Kentucky Students Serving Kentucky (KSSK), were no longer working on strip mining. The central issue this fall has been a controversial proposed water district grant of $1,800,000 and a $270,000 loan—all from the federal government. Pure water is also a potent issue in Pike County for, according to a local grand jury report, 80 per cent of the wells are polluted. The AVs and the Pike County Citizens Association (PCCA), a group of poor people, contend that poor people cannot afford the $25-per-household fee required to hook into the proposed water system. They have suggested a rate schedule based on income in which those below the $3,000-a-year poverty line would not have to pay. The AVs and PCCA organized poor people to support their proposal. The result was that only sixteen of the required 700 signatures were obtained for the petition indicating that those signing were prepared to pay the fee for water service.

Pikeville Chamber of Commerce President Holcomb, proud of Pikeville's designation last year as an "All-American City," said KUAC's hearings prove that the AVs were trying to "sabotage" the water district money. He went on to say that the director of the Pike County AVs, Tom Ramsey, "wanted to control the money we would get from the government." Ramsey has a different view. He contends that the water district is not designed to benefit the poor—who suffer most from the polluted well water. "The basic underlying motive of the whole business" is to "turn Pike County into a tourist center"—which will hardly benefit those people isolated in the hollows.

Although no AVs testified at the Pikeville hearings on this matter, KUAC issued an interim report on November 29 on the evidence it had heard. It recommended in the strongest possible language that the Governor see to it that the AVs be permanently discontinued. It said that the AVs had been excessively funded and a "tremendous detriment to the deserving people of this region." The report concluded that the AVs "work apparently to create strife, rather than . . . to better conditions in the area itself." When questioned by a reporter, during the news conference announcing the report, as to whether or not KUAC discovered any un-American activities in Pike County, Chairman Scott Miller (R., Louisville) hedgingly concluded that "working against the health of the people was un-American." He said the question of communism will await future hearings.

The second series of hearings in Pikeville were held on December 3 and 4. One AV staff member, Mrs. Easterling, did testify this time. In a moment of tension and silence she opened her remarks to the committee with an apology. Bystanders in the packed courthouse room moved to the edge of their seats in anticipation of her exposing communism among the AVs. In strong and unequivocal language she apologized to the people of Pike County for having helped elect that "dirty courthouse bunch" headed by Ratliff.

Tension was further stirred when she complained to KUAC that her life had been threatened because of her work with the AVs. When one of the committee members asked what threats she had received, she replied that she had received threatening telephone calls and that windows of her home had been shot out. "I don't call that threats," scoffed Charles Upton, the KUAC member. Louisville's Courier Journal aptly replied in an editorial the next day that had Upton been in her position he would not likely confuse such gestures "with a visit from the Welcome Wagon." Approval by the Governor is needed for the AVs to continue to receive OEO funds. That decision must be made before the first of the year.

Redbaiting, riot-baiting, charges of sedition, the collusion of local, state and federal officials, TVA's support of strip mining—this is no war on poverty. In eastern Kentucky, it is a war on poverty workers, especially those who see poverty as basically a political matter. In the early morning of December 13, a bomb was thrown at the McCure house from a passing car; no one was hurt. The following Monday they made a formal request for investigation by the U.S. District Attorney, but Alan McCure says: "Nothing will come of it because the people who run this country don't give a damn about the poor people." The local power structure and the anti-poverty workers could hardly be further apart. Mrs. Easterling emphasized that "some of the people up in the mountains are so scared of the courthouse gang in Pikeville that they haven't been out of their hollows to go to town for twenty years. Most of them are disabled miners with the black lung and are afraid someone will take their checks." Holcomb views the overall picture quite differently: "There really aren't any big conflicts in Pike County. If you measure the people's actual physical needs, there isn't much poverty either."

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Bellow's Stories: Dehydrated Novels

MOSBY'S MEMOIRS and Other Stories.
By Saul Bellow. The Viking Press. 160 pp. $5.

D. J. ENRIGHT

Mr. Enright is a writer and critic who teaches English at the University of Singapore. He is the author, most recently, of a book of poems, Unlawful Assembly (Wesleyan University Press).

These six stories all have to do with man's obstinacy, his will to survive, to carry on, whether in conditions of poverty, sickness, indignity or sheer ludicrousness. The implied thesis is an admirable one—I think an occasional appearance of cloddishness is a small price to pay for Saul Bellow's stance in the face of literary arrogance, defeatism and Wastelanditis—but here it shows a little too plainly and at times it enervates or even defeats itself. Thus poor Hattie, old and battered, at the end of "Leaving the Yellow House," thought that there was a beginning, and a middle. She shrank from the last term. She began once more—a beginning. After that, there was the early middle, then middle middle, late middle middle, quite late middle. In fact the middle is all I know. The rest is just a rumor.

By this time Harriet is drunk, so she needs the house she was about to bequeath, so she puts off the writing of her will until tomorrow. One sees what Mr. Bellow is after: a bedraggled, sleazy, irritable and irritating sort of courage, partly Dutch, with nothing fancy about it. But he has documented Hattie's miseries so fully that her courage, obstinacy or whatever it is, just seems rather unfortunate, misplaced, worse than useless. If you saw an animal suffering like this, you would cast around for something to kill it with, and we would really like Mr. Bellow to let Hattie quietly shuffle off during her drunken stupor, not to preserve her, cruelly, for another awful day tomorrow.

Something similar goes amiss, I think, in the title story, a clever account of a successful man seeking some humorous material with which to lighten his high-level memoirs, the record of his "mental wars," and recalling an utterly unsuccessful man called (with irony, and double irony) Hyman Lustgarten. Lustgarten is the kind of person who borrows his family's savings to invest in a Cadillac, ships it to France in 1947 in the expectation of making a killing, finds that the French have slapped on a heavy import tax the very day the car arrives, is consequently unable to pay his hotel bill and must sleep in the Cadillac, and then, just as he has located a wealthy buyer for it, drives the car down a mountainside and destroys it. The intention is clear: Mosby is "a voice which for many years had informed people of their errors," while Lustgarten is one of those people who are continually engaged in the performance of errors. Mosby, "a fanatic about ideas," is essentially sterile, has come to a dead halt; Lustgarten is alive, he suffers, he "moves on." But while Mr. Bellow has succeeded in making Mosby and his "mandarin irony" distasteful enough, he has failed to make Lustgarten much more than merely ludicrous, and so the parable we have come to expect doesn't realize itself.

"Oh, these Jews—these Jews! Their feelings, their hearts!" In "The Old System," the "crude circus of feelings" arising out of mankind's realization that it is human because it feels, is measured against the cold eye cast on life, on death, and is judged to be not too unsatisfactory in the final count. "The living can only will to live," says a rabbi, who adds, "I am speaking of Jews. They wanted to annihilate us. To give our consent would have been to turn from God." Mr. Bellow finds the will to live most conveniently and most potently (though at times a shade pawkily) illustrated in Jewish contexts. But it is possible to have too much will, too much "character," too much Jewishness (oh dear—to cite the narrator of this story—what a fertility of Jewish metaphor, what specialization in the chemistry of heredity!), and so to end with what approaches a parody of Jewishness. "The Old System" reads like a potted guide to another Augie March.

"Looking for Mr. Green," the mild adventures of a distributor of relief checks, is a white man's tour of a "blighted" Negro section of Chicago.

In some places the beds were even used in shifts, watchmen or jitney drivers or short-order cooks in night joints turning out after a day's sleep and surrendering their beds to a sister, a nephew, or perhaps a stranger, just off the bus. . . .

This is well-written sociology, pointed up by Mr. Bellow's characteristic style of thinking. The man from the relief office undergoes some moderately ridiculous experiences in his determination to find the elusive Mr. Green, and finally hands over the check to a naked, drunken woman who maybe is and maybe isn't Mrs. Green. The important thing, the thing that matters, is "that there was a real Mr. Green whom they could not keep him from reaching. . . ."

The theme is much the same in "The Gonzaga Manuscripts": men need a purpose, a belief, a quest, something which will evoke and employ their tenacity. Since one is going to live anyway, it is as well to have a reason for living. "Does it really matter?" was always the test question." And Clarence Feiler has found what matters to him: the poetry of Manuel Gonzaga and in particular the Manning love poems. Incidentally, "I'm not much on modern poetry in English," says Clarence:

Some of it is very fine, of course, but it doesn't express much wish to live. To live as a creature, that is. As if it were not good enough. But the first time I opened Gonzaga . . . I felt right away and in spite of this ironical turn that I was in touch with a poet who could show me how to go on, and what attitude to take toward life.

Spain defeats Clarence. After a lot of trouble and some petty humiliations he is offered mining shares instead of the poems, which appear to have been buried along with the countless to whom they were addressed. But still, Clarence is capable of turning up in the near future with an exhumation order, we feel, or a hired gang of resurrection men. For Gonzaga continues to matter.

Despite all the courageousness and pertinacity in evidence, there is a curious heaviness about these stories. Possibly this effect has its origin in technique: the stories have a density, a thickness, a detailedness about them which gives them the feel of concentrated novels, essence of novel, rather than of longish short stories. More accurately, they strike me as instant novels awaiting the addition of a large dose of action and incident. The density of documentation, whether of the travel-book variety as in "The Gonzaga Manuscripts" or of Jewish family life as in "The Old System," together with the close depiction of character or "character," and so much reflection and description—all this, in the absence of much activity, produces a wholly unintended effect of spiritual torpor. A coarser word for it would be "constipation": these stories need more exercise, the characters or narrators need to get out and about, one feels, or at the very least the windows should be flung wide open.

The complaint is a left-handed one, for it suggests that, even so, what we have here is great riches clattering up a little room. Intelligence, shrewdness, sensitivity, humor, and wisdom as well as book learning. That these stories try to say more than is effectively possible within their limits says something for Saul Bellow. Where many novels are truly short stories diluted and inflated, his short stories are truly dehydrated novels.

control the main levers of this advanced technology they will also be decisive in the economy as a whole. He projects the possible future rather dramatically, one might even say melodramatically.

With our growth rate, our investment priorities and the distribution of our national income determined by the United States, it is not even necessary to imagine secret meetings between Wall Street bankers and European cabinet ministers to understand that the areas that really count would lie outside the democratic process.

Europe must, therefore, elect one of three possible strategies: (1) Let things ride and become a full-fledged annex of the United States economy. (2) Try to play a complementary role, by specializing in industries where the several European nations still have a relative advantage and forgoing independence in the new industries. Such a path will reduce Europe to the status of a satellite. (3) Concentrate on the achievement of competence in advanced technology and thus become competitive with the United States. Servan-Schreiber, of course, advocates the third course and the main thrust of his book is an analysis and advocacy of what is involved in such a new departure.

The author argues that only by pooling the resources of the West European nations and thus mobilizing money, manpower, and education, will equality be achieved, if not superiority, in such crucial areas of modern science and technology as space, atomic energy and supersonic aviation. The soldiers in the battle should be the fifty to 100 largest industrial firms that are best able to strike back at United States competition. These firms have to be able to unite and grow so that they can have the financial and organizational means to meet United States giants on equal terms in the market place. A common market is not enough. There must be no boundary restrictions on the freedom to merge and consolidate production, marketing, and research on a continental rather than national basis. Moreover, if there is to be significant progress in the field of modern science, the European giants will have to obtain a great deal of government support in the form of direct government contracts, subsidies for research programs, and an educational system that will furnish an adequate supply of scientists and engineers. Thus, Big Business needs Big Government. It follows that the political precondition for independence is a federation of European nations that will give first priority to a unified scientific and industrial policy and an integration of government, university and big business.

Unity among nations by itself won't

One-Dimensional Analysis

THE AMERICAN CHALLENGE. By J.-J. Servan-Schreiber. With a Foreword by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. Translated by Ronald Steel. Atheneum Publishers. 291 pp. $6.95.

HARRY MAGDOFF

Mr. Magdoff is a lecturer in economics at the New School for Social Research. He is the author of The Age of Imperialism, to be published in the spring by Monthly Review Press.

Servan-Schreiber, publisher-editor of the influential French weekly news magazine L'Express, achieved a deserved measure of international fame for his bold and active opposition to the French colonial war in Algeria. These days he is using his fluent pen to campaign against a different colonial issue: the potential evolution of Western Europe into a satellite of the United States economy due to the extensive penetration by large United States corporations in Western European business affairs.

Combining elements of creed, political-economic analysis, and a call to action, The American Challenge is in effect a manifesto designed to mobilize public opinion in support of a political federation of Western Europe (including, of course, Great Britain): a United States of Europe, one which will maintain national and cultural differences but will nevertheless have enough unity and central direction to enable it to compete with the United States.

While the extent of U. S. control may seem relatively small—almost 10 per cent of the total capitalization of all European corporations (except for Belgium)—the gross figure taken by itself is deceptive. What is significant, according to Servan-Schreiber, is (a) the continuing rate of growth which suggests that the United States share will become increasingly larger, and (b) the fact that United States investments are concentrated in the most technologically advanced industries and those with the highest growth rates. Thus, by 1963, American firms in France "controlled 40 per cent of the petroleum market, 65 per cent of telecommunications equipment, and 45 per cent of synthetic rubber, among others."

Differences between the degree of concentration in the "newer" and "older" technologies are well illustrated in the strategic electronics industries. In the production of electronic consumer goods—such as radio, TV, and recording devices, only 15 per cent of European production is accounted for by United States firms. In the field of semi-conductors (devices which replace the older electronic tubes), the United States share jumps to 50 per cent. However, at the farthest reaches of the new technology, the control by United States corporations is indeed overwhelming: 80 per cent of the computers and 95 per cent of the integrated circuits (computer components) manufactured in Europe.

What seems to irritate most is that the invasion represents not so much a transfer of United States capital, but what appears to be a seizure of power. United States firms are using capital not only to create new undertakings but to buy up existing European enterprises. More than that, a good part of the money used for this investment comes from the European continent itself: either loans from Europeans, reinvestment of profits from United States plants in Europe, or subsidies from European governments. In other words, in addition to capital flowing from the United States, there are financial means and mechanisms overseas which United States firms can tap to finance further expansion and to become an ever larger force in European business affairs.

The major role of United States firms in the new technology along with the relative ease with which these firms can mobilize financial resources for use of this technology define the implicit threat to the future independence of European nations. As Servan-Schreiber sees it, the new technology will strongly influence, if not determine, the structure and operations of highly industrialized nations in the not too distant future. Hence, if foreign business interests can

Two Poems by David Ray

AN UNKNOWN WILDERNESS

This keeps night here,
and throws an unknown wilderness about me.

Beaumont & Fletcher

Time we are not together is not time, it is the soup of wildwood, it is the memory of pogroms, it is eyes to the ground looking for bread in the dust
it is looking to the skies for terror, finding the past there it is not being mothered, finding no hand in the night

II.
Simply a man and a woman going over the hill together
And I always know whether this bus is going away from you or briefly around the curve of sea toward you. This bus and I will not become an animal nosing burrowing toward you through mountains, over the sea
So I am an old man shivering sitting in a bus seat weeping because I see a man and a woman going over the hill together into their poverty, into their blessings

III.
The pale morning light has a way of breaking itself up into stars
Through the planks of the roof
it did this, all alone though I was without you and couldn't make anything happen. They left me there the skies and the cliffs of the world left me standing there bemused talking to myself, wondering where they had gone and ahead of me there was nothing but an edge a half-blossoming

IV.

Tables I looked at because they could have been our Tables. O thou freshly gathered
Then fallen
In the dark, in a strange city
I go on talking to you out loud, out loud

V.

Once you were like an archaic statue
And I found past time upon you
I was the child playing at the base, the robe
Of you, and you held me idly
And above me the slits of your eyes
Fascinated me, they were caves
Of an endless darkness
Your mind-wandered, I let it go
Encouraged it, then you came back
Broke into a smile
Came out of the white land
Of speechlessness, and adored me

VI.

I'll be like the sea behind you happiness thrown away like a coin the face becoming like anyone else's your belly on a temple fading away

VII.

Now what shall we do with these moments
They are left over from our nights
And they lie upon our skins too heavily.
Feel them though! Something has already Been done to them. They are small round circles
Of light that disappear
The pond itself disappears now
The light has lifted off a pair of brown eyes
The night has gone and left excruciating stars
Those moments are gone like coins in the hand
Those moments are simply my mouth
Disappearing off your breast

SCULPTURE

People can remove themselves like paintings
Or join one another as sculpture.
We are part of the same statue, together.
I can feel the basalt nature of our skin.
We have been chipped at together,
Made to cling, as one,
Bound ourselves inward, against the weather.
You were the first to look upon me
Without cynicism in your eyes.

And then you joined me in this stone.
Now we can go back to childhood,
Now I know you would rather sink
Into the ground with me than be free.
Nothing can wrench you away now,
As we crouch here upon the earth,
Our moments come home to us.
Don't be surprised that they are still Cold from their old loneliness.

work, according to Servan-Schreiber's prescription. There must also be social unity among the classes within the federation. Obviously, if first priority will be given to government-supported big business and big science, a large part of the social product will have to be husbanded for these purposes. In addition, such a policy necessarily entails protection of the profits of big business, as well as the opportunity for even larger profits. Otherwise, why should business make the effort? Since undue pressure from the working classes for a greater share of the surplus will rock the boat, labor and the Left need to be in line for the success of the program.

The quid pro quo for labor cooperation is the inclusion of social justice on the planning agenda of the proposed supranational regime. On top of this, labor and the Left are offered the carrot of faster economic growth which is expected to result from the mutual stimulation of big government, big business, and big science. A faster growth rate, in turn, means that before long there will be a bigger pie to divide; each slice of the future pie can therefore be bigger.

What is proposed in essence is a corporate state—one that is programmed to generate enough strength for European economic war with the United States. The cohesive social force for this supranation is to be democracy and high liberal ideals. But persuasive as Servan-Schreiber is in advocating progressive social and political principles, he is equally insistent on a conflicting economic strategy which will create greater concentration of power in the hands of selected vested interest groups.

This contradiction underscores the superficiality of much of Servan-Schreiber's analysis. While the struggle for economic power is the main subject of the book, associated issues that involve power struggles are swept under the rug. Thus, the national and imperial rivalries which in the past led to World Wars are expected to dissolve in an aura of realism, sweet reason, and the ballot box. This ignores the dilemma that the proposed development program means not only a concentration of economic power in the hands of a limited number of industrial and financial firms but also a concentration of power in selected European regions and key capital and money market centers. If the aim is to amass greater competitive strength in a hurry then the most efficient way is to favor those industrial and financial centers that already have a leg up. With efficiency and speedy growth the goal, the more backward regions will serve best by remaining backward and concentrating on their role as feeders of supplies, food, and manpower to the more advanced regions. A federation based on such a program will more than likely create new sources of tension and struggle.

Another aspect of this faith in the superiority of reason over the realities of power conflict is the optimism that eventually, when Western Europe is big enough and strong enough, the democratic process will smoothly shift gears and give more attention to social progress. Such an idealized conception of a neatly balanced social compromise overlooks not only the sort of tensions which last spring induced a 10-million-man strike in France but also the counter pressures of United States business as competition for world markets stiffens. At what point then will Europe be able to take a breather and indulge in the promised higher morality, if the economic war accelerates?

This tendency to disregard the hard reality of power conflict in prescribing for Europe's future is reflected in Servan-Schreiber's diagnosis as well. For in searching out the roots of United States advantage, he isolates the symptoms of strength from the more basic operating levers of United States growth. For example, he sees managerial structure and organizational technique as major causal factors in the growth of the corporation. It is of course true that important and valuable strides have been made in business management in this country. It is equally obvious that superior organizational technique is an important ingredient of today's successful multi-national giant. However, study of the modern transformations of managerial structures, such as that by Alfred D. Chandler, Jr., in his Strategy and Structure, indicates that the flexible and efficient administration of the giant firms are not the cause but the result of historic changes in competitive corporate strategy and allocation of resources.

Not only is management technique isolated as an independent factor of growth but government support of industrial research is isolated from the military power drive of the United States. Servan-Schreiber recognizes the paramount influence of government-sponsored research on corporate strategy, but he does not face up to the fact that this is part and parcel of the United States role as a dominant world military power. The fact that almost 55 per cent of the funds spent in 1965 on research and development by United States industry was financed by the federal government can be explained only in terms of the priority given to our military policies; the civilian applications are extra dividends. In addition, a significant part of the research financed by industry itself is also related to the advance of military technology: such research is undertaken to pave the way for new government contracts which recognize research and development as legitimate costs to be included in the price of the final products sold to the government.

The military underpinning of United States industry goes a good deal beyond the sponsoring of research. To examine the key capital goods industries is to find that military demand is a major component of their profits and stability. Indeed, the Department of Commerce input-output tables for 1958 (long before the influence of the Vietnamese War) show that federal purchases account directly and indirectly for from 15 to 40 per cent of the output of eighteen important manufacturing industries. It is short-sighted to isolate this source of economic strength, as well as the lift given to United States corporate growth by its overseas investment, from the Pax Americana of the post-World War II world. But this is precisely what Servan-Schreiber attempts to do. And in doing this, he reaches a one-dimensional analysis which touches on some important problems but in the main deals more with appearances than with the underlying reality.

Walter Benjamin: A Special Case

ILLUMINATIONS: Essays and Reflections. By Walter Benjamin. Edited with an Introduction by Hannah Arendt. Translated by Harry Zohn. Harcourt, Brace & World. 280 pp. $5.95.

GEORGE STADE

Mr. Stade teaches English at Columbia University.

"The goal I set for myself," wrote Walter Benjamin (1892-1940), "is to be regarded as the foremost critic of German literature." Yet he participated in the conspiracy of neglect that assured him he would only attain his goal posthumously. What Walter Benjamin wrote about Franz Kafka he might have confessed of himself: "once he was certain of eventual failure, everything worked for him en route as in a dream. There is nothing more memorable than the fervor with which Kafka emphasized his failure." The circumstances surrounding Benjamin's suicide on the Spanish-French border, while he was engaged in an attempt to avoid deportation to Germany, seem enveloped in that eerie malice which in Kafka's fiction a secret volition projects onto events.

Kafka's initial failure was a function of his posthumous success, as was Benjamin's. "One of the foremost tasks of art has always been the creation of a demand which could be fully satisfied only later," said Benjamin, and the remark holds as well for his criticism as for Kafka's fiction. He helped create a demand for a kind of criticism that is now being attempted by structuralists, McLuhanites, phenomenologists, existentialists, anti-Communist para-Marxists, Marxists, Zionists, rabbis of Pop, and various diagnosticians of fashion and scrutinizers of trends—representatives of all which groups, in Germany, France and England, are at present claiming that he was what they are.

It's hard to blame them; Benjamin is not only very good, he is a legitimate ancestor of much that for the moment is most alive in criticism. But he accomplished all he did by refusing to be anything that pre-existed him. "To create a place in criticism for oneself means to re-create it as a genre." Similarly, "all great works of literature found a genre or dissolve one—they are in other words, special cases." It is true that his interest in Marxism, Zionism, German humanist criticism, academic Sprachphilosophie refined his analytic technique and lent urgency to his already acute historical sense; true, he had a number of compelling personal needs that he could have satisfied by joining the various cliques that kept watch over the ideological purity of these disciplines; true, further, these cliques could have presented him to an audience, assured him of an income, guaranteed him at least a small success; but he would not join: he had a terror of being used; he insisted on creating his own genre, on being a special case. He took what he needed where he could find it and made it his own.

In Zionism and through his friendship with Gershom Scholem, author of Major Trends of Jewish Mysticism, Benjamin found another version of the millennialism that had attracted him to Marxism, and found confirmation for a certain kind of hermeneutic bias: "I have never been able to inquire and think otherwise than, if I may so put it, in a theological sense—namely, in conformity with the Talmudic prescription regarding the forty-nine levels of meaning in every passage of the Torah."

From Marxism, from his friendships with Brecht, Max Horkheimer and Theodor Adorno, he learned to think of the relations between the cultural superstructure and the economic sub-structure as texts in which he would read his forty-nine levels of meaning. "A historic materialist approaches a historical subject only where he encounters it as a monad." Benjamin approached his monads as realms of total correspondence, realms in which any item isolated for attention was defined precisely by its relations to all the other items. The gait of the flâneur, the unseeing eyes in Baudelaire, the invention of photography, the emergence of the urban mass, the decline of storytelling, the onset of "the inhospitable, blinding age of big-scale industrialism" mean what they mean, are what they are, precisely because of the positions they assume within the conceptual forms their attractions and repulsions shape in the mind of a Kulturkritik. "Where thinking suddenly stops in a configuration pregnant with tensions, it gives that configuration a shock, by which it crystallizes into a monad."

Humanist criticism lent poignancy to Benjamin's awareness of the "tremendous shattering of tradition" that defines the modern age, and it gave him a long perspective on "the cluster of symptoms called 'civilization.'" Sprachphilosophie intensified his sense of words as the main repository of human experience and as both the major symptoms of civilizations and the sole expositor of their hidden causes. The "representation of hidden significance through an embryonic attempt at making it visible is of so singular a nature that it is rarely met with in the sphere of non-linguistic life."

The unifying theme of Illuminations—ten essays on book collecting, on translating, on storytelling, on Kafka, Brecht, Baudelaire, Proust, on art in an age of mechanical reproduction, on the philosophy of history— the vicissitudes of those symptoms that Benjamin calls the "aura" or the "afterlife" of works of art. He designates as aura "the associations which, at home in the mémoire involontaire, tend to cluster around the object of a perception." The equivalent in the case of a utilitarian object is "the experience which has left traces of the practised hand." These traces are symptoms of something both individual and cultural, for "where there is experience in the strict sense of the word, certain contents of the individual past combine with material of the collective past." The aura of a work of art is its authenticity, its "testimony to the history it has experienced." And when we locate aura we see where we stand: "To perceive the aura of an object we look for a means to invest it with the ability to look at us in return."

The "contemporary decay of the aura," of the historical personality of objects, a decay related to the "liquidation of the traditional value of the cultural heritage" and brought about largely by the "pervasion of reality by the apparatus," has meant that "experience has fallen in value," that wisdom ("truth in its haggadic consistency") has become incommunicable; has led to "a crisis in perception itself," a change in the very structure of memory, and has revealed "the true surrealist face of existence." Stripping objects of their aura reveals them spread out in mental space shining with hallucinatory clarity, but merely juxtaposed, rather than arranged in the medium of their traditional contexts.

None of this reads in Benjamin like the familiar laments over traditions, communities, crafts and values blasted away forever by the eruption of modernism. No man was ever less of a hand-wringer. Much of the unsettling quality of his prose comes from the austere reserve, the icy withholding of attitude, that characterizes it. And he was able to regard with a suppressed and ironic glee the literally "shocking," the "destructive, cathartic" effect of the new art. For all cultural treasures carry with them an origin that he "cannot contemplate without horror. They owe their existence not only to the great minds and talents who have created them, but also to the anonymous toil of their contemporaries. There is no document of civilization which is not at the same time a document of barbarism." Benjamin,

"DAZZLING! Once you see it, you'll never again picture 'Romeo & Juliet' quite the way you did before!" —LIFE

PARAMOUNT PICTURES presents
a new color picture
FRANCO ZEFFIRELLI
Production of
ROMEO & JULIET
No ordinary love story...

 TECHNICOLOR® A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

5th Avenue & 58th Street - MU 8-2013

like the new art, stripped the aura from cultural treasures to redeem them.

Benjamin's prose is the perfect medium for this message. It became increasingly an arrangement of quotations. The power of these is "not the strength to preserve but to cleanse, to tear out of context, to destroy." Quotations in his work, he wrote, "are like robbers by the roadside who make an armed attack and relieve an idler of his convictions." His ambition was to write a work consisting entirely of quotations. These word fragments, these artifacts shorn of their auras and bereft of commentary, would be like currents in a force field of signification generated by their mere juxtaposition.

He never got that far, but achieved something like it by so placing his dense and oblique sentences that their meanings are only released by the silence that surrounds them: instead of a transition or a connective, one gets an interval, a rest, into which the preceding sentence flows as a delayed reaction and out of which the succeeding sentence gestures to a new movement of thought, a new dimension of relevance. These sentences, that is, are on all levels and at every angle to one another; the reader must concatenate them as he can. "Interruption," said Benjamin, "is one of the fundamental devices of all structuring," and, we might add, the phenomenological basis of the reality he was trying to make visible in words.

Illuminations is brilliantly introduced, faithfully translated, and tastefully produced, but someone is much to blame for having given us so skimpy a selection.

door slammed into the deepest hollows of the sea. Beside me a heavy wire stay unexpectedly quivered like a cello-string for a moment, then stopped. . . . Now standing up unsteadily from the sea was the famous Mushroom. . . . The only similes that came to my mind were banal: a sundae, red ink in a pot of distemper. From behind me I heard a frenetic ticking of typewriters; very soon I found I was fumbling with my own. The reportage had begun. Many of us will never live it down.

From the first, Cameron's life and work has made a mockery of the mythic credo: the "detached" journalist. Following the Bikini scenario, he participated in the Campaign For Nuclear Disarmament and the Aldermaston March. . . . this annual ritual naturally attracted the derision of the Press." Of course. How could—a serio comic case in point—Malcolm Muggeridge, charming master of irrelevancies, understand a man like Cameron? No more than the court fool could interpret the haunted spirit of the saga man. (In What A Way To Run The Tribe, there is a delightful, though devastating reply to poor Muggeridge. As usual, Cameron tried to be gentle. That "sense of mortal community" again.)

There was a fine irony in his being on the scene in Chicago during Convention Week. Here, it would seem, the ghost of "objective" journalism was once and forever laid. Cameron needed no billy club on his gray head to tell him this; though a good whiff of Lincoln Park tear gas did add an acrid note to his London dispatches.

Inevitably, his personal concern—can't the man mind his own business and tend to his trade?—has led to troubles, though he has never quite seen it that way. Take that 1945 brouhaha, for instance. Lord Beaverbrook's Evening Standard carried a scurrilous headline concerning John Strachey, Labour's newly appointed War Minister. Cameron was, at the time, the highest paid correspondent of The Beaver's other paper, Daily Express. Doing what comes naturally, he resigned, though he had never met Strachey. It was a cause célèbre along Fleet Street. Not to Cameron. It was simply a matter of standards.

Again it happened, while he was roving Korea for Picture Post, during that wretched war. In a startling coup, at least for the Western world, he revealed that noble little patriot, Syngman Rhee, to be an ignoble little brute. Firings and resignations followed. To the credit of British journalism, jobs found Cameron.

A remarkable chapter in the autobiography deals with his visit to Lambaréne, while another myth was still extant. In the rain forest, he discovered Dr.

Detachment De-Mythified

POINT OF DEPARTURE: An Attempt at Autobiography. By James Cameron. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 318 pp. $5.95.

WHAT A WAY TO RUN THE TRIBE. By James Cameron. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 347 pp. $6.95.

STUDS TERKEL

Mr. Terkel is the author of Division Street . . . America (Pantheon).

I cannot remember when these curious moments of suspense first began, when I would find myself unanchored and adrift in the dark, groping for clues as to where I was. These moments came, and still come, at the exact transition between sleep and awakening, lying on the edge of uncertainty: what is this bed, where is this room, what lies beyond it—Egypt, England, Berlin, Jerusalem, Moscow, Minneapolis, Peking; there have been so many places, and any of them could be the background of this vacuum.

From the beginning you are caught and held fast by this astonishing autobiography. In Point Of Departure, James Cameron truly reveals himself; as, indeed, he has done in all his remarkable dispatches.

What A Way To Run The Tribe is a collection of seventy such pieces. Whether it's the Six Day War, the Algerian Conflict, the volcanic boilings of Latin America; life in Verwoerd's South Africa, Franco's Spain, Ho's Hanoi; the guts of American hacks or the atonality of Downing Street's sweet singers; the death of Gandhi or the psyche of Nehru, whom Cameron, of all Western chroniclers, knew best—if it's passion-cum-insight you're looking for, Cameron's your man. Like Kilroy, he's been there and left indelible marks on these walls.

James Cameron is one of our best living journalists, and one of the most self-deprecatory. Nor is it a sense of unseemly modesty that causes him such self-doubts. Rather it's a vision he has followed from his first days as a young newsman in the industrial bleakness of Dundee: the fragile possibility as against the brutal fact. From the late twenties on—in the depressed Scottish town and in more exotic places—Cameron has known where he stood; and how so often the ground beneath proved treacherous. Even now, he pursues the ideal: "a sense of mortal community."

With an elegance of style, he has recorded on the run, in the rain, or at some weekend refuge, his feelings as well as his observations. The double sense of his writings is evoked, while watching the A-bomb tests at Bikini:

It was not a bang, it was a rumble, not overloud, but it thudded into all the corners of the morning like a great

KNOWING

"Mon moi, Ils m'arrachent mon moi"

—Michelet

*I will be lonely at half past dead
Weep none one or many beside my bed.
At the dead center of all alone
I must unwillingly work at dying
I will be crying crying crying
Not I not I this flesh these bones*

ISABELLA GARDNER

Schweitzer to be somewhat less than saintly. . . . "the Hospital existed for him rather than he for it. It was deliberately archaic and primitive, deliberately part of the jungle around it, a background of his own creation which clearly meant a great deal more philosophically than it did medically." Bach, it seemed, was one thing; the blacks, another. Yet, it is the journalist's "Reverence For Life" that makes this sequence a deeply moving, perhaps because it is nonworshipful, study of Albert Schweitzer.

And Churchill. Some fifteen years after Cameron's tempestuous goodbye, he was invited by Beaverbrook to his Cap d'Ail home. The publisher had a project in mind. Cameron was his man; at least, so he thought. As divertissement, there was dinner for four: the host, the journalist, a senile Winston Churchill and a rugged Aristotle Onassis. Cameron, caught willy-nilly in this rare circle, observed.

What Cameron captured becomes a vivid study of the passing of power that is, at once, Lear in its tragic overtones and hilarious in fact. While Churchill snored, the two infinitely lesser, semiliterate men, talked the arcane language of big money. Theirs was the power, if not the glory. As for Churchill:

After dinner somebody put a cigar in his mouth and lit it; it seemed a ritual gesture without dignity; the completion of an effigy. Already I had begun to find this a profoundly melancholy occasion. My own admiration for the old gentleman's vigorous and abrasive qualities had always been qualified by opposition to almost every one of his public attitudes; nevertheless . . . it was sad to see him, for the first and last time, diminished into a totem, part of the social image of a rich Greek patron.

So it has been, and fortunately still is, with Cameron: the heart of the innocent, the eye of the experienced and the style of a master. It's been said he has changed the whole character of English reportage by giving it an amazing model that transcends journalism. It is to be hoped that these two books may help do the same for ours.

himself and others miserable, largely because of an honesty which masquerades as bad manners.

Turner embarks upon a search which is as much for himself as it is for the missing diplomat: a search which, largely because of the happy conjunction of Mr. Le Carré's talents and the literary possibilities of the subject of Bonn, constantly slips from the objective world into a bureaucratic phantasmagoria in which all ordinary distinctions—day and night, right and wrong, love and hate, abstract and concrete, history as written record and as personal experience, past, present, and future, are alternately effaced and reversed. As for the private search, it appears to be not entirely unsuccessful.

What is most remarkable about Mr. Le Carré's book is that it isn't dull, or pretentious, or hopelessly clichéd. For all the elements of a bad book are present: a cast of upper class types from the old-fashioned English novel of manners whose problems are as drearily familiar as they are superficial, a collection of secondary characters from the lower classes who are much less successfully drawn, and a great deal of speculation and preaching about history and private morality, none of it terribly profound.

Two things save the book. Mr. Le Carré has always been a competent craftsman; but nothing in his earlier works can match the beauty of many of the descriptive passages in his new

Popular Art Into Good Art

A SMALL TOWN IN GERMANY. By John Le Carré. Coward-McCann. 383 pp. $6.95.

JOHN GLIEDMAN

Mr. Gliedman is a graduate student in psychology at M.I.T. and is at present at work on a spy novel.

So much has been written about the stagnation of the novel, that some extremely interesting developments in science fiction and the spy story have passed somewhat unnoticed. In science fiction the novel of serious social satire has come into its own. Though hardly up to the standards of the classical anti-utopias (1984 and Brave New World)—the handling of character is far too shallow—Robert Sheckley's Immortality, Inc. and (to a lesser extent) Mindswap, are strikingly original commercial satires. And while the second half of Robert Heinlein's Green Hills of Earth decays into superficiality, the first half is an extraordinary Bildungsroman. Nor have "serious" writers left the genre untouched. Two of Kurt Vonnegut's novels are science fiction: Cat's Cradle and The Sirens of Titan. Anthony Burgess has written a first-rate anti-utopia (The Wanting Seed) and an all-time classic in the neo-Joycean meta-McLuhan manner, The Clockwork Orange. And if the eloquent Barth is more at home in the seventeenth century than in the future, he has been there too in Giles Goat-Boy.

The spy novel, a kind of pornography, has been slower to yield serious literature. The most promising innovation of recent years has been the introduction of unhappiness into the world of the secret agent. The best of this kind is John Le Carré's The Spy Who Came in From the Cold. Unfortunately, as Mr. Le Carré's later (The Looking Glass War) demonstrates, something more has been needed to open up the form to serious efforts. Even Anthony Burgess, who has dipped into this honey pot too, has not been able to go beyond Le Carré—producing in Tremor of Intent a souped-up, verbal variation on the theme of dirty spy/dirty life.

But Mr. Le Carré's latest book, A Small Town in Germany, is quite a bit more than a spy story with a clever twist; it is a political novel almost in the grand manner.

The book opens with the discovery by the British embassy in Bonn that one of their diplomats has disappeared, along with enough sensitive material to wreck England's chances of entering the Common Market. London sends an investigator, Alan Turner, to find the man. Turner is one of Mr. Le Carré's specialties—a more interesting Michael Caine, complete with red-brick university education, a volcanic hatred of the "better" class (his wife ran off with one of them) and an immense capacity for making

The Nation BOOK SERVICE

Offers the following at a discount:

- ☐ VIETNAM FOLLY by Sen. Ernest Gruening and Herbert W. Beaser (National Press, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ FRIENDSHIP AND FRATRICIDE by Meyer A. Zelig (Viking, $8.95) $7.15
- ☐ THE GOODBYE LAUD by Jose Yglesias (Pantheon, $4.95) $3.95

Remittance accompanying orders should be made payable to THE NATION, 225 6th Ave., N.Y. 10014

Readers can avail themselves of our regular offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S. at the retail price post-free. When ordering, please give title, author and publisher.

12-30-68

book or the use of aural imagery (the sounds of the Rhine, the Bonn traffic, the figures of speech used by the main characters). Second, and of still greater importance, is his use of the spy story. It lends to the ideas, motives, and hypocrisies of the leading characters a special dramatic interest. Because he tells a first-rate yarn, Mr. Le Carré can deal with a number of serious topics without becoming offensive. (Something similar goes on in Antonioni's Blow Up which, because of the dullness of its subject matter, might be seen as a paradigm of this technique. The viewer's expectation of a murder—which never takes place—rescues one from the boredom of the pointless episodes in the life of a fashion photographer. When the film ends there is the realization that events have been invested with a false significance. But by then it is too late. The film has been enjoyed.)

Mr. Le Carré has long been a master of the essential machinery of the spy and detective novel. He has also shown himself to be a sensitive observer of character and manner, within the limits of his genre. But nothing which has come before quite prepares one for the literary distinction of this effort—the quality of its prose, the complexity of its construction, the cunning of some of its dialogue. But the book's great merit is its originality. If this book endures, one senses that it will not be because it brings up to date an aspect of that chronic dissatisfaction with itself which seems to be a prerogative of the English upper class. Nor even because it tells us what we already know far too well, but rarely encounter in literature: that diplomacy is an especially vicious and cynical sham. But because it represents something of a breakthrough in the use of the spy genre for serious purposes, A Small Town in Germany is that rarest of all things in contemporary fiction—good art which is also popular art.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

Given the average standard of local operatic production, Herbert von Karajan's presentation of Wagner's Das Rheingold is a rather special event, offering a combination of musical and dramatic values only rarely present at the Metropolitan Opera—and, indeed, only partially present in Karajan's Walküre of last season. Seeing the two operas in succession, the viewer (if not the listener) might be forgiven for assuming them the work of two different directors. The Karajan who staged Walküre not only ran aground on such traditional shoals as dinner chez Hunding (none was ever served, although Martti Talvela, a 6 ft. 7 in. mountain of a man, certainly ordered it, and he didn't look like the kind of Hunding to overlook such a wifely oversight) but also ignored Wagner's musically specified lighting effects in Act II in order to build up a showy tableau for the battle scene.

Some aspects of this production, in fact, betrayed an utter lack of professionalism: the tight spotlighting which—given the overall gloom—caused Wotan's arms to vanish whenever he stretched them out in a characteristically Wotanish gesture; Siegmund's apostrophe to the sword, addressed to the brass section of the orchestra, its proper object being behind him and across the stage, some thirty feet away; and the stately pattern of movement imposed on the singers, which upset Wagner's carefully scored entrances and exits. Nor did the settings, vacillating between post-Pretorius semi-abstract and neo-Bayreuth symbolism, suggest that a consistent point of view was being applied. The continual transformations of the second-act set were particularly distracting because so unnecessary. A single set, meeting Wagner's specifications, would have been much simpler than what amounted to four different ones.

With Rheingold, all this changed; it is a straightforward, thoroughly professional staging, not distant in style from early Wieland Wagner, but free of the economically imposed amateurisms of early post-war Bayreuth. Lighting and movement were managed with great skill, and virtually all the special effects (swimming Rhinemaidens, Alberich's transformations, and the meteorological extravaganza culminating in the rainbow bridge) were splendidly realized. Only Erda's emergence, at a great distance, failed to impress (it would have been a total disaster with anything less than the voice of Lili Chookasian), and it was prepared by a singularly inept bit of blocking.

As already intimated, the musical characteristics of the two productions had a good deal in common (they will be broadcast on February 22 and March 1, and Karajan has recorded both operas, with the Berlin Philharmonic and substantially similar casts, for Deutsche Grammophon; see listing below). The first point to note is that Karajan got absolutely first-class playing from the Met orchestra—at least at the initial performances; I was disappointed to note a marked deterioration in this year's Walküre performance, especially among the brass. And the kind of orchestral sonority he is after—lean, smooth, light, relative-

STANFORD STREET POEM: ALBUQUERQUE

When living

even with people you love

boils you dry each day

what music shall calm you Can the sky open that wide to receive your cry

The gag of love

steals your tongue what you know of soil and sea flowering and fall

As other bodies call to you a woman's teeth a man's beard

you approach them cold leaves in your legs leaning on an old moonbeam

the song:

a single crow on the naked bough

snow on the Sandias now creamy fields below Taos

water in hose will freeze nothing to reach for you must dance

with the trees

GENE FRUMIN

ly unaccented—remains consistent in the performances and recordings; it is not only quite different from the traditional Wagner sound but also from the sound he espoused in 1951 at Bayreuth (to judge from the recording of Walküre Act III made at those performances, on Odeon 90280/1). Some passages are played so lightly as to become almost pure texture, devoid of rhythm if not of meter, and throughout there is a tendency to neutralize rhythmic detail.

In Rheingold, this pushed the action forward, and the strikingly cohesive effect that the piece makes in Karajan's reading is primarily a result of the smoothness with which he propels it from beginning to end. Naturally, the extensive musical preparation of the entire ensemble also contributes to the effortless flow of the proceedings. A good deal is lost, however, in terms of textural variety and dynamic contrast: this scaled-down, streamlined Wagner is far less revelatory than Solti's occasionally erratic conception (London OSA-1309) or the extraordinary Furtwängler Rome performance of 1953 (once scheduled for release, this has been circulating privately for years, and should certainly be made commercially available).

The Walküre is a somewhat different story, for here Karajan seems less interested in imposing a consistent forward drive. My impression is that the performance has tightened up a good deal since the recording (which was made in late 1966, prior to any stage performances), but the insistence on a low dynamic framework for the first act remains firm.

Obviously, the conductor does realize that his Rheingold strategy won't work on the vastly more elaborate, more dimensioned fabric of Walküre, but his options are severely limited by the kind of orchestral sound he favors. As a result, some passages emerge impressively—the genuinely soft Winterstürme song, the breathless quiet at the start of the “Annunciation of Death” scene—but most of these are static effects; there is too little of the lively rhythmic articulation and anticipatory accenting that produces a shaped progression of musical phrases and sentences. Most of the motion here arises from lack of friction rather than from internal propulsion.

A splendid counter example is provided by Otto Klemperer's current recording of Der fliegende Holländer. Despite some tiresome sound effects (notably a nasty distortion effect that is supposed to make the Dutch crew sound “spooky”), some characteristically undisciplined orchestral attacks, and the silly pedantry of using Wagner's first version (why not allow a composer his second thoughts, when they are improvements?), this is a fine example of the kind of orchestral presentation that makes the most of Wagner's scoring through a wide variety of articulation and an insistence on the significance of detail. Even when Klemperer's choice of tempo seems initially perverse, it usually justifies itself in practice by the strong musical profile with which nearly every passage is projected and by the firm grasp that is maintained on the overall structure. (Another counter example is Furtwängler's Walküre, available on a bargain label: Seraphim IE-6012.)

I have hardly mentioned the singing in these performances; little of it is memorable, save that of Martti Talvela in the Ring operas. In fact, the vocal high points of the recordings are Karajan's splendid ensembles of Rhinemaidens and Valkyries, rather than any single soloists. In general, the Met casts were slightly superior: Crespín makes a better Sieglinde than a Brünnhilde (in the recording, she is audibly reinforced by resonance at crucial points), and the Met offers Birgit Nilsson as Brünnhilde. Other desirable substitutions were Stewart as the Rheingold Wotan (greatly preferable to the dispiriting spectacle of Fischer-Dieskau tearing out his throat), Milnes as Donner (for the weak Kerns), and Chookasian as Erda (instead of the rhythmically insecure Dominguez). Klemperer's Holländer cast, too, offers little to interest those who think Wagnerian opera is about singing.

At this halfway point in Karajan's Ring, then, I'm not overly optimistic about what is to come, because the problems he has failed to solve in Walküre become ever more acute in the remaining operas. On the other hand, it is an unusual (and pleasurable) experience to confront operatic performances that demand consideration at such a serious and fundamental level; Rheingold is not an easy opera, and the current production is certainly the most distinguished that New York has seen for many years. That it takes a kind of international road show to achieve opera of this musical (as distinct from vocal) standard may tell us something about future patterns of operatic production.

WAGNER: Das Rheingold. Josephine Veasey, Oralia Dominguez, Gerhard Stolze, Donald Grobe, Erwin Wohlfahrt, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Zoltan Kelemen, Robert Kerns, Martti Talvela, Karl Ridderbusch, et al.; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139 226/8, $17.37.

Die Walküre. Régine Crespin, Gundula Janowitz, Josephine Veasey, Jon Vickers, Thomas Stewart, Martti Talvela, et al.; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Herbert von Karajan, cond. Deutsche Grammophon 139 229/33, $28.95.

Der fliegende Holländer. Anja Silja, Annelies Burmeister, Ernst Kozub, Gerhard Stolze, Theo Adam, Martti Talvela; BBC Chorus, New Philharmonia Orchestra, Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel SCL-3730, $17.37.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

How do museum exhibitions get arranged?

For a partial answer, we might consider the background of the present show at the Museum of Modern Art, “The Machine as Seen at the End of the Mechanical Age.” When the Museum was originally planning “The Responsive Eye,” the exhibition of 1965, it was conceived as one of a pair of related shows, the other to be devoted to kinetics and light art. Early in the sixties there had been discussions between the Modern and the Solomon R. Guggenheim Museum to straighten out the problem presented by the fact that both institutions wanted to stage such exhibitions. The first solution was to divide the cake, with the Modern getting what came to be called “Op Art” and the Guggenheim getting kinetics. When Peter Selz left the Modern for Berkeley he put on his own West Coast hardware show, but the Guggenheim did not do anything about its “rights” on the Eastern Seaboard.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION

12-30-68

211 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $16

☐ Two Years, $30

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name

Address

City

State Zip No.

The next move is recorded in the catalogue of the Machine show: in 1965, the Modern invited K. G. Pontus Hultén, director of the Moderna Museet, Stockholm, to do a kinetics show. Instead he proposed the present show, which derives from an entirely different set of ideas than the museum's original plan. Instead of being part of a comprehensive survey of movement in art, optically active paintings that seem to move and sculpture that literally does, it is something else, something very personal to Hultén.

The other piece of background information that may clarify aspects of the Machine show has to do with a little-remarked shift in postwar aesthetics. After World War II a generation of artists born in the 1920s became fascinated with connections between art and, let's call it, the urban-industrial complex. This emergent sensibility, pro-technology-cal but nonconformist, is extensively registered by the Machine show. It may be appropriate to indicate the European character of Hultén's interest in machines by references to England, where I lived.

The postwar revival of interest in Futurism and Dada produced two relevant books, both given, incidentally, in the bibliography of the catalogue. One is Peter Reyner Banham's Theory and Design in the First Machine Age, the title of which parallels Hultén's for his exhibition (both derive, of course, from Norbert Wiener's distinction, 1948, between the first and second Industrial Revolutions). The other book was designed by Richard Hamilton, who figured out how to translate the facsimile, random notes of Marcel Duchamp for The Bride Stripped Bare by her Bachelors. Even into typographical form for the first time. Both books were published in 1960 and represent the outcome of ideas formulated and research done in the previous decade. Hultén's show is strong on Dada and Constructivism and, analogously, pro-tech English art of the fifties was a tangle of pre- or early Pop Art and a Constructivist revival, dominated, but not truly summed up by, Victor Pasmore.

The sympathetic attitude of artists and art historians toward technology, as much a fact in their art interests as in their lives, had a salutary effect on the history of modern art which had become grossly one-sided. Expressionist-oriented writers saw modern art as the seismograph of psychic turmoil, caused by artists recoiling from the cities and the mob. This view was updated, but not really altered, by the sophisticated dramas of existentialist art criticism: Sartre's Giacometti and Tintoretto are up to their eyes in agony and paradox. There was still a strong case being made, in those days, for the unconscious sources of art (Freudian and/or Jungian): symbols that only artists could provide were expected to act as torches and talismans. Romantic criticism also took rustic forms, in which the birds and the bees, not to mention the rocks and the blue horses, silently reproached divisive mankind. Such an expressionist-existentialist-unconscious-romantic-pastoral complex was opposed by the shifted sensibility of the fifties: Pop Art and the accelerated development of kinetic art are proof of its success.

At the Museum, recent art movements are presented in such a way as to bring out latent urban-industrial content. Dada and Russian Constructivism are brilliantly handled with, among other things, a great selection of Picabia's machines and a reconstruction of Vladimir Tatlin's "Monument for the Third International," that much reproduced but destroyed tower of 1920. Hultén contributes to the removal of Constructivism from the idealist aesthetic generated by Gabo and Pevsner and restores it to the political and pro-industrial scene of Tatlin and El Lissitzky. The Futurist section is masterful, also, but completely familiar, unlike the Dada and Constructivist sections. It is clear that the Futurists, who were being revived through the fifties, are back and living safely among us. The polemic edge has gone from the act of reinterpretation and, as a result, most of Hultén's art looks perfectly in place, because the pro-technology sensibility has been generally absorbed. Indeed, we have reached a point at which many artists seem to want nothing better than to have an engineer for Christmas.

In the section of recent art the major figure is Jean Tinguely, long admired and passionately supported by Hultén. The earliest piece, 1953, is a delicate stable, half-way between a Duchamp perspective drawing and a builder's scaffold. The loose-jointed forms relate to contemporaneous work by Eduardo Paolozzi, influenced by Klee, and by the strut systems of early aircraft; in London, at this time, there was talk about the Blériot aesthetic. (Paolozzi, for some reason, has been suppressed by Hultén.) Tinguely's motorized machines, loquacious in form and sound, use brute mechanisms for parody. The humor of his work is part put-down of machines and part the celebration of rough values (like a preference for vin ordinaire). The best works that Hultén has selected from the fifties and sixties are designed to support Tinguely's ebullient, basically expressionist iron works. There are characteristic pieces by Edward Kienholz (Yes, "Back Seat Dodge" is there, if you haven't seen it yet, and with the door open). Robert Rauschenberg's "Oracle" (the five-piece sculpture of found objects wired for sound) and Claes Oldenburg (soft fan and soft auto engine). Hultén has also resurrected a big, banal piece by Richard Stankiewicz.

The exhibition gives a favorable view of the rough and rowdy, tough and funny, Junk Culture of the fifties and its extensions in the sixties. But there are no works by Andy Warhol (mass production, machine images), Billy Al Bengston (cult pictures of his own motor cycle), Tom Wesselman (full-size VW cutouts—and the exhibition makes a thing about cars), or Roy Lichtenstein (simulated mechanical reproduction of mass-distributed images). However, the show, apart from the expertise and good eye of its organizer, is itself a document of a formative moment in mid-20th century taste.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, Algonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

RENTAL—February through August; four bedroom completely furnished house; beautiful neighborhood Flatbush; fireplace; washer-dryer, $325-month. References. Box No. 620, c/o The Nation.

BIRTHCHART/HOROSCOPE computed and drafted for reference and display 9½ x 11. Send $5.00, date, time and place of birth. INPROMA, Box 224, Lake View, N. Y. 14085.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y.C. 10016

KENNEDY '72 bumper sticker—$3 $1.00. Buttons 4-$1.00. Drum, Box 609N, Fairfield, Conn. 06430.

HIGHLY educated, interesting, do-gooder wants to meet female. Write Mr. L., 522 Van Duzer, Staten Island, New York 10301

PARTICIPATE in an intriguing nationwide dating project for alert, literate, Jewish singles. For FREE literature write, giving age, to: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 550 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10036.

AUTOMOBILE BUMPER STICKERS. Low cost, custom-made advertising for Organizations, Special Events, Community Projects. Political Campaigns, Slogans, Business, Tourist Attractions, Amusements. Write for Free Brochure, Price List and Samples. Please state intended use. REFLECTIVE ADVERTISING, Inc. Dept. NA, 873 Longacre, St. Louis, Mo. 63132.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74¢ a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Crossword Puzzle No. 1278

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

- 1 Possibly how to travel more cheaply in the spirit of "here today, gone tomorrow." (3-2-5)
- 6 Many artists are able to do it in sketching. (4)
- 10 In a way, bound to be cleaned out of it. (7)
- 12 Cuts some fancy clothes out of it, possibly. (8)
- 13 What's in common with presidential candidates of 1928 and 1952, as they were known? (5)
- 15 An advantage, like going down at the table? (5)
- 17 Here's a how-de-do! (9)
- 19 Spread out and passed around, it is shown. (9)
- 21 Reputedly a deadly bite? (5)
- 23 Are licensed to hold a memorial? (5)
- 24 An actor of Spain, perhaps, after the leading part? (8)
- 27 A sailor loves trouble when free from the consequences. (7)
- 28 One of the things Ralph Straw could have been, perhaps. (7)
- 29 A call to the cutter? It might be a false alarm! (4)
- 30 A crooner and a bad actor, not back in town yet! (10)

DOWN

- 1 and 11 across Given away, like a shuttlecock? Certainly not fast, though! (4,2,1,4)

- 2 Chrome and cadmium, for example? (7)
- 3 Enterprise, if American? Endeavour, if British? One or the other! (5)
- 4 One might have it yet in mind as compensation for loss. (9)
- 5 Arranged as the race divisions might be. (7)
- 7 Petty four in the experiment? (7)
- 8 A less serious mix-up than 17. (10)
- 9 A record in animals, or records? (8)
- 14 Less hirsute, but with elan? Nonsense! (10)
- 16 Certainly doesn't involve free speech, at least for one party. (4,4)
- 18 A token to the band, but might prove a harassment. (9)
- 20 This isle is a riotous and divided region. (7)
- 22 Free-verse poet, as a self-proclaimed substance? (7)
- 24 One of Respighi's fountains. (5)
- 25 Square Gilbertian Duke—no bull! (5)
- 26 At another time, getting many Bartlett credits? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1277

ACROSS: 1 and 10 Play hard to get; 5 Stable; 11 and 25 Margin for error; 12 Remains; 13 Vinegar; 14 Inners; 15 Stratum; 18 Upswing; 21 Disown; 24 Meeting; 26 Trachea; 27 D'Artagnan; 28 Court; 29 Porter; 30 Very well. DOWN: 1 Peters; 2 Arguments; 3 Hot line; 4 Rameses; 6 Thinner; 7 Befog; 8 Eardrums; 9 Drives; 16 Town house; 17 Summed up; 19 Imitate; 20 Gaging; 21 Detente; 22 Starchy; 23 Pastel.

EDUCATIONAL

GRADUATE STUDIES IN HISTORY
SIR GEORGE WILLIAMS UNIVERSITY
MONTREAL, QUEBEC, CANADA

"The liveliest most subversive university on the continent." Quoted in Time (Canada), November 8, 1968.

The Sir George Williams department of history offers programs leading to the M.A. and Ph.D. degrees. Student programs are keyed to individual needs with a minimum of bureaucratic specifications. Thus, both thesis and course work options are available for the M.A. degree, and the Ph.D. is largely a tutorial program.

Probable graduate seminars for 1969-70, include: Roots of European Imperialism, Comparative European Revolutions, Metropolitanism in Nineteenth Century Canada, Traditionalism and Nationalism in South Asia. The Chinese Revolution, The African in the Americas, Social and Intellectual History of the U.S. in the Nineteenth Century and African Resistance to Colonialism.

Several assistantships at $2,500 will be awarded. Inquiries are invited: Graduate Advisor, Department of History, Sir George Williams University, Montreal 25, Quebec.

PUBLICATIONS

GUATEMALA PERSPECTIVE. 80-page critique of U.S. involvement in Latin America's potential Vietnam. Includes papers on Guatemalan Economic Development and International Politics; The Violent Polarization of Left and Right in Guatemala; Peasant and Worker Organization; map, profile, annotated bibliography. Send $2.00 with order to N.Y. COMMITTEE OF RETURNED VOLUNTEERS, 45 Irving Place, New York, N.Y. 10003.

APPLE's first two issues contain poems by Ammons, Enslin, Levortov, Tagliabue, Wade and others known and unknown. Sample copy, $1. Four-issue subscription, $3.50. APPLE, Box 2271, Springfield, Illinois 62705

NOW available . . . SDS's 1969 wall calendar—marking the history of the struggle in America. Order now—for gifts or for yourself: $2.00 each, to sustain SDS. Bright colors . . . fully illustrated large beautiful pictures. Order now from SDS, 1608 West Madison, Chicago, Illinois 60612.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Forget anyone?

Did you forget a friend or relative in the gift-giving rush this year? Or did the person you least expected send you a surprise present and you would like to reciprocate? Or perhaps you were just too busy to do all your shopping in time for the holidays.

We think we have the solution to your holiday gift problems. There's still time to send a subscription to The NATION, the gift that will bring your friends enjoyment throughout the coming year.

Act now and we will send you Unless Peace Comes—A Scientific Forecast of New Weapons, edited by Nigel Calder, as our gift to you.

clip & mail

THE NATION

333 Sixth Avenue

New York, N.Y. 10014

MY NAME

STREET

CITY STATE ZIP

I'd like to send gift subscriptions of The NATION to my friends. I enclose $10 for the first gift and $8 for each additional one and understand you'll send me free UNLESS PEACE COMES by Nigel Calder. Please send gift subscriptions to the following.

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

NAME

ADDRESS

zip

Enclose gift card ☐

N12-30

